One morning the doctor, as he was about to leave, motioned across the sick man's bed to David that he wished to speak with him alone. They went out into the hall, where the physician sat down upon a chair and David leant back against a corner of the wall.

Presently Allan heard the confused murmur of their talk. He climbed out of the bed and dragged himself with difficulty across the floor into the sitting-room. Placing his ear against the hall-door, which was not quite closed, he heard all, unseen and unsuspected.

"It is useless for me to continue these daily visits," said the physician; "hereafter I will come only when you send for me."

"Well, what shall we do about—about his eyes?"

"They will probably not pain him any more. You can take off the bandage whenever you are ready to tell him the whole truth."

David's lips grew very white. "You mean that he will never recover?" he said.

The doctor looked up at him suddenly with a frown. "Really," he said, "I thought I had made the state of things pretty clear to you."

"Yes," said David; "I know—but I kept hoping."

"My dear boy, I am sorry, but I cannot even let you hope. If your leg was cut off, would you expect another to grow in its place? A part of the eye is gone—and that ends it."

"And the lameness?"

"He will always walk with crutches."

Perhaps it was well that no mortal eye saw the wan face pressed towards the opening in the door. There was a shuffling across the floor, and Allan drew himself upon the bed again, where he lay motionless and silent, though all his body seemed to quiver and his thoughts to cry aloud.

Presently the footsteps of the doctor sounded on the stairs and the lower door opened and shut. But nearly an hour passed before the younger brother came back to the room. When he came, it was with the belief that he was prepared to speak to Allan and tell him all. He looked for a moment at the figure curled up on the bed, and shook his head. He would wait.

Several days passed. Then in the evening Allan said suddenly to his brother:

"David, what is the matter? Perhaps I imagine it—but is there not something that you want to talk to me about?"

"Yes," said the other, startled.

"It is about my eyes and my lameness, is it not?"

"Yes."

The time had come. He sat down by the bed and took his brother's hand. His own trembled violently, but that of the sick man was quiet.

Digitized by Google

"Poor boy," said Allan, as though not he but David were the one upon whom misfortune had fallen. He stroked his brother's arm gently for a moment, and then whispered: "you need not tell me, David. I know all. I listened when you and the doctor talked about me."

David spoke, also in a whisper: "I could not bear to think it—and so I could not speak to you."

"Poor, dear brother," said Allan, but with perfect calmness. They sat in silence for a few moments, and then Allan said: "Now, David, we have looked the worst of it in the face; let us examine some of the smaller troubles. What about money matters?"

"Oh, Allan," cried the other, "don't ask about that yet."

"Yes," said the elder brother firmly: "you must tell me all. Be frank and fair, as I would be with you."

So David told. The money in the bank was all gone, of course, and there were debts—to the doctor, the chemist, and the landlady. Having explained thus far, David hung back, and it took determined questioning on the part of Allan to bring out the rest of the story. Their friends at the club, knowing the trouble of the brothers, had raised some money—a considerable amount—for their benefit.

"It just paid the nurse," said David.

The proud lines in the other's face deepened to harshness. After a momentary struggle he managed to say aloud: "It was very kind of them."

But to himself into his pillow he muttered: "My God! This is the beginning!"

"I am afraid," said David, "that it will be some time before we can pay up these debts. Everyone seems to be good about it. The doctor says he will wait years if need be."

"Yes," replied Allan absently.

"Of course, you know what my pay is," continued the younger brother, "and you also know what our expenses are. Well, they don't fit. I have been thinking about it. We must move into one room and must economise in various other ways."

"Yes," said Allan.

"The worst of it is," David went on, without looking at his brother, "that we cannot get you the things you ought to have. It is so hard for you to be all alone here——"

"Never mind about that, Davy," said Allan quickly; "what we must think about is how to clear up these debts and how to live on your pay."

After this the old confidence seemed to be restored between the brothers. What small part of the day David was not at work he spent with Allan, and they talked of their affairs just as they had done before the misfortune came. Yet there was one thing David failed to understand, although he studied over it a great deal. Why was Allan so calm and undistressed? It was not like him.

"Can it be that he does not really appreciate what it means to be blind and helpless?" thought the younger brother; "he was always so proud, ambitious, and full of hope. And he is sensitive. I thought he would suffer."

The sick man's strength gradually returned. Presently he was able to move about the room, and then, accompanied by the landlady's little daughter, he managed to make short excursions into the street. He wore a dark shade over his eyes and walked on crutches.

The various economies which the brothers had talked over were practised, and yet every day they ran more into debt. David's pay was very small; it was not enough to keep two people in comfort—one of them an invalid needing medicines and a physician's care. Yet Allan remained apparently unconcerned.

At last David found work to do in the evening. He now earned enough to cover their necessities, but Allan was left alone most of the time.

One evening David had an unexpected vacation. An accident caused the establishment where he worked to close early, and he hurried to the room, eager for the pleasure of a few hours with his brother.

When he came to the street-door, he said to himself: "I will go up quietly and surprise him."

He ascended the stairs with a quiet tread. The door to the room was open, and he saw Allan seated at the table, moving a pencil slowly over a large sheet of paper.

"The poor fellow is trying to write," said David. Then he noticed that the edges of the sheet were notched at intervals and that it had been folded in creases. As the blind man wrote, he felt for these notches, and then ran his finger along the crease in advance of the pencil.

Full of tender sorrow and pity, David crept up behind, that he might put his hand on Allan's shoulder and thus make his presence known; but happening to glance down upon the paper, he saw the words "My dear brother," and he knew that the writing was for him to read.

He did not give himself time to wonder that Allan should be writing to him, but began instantly to decipher the misshapen characters on the paper. In a few moments he had overtaken the pencil:

This is what he read:

MY DEAR BROTHER.—You will find this note fastened up on the outside of the door. Please read it through to the end before you enter. Perhaps you will then think it best not to enter alone.

David, my brother, these words come to you from the dead. I have destroyed the pitiful fragment of life which fate left me. You were wont to be so strong and brave—can you read on calmly now, and try to understand me when I tell you my reason? Can you love me and trust me as you always have done? I believe that you can and will, and that is why I have dared to take this step.

Several days ago I procured some poison, which I have kept concealed from you. Through it death comes swift but painless.

David watched the slow, laborious making of the last few words, and it gave him time to think. Where was the poison? He glanced across the room to the chest of drawers. There was a small drawer at the top which Allan had used exclusively, and which was now half open. With noiseless step, the younger brother crept over the floor to this chest of drawers. The guess was correct. Hidden under some handkerchiefs lay a small phial, filled with a colourless liquid.

David took it up, shook it mechanically, and then turned it over and over in his hands, while he tried to think what he had better do. At any moment Allan might finish his writing and come in search of the poison. It would then be necessary for David to speak aloud and explain, and his brother would suffer the torture of humiliation. That would not do. Better to carry away the phial and make no explanations, unless they were demanded. He was about to steal out of the room, when the thought struck him that his brother, if determined, could secure death by other means than this one bottle of poison. There was a loaded revolver in the drawer—that must be taken away. But what was to prevent Allan from obtaining more poison?

Digitized by Google

He was accustomed to buy his own medicines, now that he was strong enough to get about. Ah, there were so many ways!

The blind man seated at the table wrote on, feeling his way carefully along the folds in the paper. David crouched upon the edge of the bed, watched him and thought:

No; merely to remove the means of death would not save Allan. The only hope lay in appearing to him, in pleading with him for his own life, in conjuring him by the love which held them together, not to do this terrible wrong. What should he say? David was not easy of speech. His very thoughts were blunt, ill-assorted, and confused. Deep in his soul he felt that his brother was about to make a mistake—one of the most awful of which life contained a possibility. This feeling was independent of religion or of superstition; it was a part of David's very existence. But how was he to speak of this to Allan, who seemed to understand everything so much better than he?

And now it suddenly occurred to him that he really did not know his brother. Evidently this design of self-destruction had been in Allan's thoughts for many weeks, and yet he, nearest to him of all beings on earth, had never been allowed to suspect it. This was why Allan had been so calm and had accepted his misfortune so lightly. Tortures of sorrow there must have been, unspeakable agonies of ruined hope, all endured in secrecy and silence. It seemed to David that he himself, and not Allan, must have lacked the power of sight.

But what was to be done now?

The pencil was still moving slowly over the paper. David rose from the bed, and, resuming his place behind the blind man, read on:

This concerns you and me, and no one else; is it not so, brother? The world is far away from us; we are alone together.

Now, what has existence for me? When first I learnt that I was to be always blind and a cripple, there came with the knowledge an impulse for death. But I put it away and said: "No, let me think of this more fully. The calamity seems now to sweep over all of life. Perhaps when I am more calm I shall find that much remains untouched." So I waited and thought—and in the end I found one thing, the happiness of being with you. That is real and lasting; and for a time I asked myself if it were not enough. But I remembered that my existence, wretched and useless as it was, meant more of labour and of hardship for you, and I thought, too, of what sorrow you must feel for me; and the pleasure of being with you turned to bitterness. There was nothing left.

But you—you love me, and you have a right to my life. It is for your sake that I have spent these long weeks in silent, solitary debate, after every other doubt was cleared away. At one time I had almost decided to beg my life of you, as I might any other favour—but I dared not. Yet I am begging it now—after I have taken it.

Dear brother, I know that you are unselfish. I believe that for my sake you would give up the greatest happiness which life affords—as I would for you. Can you not then allow me the little that I take when I deprive myself and you of my existence? If, now, the conditions were reversed—if I were the one to be strong and well, while you were crippled and blind—I try to think of it in that way, in order that I may understand it better and judge more fairly—I should, of course, feel an intense sorrow——

What was the matter? The pencil was moving slower and slower. At last it stopped. David looked up at his brother's face and saw it working with strong emotion. Then, after a moment the pencil went on:

——that you should suffer so, and it would be an unspeakable happiness to help, to work for you—you would be dearer to me then, a thousand times, than if——.

"Oh, what am I saying!" exclaimed the blind man, aloud. The pencil dropped from his fingers, and he threw himself back in his chair. "I could not let him go," he cried; "it would be cruel in him to leave me. But I—what will he—oh, Davy!"

He leant upon the table with his face resting in his open hands, while David stood watching almost breathless in the struggle to keep silent. At last, Allan caught up the sheets of paper on which he had been writing and tore them to fragments.

"It is over," said David. He restored the bottle to its place, and crept past his brother out of the room. Presently Allan heard the street door noisily open and shut, and David's tread sounded upon the stairs.

That night, as the brothers were about to retire, Allan said:

"David, there is something that I want to promise you. I have already promised myself, but I want to assure you of it also."

"Yes," said David; "what is it?"

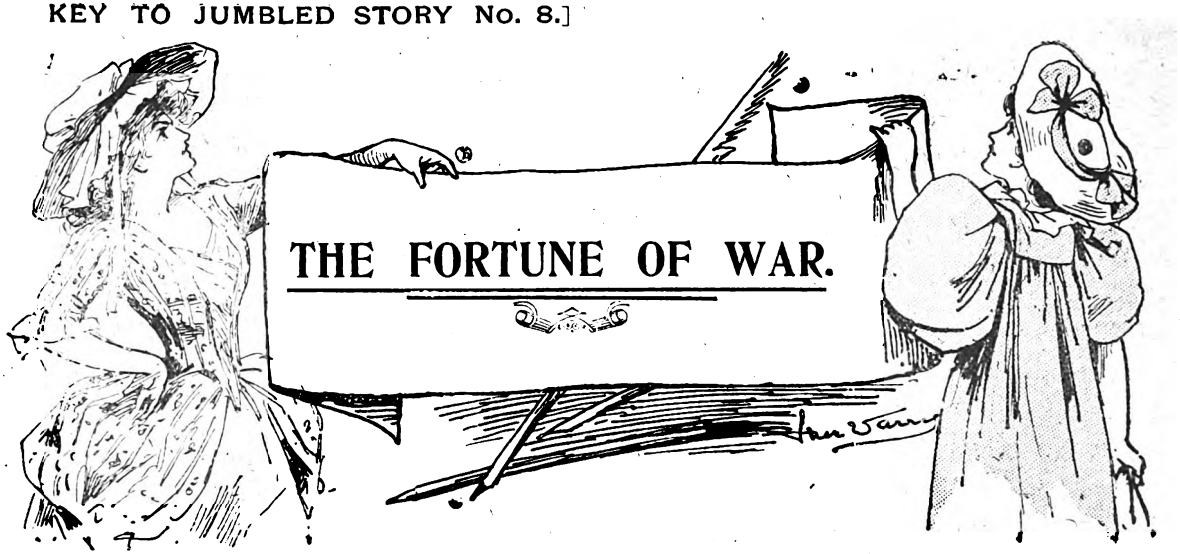
"I think I had best not tell you what it is. You would—you would be distressed, perhaps. But I promise you."

"Very well," said David; "let it remain a secret; then. But I accept the promise."

CHARLES DWIGHT WILLARD.

Digitized by Google

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY No. 8.]



THE FORTUNE OF WAR.

THEY had caught him red-handed, absolutely red-handed, prowling about within the French lines, in the vicinity of the regimental stores.

He was a miserable enough looking specimen of humanity, in all conscience, small and thin, with a dirty beard, which evidently had not been trimmed for weeks past.

It was easy enough to guess his nationality; he was a Jew, and the Jews have never been a popular people in France.

So they brought him before the general, a bluff, hard drinking, hard-swearing soldier, with as much feeling in his body as there is in a plank board, and about as many qualifications for acting the part of judge.

"Where was he found, do you say?" he asked.

"He was sneaking about near the bread waggons, general," was the reply of the lieutenant who had made this important capture.

"What were you doing there?" thundered the general.

The miserable Jew whined and wept, and protested that he was doing no harm—that he was only looking for a bit of bread to bring back to his wife and childen.

At least that is what he tried to tell them.

But they were not disposed to take much trouble in attempting to understand him.

They were in no humour just then for sifting the excuses made by a dirty little Polish Jew.

"Bread!" sneered the general, who had dined well that day, "a likely story, I must say. Where are his wife and children, I should like to know. He only speaks German: and it is clear that he is nothing but a German spy. Take him away and let him be shot at daybreak. It will encourage the others."

Sedan had fallen but a few days before; and all Frenchmen felt that nothing but blood could wipe out the national disgrace.

Of course, the blood of this weedy-looking wretch could not be reckoned as very much; but it was something.

It would make a beginning, as it were.

Besides, he was easier to deal with than most of the Germans whom they had met up to the present had proved to be.

They took him away, and on the following morning, as the sun was rising gloriously and pouring his rays down upon the small valley, they led him forth, put him before a platoon, and bound his eyes.

The unfortunate wretch implored them for mercy; but his cries fell upon deaf ears. Mercy!—after Sedan!

A likely thing, forsooth.

The word was given, the rifles rang out, and the little Jew fell forward upon his face, dead.

"So perish all enemies of France!" exclaimed the general, when they told him that his orders had been duly carried out.

The sentiment was a truly patriotic one.

And it was so much easier to overcome a diminutive Polish Jew than the German armies.

They threw him into a hastily made grave; and then prepared to retreat further before the advancing enemy.

Later in the day a poor-looking woman with one child in her arms, and leading another by the hand, came into the camp, and began to make anxious inquiries about her husband, who had left her the previous evening to try and obtain food for herself and the children.

They questioned her; and after some time they found that the missing husband was none other than the Jew whom they had just shot as a spy.

So they took her, and showed her the newly-made grave.

The general was told about the mistake they had made.

"Sacré nom," he exclaimed, "the little fool. Why did he not say so?"

In the hurry of departure they soon forgot a little incident like this.

After all, it was only the fortune of war.

They marched away from the little valley with bands playing, colours flying, and the various other accompaniments of "glorious war."

And none thought of the woman with the ragged shawl around her head, lying beside the mound where the sod had been recently disturbed, and who was weeping bitterly; while her two children looked on with wide open eyes.

They did not understand.

R. JOHNSTON.

Digitized by Google

BY MISS WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," "Through the Valley," "Six First-class Passengers," etc., etc.

PAUPER BLUE BLOOD.

CHAPTER XXII.

The Death of the Heir.

Lady Ravenscroft knew that Sefton had thus garbed and disguised himself for the purpose of wounding her, and calming down, determined to disappoint him.

For this reason she adopted an alarmingly boisterous manner, laughing and talking loudly as if from bravado, and appearing in such hilarious spirits, that the sedate county magnates looked askance at their bouncing hostess.

Sefton saw and felt it. It seemed to him that Georgina was forcing her hospitality upon these people. She could not contain her delight at their presence, the splendour of her own entertainment had turned her head. She did nothing quietly, but rushed hither and thither introducing men to girls they had known all their lives, and thus revealing her ignorance of near neighbours. She exclaimed at each fresh costume, and poured profuse compliments into the ear of every new arrival, and all the while John Reginald slumbered sweetly in his basket to the bewilderment of all beholders.

"He is just like a doll," declared a group of baby worshippers gathered round Sir Sefton's heir. "What a marvellous child to sleep so soundly!"

But the elderly ladies cast up their eyes, and murmured it was shocking to treat a young infant so carelessly. Eventually, however, when Georgina began to dance, she tossed the basket with her offspring upon the sofa, from whence it was borne away by an extremely elegant nurse.

Throughout the evening Georgina felt as if the ghost of Sir Reginald were haunting her. Every glimpse of Sefton among the gaily-attired crowd goaded her on to nosier excitement. Once he hissed in her ear:

"For goodness sake, control yourself!" But she glanced up defiantly, flung back her wild black locks, and laughed.

"We are all on the razzle-dazzle to-night!" she cried. Yet her mirth was somewhat hysterical and overdone.

Not until supper, however, did Lady Ravenscroft's crowning offence occur.

Down the centre of the room was a long table, while smaller ones were grouped round the wall. She had gone in amongst the first batch of guests, and was making herself conspicuous by chaffing old Lord Curgenven, one of the leading lights of the county, in an unpleasantly familiar strain.

Sefton, who had shadowed her from the first, hot and ashamed of her vulgarity, which wealth increased and brought out, instead of concealing, now listened silently scornful, looking his disapproval.

In the midst of her aimless and frivolous talk, she gave a little scream, and upset a plate of trifle.

"Something touched my legs!" she cried, "it did truly! Oh! please look to see if there is anything under the table."

Her partner bent down and lifted up a fluffy cat.

"What a dear thing," said a fair girl next to Lord Curgenven. "Do pass it this way, Lady Ravenscroft."

Sefton was close to Georgina, and his presence was like a red rag to a bull. She knew he was watching and criticising her actions aversely.

She snatched the cat out of the young man's arms, and called out loudly:

"Here you are! Catch it, Lord Curgenven!"

With these words she flung the unfortunate animal across the table, and in its dizzy flight, it scratched Lady Curgenven's delicate white shoulder, landed somewhere among the valuable lace of her skirt, tearing wildly away with the torn fragments in its claws.

Nobody smiled, nor yet spoke for a moment.

"I say, awful hard luck on the poor beast," muttered her partner, as Lady Ravenscroft turned laughingly away, to make room for fresh comers.

"Do you mean the cat or Lady Curgenven? I did not intend it to land upon her neck and scramble off with the dress trimmings."

"How horribly cruel!" said the fair girl, as Georgina vanished through the doorway. "I should be sorry to be Lady Ravenscroft's tame cat."

Sefton apologised as best he could; and Lady Curgenven, really sorry for the husband's strained look and evident annoyance, made light of her scratches. But, in reality, she was seriously offended, and determined never to enter Georgina's house again.

"And that woman," thought Sefton to himself, "is the mother of my child!" If only it were not for John Reginald, he would sell the place, that he now hated, over Georgina's head. He could part with it in its altered condition without a pang; but that living tie was still between them—the son whose entrance into the world had brought misery upon his father.

The whirl of the valse tortured Sefton's brain; he pined for a moment's reprieve.

In his musty garments he wended his way upstairs to the bedside of that tiny creature—the boy given him by Georgina.

Digitized by Google

The room was in half darkness, and the swing cot stood near the lowered gas burner. He approached it on tip-toe, a weird figure in wig and ruffles.

Ah! John Reginald, it was well for you that you could not see the light in your father's eye, the queer smile flickering round his nervous, twitching lips, nor yet read in his black heart the urging devil whispers of madness.

No one was sitting by the child, the nurse had been lured away by the sound of enticing dance music.

At that very moment she was whirling down a distant passage in the arms of a powdered footman.

The brown gipsy tint had been greased off the baby's face, he still lay dreaming, his small fists clenched, his mouth open.

"So you're sleeping under the Ravenscroft colours, are you?" muttered Sefton, and the curtains shook as his trembling figure leant against the silk frilled drapery. "Poor John Reginald, what a life you will have with Georgina to rear and train you in the way you should go. She will make you hate me."

He bent down till his hot breath fanned the infant's cheek.

"She sported you to-night for a show, flaunted you as our joint property with your skin stained, and a red spangled wrapper about your head. That's what she will do till the end; swagger at our expense," he told the child in laboured gasps. "You sleep like the dead, John Reginald. Is it the influence of your two namesakes? Do they whisper from their restful tombs?"

He waited, but John Reginald answered not. The power of the drug was still upon him. Suddenly an inspiration seized Sir Sefton, one that brought no horror to the man's heart, only a sensation of unutterable delight. It would be sweet to embitter Georgina's cup on this, of all nights—to rob her of the son who kindled the light of pride in her eyes—to give John Reginald back.

"It was all a mistake, little chap," he whispered. "You should never have opened your eyes and looked upon Georgina Pluff. She cannot be a Ravenscroft. She obtained the name by threats; she is worse than the lowest woman in the land. Her treachery will flow in your veins; the offspring of such a mother is not fit to live!"

He bent lower over the cot, his hand, outstretched, spread its burning palm across the rosebud mouth, the lace falling from his wrist swept the white sheets and lay upon the spotless baby gown. These old world garments seemed to have transformed Sir Sefton into a living fiend.

He stood there, a smile upon his lips, destroying Georgina's flesh and blood, which was his own, glad beyond measure.

A faint movement, he fancied, of the unconscious child, then a convulsive struggle, and John Reginald breathed no more.

It was dark, he could not see the still features of his murdered son. He only cowered back, and let his arms fall to his sides limply. Then stealing softly across the room with the cunning of madness, Sir Sefton passed unseen down the stairs, to rejoin the merry throng below.

Georgina was still dancing, she did not know her child lay stiff and dead in the room above, killed by her husband's hand. Life was all music and laughter to her in that hour of triumph.

"Where did your husband get his costume?" asked a Pierrot with whom she was valsing.

"Out of the box-room," she answered lightly. 'It looks like it, doesn't it?"

She turned to get a better view of Sefton as she stopped dancing. What a spectre he appeared, with his pale, haggard face and frowsy garments, the sight of him dispelled Georgina's smiles.

As she passed out of the ballroom he laid his fingers on her arm and drew her back.

"I hope you are enjoying yourself, darling," he muttered.

She started, half frightened at his words, for his tone was ribald and the look in his eyes sinister.

"Yes," she retorted, "and so is everyone but you."

"Oh, I am quite jolly!" he replied. "Never felt happier in my life."

Georgina did not believe him, but she nodded and slipped away.

Sir Sefton had not danced that night, but now he selected a partner, and seemed quite impatient for the music to commence. He had always been known as the best dancer in the county, and as he steered an exquisite snow queen through the crowd of whirling figures his pulses beat fiercely, for he thought of his son's soul.

"It has gone back," he told himself, "to the God that gave it and the name of Ravenscroft shall likewise die. It has brought a curse upon me and upon my house. John Reginald, good-bye."

The music wailed and he fancied he heard the joyful shout of a child-angel wafted through the air.

"Really, James, you mustn't keep me longer, upon my word!" declared John Reginald's nurse, panting from her impromptu hop upon the upper landing. "It is as much as my place is worth, to risk being caught dancing here with you at this hour, when that blessed baby's all alone. But there! men don't consider what they lay us women open to."

James protested that he required Susan far more than the "hinfant," for Susan had a lofty bearing, and the slimmest waist at Ravenscroft Park. But Susan was firm in her conviction that enough was as good as a feast, and hurried away with a shake of her head, and a glance of admiration at her pointed slippers.

She sailed majestically into the nursery, half hoping James would venture to follow, turned up the light, and regarded herself in the glass. Her cap was decidedly crooked, and she righted it with a muttered protest against the clumsiness of the stronger sex. Then, with an impatient sigh, turned to her charge.

The stillness of the child, and the look on his white face staggered her. She raised him in her arms and felt his heart, then laid him back with trembling hands, while a flood of hysterical tears drenched her cheeks. She was a very excitable woman, and hardly knew what she did as she rushed from the room and down the stairs into the huge hall. The lancers were being played, and Lady Ravenscroft was the centre of the liveliest set, when Susan hastened in among the dancers, wringing her hands.

"Oh! my lady! my lady!" she cried, grasping Georgina's flowing garments, and dragging her towards the door.

"What is the matter?" asked Lady Ravenscroft wildly, then seeing the nurse's wet cheeks, she beat her hands together frantically, and exclaiming: "John Reginald!" flew at lightning speed towards the nursery.

A moment later and her bloodshot eyes were staring in horrified amazement upon the body of her lifeless child. She could not speak, scream, or move, but her teeth rattled in her head, and her knees knocked together.

At last a question broke from her livid lips:

"How did he die?"

"In a moment, my lady—a convulsion—I had only just left the room—hardly a second before."

Georgina raised her hands with a gesture of despair, staggered back, and fell prostrate at her husband's feet. He had followed her mechanically, apparently too dazed to notice what had happened. He never looked at the small, cold corpse, but bent over the fainting figure of Georgina, in her long black wig and carefully designed dress, raising her with apparent ease, and bearing her away to her own room.

The chill horror and dread of sudden death crept over the large assembly below as the music ceased, and cloaked figures crowded out through the open door. They all thought of the sleeping infant which only a few hours ago had been so conspicuously in their midst, and murmured each their individual opinions in hushed undertones.

Digitized by Google

The empty rooms and deserted supper tables presented a mournful aspect in the dim rays of the early dawn, while the carriages rolled solemnly down the long drive, fleeing from the grim abode of death.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Soul's Awakening.

When Georgina opened her eyes Mrs. Humphery was bending over her.

"Is it true," she asked, "that John Reginald is dead?"

She half expected a shocked and hasty "No." Surely that immovable infant face must have been the outcome of a fevered dream!

But Mrs. Humphery bowed her head in silent assent, and the mother's heart grew cold, hardened by her great sorrow.

"Are we alone?" she whispered.

"Yes."

"Don't say a word, I intreat you," clutching Mrs. Humphery's arm; "I killed him—oh, God!—by my wickedness! It was the drug which I called harmless. He slept so soundly, he lay so still—like a waxen image; but I little thought I was putting him to sleep for ever!"

Georgina covered her face with her hands, and her friend expected to hear her stifled sobs. But no convulsive weeping shook her frame; her features remained passive and white. She could not cry; the blow had stunned her. Henceforth she must be childless, unloved and alone; widowed, yet fettered—tied to a living man who was worse than dead to her.

"Could he suspect?" she wondered. "Did Sefton know that his son had been tampered with, drugged by the mother's hand? If so, what would he think of her now?"

"Do you imagine my husband guesses?" she asked.

"No, dear, not for a moment. You had nothing to do with the poor little dear's end, so don't trouble about that soothing mixture. I shall say nothing, and do not think of it again."

"But it is so terrible I shall never cease thinking of it. Oh! why did I name him Reginald?—that unlucky name! There is a fate against it. I have never known a happy, or fortunate Reginald, they live to suffer, or else die young."

"Happy! fortunate! your child is both. He is safe from the world and its temptations."

"But I cannot spare him," cried Georgina fiercely. "He was mine, my very own, part of myself. In his death the centre of my being is destroyed, cut off. Think of it all, he was to inherit my money, now there is no heir, the title will die out, there is nothing worth living for, nothing left."

But Mrs. Humphery kept her own counsel as she listened. She knew that Georgina's passionate nature must rebel for a time, and chafe against its loss. But when the first agony of grief wore off she would lift up her head again and as freely crave for the wine of life and the pleasures that were now swamped by the night mists of bereavement.

The following morning the Humpherys left.

"I am afraid to look at the child," Georgina whispered as she wished her friend good-bye. "I dare not face him again."

Later in the day Sefton came to his wife's room. They had not spoken since John Reginald's death.

"I came about those flowers you sent to the nursery," he said abruptly. "Why did you not take them yourself? You have not seen the boy since last night."

"No." She shook her head mournfully, raising her tearless eyes to Sefton. "I shall never see him again."

Her husband leant against the bed-post with a queer expression on his face that Georgina could not understand.

"I wonder," he began, speaking slowly, "what caused his sudden death. I suppose it was quite natural."

Lady Ravenscroft whitened to her very lips. Was it possible that a sneering smile lurked for a moment round her husband's mouth? If so he divined the truth, and the awful stillness of John Reginald at the ball had not escaped the father's shrewd wits. She felt like a convicted criminal before the judge.

"You don't reply. Have you no theory on the subject?"

"He—he—died in a convulsion," she answered faintly. "The nurse said so, and now the doctor confirms it."

A long silence, in which Georgina's eyes were lowered.

"That is the statement I accept, but not the one I believe," Sefton retorted grimly.

He wished to arouse her curiosity. He expected a flow of excited questions, but they did not come.

Georgina stood with tightly-folded hands, voiceless, and apparently unmoved. Only the sign of deeper feeling past the power of words lay revealed in her dry, burning eyes, opened widely, and raised at last to confront her husband.

"All I know," she muttered, her fast breathing half choking her utterance, "is that our son lies dead! I care to hear nothing more. I only want him back. That is impossible. No amount of talking will bring him his life again. The child, the one tie between us, has been severed. God willed it so, maybe as a judgment, a punishment! I am not resigned; I can never be that. Only one thing I ask and pray of you, my husband, both now and in the future, never to mention John Reginald's name. I could not bear it. All trace of him must be put away—out of sight. Our child is dead, indeed; let us, if we can, forget him."

She spoke excitedly, her hands clasped over her heart, a crimson flush standing out in streaks on her hitherto pale skin.

Georgina was commending her son's memory to unbroken silence for a special purpose. She believed now that her husband suspected her of drugging the child and being thus connected with his mysteriously sudden death. Hints and half-veiled suggestions would be intolerable. In the face of remarks such as Sefton had just made her life must become a spell of dread, warding off the hateful innuendoes of her husband.

He bowed his head.

"So be it," he answered, the curious look in his eyes hidden. "For the last time, I mention his name. John Reginald, you are no more, and henceforth there is a seal set on your memory. You have gone into realms of forgetfulness; it is better so."

As he spoke he grasped his wife's hands with a cruel grip, and she beheld his face as she had never seen it before, lit up with a weird radiance, half angel, half devil! She scanned the features as if he were a stranger in whom she tried to seek some likeness to a man she had once known, perhaps almost loved.

But before she could speak he had dropped her hands, and turned away.

She watched him go without daring to call him back.

As the door closed, Georgina owned to herself that her resolve never to speak of John Reginald again had caused her the most painful effort of her life.

"Where have you gone?" she cried, seeking the enfranchised spirit of her child in the shadows of departing day, "my little lamb, not yet to the cold damps of the grave, yet out into vast incomprehensible eternity." She moved as she uttered her pitiful wail, away from the warm glow of a bright log fire, and crossed to the window. The sky was leaden, the bare trees waved their gaunt arms aloft to the wild grey clouds above. It was winter without, and winter in her heart.

For months Georgina had not listened to a sermon, and suddenly the grim deserted scene took voice and movement. The uncovered boughs, the floating mists on high, the sodden grass, and empty earth flower beds all preached to her of a Deity, and like messengers clothed with a prophet's mantle, asserted the magnificence, the awfulness, and the goodness of the Omnipotent!

Digitized by Google

Dumb with the mute astonishment of thrilling realisation, Georgina hearkened to this lesson issuing from creation.

Ravenscroft Park might be modernised within, but the monarch trees without, the far-reaching landscape defied her. Never in sunniest summer days had it worn a nobler aspect than now, as night swept down, and the woman, feeling her own insignificance, gazed wonderingly at that splendid mirror upon which God reflected his greatness.

The unseen powers around had given her for a few brief seconds spiritual eyesight.

She fancied that the earth shook, and the pillars of the world trembled under her, that the countenance of Heaven turned from grey to appalling blackness, the day of vengeance was at hand, hastened by hardness of heart, unbelief, impenitence! A dreadful vision of the final separation between the good and the bad rose threateningly. Her Inferno was to be always with Sefton, in a city of wickedness and wretchedness, built up by the jealousies, bickerings, railings, and disputings of past centuries. She struggled to free herself from this horrible dream besetting her in an hour of wakefulness, and her efforts were as the stormy strivings of disturbed elements. The tempest within Georgina seemed to mingle earth and sky in one wild scene of fierce confusion.

With a cry she banished the fearful picture conjured by her brain. What if she—the designing adventuress, the unloved wife—the frivolous, careless mother, who had sacrificed her offspring for a whim, could cast down the fabric of her old unworthy life, and rear a new creation on the ruins of the past.

Wrought on by remorse she sank beneath an accumulation of self reproach, and burying her head on the window-sill, gasped forth a halting prayer, torn, tossed, crushed, seared by a swift revival of apparently dead principle and conscience.

Her earnest desire to know more of God astounded Georgina, for already a strange unaccountable tranquility calmed her racking nerves. She looked upwards and spoke with sure confidence. "Heaven," she said pressing her hands to her heart, "has begun already; its powers are in action."

The worthlessness of everything but faith swayed her mind, till it seemed to soar to the land into which John Reginald had been gathered.

She held him in her arms again, and talked with his glorious companions. All things around them were pure and lovely—exquisitely innocent, as the child who had never tasted sin.

For the first time since his death, the tears poured in torrents down Lady Ravenscroft's drawn cheeks, shedding their healing waters on her parched, dry heart.

"We have found Him together, baby," she whispered to her angel child; "the One who can heal the broken-hearted, and set at liberty them that are bruised."

So she knelt still by the window, with her face buried in her hands, while the fire burnt low, and the dark mists of night shed their chill breath upon the panes.

Only in that intense quiet a mocking, distant laugh came wafted on imagination's wings, whispering that the bruise was difficult to heal, and could not be cured in a day, perhaps never in this world.

And the laugh was always Sefton's.

When eventually a maid, taper in hand, entered Lady Ravenscroft's room to light the blazing gas-burners in their decorative globes, she started back in trepidation at the sight of her mistress.

What an object of misery crouched by the window curtains, sick in body, sad in soul, bowed down with woe, stricken by care!

"My lady," she said softly, trying to raise her.

Georgina lifted her head, and, lo! the face that was marred by weeping was also wreathed in smiles.

"I am cold," she murmured; "stir up the fire, light all the candles and the gas, draw the blinds."

Then for the first time Georgina remembered that conventionality should have prevented her raising the window's veil, since John Reginald's white image lay upstairs—not John Reginald, only the casket that once held his soul.

"Where is Sir Sefton?" asked Lady Ravenscroft.

The maid looked down; her eyes were moist.

"Upstairs, my lady," she replied.

"In the nursery?"

"Yes; he has been sitting there for the last hour."

"You can go," said Georgina, sinking into a chair.

She listened to the retreating footsteps.

"What does it mean?" she asked herself. "Sefton would not look at the child while he lived, and now when I cannot bear to face those ashen features, he watches as if guarding by the dead?" It was uncanny, she thought, her husband's attraction for that room. Oh, if she could only read his mind—decipher his inner self.

But Lady Ravenscroft did not know what she was wishing, or she might have thanked God for her blindness and incapacity.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 9.

THE guinea goes this week for London to A. Richards, 66, Dalston Lane, N.E., and for the provinces to A. Clayton, 226, Wheeler Street, Aston, nr. Birmingham.

The sentence was "Octavia sprang forward with a little cry."

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.

No. 8

THE following three competitors—Mrs. Alley, 56, Baronscourt Road, West Kensington, N.W.; Mrs. J. W. Blakston, 11 Brinkburn Street, Sunderland; Mrs. E. Glave, 8, Windsor Terrace, Uplands, Swansea—have forwarded the best solutions to the eighth Jumbled Story, and the first three prizes have therefore been equally divided between them; that is to say, each of the above-named will receive a cheque for £2 6s. 8d. The remaining three prizes of £1 each are awarded to the following: A. B. Hind, 44, Lloyd Street, Manchester; Mrs. Dudley, 17, Springfield Terrace, Kidderminster; C. W. Garbutt, 3, Ovington Street, Middlesbrough-on-Tees.

Post-Card Competition.—No. II.

A GUINEA is offered to the first person living within 100 miles of London whose post-card is received at this office bearing the solution to the following anagram, which, when correctly transposed, forms the title to a forthcoming serial story in Short Stories. Another guinea is offered for the same task to the first reader whose attempt is posted at a place more than 100 miles from London. Post-cards only, please.

TONING LIKE THAT FAT LASS.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS

IN THE

TREATMENT OF OBESITY.

Our corpulent readers will be glad to learn how to positively lose two stone in about a month with the greatest possible benefit in health, strength and muscle by a comparatively new system. It is a singular paradox that the patient, returning quickly to a healthy state, with increased activity of brain, digestive and other organs, naturally requires more food than hitherto, yet, notwithstanding this, he absolutely loses in weight 1lb. or 2lb. daily, as the weighing-machine will prove. Thus there is no suggestion of starvation. It is an absolute success, and the author, who has devoted years of study to the subject, absolutely guarantees a noticeable reduction within twenty-four hours of commencing the treatment. This is different with other diseases, for the patient in some cases may go for weeks without being able to test whether the Physician has rightly treated him, and may have derived no real or apparent improvement in health. Here, we repeat, the author guarantees it in twenty-four hours, the scale to be the unerring judge. The treatment aims at the actual root of the disease, so that the superfluous fat does not return when discontinuing the treatment. It is perfectly harmless. We advise our readers to call the attention of stout friends to this, because, sincerely, we think they ought to know. For this information, we may say that on sending two penny stamps a book "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), containing a reprint of press notices from some hundreds of Medical and other journals (British and Foreign), and other interesting particulars, including the "recipe," can be had from a Mr. F. C. Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Extract from The Belfast News Letter.

A POSITIVE REMEDY

FOR

CORPULENCE

Any remedy that can be suggested as a cure or alleviation for stoutness will be heartily welcomed. We have recently received a well-written book, the author of which seems to know what he is talking about. It is entitled, "Corpulency, and the Cure" (256 pages), and is a cheap issue (only 2d.), published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. Our space will not do justice to this book; send for it yourself. It appears that Mr. Russell has submitted all kinds of proofs to the English Press. The editor of the Tablet, the Catholic organ, writes: "Mr. Russell does not give us the slightest loophole for a doubt as to the value of his cure, for in the most straightforward and matter-of-fact manner he submitted some hundreds of original and unsolicited testimonial letters for our perusal, and offered us plenty more if required. To assist him to make this remedy known, we think we cannot do better than publish quotations from some of the letters submitted. The first one, a marchioness, writes from Madrid: 'My son, Count ——, has reduced his weight in twenty-two days 16 kilos—i.e., 34lb.' Another writes: 'So far (six weeks from the commencement of following your system) I have lost fully two stone in weight.' The next (a lady) writes: 'I am just half the size.' A fourth: 'I find it is successful in my case. I have lost 8lb. in weight since I commenced (two weeks).' Another writes: 'A reduction of 18lb. in a month is a great success.' A lady from Bournemouth writes: 'I feel much better, have less difficulty in breathing, and can walk about.' Again, a lady says: 'It reduced me considerably, not only in the body, but all over.' The author is very positive. He says: 'Step on a weighing-machine on Monday morning and again on Tuesday, and I guarantee that you have lost 2lb. in weight without the slightest harm, and vast improvement in health through ridding the system of unhealthy accumulations.'"—Cork Herald.

Digitized by Google

TRILENE MEGA TABLETS
THE ONLY CURE for STOUTNESS Registered by GOVERNMENT Price 2/6

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West-Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16½st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid. VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Road, Lambeth, London.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 184, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb.

JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C. N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

THE WHITE ELEPHANT (SEE PAGE 360).

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 403. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 19TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

Dress at First Cost.

NEW AUTUMN FABRICS.

PATTERNS ARE NOW READY,

And will be sent in order of application received.

NOVELTIES in Silk and Wool Figured and Chiné Etamine, Broché and Fancy Shot Repps, Glacé Silk Poplins and Mélanges, Canvas Cloth in Black and Colours; Venetian, Covert and Melton Cloth Coatings, Frieze and Cheviot Coatings, Repp, Poplins, Vigoyne and Habit Cloths, Mohair Brochés and Alpacas, Black and New Dress Materials: Endless variety, at all prices.

Regd. Trade Mark.

DRESS LENGTHS FROM 3/11 TO 48/-

Patterns on approval Post Free.

No Agents. Sole Address THE

BRADFORD MANUFACTURING CO. LTD.,

Depot S. S.—BRADFORD, YORKS.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON

Digitized by Google

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Provents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 20, Belvedere Road, Lambeth, London.

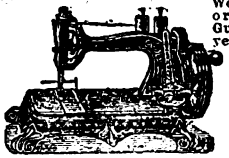
TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Store, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 189, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.: 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 38

Sept. 19, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

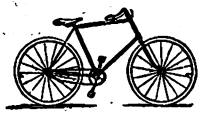
HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid. VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.



ARMSTRONG'S

Lady's & Gentleman's, from £5 10s., carriage paid. Prompt delivery, lists free. SPORTING GUN DEPT., Collingwood Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Dr. Mackenzie's

ARSENICAL TOILET

SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON,

Drum in position, 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T D.," 57, Strand, London.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

OUR GRAND BONUS PARCEL.

GREAT DISTRIBUTION of VALUABLE PRIZES.

A CHANCE SELDOM MET WITH.

Given away Free of Charge to Our Customers.

100 Golden Sovereigns, 100 Half-sovereigns, 100 Five-shilling pieces, 100 real Silver Watches, 500 Framed Oil Paintings, 500 Clocks, 500 Keyless Watches, 500 Real Gold Brooches, 500 Real Gold Rings, 500 Silver Brooches, 500 Silver Rings, 500 Silver Pins.

We guarantee at least one prize to every ten persons entering into our grand Bonus Parcel scheme.

Every parcel contains: A beautiful Crocodile Leatherette Writing Case, with compartments, note-papers, envelopes, and blotting-paper, one of Raphael Tuck's best 6d. Plaques, a beautiful Model Theatre with side wings, figures, and words complete, a Comical Climbing Monkey, Pack of Cards, the Old Maid's Game, a Card of Tools, the complete Game of Ludo, the Performing Sailor, Race Game, with board, horses, etc., a Transformation Album, over 50 changes of figures, a Working Japanese Signalman, 3 Japanese Lanterns, Tuck's Panorama Toy Books, in colours, a beautiful Model Fire Escape, with extending ladders, fireman rescuing child, made to put together and move along. 1 Box of pretty Japanese Expanding Flowers, Spring Pistol with dart and bird complete, Story Book of Mother Hubbard, in colours, Running Crocodile, Grand Bicycle Race Game, board, bikes, and boys to move. The popular game of Jumpkins, 3 Fancy Plaques, a magnificent elegant Fancy Carved Table Mat, the marvellous Optical Illusion, Trilby hypnotised by Svengali, moves across the room, the String and Ball Puzzle, the Magic Cylinder Puzzle, Japanese Butterfly Trick, Double-headed Puzzle, the Card Square Illusion.

This entire lot of goods we send carriage free for 2s. 6d. (two parcels 4s. 6d.), and in every parcel is a Prize Coupon which entitles you to an equal chance of obtaining one of the valuable prizes mentioned at top without any charge whatever. You obtain most splendid value in the parcel for 2s. 6d., and the prizes we give free. As this offer may not appear again, send at once. There is no trick about this, we did the same thing last winter, and one out of every 10 persons that sent got a prize; names and addresses of winners near you on receipt of a stamp.

J. THEOBALD & CO.,

19, FARRINGDON ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

A LOVELY FIGURE

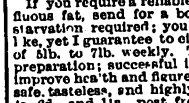
with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B.J." Oriental Toilet Co., 57, Strand, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof F.T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.



CAMDEN HIGHEST GRADE & AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.

IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.

Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.

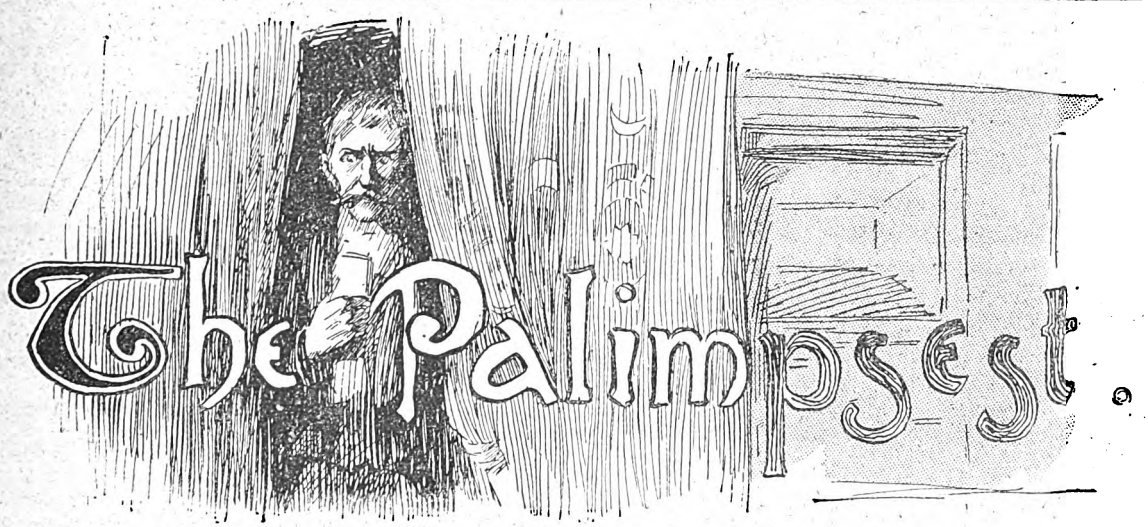
Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS.

BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 403.] For the Week ending September 19th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.



I LITTLE expected when the Minister of Fine Arts commissioned me to secure for the French Government a palimpsest, that I was to witness—indeed, to play a small part in—a very moving tragedy. A palimpsest, as you know, is a manuscript of which the original text has been covered and new text super-imposed—generally the work of monks of the tenth century, who needed more parchments on which to inscribe their ecclesiastical writings. The re-agents of modern chemistry have made it possible to restore the original text, and some of the most precious gems of Greek and Latin literature have thus been redeemed from the desecrations of over-zealous clerics.

This particular parchment had been discovered to be a palimpsest in the last century; but it had been lost, before it could be deciphered, in the sacking of the Abbey of Faverney, in 1793, and had only recently been heard of again in the library of an eccentric Russian, Prince Volkine, who was suspected of being a Nihilist, and had died mysteriously a year before. The library of this Prince Volkine—curious name, Volkine, I thought; evidently of Slavic origin: Vilko, vilk, vulk, volk, Volkine the same root; meaning a wolf—was to be sold by his widow, and as other collectors and libraries would be after it, I lost no time in setting out for the Château de Doremont, where the princess resided.

That very evening I took the Basle express. In the compartment with me were a lady and gentleman to whom I paid no particular attention. As the train started, he drew out a bundle of papers and began to read them, and the lady, leaning her head comfortably against his shoulder, closed her eyes with a contented smile and settled herself for a nap. She was a dainty little woman, with fair hair, great black eyes, and a pale complexion. She was not pretty, however, a bulging forehead, thin lips, and a short nose, made her almost ugly. But her face beamed with the beauty that illumines the faces of all women who love and know themselves beloved.

Soothed by the movement of the train, I, too, soon dropped off to sleep. Suddenly I awoke with a start. Before me, kneeling in the middle of the compartment, was the man, motionless as if petrified with fear. His haggard eyes stared with dilated pupils straight before him; his parted lips moved in a vain effort to make a sound; and his right arm, stretched rigidly towards the open window, pointed out upon the moonlit plain. An almost unintelligible murmur now came from his lips. "The snow!" he stammered; "the snow! How cold it is, how cold!"

The young woman had sprung up in alarm. "Lucien, Lucien," she cried, "it is I—I who am here with you," and she tried to raise his inert body.

Suddenly the intensity of his gaze relaxed, his lips closed, and he burst into a peal of shrill laughter.

"Farewell, old wolf!" he cried, in a tone of concentrated hate; "the wolves will spare the wolf," and he fell back unconscious.

Now a strange change took place in the man. From beneath his lids two tears stole down his cheeks—he was weeping. And for some moments he wept, silently and motionless. The woman had taken him in her arms, now kissing his hands, now wiping his tears away with her handkerchief. Little by little his contracted limbs relaxed, he sighed deeply, and his eyes opened.

"What has happened?" he asked, in evident astonishment.

But the train had slackened up and stopped, the guard opened the door and cried "Jussy," and as this was my station, I bowed, and hastily stepped down upon the platform. As I left the train, I heard the great clock of some neighbouring church strike eleven.

I was driven over to the Château de Doremont the next morning, and found that the Princess Volkine was in Paris, but was expected to return any moment. When I explained my mission, the rotund little gentleman who received me stated that he was the father of the Vicomte Lucien de Hurecourt, who was to marry the princess on the morrow, and he was now escorting her home from Paris. His own name was Grand-Jacquot, he said, but his son had revived the ancient style of the family, Grand-Jacquot de Hurecourt, and was a very aristocratic young gentleman. I must defer my affair until after their return, and it would afford them all much pleasure if I would honour the wedding, a very quiet affair, with my presence. There was nothing for it but to accept the worthy man's hospitable offer.

All rights reserved.

After some refreshment, M. Grand-Jacquot led me to the library. It was a large and sombre room, with books of all kinds and manuscripts of all ages filling the shelves to the ceiling. In the middle of the room was a square table, and on it were a folio volume in red morocco—the catalogue, doubtless—two silver candlesticks, with half-burned wax candles in them, a bronze inkstand, pens, and an eraser. But what first attracted my attention was the great fireplace, with a great stone chimney. Carved upon its otherwise plain surface was a striking device—a wolf's head, sable, with eyes, gules, on a silver field. This black head, staring sharply out from the white base, glared ferociously and fantasically, like a wolf of the Ukraine. It was crowned with the coronet of a prince, and on a scroll beneath was the legend, written in capital letters: Volke ne volk volku.

The lady . . . closed her eyes with a contented smile.

"The wolf is not a wolf to the wolf," said I, translating it literally.

"Exactly," said M. Grand-Jacquot; "it is derived from a family legend," and he repeated it to me, though I was already familiar with it from a Byzantine manuscript—John Stilitzes, I think. In the time of the Dukes Rurik and Oleg, it ran, among the Malo—Russian worshippers of the god Teroun, the golden-bearded Jupiter of the Slavs—lived a Prince Volkine, a mighty hunter and redoubtable brigand, who amused himself with training wolves. He had formed a pack of them with which he ravaged the lands of his neighbours. He had made pets of three wolf-cubs, bringing them up like domestic dogs; the beasts even ate at his table and slept in his chamber. In a certain battle, the bandit was wounded and fell from his horse. His enemies were about to dispatch him, when the wolves, like a faithful body-guard, flew to his aid and put the strangers to flight.

"I would amend my translation of the legend," said I, when he had finished. "The idea, more concisely put, is: 'The wolf spares the wolf.'"

"A lying legend!" sneered a mocking voice behind me, and turning, I saw that a man and woman, in travelling dress, had entered the room while we were talking. I could not repress a slight movement of surprise, for in them I recognised my travelling companions of the preceeding night.

"Marfa, Lucien!" cried M. Grand-Jacquot; "ah, you naughty children, how late you are! I expected you all last night, and have been quite uneasy about you." Then presenting them to me: "The Vicomte de Hurecourt, my son, and the Princess Volkine, who is soon to be my daughter, M. Stéphane Chéraval."

"To what are we indebted for the honour of your visit?" inquired the Vicomte curtly.

"M. Chéraval is a savant whom the Minister of Fine Arts has sent for a palimpsest," replied M. Grand-Jacquot; "doubtless the one that Prince Volkine used to treat with acids and scratch with an eraser so incessantly."

His words startled me, but not so much but that I could notice the Vicomte's sudden nervousness and the trembling voice in which he replied.

"The palimpsest has disappeared," he said.

"Disappeared?" I cried.

"Yes, a week ago. I have searched everywhere for it without success. It must have been stolen."

"Stolen—who can have taken it?"

"There is but one person—Anton Mikhail."

The Princess had not yet spoken, seeming disconcerted by my presence. But now, turning to Lucien, she said, in an indignant tone: "No, no; you malign him. Anton Mikhail is a saint, he would rather die than commit a sin. But come, we must go and receive Judge Bardene, whom Lucien invited this morning to be one of the witnesses of our marriage. That is why we are so late, for Lucien got tickets for Lure instead of only Jussy." And she led the Vicomte away, the old gentleman following them. Left alone, I hastened to the table, and, with a trembling hand, seized the catalogue. The folio opened as of its own accord at "Manuscripts." It was an admirable catalogue, each entry being carefully made with full particulars. The first read as follows:

No. 1. Psalter, without commentary, of the tenth century. Twelve pages. Incomplete and mutilated, comprising only the 114th, 119th, 129th, 137th, and 145th psalms; the psalms of the office of the dead in the Latin ritual. Mentioned by the Benedictine dom Loysilleau. Procured from the pillage of the Abbey of Faverney.

In a trembling hand—doubtless that of the Prince Volkine—was added this note: "Palimpsest. Very precious. The Milesian of Lucius of Patras."

Unconsciously I had picked up the eraser that lay on the table and now I saw that particles of parchment adhered to the sharp steel, that it had evidently been lately used. As I was studying this, a shadow fell upon the table, and, lifting my eyes, I saw at the window a strange being, whom I knew at once for Anton Mikhail of whom the Princess Volkine had spoken. Dressed in a long robe of soiled white cotton, he bore in his arms several planks of pine wood. From his belt depended a bag, in which were nails and a hammer. Then he had considered me well, he entered the library, crossed the room, and set down his burden by the wall. Then, without a word to me, he began to adjust his planks, and nail them together, droning to himself meanwhile a monotonous chant that I remembered to have heard before in the Ukraine.

Digitized by Google

"Little father——" I began in the same tongue.

No answer.

"Anton Mikhail, what are you doing?"

"You can see," said he, without desisting from his work; "I am building an altar."

"An altar! What for?"

"The little mother, the Princess, is to be married. You should know that, since you are invited to the wedding."

"And you think, Anton Mikhail," said I, smiling, "that the Princess will kneel before your altar?"

"Listen," he said, leaving his work, and coming to stand before me; "the daughter of Anna Petrovna, the freed serf, the wife chosen by the noble wolf Volkine, is, in spite of her sin, neither a pagan or a lost soul. She will kneel before the God—my God, and here." And turning to his work, he resumed his monotonous chant.

"Man of God," I said, "do you know of what you are accused? They say you have stolen."

Anton Mikhail turned, and pointing towards heaven with one finger, said: "Listen once more. God is the public witness of the most secret crimes; at His chosen hour He will denounce. He will speak if I am guilty."

At this moment a servant entered, and announcing that they waited dinner for me, led the way to the drawing-room. Here I was introduced to Judge Bardene, and the Princess Volkine taking his arm, M. Grand-Jacquot, the Vicomte, and I followed to the dining-room.

"Father," said the Princess to M. Grand-Jacquot, "will you aid me to do the honours of my house? M. Chéraval at your right, Lucien at your left." The judge placed his hand upon the chair at her right, and seeing her seat herself was about to follow her example.

"No, no, my dear judge, not at my right—here," she said, indicating the chair at her left. "Valentin," said she, to the servant, "tell him we are awaiting him." Then, noticing the judge's disconcerted air, she added: "You will excuse me when I tell you that in my house the place of honour is always reserved for God—that is, in the person of one of His Messiahs."

While she was speaking, M. Bardene was casting very singular glances about from under his spectacles; and it was Lucien whom he presently addressed.

"So, M. de Hurecourt," he asked, "you do not believe in expiatory Messiahs, perhaps not even in expiations?"

"I hate charlatans, under whatever robe they appear," replied Lucien drily, and the conversation turned to other topics.

At the conclusion of the dinner, we went out upon the terrace, where coffee was served. It was a balmy August evening, and Judge Bardene discoursed charmingly of his early life, when he had been the friend of Mme. Récamier and Mme. Louise Collet. But his words were lost on us. I was thinking of the missing palimpsest, Grand-Jacquot, of anything but Bardene's talk, and the Princess watched Lucien with loving eyes, as he sat back and let his gaze wander over the moonlit scene before us.

"Anton Mikhail, what are you doing?"

Presently he rose, and, motioning the Princess to join him, began to stroll up and down the terrace.

The loving couple had passed and repassed us several times, when suddenly Lucien started back. The gaunt figure of the priest had appeared from behind a bush and stood confronting them.

Lucien clenched his fist tightly, and strode up to the fanatic.

"For my sake, Lucien," she cried, "do not strike him. And you, Anton Mikhail—leave us. I cannot see you now." She had stepped up to the "man of God," and seizing his hand, would have kissed it.

"You shall hear me!" he said hoarsely; "I am your prophet, and your expiator. You shall hear me! Listen, Marfa—I have watched, and I have fasted. I have prayed and prayed. Then the dead appeared to me; his spirit has descended upon me, and his soul has united itself to my soul. It said to me: 'Go to my well-beloved, and tell her that, if she wishes, I will forgive her.' Do you wish it, my daughter?"

"I do not wish to be separated from Lucien," she said, in a low voice, pressing herself against the Vicomte's arm.

Anton Mikhail burst into a scornful laugh; then he cried, with growing excitement:

"He is so just, and so good, the noble wolf Volkine! Do you remember, Marfa?—your father was a serf, a kholop, a brute with a human face. Volkine was pleased to free him, he was his redeemer. And you—

Digitized by Google

he took you from out the dust, and lifted you as high as himself. To your father he gave the liberty that makes a man, to you he gave the knowledge that should make a saint. He has made you the equal of queens—he married you. But you, Princess Volkine, you?—oh, you!

"And so, poor woman," he went on, "to-morrow you wish to consummate your sin, to bind your life to that man—a blasphemer, an atheist! You wish to lose your soul for ever, and abandon it to torture! You shall not do it, Princess—I forbid you! But do not tremble so, and understand me well"—his voice became low and supplicating—"ah, my child, if you hearken to me, to-morrow you will repent your sins and purify yourself for ever. To-morrow will your pardon come; to-morrow will you gain Paradise!"

"To-morrow we shall square accounts, you thief," cried Lucien, trembling with rage; "come, Marfa, this farce has lasted long enough."

Anton Mikhail turned slowly towards him, and looked him straight in the eye.

"You, too, to-morrow—you will come to pardon; yes, to-morrow. The dead wishes it—the dead commands it!"

"You dare threaten me!" cried Lucien, and he sprang at the priest with clenched fist.

But he did not strike Anton Mikhail. Just then the great clock of Doremont began to strike the eleventh hour. Lucien turned pale as a ghost and trembled in every limb.

"The snow!" he muttered; "the snow! How cold it is, how cold!"

He was silent for a moment, his mouth open, his eyes staring as if in horror.

"Farewell, old wolf!" he cried suddenly, in fiercest scorn; "the wolves will spare the wolf!" And he laughed—laughed horribly.

"Help, help!" cried Marfa, half fainting, and we sprang towards Lucien. But already, as on the preceding night, a reaction had set in, and he was weeping silently as he lay inert upon the terrace. Then he sighed deeply and the crisis passed. He looked about him, recognised us, and asked in a tone of profound surprise: "Why, what is the matter, gentlemen; what is the meaning of these frightened faces?"

"Come, children," said M. Grand-Jacquot, whose face had become livid, "you must retire now, you have much to go through to-morrow," and he hurried them into the château.

Anton Mikhail had long before disappeared.

"That was a very strange scene," commented Bardene, when we were alone; "by-the-way, you are a Russian scholar—could you make out what it was all about?"

"Oh, yes," I replied; "they talked a common Russian," and I repeated to him what they had said.

"Strange, very strange," he murmured.

"No," said I; "there is nothing remarkable about it. The Princess as a serf belonged to the sect of which Anton Mikhail is a priest—the Filipovtz; fanatics, who hope by their own sufferings to redeem mankind; voluntary expiators of the crimes of the world, Disciples of the Bleeding Lamb, who kill themselves that others may be immortal. That explains it all—the reproaches of the 'man of God,' who saw her slipping from the faith, and the perplexities of the Princess, struggling between her love and her conscience."

Bardene chatted about it a few moments longer, and presently he retired. At last I was free to make a search for the palimpsest.

All was silent as I entered the library. Lighting one of the candles, I proceeded to look about me. At the extremity of the hall stood Anton Mikhail's little altar decked with flowers. Raising my eyes, I shuddered as I beheld the great Volkine wolf, its sparkling eyes gleaming down upon me. I was about to begin my search among the manuscripts, when a sudden noise startled me. It was as if a key had been inserted in the door giving upon the terrace. I stood quite still, and held my breath. Yes, the door began slowly to open. I snuffed my candle, and fled to the darkest corner of the room.

"You dare threaten me!" cried Lucien.

A hand now appeared, and slowly drew aside the portière, disclosing the pale face of Lucien de Hurecourt. His eyes did not change their direction once—they stared at me. I saw that I was discovered, and managed to muster up courage to come forward.

"Sir," I said hesitatingly, "it is true you find me here after midnight in an apparently compromising position; but——"

I did not complete my sentence. He did not hear me, he did not see me. He walked slowly forward with an automatic step—he was walking in his sleep. In his hand he held an object which he pressed to his breast. It was a manuscript—my palimpsest! Arrived at the table, Lucien laid down his manuscript, opened it, and gazed at it for some moments. Then he lit a candle, sat down, took up the steel eraser from the inkstand, and began to scratch the parchment.

I had now regained my self-possession, and stepping lightly forward, I looked over his shoulder, and examined the manuscript. It was indeed the palimpsest, the Carolingian, the psalter of the offices for the dead. "De profundis clamavi ad te," the first line of the open page read—"from the depths have I cried unto thee." It was scraped through in places, and was sadly mutilated, but here and there I could read words, phrases, sentences, in Greek text of the best epoch. But, alas! a great blank space had been erased upon more than half of the page, and at this Lucien was scratching industriously. Drawing out paper and pencil, I transcribed what was legible, translating as I wrote:

Digitized by Google

.....Lucius.....
.....Oh, Lucius.....
.....you, Lucius in.....
.....to secure yourself an adulterous love and to steal a vast heritage.....
.....By the religion of the gods, in the name of the human conscience, in the name of public piety, punish an abominable crime.....
.....the soul of the dead has for a moment been freed from hell...
.....have pity, have pity; by the stars of heaven, by the divinities of death, by the elements of nature, by the silence of night, give me back my life for but an instant.....vengeance, the sole consolation of the dead.....

(Here occurred the blank space; further down other phrases followed:)

..... and the body rises, it speaks; it weeps, alas!.....
.....you shall confess, you shall tell all, you shall tell to all the secret of the dead.....the sin that has robbed me of my bleeding couch.....

Here came the bottom of the page. The continuation of this strange scene of necromancy should follow. I tried to turn the page gently, but could not. Lucien was leaning heavily on it, and still scraped away.

Now he stopped, and sighing deeply, arose and started slowly towards the door. Now was my chance if I ever hoped to get the precious manuscript.

I put forth my hand to draw it gently from him, but I had no sooner touched it than he screamed, as if in mortal fear, and struck me a terrific blow on the chest.

It sent me sprawling on the floor, and when I got on my feet again, Lucien had disappeared through the door.

The next morning I was rather late in getting down. I had taken my coffee in my room, and found the wedding-party already assembled. Judge Bardene and a young doctor were to act as Lucien's witnesses, and two lawyers were to perform the same kindly office for the Princess. But as one of the latter had sent word that it was absolutely impossible for him to be present, I was asked to take his place, and willingly consented.

Lucien seemed to know nothing of the preceding night's performance in the library, and seemed the happiest of men.

"Come," said M. Grand-Jacquot, after a few moments, "we must repair to the mayor's office to have the civil marriage performed. M. Chéraval, as the Princess's senior witness, will you offer her your arm?"

"Excuse me," said Lucien, stopping me, politely enough, as I offered my arm, "the Princess will take my arm;" and as she seemed to hesitate: "Marfa, I beg of you, take my arm."

She obeyed, pleased, and blushed charmingly.

"Children, children!" cried the scandalised parent, "I am astonished——"

"I wish it," said Lucien shortly, looking his father in the eye, and the party proceeded to the great door. Suddenly Lucien turned and led the Princess towards the library.

"Come, none of this pleasantry, my son," said M. Grand-Jacquot; "the mayor has been waiting an hour."

Again the son turned upon him and said imperiously:

"I wish it."

In the library a strange spectacle awaited us. The walls were adorned with green branches, and the little altar, erected by Anton Mikhail, was decked with flowers. On the altar, amid roses, lilies, heliotrope, and pansies, was a wooden chalice, a clumsy production of Byzantine art. The "man of God," still in his robe of soiled cotton, stood upon the lower step of the altar, awaiting our approach. Lucien led the bride towards the altar, while we filed in behind them.

Struck me a fearful blow on the chest.

"How kind you are, Lucien," said Marfa, in a moved tone; "I am very grateful to you. But, truly, we must put off the religous ceremony until later. Let us go first to the mayor's."

"I wish it," said Lucien de Hurecourt for the third time.

"Darling, I beg of you——" began the Princess, joining her hands in supplication.

"Obey, Marfa!" cried the stern voice of Anton Mikhail; "the dead commands. For you the hour of pardon has come."

He had expressed himself in French, rough and incorrect, but intelligible to all. A livid pallor overspread the Princess's features, and she bowed her head without a word.

"Ah, judge," said Lucien, turning with a mirthless laugh to Bardene, "how coarse and superstitious are these Slavs. I know them well—I have lived in Kherson, where I was consul of France. It was a melancholy post, that city of Potemkin, with its steppes—its eternal steppes on all sides. But let us sit down—I have much to say," and pushing forward a chair for Bardene, they sat down while we grouped ourselves about them. Princess Volkine, her head bowed, seemed to hear nothing, to see nothing, to be stolidly resigned—but to what? As to the "man of God," he stood motionless as a statue, his blazing eyes fixed upon Lucien.

"Proceed, sir," said the judge; "I am listening."

"Yes, Kherson is a sad place," resumed Lucien, "with no distractions—little society, no balls, no concerts; the only solaces are to be found in cigars, cards, and brandy. Outside the city all is desolation—boundless levels of barren plain, inhabited only by wolves—packs of fierce, gaunt wolves. It was neither duty nor the attractions of the city that kept me there, it was an affair of gallantry. Thirty versts north of the city rose the towers of the Castle of Kara-Issar, where for a few months each year lived the Prince Volkine.

Digitized by Google

"A strange person was this Prince Volkine, with his bald head, his black eyes under their shaggy brows, his Kalmuck nose, and his long, white beard; grand in his manners and imbued with an inordinate pride of race. He had two passions; he strove madly for universal knowledge, and to that end studied all the sciences and spent his nights over musty parchment and mouldy manuscripts; and he conspired—yes, this Prince Volkine, whose forefathers had not deemed a Romanoff worthy to unloose their shoes, had become a democrat, a conspirator, had even married the daughter of a serf. Out of respect for his ancient name, and, perhaps, for his age, the government did not interfere with him, but it watched him; and he abused its indulgences, unhappy man.

"I was very assiduous in my calls at Kara-Issar, not to listen to the old man's maunderings, but to see his wife, the Princess Marfa. We loved each other, she and I, and she——"

A heartrending cry of grief and indignation burst from the Princess's lips, and she sank on her knees before the altar.

"Let her suffer!" said Anton Mikhail imperiously, as I started to aid her.

"Lucien, Lucien, my child," cried M. Grand-Jacquot, "you are ill. You must go up to your room——"

"Silence, M. Grand-Jacquot!" said Judge Bardeno sternly; "as an officer of the law, I command you not to interrupt this statement. Proceed, sir," he said to the Vicomte.

Then began before us a terrible scene. Lucien, impelled by an irresistible impulse, had risen, and now like an actor he played—he lived his part.

"It was very monotonous when I returned to Kherson," Lucien went on; "I was reprimanded for my absence by the minister, little work had accumulated, and there was nothing to do—oh, Marfa, Marfa, if she were with me! Meanwhile, let me work. To-morrow evening there will be a ball given by the new governor—someone knocks at my door. 'Come in.' Ah, a soldier, with a note—two lines hastily traced:

"The police will attempt the arrest of your friend, Prince Volkine, at his Château to-night. Save him. You are commanded to do so.

"'Who brought this?' The man was gone, there was no signature. 'Save him'—I shall not go. May a thousand devils take him! 'You are commanded'—I commanded! By whom? A pack of scoundrels—and then, is he not Marfa's husband?

"'Prepare the drosky, Tegor, and put in the two best horses. No, you need not come—I shall drive myself. What do you say? Yes, there is plenty of snow. And—what? Oh, wolves, I am not afraid of wolves. Good, give me the reins—I shall not be back until the morning.'

"How long and sinister the road is! Last year, when Marfa was at Kara-Issar, I used to drive over twice a week, and it seemed delightful. Dear Marfa, why did he send her to Switzerland? Can he suspect? To-night the road seems horrible. Ah, this Volkine.

"At last the castle. The court is deserted, no noise in the house. The door is half open—Volkine expects some one. Eleven o'clock; we can get back to Kherson before daybreak, but we must be quick. I spring up the stairs—I know the way so well—I push open the door, and find the old man working—always at the same manuscript. 'Lucien,' he cries, 'what brings you at such an hour?' I give him the note he reads it, then looks at me. 'Hasten, prince; I will conceal you at the consulate. To-morrow you can depart on a French vessel for France—you are saved.' No word of thanks; he slips on his wraps, takes the manuscript in his hand, and we start. I lash the horses, we fly over the snow—we two, alone, side by side, in the night.

"See! What are those two red points of flame, down there in the moonlight, that seem to gleam and change their position? The man is mad to put himself in my power thus. And I love Marfa, she belongs to me. If she should become a widow—but it is absurd, the police are on our track, they would find the body——

"The two red points of flame have come nearer—there are four of them, six, ten—and black forms begin to appear against the snow. They are wolves! they have scented us. Our horses plunge forward.

"'You are armed?' asks Prince Volkine. 'Yes, I have my revolver.' Why does Marfa's husband remind me of it? He is looking at me—this old man drives me mad. 'What are you thinking of, Lucien?' he asks suddenly, with a strange laugh: 'I will wager I could say. You are telling yourself that if your companion should die you could marry his widow. You are wrong, my poor friend; you will never marry Marfa!' I suppress an angry and threatening gesture—he knows all! How has he been able to read my thoughts? Now I remember something Marfa once told me, that Prince Volkine pretends to exercise a mysterious power over me. Yes, that is it. He knows all, he will separate me from Marfa—kill her perhaps.

"The wolves surround us. They gallop beside the drosky. They are ahead of the horses and snap at their muzzles. We are lost! if we could throw something to them they would stop—it would be deliverance. A wolf leaps at the off horse and seizes him by the nostrils. I rise in my seat and draw my revolver. 'Shoot!' cries Volkine. But I do not shoot, and, turning to him, I say: 'Since you are of the race of wolves, why are you afraid?' He drops the reins, and stands up facing me.

"We threaten each other, face to face; we defy each other; we challenge each other with our eyes, without a word; his eyes seem to burn into my soul. Enough of this torture! I raise my pistol and fire upon him. He cries out, he sways, he falls against me. With his two hands he seizes me—one upon my forehead, the other gripping my throat. Still those eyes—those terrible eyes! He leans towards me, whispers in my ear, his hot breath upon my cheek: 'You shall never marry Marfa. On your wedding day you will tell the whole story to the officers of the law.'

"With a desperate effort I push him from me, I throw him into the snow. Then, laughing in my turn, I lean back and cry after him: 'Farewell, old wolf. The wolves will spare the wolf!' the motto of his family.

"Already I am far away. Through all the night I hear his desperate cries, half drowned in the snarling of the wolves. At last it is day. The city—the streets are still deserted. I reach my house, and in my room fall asleep in a chair. My servant awakens me. 'You have forgotten something, sir, in the waggon,' and he hands me a manuscript, the one the Prince carried. But the wolves alone know my secret. Ah, Marfa, you are mine henceforth, mine for ever!"

The crisis had passed, and after it came the tears, unconsciousness, and surprise of the two evenings before.

Digitized by Google

At this moment Marfa arose. The pallor of agony was on her face; but her eyes gleamed with joy, shone with happiness. Slowly she approached Lucien and knelt before him.

"Was it for love of me," she asked, "that you dared to kill? And for love of me you will die?"

"I loved you," murmured Lucien; "and you—do you love me still?"

For answer she seized his hand and covered it with passionate kisses—this hand that had done murder for her.

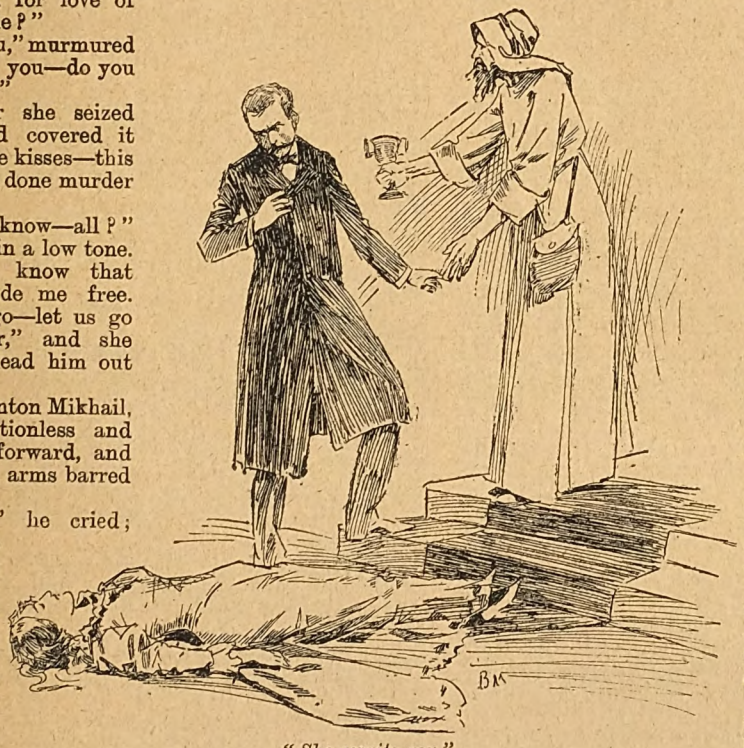
"Do they know—all?" asked Lucien in a low tone.

"All; they know that you have made me free. Now, let us go—let us go away together," and she rose as if to lead him out into the park.

Suddenly Anton Mikhail, till then motionless and mute, strode forward, and with extended arms barred their way.

"Cowards!" he cried; "you shall not go! God has led you to pardon; you must bow to it!"

Marfa drew back into the room, her lover following her.



"She awaits you."

"Marfa," pursued the fanatic, "the hour of expiation has sounded, and you know well how God exacts expiation. He Himself taught us, in Himself wishing for death. Death—propitiatory death—will wash away all guilt, cleanse of all sin; it is the baptism of life, it is the Great Pardon. But the law of the Bleeding Lamb is inexorable.

"Voluntary murder is only atoned by self-immolation, the blood of others can only be washed away in our own." He was silent, at once ferocious and suppliant. Marfa said not a word, but softly took Lucien's hand in hers, and together they drew near the altar.

"My daughter—my dear daughter," said the priest, taking his place at the altar, "here, in this chalice, is Paradise for both of you."

"Paradise, father—the Paradise of which you have told me so often, the Paradise of eternal love?"

For all response, Anton Mikhail took the wooden chalice and held it towards the couple.

Lucien opened his arms; the young woman threw herself into them, and lip to lip, clasped in each other's arms, they stood thus, in silence for a moment.

"Father," said Marfa, at last, "in the eternity to which you would send us will my beloved never be separated from me?"

"No, dear child. God is called Justice, but he is also called Love. Trust in Him. Your marriage in death will be for all time."

Tearing herself from the loves of earth, Marfa stretched forth her hand for the chalice that held eternal love.

"Give it me quickly, father," she cried; "I shall leave a share for you, Lucien," and she drank the deadly draught. She gave the chalice back into the priest's hand, swayed for a moment and fell on her face upon the floor.

"Saved!" cried Mikhail, and he offered the poison to Lucien, saying: "She awaits you."

Lucien hesitated for a moment; then, closing his eyes, he drained the cup, and in his turn fell dead beside the woman he had loved.

James Rockell.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 10.

Curiously enough, the first correct card to hand this week comes from Cardiff. All the competitors, London and provincial, whose attempts arrived before that sent by Mr. J. Burke, 3 Burgh Street, Riverside, Cardiff, gave the word "house" (p. 290, c. 1, line 21), of which two-fifths of the letters were turned; or "man" (p. 316, c. 1, line 38), of which the "m" alone was turned. The correct word is "stood" (p. 290, c. 2, line 67). The "inner radius" guinea goes to Mr. A. J. Stevens, P.O., H.M.S. Repulse, Chatham.

POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 12.

If A=17, E=19, I=20, O=25, and U=3, what word on this page is of the greatest numerical value. Give the word and its total value in plain characters on the back of a post-card, together with your name and address. A guinea goes to the reader who first points this out, and another to the reader living more than a hundred miles from London. Post-cards only, please—other forms of communication disqualified.

Digitized by Google

THE WHITE ELEPHANT.

"SHE's a-goin' fast," murmured the Widow Mudge as she bent over John Holcomb's wife and noted the laboured breathing and ashen look of the sick woman.

"Ye don't mean it, do ye, Betsy?" said Mrs. Pringle, who was assisting the widow in the care of the invalid. "She's been a-goin' so many years I don't much believe her time's come now."

"I tell ye, Cinthy," retorted the widow with a grim satisfaction, "I tell ye that airs death." And she added hastily: "I think mebbe we'd orter call John."

"Well, I should think we had orter," replied Mrs. Pringle. "A man wants to know when his own wife's a-passin' away."

So she hurried through the low-ceilinged, whitewashed kitchen, in which lingered the subtle aroma of boiled beef and cabbage, and through the woodshed to the back porch, where John Holcomb sat engaged in mending a rake and talking to another man sitting in a light spring waggon drawn up before the door.

"John," said Mrs. Pringle, touching him on the shoulder, "I do believe Martha's hour has come. The widder thinks so, too. Ye'd better come in and pray, hadn't ye?"

John rose, and, drawing a face befitting the occasion, said to the man in the waggon: "Joel, I wisht ye'd hold on a minute; if Martha's really so bad as they say, I'd better send to town by ye fer to get her coffin. I shan't have no chance to go myself, an' you kin git it jest as well as me."

"All right," replied Joel Purdy; "I'll set here till ye come back an' tell me how she is."

John Holcomb, who was a thin man with a sandy beard and meek grey eyes, disappeared within the woodshed, followed by Mrs. Pringle's fluttering cap strings. He was absent only a moment or two, when he returned with pale, solemn-visage and perturbed air.

"Yes, she's a-goin' sure," he half whispered, "I'll resk gittin' it. Martha's five foot two, an' thinner'n a poker, so ye won't have no trouble findin' one ready made. They come a mite cheaper, I fancy. I wisht ye'd call at Parmlee's, too, an' ask him to come out, so's I can arrange bout the buryin'. Ye might's well tell folks we'll probably have the funeral day after to-morrow."

Having received his melancholy commissions, Joel drove away, while John returned to engage in prayer at the bedside of his dying spouse.

Mrs. Martha Holcomb had been dying for years: time and again had she announced that she could not survive the day. Over and over had she taken to her bed for the last time. Whenever her children or grandchildren departed after paying her a visit, she called them to her and, after bidding them a solemn and final farewell, adjured them to meet her "beyond Jordan, where the wicked cease from troubling." It was one of Mrs. Holcomb's fond delusions that the wicked had set snares for her feet all her life; that they were determined to make her stumble and fall into the pit. She yearned to be set free from these abominations, and really tried her best to die. But the wiry little woman had strong vitality, and as, after all, there was really nothing the matter with her, save slight attacks of what her neighbour, Mrs. Pringle, called "magrums," she had held out to a reasonable age.

But this last attack, whatever its nature, had assumed quite a serious turn, and even her husband, who had been known to speak rather slightingly of "Ma's conniption fits," was now thoroughly alarmed and convinced that he was about to lose his life partner. Accordingly, with the thrift begotten of his daily experience, he determined to secure a bargain in coffins and have it on hand when the fatal moment should arrive.

Mrs. Holcomb lay in a stupor all day, never rousing until sunset, just at the moment that Joel Purdy drove into the yard with his long, ghastly freight. John Holcomb was standing in the porch as Joel reined up his horses.

Together the two men lifted out the coffin and bore it tenderly into the kitchen, where they deposited it on a couple of chairs, and, drawing back, regarded it with the gaze of connoisseurs.

"It looks fust-rate," was John's comment; "good strong one, hain't it, Joel?"

"'Twas the best Ben Cook had in stock," replied Joel, his head on one side, as he eyed his purchase critically, "an' bein' ready made, he'll let you have it dirt cheap, he said."

"Well, I'm obleeged to you, Joel," said John, as he followed his neighbour to the kitchen door, "an' mebbe you'll ask your wife to come over this evenin' an' help lay Martha out. Mrs. Pringle an' the widder air clean beat out a-nussin' of her."

"Why, yes, John, certainly I will. I know Mrs. Purdy'd jest soon come as not." And vouchsafing this encouraging statement, Joel turned his horses and drove homeward.

As John stepped back into the kitchen, the stillness of the house suddenly smote him. The widow Mudge, wearied out, had gone home for a nap. Mrs. Pringle was in the pantry cutting up the cold ham for supper. John felt calm and peaceful, and resigned to the trial he was about to undergo.

Suddenly he heard a voice, sharp, irritable, querulous:

"John!"

The sparse hairs on John's bald head stood up. A trembling seized his limbs. His face grew pale. He gasped.

"John!" called the voice again.

At this, Mrs. Pringle emerged from the pantry, a slice of ham dangling from the fork in one uplifted hand, the knife in the other. Her eyes were fairly popping from her head.

"Why, John," she panted, "that's Mrs. Holcomb's voice. She's a-callin' ye. She——"

"I know it," cried John, in a terrible tone, "she's a-callin' me. She hain't dyin' after all, ye see, an' jest look at that there coffin settin' right there. Will ye, for the love of Heaven, hide it somewheres afore she gits up an' sees it?" And, clutching his hair in impotent despair, he went into his wife's room.

Mrs. Pringle was a woman of action. She was as strong as a man, and alert as a cat. Realising John Holcomb's awful predicament, she rose at once to the situation. Dropping knife, fork and ham, with one supreme effort, she pounced upon the coffin, lifted it and vanished.

When, ten minutes later, she reappeared, flushed and guilty, she saw an apparition wrapped in a patchwork bed-quilt before the kitchen fire. It was the sick woman, who an hour before was believed to be in extremis. There she sat, comfortably ensconced in an easy-chair, toasting her feet at the oven, and smiling feebly as she sipped a cup of tea handed her by the trembling hands of John.

Digitized by Google

"Why, Mrs. Holcomb," said John's fellow conspirator, "how careless of ye. Ye've been dreadful ill. Ye hadn't orter got up so sudden, had ye?"

"I couldn't stand that air bed another minute," declared the invalid. "It was as hard as a marble tombstun."

John gave such a start that the spoon beat a little tattoo on the saucer, as he passed a fresh cup of tea to his spouse. Mrs. Pringle looked demurely down, and smoothed out the creases in her gingham apron.

"I really thought the hour of my departure had come," went on Mrs. Holcomb, smacking her lips over her tea.

"So did some other folk," thought Mrs. Pringle, stealing a sly glance at John. The unfortunate man was truly a pitiable object. His brow was covered with perspiration, and he shook as if seized with an ague.

"But my strength is renewed," continued Martha, "and though yet very feeble, I feel that a time, times and half-times, are still mine. But I need some nourishment dretfully. Mrs. Pringle, I do believe I could relish one of them slices of ham."

Mrs. Pringle smiled as she went back to the pantry. "I'll bet anything," she said to herself, as she fell to slicing a loaf of bread, "that she heerd me cutting that ham and that's what fetched her out of that bed. She does love good vittles, though she don't know nothin' 'bout preparin' on 'em. But that air coffin! If it don't beat anything. What in the name of the old cat will he do with it? I fancy he's got a white elephant on his hands."

There was a movement behind her. She turned quickly to meet John's pallid face, glassy eyes and parched lips.

Lifting his voice so that his wife could hear him in the kitchen, he said: "Jest reach me a jug, will ye, Mrs. Pringle? I'm a-goin' down to the cellar fer ter git some cider fer my poor, dear, sufferin' wife." Then in a low, hurried whisper: "What have you done with it?"

"It?" asked Mrs. Pringle, with a puzzled air. Though she perfectly understood his question, she enjoyed his alarm and confusion.

"Yes, that air jug'll do fust-rate," said John in strident tones to gain time. Then lower: "Yes—it—it—that air blamed—old—coffin?"

"Oh!" said Mrs. Pringle, "oh, you mean that. It's safe."

"Where? Where?" persisted John.

"In the loft over the hog-pen," whispered his tormenter as she handed down the jug.

* * * * *

Mrs. Holcomb continued to improve rapidly, and in a week or so was able to attend to her household duties. John, however, was on the verge of nervous prostration. At any moment some officious and meddlesome person might tell his wife of his premature bargain. He knew the temper of his consort, and that if she were to discover he had been so ready to assist her departure from this world, he would know no peace from her waspish tongue. He could depend upon the village cabinet-maker, who had supplied the coffin; upon Joel Purdy and Mrs. Pringle, for these he had sworn to secrecy; but at least a dozen other people had seen Joel driving along with his gruesome burden, and had received the information that it was intended for John Holcomb's wife. The sword was suspended over his head. At any moment it might fall.

He grew nervous and fidgety, starting like a guilty thing whenever his wife addressed him. He paid stolen visits to the loft, and regarded his bargain with looks as black as its sable cover. At times he was tempted to destroy it; and reckless visions of the glorious bonfire it would make darted through his brain. But John Holcomb was a penurious man. He could not bear to waste anything—even a coffin. There was ever the possibility that his wife might——

John always turned away from these meditations in a state of mingled hope and fear.

One morning Joel drove up to the door and called to John to ask if he had heard the news:

"What news?"

"Old Si Hawkins can't live till night, they say. He's jest a-gaspin' like a fish," returned Joel.

John was seized with an inspiration. "Joel," he hoarsely whispered, "ef you're a-goin' 'long by there, I'll jest jine ye."

"Well, git in—git in," said Joel cheerfully, "I'll be glad of your company."

"Joel," said John, when they had jogged along a few minutes, "do ye know why I'm a-goin' over to Si Hawkins'?"

"Why, I suppose fer to neighbour with his folks in the hour of sorrow."

"Well, of course," said John, "that is my principal reason fer a-goin'; but, Joel, I think mebbe I can drive a trade an' git thet air coffin off my hands. I tell you, Joel, thet thing'll drive me clean crazy if I don't git rid on it. Now, if Si was willin' ter swap a calf——"

"How can he when he's a-dyin'?" demanded Joel.

"Well, I mean his folks, of course. I'd take a calf or barn-yard tools—Joel, I'd take almost anything fer that coffin," concluded poor John.

"Yes," said Joel musingly, "I understand how ye feel 'bout it, John. If I was in your shoes, an' had a wife with Mrs. Holcomb's temper, I shouldn't want no coffins about. But s'pose Si's folks say they'll take it, how are ye a-goin' to manage to git the thing away without Mrs. Holcomb a-seein' of it?"

"I dunno," said John despondently, "I hain't thought so fer as thet."

"Ye might git 'em to cart it away at night after she's gone to bed," suggested Joel.

"Thet's so," cried John eagerly, "you're a fust-rate one to plan, Joel. I do hope that Si's folks will agree to take it. You see, Joel," argumentatively, "they've got to have one. Thet stands to reason. Well, they might jest as well take mine as git one from town. Don't you think so?"

"Yes," said Joel, "seems as if it would be a foolish waste of time and labour to haul up a coffin from town, when there's one handy in the neighbourhood. I'll tell ye what I'll do, John, to help ye out. If they take your coffin, I'll come over to-night an' git it and take it down there, after you and Mrs. Holcomb are fast asleep," and he nudged John playfully.

"Joel," said John, grasping his hand, "you're a friend in need. Help me to git thet air coffin off my premises an' anything I can do for you, jest call on me."

By this time they had reached the Hawkins' farmhouse, and John, descending from the waggon, tiptoed softly up the front steps and knocked—a gentle, deprecating knock, befitting the solemnity of the moment. He was admitted by one of the daughters of the house, and invited to be seated.

Digitized by Google

"How's your pa?" he asked nervously.

"He's very low. Can't last till night, the doctor says."

"Can I see your ma?" was the next timid question.

"Yes," said Matilda Hawkins, manifesting no special surprise at the request; and going to the adjoining bedroom, spoke to her mother, who presently appeared.

She was a gaunt woman with large features and firm mouth. She shook hands with her neighbour and sat down.

"I jest heerd this mornin' how bad off Si was," said John, "an' I hurried over to see ef there's anything I can do."

"No, thank you," returned Mrs. Hawkins, "there hain't nothin' nobody can do. He's jest alive an' that's all. How's Mrs. Holcomb?"

"She's pretty well," said John nervously.

"Well, it was amazin' how she got over thet last attack of hern," observed Mrs. Hawkins. "I never was so beat over nothin'."

"Nor I," said John earnestly.

"I should be jest as much surprised to see Si Hawkins come a-walkin' out of that air bedroom," said the lady. "You'd given her up, hadn't ye?"

"Yes," said John, "I had even made all calculations for the buryin', got the coffin an' all."

"Why, so I heerd," said Mrs. Hawkins. "Astonishin'!"

"I didn't know," stammered John, "but what if you hadn't spoke fer one—thet bein' as how you'd have to have one—I might sell you mine, or swap it—or—or—somethin'," he finished helplessly.

"Buy what?" inquired Mrs. Hawkins.

"Why—my—thet is—Mrs. Holcomb's coffin."

"Do ye want to sell it?"

"Do I?" shouted John. Then, lowering his voice, he added: "Excuse me, Mrs. Hawkins, fer hollerin' so loud, but if you could know how I've suffered from thet air coffin, you'd feel fer me. Do take it! If Mrs. Holcomb was ever to find it, I dunno as she'd live with me a day—no—nor an hour."

"How big is it?" asked the prudent widow-elect.

"It's a good size," replied John, trembling with joy at the encouraging tone of her voice, "Martha's five foot two, an' it's plenty long fer her."

"Thet would do fer Si," said Mrs. Hawkins thoughtfully. "He was always a small man, and, lawd! he's shrunk up to nothin' now. I s'pose you'll sell cheap?"

"Yes, you can have it cheap. I'll knock off ten shillings, or if you'd ruther, you can swap somethin' fer it."

"Well," said Mrs. Hawkins, who was keener at a bargain than even John himself, "I'll swap ye a plough fer it."

"Don't need no plough," hesitated John.

"Well," said his neighbour, "from all I can hear, you need one as much as you do a coffin. Thet's all I'll do. The plough's out there in front of the barn. You can look at it, and ef you want to swap fer thet, I'll take the coffin an' agree to keep my mouth shet."

John expostulated, but in vain. He had met his match. He went out and examined the plough. It was a crazy old affair, and would need considerable patching before it would be of any use, but he decided to accept the proposition. "Mrs. Hawkins'd skin the hide off ye," he confided to Joel, "but I've got to do it. I don't see noo other way out of the mess."

So the bargain was struck. Joel was to deliver the coffin at ten o'clock that night, while John was to come after the plough at his convenience.

* * * * *

"John," said Mrs. Holcomb, with a sharp poke, "wake up. There's someone about. I believe they're down at the hencoop."

John started up and listened. He distinctly heard the door of the hogpen open. Joel was about it.

"Bosh," he hastily remarked, "there hain't no noise. You're always a-hearin' of somethin'. Lie down, Martha, an' go to sleep, or you'll be havin' one of your worst spells."

"Never mind," replied his consort, as she put on her dress, "there's something wrong out there, an' I mean to see what it is."

John was driven to extremity. Through the soft summer night he could hear Joel dragging something heavy down the stairs from the loft. He heard the horses stamp, and Joel softly say: "Whoa!" once or twice. What should he do? If his wife insisted on going out, she would discover his awful secret. In some way he must distract her attention until Joel should get safely away with the coffin.

He hesitated one instant, then with a yell which would have terrified a band of Apaches, he seized the water jug from the washstand, and deliberately flung himself over the large rocking-chair at the foot of the bed.

The yell, the crash of breaking china, the deluge of water, and the fear that her husband had gone suddenly insane, was too much for Mrs. Holcomb. She fainted upon the bed, while John, drenched, cut, bleeding, but triumphant, rose from the débris as Joel drove quietly past the bedroom window. He was saved!

* * * * *

It was the evening after the funeral services of Silas Hawkins. John Holcomb and his wife sat at their supper-table. The lady was reviewing the event of the day.

"It was as pleasant a funeral as I ever see," she observed. "The minister's remarks was very satisfying."

"Yes, that's so," assented her husband.

"The singin' was good, and the flowers was nice. I thought Mrs. Hawkins had orter had a new bunnit, but she's near, so near, I s'pose she wouldn't spend the money."

"I never see no closer woman," agreed John, with a sigh, as he thought of the rickety old plough.

"But what struck me," said Mrs. Holcomb, reaching for the cold corned beef, "was the coffin."

John shivered.

"It was a fine one," went on his wife. "I was surprised ter see so good a coffin. I wonder where she got it. Did Ben Cook git thet up, John?"

"I don't know—I s'pose—how do I know?" fell in jerks from John's blue lips.

"Well," said his wife composedly, "I never see a coffin I was so taken with. When the hour of my departure comes, John—an' it's liable, you know, to come at any minute—I'd like to have you git a coffin for me as near like thet as you can, for I never see no nicer pattern of a coffin."

Poor John could not speak.

E. S. Tupper.

Digitized by Google

JUMBLE STORY No. 12.

TED CAPEC.

See Page 384.

He had gone into a shop to buy her some roses, and borrowed. It was only a small sum, for the paint. His bride of less than a year made him the chance of life; a week, even longer perhaps—but lips he pressed so tenderly heeded not his passionate hæmorrhage and actual disease."

"How she would have rejoiced over my first child thrown out of harm's way; the fragile rescuer should come now."

With hair half unbound she stood, a dark, proud most perfect Hero that ever watched for Leander.

He was not allowed to go to his wife yet; for Parker does not do things by halves.

So Foster did what he had sworn he would never he kissed the death damp from her brow.

The Artist put the girl into position again and left his wife's bedside. At the end came the return and an almost too ethereal beauty in her eyes.

"I shall be here again later, but I am afraid there would not have lent him anything. But it saw enough. He realised everything.

There were many men besides Jack Foster stays away. When I no longer need or welcome God, it is too hard; I cannot bear it."

* * * * *

"In this world," muttered Foster to himself the varnishing ticket; and the irony of it that it thought she was by his side. Then he saw a run- at each visit was more importunate that his patient relaxing—most important if organic mischief were but still a child; while half-way across the year; maybe there were many better pictures than Evelyn.

"Accepted!" he cried; then his agony was sharp after all," he murmured.

He opened the envelope carelessly and drew back unopened, and then Foster went to a friend after all, you see," she whispered, and the smile on her husband's anxious look.

"Sometimes Fate's little jokes are not so unkind the girl went on:

Before he could move the tragedy was over—the goddess, watching, with an unfathomable look of her face deepened into absolute radiant content; and her old buoyancy return, and the far away surgeon rubbed his glasses and continued:

"Sweetheart, you are not so well to-day," he said and until a shrill cry made him look round he half crushed a letter that he held unopened in his hand right? I am afraid I turned my head."

The picture was finished and sent in before she were taken all might be well, and he watched for while he waited a maid brought in a letter. He for the first time noticed how fragile she had grown, he stared at it:

The days passed slowly and Jack Foster scarcely watched the colour come back to Evelyn's cheeks, directly in its way a tiny child—dirty and unkempt, and at first Jack Foster did not realise that the fate of our picture," she said afterwards, in reply to see a doctor."

An hour later the doctors had completed their hand.

"I am so glad, darling. I did bring you luck of consciousness, and she smiled faintly at him as Foster could never quite transfer to canvas.

"Nothing to be done." Jack Foster sat motion- senseless on the ground.

"This feverishness is only anxiety to know the man was poor—probably if he had been rich he should go to a dryer climate. "London was too cold, and if he were to forbid my posing! What doctor. Go on painting, I am quite rested. Is my name and lead to endless commissions and bring kisses.

"It has been taken, little one." His voice was to be prevented. Delay now might result in examination and given their verdict: "No possible road, with arms outstretched to save it, was his, but no one had a more beautiful woman to House, but Dr. Clayton came again and again, and much depended on money now. The letter came tenderly, a few days before his picture was finished, do; he wrote to Evelyn's father and told him how as he stopped suddenly in his work. "You must opened it mechanically, and read without under- standing it, but the contents grew clear to him as keenly anxious to have their pictures taken that look died out of her eyes. Now if only his picture find they have not space to hang it."

"Your picture, Jack?" she breathed.

"Then if it's accepted that means it is sold as husky, but well under control.

"Yes, darling, if they take it it means Davos gaily.

"Not, yet Jack," she pleaded. "It is only a little Platz for you and commissions innumerable for me; that is all."

The man crossed over and kissed her softly, and send for his picture "as the Committee regret to her she comes." In the bitterness of his soul he consented to see a doctor. And when he shook his head and talked gravely of Davos Platz she laughed longing in her glorious eyes, that try as he would and unjust. When success means everything she well. Oh, Jack, if they only take it."

The days passed with no news from Burlington away horse dashing madly down the street, and less.

"Sir James Parker saw it one day and offered you ever so much money, isn't it?"

"When you have sent it in, dear, then I will se- a the posts eagerly.

Foster took the news as one stunned. The day after the funeral, "things are horribly unequal should we do then? This picture is to make your out not the ticket but a request that he would them safely settled at Davos Platz, and Jack me a hundred guineas for it if it is hung."

"To lose her on the point of winning all. Oh, is nothing to be done."

MR. C. Y. BANT

Digitized by Google

By George Manville Fenn.

CHAPTER XX.

A Terrible Complication.

"A lady, sir," said Rancer—"strange lady. Just come in a cab. Been in some accident."

"Why does she come to me? Send her to Mr. Gainsford. I'm not a surgeon."

"Said she had come from Lord Braetoun, sir. Would see you."

"Good Heavens, madam! You here?" cried Murray, as he saw the door move, and Lucy Lee stood before him, ghastly pale, her bonnet crushed and torn, and a long scratch across her face, which had bled slightly and been badly wiped.

"Yes. Come at once. He's dying. Pray, pray make haste!"

"Braetoun dying!"

The words went through Murray like a galvanic shock, and everything else was forgotten.

"What is it? You have been in an accident?"

"Yes, but come, pray come."

He did not hesitate. His thoughts were mingled, and for the moment he could think of nothing but obeying the summons.

The cab she had come in was waiting, and he followed her.

"Quick!" he said to the driver; "Chester Square."

"No, no; Brompton Square," cried Lucy wildly.

"But is he not at home?"

"Yes, I took him home, and there's a doctor with him; but he is so horribly hurt I felt that I must fetch you."

"You took him home," murmured Murray confusedly, and then to himself, as the light fully broke upon him. "Then she does not know!"

He was silent for a few moments, during which Lucy tried to speak to him, but broke down and covered her face with her hands, to burst into a hysterical fit of sobbing.

At last, though, she sat up and gazed piteously in his face.

"You saved him before; you will again?" she said.

"I will do all I can; but try and tell me what has happened."

He looked at her strangely, for her dishevelled aspect and the injury to her forehead suggested an encounter. He had read of such things. Was it possible that in a quarrel he had struck her, and in a mad fit of passion she had retaliated with some weapon?

"We were going—down to the races," she faltered, with a great effort—"Rod was driving four-in-hand—there was a waggon in the way—I hardly know—the next moment there was a horrible crash, and he was down among the horses' feet, and they were kicking him."

She shuddered and held her hands to her breast, as if to stay the tumultuous throbbing of her heart. Then, making an effort, she went on:

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

"I just saw that, and then I seemed to go to sleep, and when I opened my eyes again I was lying in a room with poor Auntie, whose arm was broken, and dear Rod was in the next room with people trying to bring him to.

"But it was a long time before he opened his eyes, and then he didn't even know me. The doctor said one of the horses had kicked him in the head, and they wanted to take him to the hospital, but I—we brought him home. Pray, pray tell the cabman to drive faster."

Murray mechanically gave the message, and then reseated himself, with the new trouble making his head swim. Braetoun at this woman's house, perhaps seriously injured, and Olive in ignorance of her husband's state.

The cab drew up at the number in Brompton Square that Lucy gave; and as they entered the house she left Murray in the hall, ran up the stairs to the drawing-room, and entered, to find the surgeon who had been called in kneeling by a mattress on the floor.

"Oh, Rod, Rod," she moaned, and she was about to fling herself down beside him, when the surgeon sternly interposed.

"Hush!" he said. "Silence! Not a word, or I will not be answerable for the consequences."

"But I am his——"

Lucy stopped with her lips apart.

"Yes, so I conclude, madam; but I am doing everything possible for your husband. Come with me into another room. I must speak to you."

He sternly backed her on to the landing, and said quickly as he closed the door: "I must have perfect silence in the house—a trained nurse must be in attendance."

"Oh, please, please let me!" she pleaded wildly.

"Hush, madam. Calmness and decision are necessary. You are yourself suffering from shock, and totally unfit. I wanted to tell you, too, that the case is so grave that I wish for some able medical man to be called for consultation, and—— I beg your pardon, sir; this is private, if you please."

"No, no," whispered Lucy excitedly. "This is Doctor Murray. I have been to fetch him."

"Yes, and I am an old friend of Lord Braetoun."

"Indeed! I beg pardon. I am glad to meet you. I knew your name well. Will you kindly step in?"

Murray followed him into the drawing-room, and Lucy crouched down upon the floor with her throbbing head resting in her hands, and the consultation went on, a low murmur reaching her ears from time to time. While beyond the door Allan Murray found that Braetoun's position was grave enough; severe concussion of the brain and a rib broken, with possible laceration of a lung.

The consultation and examination were long, and the surgeon said at last:

"If he were some sturdy young fellow, full of life, I should have hope, but he seems to have been in very bad health, fragile in the extreme. You have perhaps attended him?"

Digitized by Google

"Many times," said Murray gravely, and he gave a brief history of the last attack.

The surgeon tightened his lips, shrugged his shoulders, and said quietly:

"Well, sir, we must do all that we can. Will you suggest anything you would wish?"

"I can suggest nothing," said Murray, as he stood looking down at the pale face and bandaged head before him, and he shuddered slightly as he thought of what must be done.

"His friends ought to be communicated with at once. Will you undertake the painful task of speaking to Lady Braetoun?"

"Of speaking to Lady Braetoun?" said Murray with a start, and then he paused. "I cannot—I dare not," he muttered, and the surgeon looked wonderingly at him.

"Shall I go?" said the surgeon. "I see it would be very painful to you as the lady's friend."

"Painful, indeed," said Murray at last. "Lady Braetoun is an old friend, sir, and a lady whom I deeply reverence. The shock of this horrible mishap will nearly kill her. Can you help me under the circumstances to keep the whole truth from her, and spare her an additional agony?"

"Would it be right, sir?" said the surgeon sternly. "You are a man of eminence in the profession; should we be justified, in the face of such severe injuries, in keeping back the truth?"

"Not of his accident," said Murray bitterly. "I must be more plain. At any cost I must get my poor friend home. Lady Braetoun must not know under what circumstances the accident occurred."

"The overturning of a brake—want of skill in driving. But you said home. Impossible. If this is not their home, they must make arrangements to stay. Surely, sir, a little further consideration will show you the danger of the step."

"Yes, I see it without further consideration," said Murray gravely; "he must not be moved, but the lady whom we have seen is not Lady Braetoun, sir."

"Ah—h—h!" said the surgeon softly, and he tightened his lips. "Yes, I see, I see. Poor lady! The old, old story. It would save her—but no, the symptoms are too grave; I dare not."

"Yes," said Murray, with a weary sigh, "you are right. The symptoms are too grave; we dare not."

He turned mutely to his colleague, who interpreted rightly his silent question.

"Yes," he said, "we cannot help ourselves. Lord Braetoun's relatives must be told at once."

Murray bowed his head, stepped back to the injured man, bent over him for a short space, and then rose to quit the room.

"I will send in his old nurse as soon as possible," he said firmly. "You will stay?"

"Oh, yes, he must not be left."

As Murray reached the landing Lucy started to his side.

"May I go in now?"

"No; it is impossible."

"Oh, don't say that," she cried in a passionate whisper. "I can't bear it. Pray, pray let me go. I'll nurse him; do anything. Don't, pray don't keep me away; it is too cruel."

"Heaven knows, my poor girl, that I do not want to be cruel to you, but I am forced to say that you must not go."

"Then he is worse? I was right. He is dying!"

"No; he is not dying. He is in a very dangerous condition, but there is always hope. Now for his sake be patient, and leave it to those who will do their best to save his life."

"Ah! You are going! No, no, don't, pray don't go. You must stay with him. He has often told me that no one but you could save him when he was ill."

"I am going to send in a nurse, and——"

"Yes. I know: to get a carriage to take him away. He shall not go. It would kill him. I would die first. I know: it's because he is here with me."

"I am not going to fetch a carriage to take him away," said Murray sternly, "for it would kill him to be moved."

"Ah!" ejaculated the girl.

"But I must let his friends know of his condition. I am obliged to tell you that."

"His friends?" she cried, looking at him wildly. "Yes," she added, with a curious smile, "you are going to tell his wife. Well, I am sorry for her, but why tell her? She wouldn't come near him now."

Murray made no reply to that, but said hastily:

"As soon as the nurse comes——"

"No, no; he shall have no nurse but me."

"He must have a properly trained nurse if his life is to be saved."

"Oh!" groaned Lucy, and her pallid face grew convulsed.

"If you have any proper feeling you will help the lady I send in to do her duty."

"Yes, yes, Doctor," she said, clasping her hands and looking up at him appealingly; "I will—I will do everything; I'll be her servant. I'll do everything you wish, and be so patient and humble. Yes, indeed, I will. Go quickly, please. Don't mind what I said, only pray don't be cruel to me, because—because—yes, that's right. Go now. I'll wait, and get anything the other doctor wants."

He hurried out, feeling that his task was becoming doubly hard, so hard that for the moment there was little room to think of self.

CHAPTER XXI.

Playing to Lose.

Murray went straight to the nurses' home, was fortunate in his search, dispatched the attendant, and ten minutes later he was at Eaton Place, and was shown into Emsworth's library.

"Ah, Doctor, glad to see you, but, eh? What is it? Something wrong?"

Murray told him briefly.

"I could almost read it in your face," said Emsworth. "The fool! The idiot! No, poor devil! An accident. Might have happened to any of us. But how horrible! Olive! It will nearly break her heart. We mustn't tell her."

Murray looked at him fixedly.

"Eh? You think we must?"

"He is in a grave condition."

"You don't mean that? Tut—tut—tut! Dangerous? My poor, poor girl! I suppose we must tell her before they bring him home."

"They cannot bring him home, not for weeks to come—if we can save his life."

"Worse and worse. Where do you say he is—at some house where they took him? How was it they sent for you? He was sensible then?"

Murray drew a deep breath and then completed his communication, and Emsworth started from his seat, and, forgetting his pains, began to walk up and down the room, to the window and back.

"Out with her then! A scoundrel! A judgment on him, and at her house. The miserable Jezebel. This is worse than all. He must be brought away before she knows."

"It is impossible, or I would have had it done at once."

"You would, yes, I know you would, for her sake," groaned Emsworth. "But we can't tell her then. She must think he has gone off on some mad expedition, and know nothing till he is worse or better. I couldn't look her in the face and tell her he has been such a scoundrel to her."

Digitized by Google

"It is in the evening papers by now," said Murray, "and she is sure to know."

"Yes, she is sure to know," groaned Emsworth from the window. "Ah! Look here, man, look here!" he shouted.

As Murray reached the open window a boy was crying out papers across the way, a bundle under his arm, and one hand holding a contents bill, with, in big letters:

"Fatal Carriage Accident at Brompton. Death of Lord Braetoun."

"And you told me he was only badly hurt," said Emsworth reproachfully. "Am I such an old woman that you must break the news gently?"

"I told you the simple truth. I have just come from sending a nurse to his side. He is very, very bad, and there is nothing more to be done yet. We may save his life. I can say no more."

That "may" sent a peculiar chill through Isaac Emsworth, and he stood gazing hard at his visitor.

"What shall you do?" said Murray, whose deep voice sounded strangely impressive.

"Ha! I must go and tell her at once," said Emsworth bitterly. "Good God! What news for a father to take to the girl who is everything to him! How can I tell her? It is horrible! I never knew I was such a coward till now. Lying there, at that woman's house! Fool! Idiot! I must have been mad ever to encourage the match! I can't help it—his doing—I wouldn't be such a brute, but I can't help saying it; wouldn't it be better for her if the news that scoundrel is yelling were true, quite true?"

Murray's heart gave one great throb, and he turned pale as death.

The two men stood gazing at each other as if trying to read the thoughts that half maddened them, and at last Murray spoke as if Emsworth's question had not reached his ears.

"I am going back to Braetoun."

"No!" cried Emsworth angrily; "not yet, I feel a broken, helpless old coward, and I—I dare not face her to tell her where he lies. Can we not—keep it back about what place it is; or at all risks he must be taken home before she knows that truth."

"It is impossible, Mr. Emsworth. He cannot be moved."

"Heaven help me then! I never needed its help more. Go for me, Murray—go and break it to her—as gently as you can—you know her well; she has such trust and faith in you."

Murray shrank from him with a look of horror.

"I? I go and tell her?" he cried. "Impossible!"

Then more calmly, as he fought hard to master his emotion:

"No, you cannot mean it. If this terrible news is to be broken to Lady Braetoun, and it must be before she hears in this brutal way exaggerated and shouted through the streets. The task must come from you."

"Yes, it must come from me," groaned Emsworth, who was trembling like a leaf.

"Go at once, sir," said Murray, more calmly now. "Break it as gently as you can. Tell her in a way to make her hopeful. I'll go back to the house and see if I cannot get this woman away."

"Ah, yes; of course," cried Emsworth, snatching at the thread of hope. "Why should she know whose house it is? With care we may keep the news from her till he can be moved. And look here, Murray, money will do a great deal. Use it as freely as you like. Spare no expense. Spend thousands if it is necessary, only keep this horrible position from her ears. Come, let's go at once."

CHAPTER XXII.

AN OWL OF ILL TIDINGS.

OLIVE, Lady Braetoun, was in her room putting the finishing touches, with the help of her maid, to a simple afternoon costume, and the carriage was waiting at the door. Her face was pale and troubled, and a faint line was dawning upon her broad white forehead, for she had been thinking a good deal during the past few days that she would try and wean her husband somewhat from the intense and feverish love he was developing, as it seemed to her, for the race-course. For the truth was beginning to dawn upon her that his monetary troubles were on the increase, and instead of his freeing himself, as he had assured himself he would, by a few lucky coups, matters were getting worse, and he was constantly absent from home.

She had not seen him for five days, for he had told her that he was compelled to go down to Newmarket and also to spend two days in Surrey at his little training stable, where his mare, Belladonna, had developed some strange disease.

So Braetoun went down to the Surrey farmstead and to Newmarket, but he did not send any message home. It was Highdown Races that day, and having unwillingly become acquainted, since her marriage, with racing fixtures, Olive concluded that Braetoun would be down there and return home at night.

The line grew a little deeper in her brow as she covered her fair young face with her veil, the act seeming to draw a cloud over its sunshine, and she trembled a little, wondering how he would be when he came home—happy and bright, and eager to take her in his arms, or dull, heavy, and bitter from losses, and complaining about the agonising pains in his head.

The veil had just been secured, and Olive was thinking that she would first go and call on the Dowager Lady Braetoun, when an upstairs bell rang for Melson.

"The bell, my lady."

"Yes; it is only to say that the carriage is waiting. Go and say that we know."

"Yes, my lady."

The next minute the maid was back in the room.

"If you please, my lady, Lady Braetoun is here, in the drawing-room."

"Oh," said Olive. "I'll go down."

But there was no look of delight in her eyes, for somehow the ties of affection between her and her former chaperon had not tightened since the wedding.

Olive moved to the door, but before she could reach it there was a sharp click, it flew open, and Braetoun's mother staggered in, looking wildly excited.

"Are you all treating it like this!" she cried. "Where is he? Where is he?"

Olive turned ghastly pale, and caught her visitor by the arm.

"What is it—what is wrong?"

"Then they haven't brought him here?"

"Brought—him—— Oh!" cried Olive wildly; "then something has happened to him! Quick, Lady Braetoun," she cried, seizing her now by the shoulders in her excitement. "Pray, pray, speak! Roderick—Roderick!"

Lady Braetoun was in an intense state of excitement, and bursting into a fit of hysterical sobbing, she wailed out:

"He's killed—he's killed, and the paper said they had brought him home."

Olive reeled and fell as if suddenly struck down, and Lady Braetoun, whose hands clutched the evening paper containing the terrible news, let it fall to sink on her knees, and began to tear off her daughter-in-law's veil and bonnet.

"Oh, my lady, my lady!" sobbed the maid, wringing her hands; "it's killed her—it's killed her!"

Lady Braetoun, who was the more collected of the two, pointed to the water on the stand, for she could not speak, and for the next few minutes that, eau-de-Cologne, and salts were tried in turn, but without avail.

The maid then took the initiative, tore at the bell, and on her own responsibility sent off one of the servants to Wimpole Street with a message to Murray.

"Widowed—doubly widowed!" groaned Lady Braetoun, as she sobbed hysterically over Olive; and then, as she took first one and then the other cold hand to raise it to her lips, she let them fall, and knelt there gazing straight before her.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, my lady! my lady!" cried Melson; "don't you be taken like this, too."

Lady Braetoun started and turned to the maid.

"That paper—quick!" she cried; and the maid handed it to her from where it lay crumpled on the floor.

"What did they mean by 'took him home'?" she cried vacantly, as she opened the sheet and turned it towards the girl. "I can't read it—I can't read it," she moans. "Quick! Tell me."

The girl mastered her sobs, and began to read the brief account, but Lady Braetoun interrupted:

"No, no, not that; the end—the end."

The girl uttered a loud sob, hastily dashed the tears from her eyes with her apron, and then read aloud the concluding paragraph of the report.

"Yes, yes," sobbed Lady Braetoun wildly. "I see it all now, that wretched woman was with him, and they took him there."

She began gesticulating with her hands, and rocked herself to and fro, sobbing hysterically.

"Oh, Roderick, my darling, and I did try so hard to win you back from your wicked ways," she cried. "I did think that now you would have repented, and left her altogether for your wife's sake. But I might have known why you were so much from home, neglecting her as you have. Cut off in your early manhood—at a time like this! A judgment upon you for your sin!"

"Oh, hush, hush, my lady!" whispered the maid excitedly.

"No, no; the truth must come out now," wailed Lady Braetoun, who was half delirious with grief; "everyone must know of his wicked, shameless life. I tried to hide it for her sake. I tried all a mother could, but only to be mocked, ill-treated, and reviled, and now it has come home, snatched away like that in his sins, to shame us both."

"My lady, my lady!" cried the maid in a hoarse whisper, as she took the unhappy woman by the shoulders, literally shook her, and ended by clapping a hand on her lips. "Hush, don't, pray, my lady. Can't you see she's coming to, and listening to every word?"

Lady Braetoun turned and looked in Olive's direction, to find that she had recovered her senses, and had raised herself upon her left elbow, while her right hand was holding her wet, dishevelled hair back from her brow, as she stared with dilated eyes at the speaker—her parted lips and ghastly face proclaiming that she grasped the full truth of all that was being said.

"Olive, my darling," cried Lady Braetoun wildly; "don't, don't look at me like that. It wasn't my fault, indeed."

"Roderick! Dead! Tell me, then, where is he now?"

Lady Braetoun uttered a passionate cry, and sank down on the carpet, burying her face in her hands, and then burst out into a series of hysterical shrieks.

Olive crawled to her, and as she bent over she drew the unhappy woman's hands from her face, as if unrelentingly determined to know all.

"Lady Braetoun, speak to me," she said in a strange, husky voice.

"No, no, no!" sobbed the hysterical woman.

"Speak! tell me! I will know the worst!"

"I did try—so hard, and—and he did leave her—but—but he went back."

"Who is this woman?" said Olive sternly.

"I can't—I daren't tell you, my dear. It is too horrible at a time like this, for he is dead—he is dead!"

"Dead?" said Olive where she knelt now, with her hands pressed to her temples. "Dead? No—no—no, it can't be true!"

"No, no; you can't come in!" cried the maid, who had suddenly rushed to the door. "My lady is taken ill."

"Stand back, girl!" cried Emsworth angrily. "Olive, my darling!"

"Father!" she cried wildly, as she stretched out her hands to him. "Take me, oh, take me! Dead—dead!"

She sank in his arms as he lifted her from where she knelt, and her head dropped back in perfect insensibility once again.

"Too late!" groaned Emsworth, turning to Lady Braetoun, who crouched dishevelled on the floor. "Does she know the worst?"

Lady Braetoun gazed at him with a pitiful, half-imbecile look on her countenance, as her lips feebly moved, but no words came, and Emsworth involuntarily turned to the trembling maid with so fiercely-questioning a look in his eyes that she whispered quickly:

"Yes, sir; I did try to stop her, but my lady told her all."

(To be continued.)

A Faithless Sentry.

SAID the President of the military court of Trofim Stoyan:

"You have been found guilty of the crime of aiding the escape of prisoner number two hundred and seventy-nine from the mine of Gorkaya-Balka. Before sentence is passed the court desires to hear from you your version of the circumstances of the prisoner's escape, and the motives which induced you to be false to the trust imposed on you. We understand that you dispute the correctness of some of the witnesses' statements. We warn you to speak the strict truth. Stand at attention."

As the President spoke, a slim young fellow, standing between two glittering bayonets, drew himself up to the attention, glanced at the spectators, and faced the court.

"Go on," said the President.

"Your excellency," began the soldier, "I don't want mercy, and I don't expect it; but you have asked me to tell the truth and I tell it. It was on a Saturday night, snowing hard and bitterly cold. Sergeant Petroff marched me up to the entrance of Gorkaya-Balka mine, and I relieved the sentry on duty there. I was to remain until midnight, and I received the usual orders to stop anyone who tried to enter or leave the gallery and to shoot them if they persisted. I was shivering with cold and kept tramping about in front of the entrance to keep warm. After the barrack clock had struck ten I noticed someone crouching in the shadow of the old tool house—a woman, I thought. It seemed darker there than out in the open. The snow was driving in my face.

Digitized by Google

"I felt queer and timid that night. Turning sharply round at the end of my beat farthest from the tool house I saw approaching me the figure of a woman in black. I got opposite the entry into the gallery and stood silent. I don't know why I felt scared. There was no one else about or nearer than the overseer's house. She came swiftly over the snow, and her face was covered with a veil. I couldn't speak; it was as if my tongue was frozen. She put her hands on my shoulders, and looked up into my face."

"What was she like?" demanded the President.

"Your excellency, I cannot describe her. I only saw her eyes then, and they were on fire, and went right through me. She told me much that I cannot recall, for I was looking, not listening. But at last I understood her to be talking of her brother in the mine. She said she had come all the way from Russia to see him, and that he was dying. She said that if I would let her into the mine for a few minutes she would always pray for me, and devote her whole life to making me happy. Her great black eyes bewitched me, and I believed her. I said nothing, but pointed to the mine, and in a moment she had fled into the dark opening to the gallery. I never thought of what I was doing. I was dazed, and stood stock still, and the snow kept falling all the time, and the night was growing darker. I had my eyes fixed on the entrance, and saw the figure emerge and run towards me.

"'Soldier,' she said, 'you have made me happy for life; make yourself happy and fly with us. Let my brother pass. I will lead you and him to a place where we will be happy together. Be good to me, soldier, and I will give you all you ask from me. I will be yours. I will live for you, and die for you.'

"Don't smile, excellency. I was intoxicated with her words. I believed her. Her arms were round my neck, and her face was lovely as the Madonna's. I seized my rifle and flung it with all my strength out into the snow. She put a file into my hands, and I followed her into the gallery. There the darkness was thicker still, but we groped our way to where a man stood chained to a thick wooden stanchion. I knew what I had to do. The man said nothing, but the woman kissed me; kissed me, excellency. So I worked like a madman. He was soon free.

"We reached the entrance as the barrack clock was striking eleven. There was a whole hour yet before the guard would be changed. We ran through the little wood and crossed the frozen river, and away beyond a wide open space, where the snow was very deep, we entered the pine woods. The woman knew where she was leading us, for we came to a hut where we found clothes and food. I buried my uniform in the snow. All that night we moved rapidly through the woods, hardly speaking to one another at first. But the man and woman went on in front, walking arm in arm, and often they kissed one another, laughing and crying in turns. When I was close to them they sometimes spoke French. As soon as it was light I never let my eyes leave her face. Her eyes were large and dark, but her hair was like gold and hung down her back wet on her black cloak."

"Stand at attention, sir!" said the President sharply.

The prisoner stood erect and again resumed his story.

"The morning was clear and frosty. The man had fallen several times during the night. His strength was gone.

"I saw he was pale as death, and blood oozed from his mouth. The woman grew frantic with fear that he would be caught. The man, however, could go no farther. He lay down on the snow, just as we were leaving the woods and coming out on the steppe. I thought he would have died. I took him in my arms and carried him verst after verst until my strength was gone and I felt fever coming over me. But the woman never noticed me, and once or twice when I turned to look at her from under my burden I saw that her eyes were fixed on the face of the man I carried. I could hold out no longer. I fell on the snow and fainted. How long I lay there I cannot say. Whether or not I dreamt I am unable to tell the court. I don't think it could have been a dream. I thought I saw a troika come noiselessly over the snow, and heard the breathing of horses."

"Do you mean to tell the court this was a dream? Can you give no further particulars about the troika or its driver?" interrupted the President.

"No, your excellency; the horses were black, I thought, and I know their eyes shone brightly; the sledge also seemed to be black. It came silently, it went away with gently ringing bells, the silver bells. When I came to my senses it was snowing hard. The wet flakes awoke me, I think. I gazed around me on all sides, I was alone. I thought of my dream. There were no hoof-marks, no traces of sledge runners, nothing but the level, trackless snow. Perhaps the snow had filled up the track, perhaps—perhaps there was some other reason. Your excellency, I felt myself forsaken. I could not understand it. I was mad, and cried aloud. Suddenly I noticed pinned to my coat a scrap of paper with pencil writing on it. It was taken from me when I gave myself up, but I'll never forget the words: 'We cannot take you with us further. Save yourself as best you can. My husband and I will always pray for you.' Oh, excellency, I saw it all then, and sat down in the snow and wept and cursed. I loved that woman. Yes, I was a fool."

"And a traitor," interpolated the President, scowling.

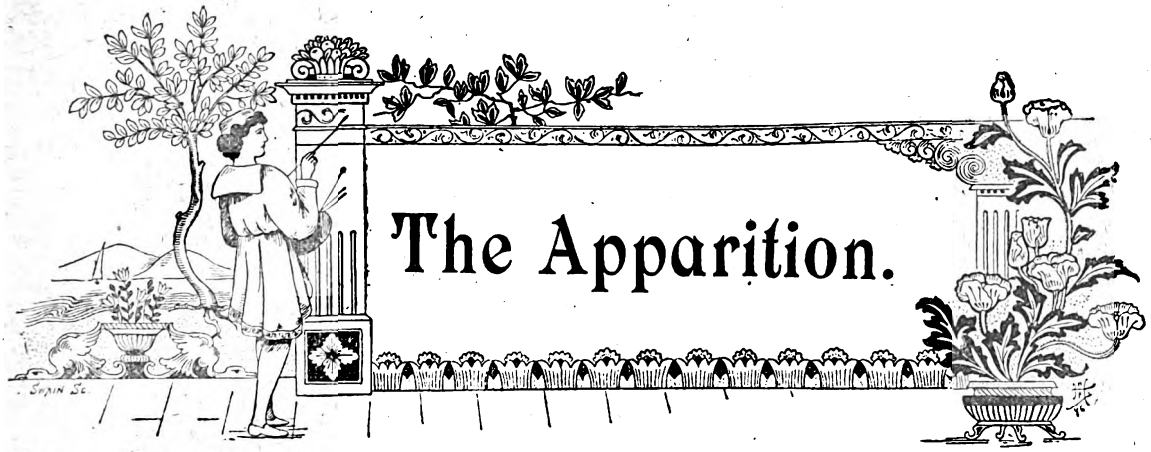
"And a traitor, if your excellency says so; but I did not think of that then. I thought only of my love, of how I had been betrayed, of my hurt pride. Your excellency knows the rest."

"The sentence of the court is that Private Trofim Stoyan take the place of the escaped prisoner in the mine at Gorkaya-Balka. He will remain there during the pleasure of his Imperial Majesty."

That evening the young soldier was chained to the stanchion.

ARNOLD WEEVIL.

Digitized by Google



The Apparition.

The peasant stood face to face with the doctor in the background, near the bed of the dying. The old woman, calm, resigned, regarded the two men and listened to their talk. She was about to die, but the thought was not revolting. She was ninety-two and her days were over.

Through the open door and window streamed the July sun, spreading its warm rays over the brown, earthen floor, furrowed and beaten down by the wooden shoes of four generations of rustics. The odours of the fields drifted in, borne on the scorching breeze; the smell of grasses, wheat, and leaves burned by the noonday heat. The clicking sound the grasshoppers made was clear and distinct.

Raising his voice, the doctor said:

"Honoré, you cannot leave your mother all alone in this state. She may pass away at any moment."

The peasant grumbled.

"Must get in my wheat. Been too long in the fields already. The weather's just right. What do you say, mother?"

The old, dying woman, still possessing the avarice of a Normandy peasant, nodded "Yes," urging her son to get in his wheat and leave her to die alone.

But the doctor became angry and stamped his foot. "You are nothing but a brute, and I'll not allow you to do it, do you hear? If you have to get in your wheat to-day, go and find Mother Rapet, parbleu! and let her watch your mother. I wish it, do you hear? If you don't I'll let you die like a dog when it comes your turn to die—when your turn comes to be ill—do you hear that?"

The peasant, a tall, spare man, tortured by indecision, by fear of the doctor, and the fierce love of saving, hesitated, calculated, and blurted out:

"How much will La Rapet ask to watch?"

"Do you suppose I know?" exclaimed the doctor. "That depends on how long you want her for. Arrange that yourself with her, morbleu! but I want her to be here in an hour, understand," and he went out.

When the peasant was alone he turned towards his mother and said in a resigned voice:

"I'm going to get La Rapet, because that man wants her. Don't budge till I get back."

And he left the room.

La Rapet, an old woman, watched the dead and the dying of the Commune and its environs. Then, when she had wrapped her clients in the clothes they were never to leave, she took up her irons to press the garments of the living.

Wrinkled as a last year's apple, evil-minded, jealous, avaricious in the extreme, bent double, as if she had become broken by continually bending over the ironing-board, one might say that she had a sort of love for witnessing the agony of the dying.

She could only talk of people she had seen expire, of the variety of ways they had passed out of life, repeating her stories over and over again, with the minuteness of detail of a hunter recounting his adventures.

When Honoré Bontemps found her she was preparing blueing for the collarettes of the village women.

"Well, good-evening," he said. "How are things going, Mother Rapet?"

"Just the same, just the same," turning her head. "How is it up your way?"

"All right with me, but the mother's bad."

"What's the matter with her?"

"She's going to close her eyes."

The old woman took her hands out of the water, the blue, transparent drops dripping from her fingers into the tub.

"She's down as low as that?" with a sudden sympathy.

"The doctor says she won't live beyond sunrise. What'll you charge to watch her to the end? You know I'm not rich. Never could afford a servant—that's what broke mother down. She worked like ten: never stopped till she was ninety-two—you see how it is."

La Rapet replied gravely:

"There are two prices; two francs a day, three francs a night for the rich. Franc a day, two a night for the other. The other is for you."

The peasant reflected. He knew his mother to be hardy, vigorous, tenacious of life. She might last eight days in spite of the doctor.

He said resolutely:

"No, I'd rather make a price—a price to the end. I'll take the chances one way or another. The doctor say she will soon go. If so, all the better for you and the worse for me. If she holds on to-morrow or longer, I'm ahead—you're out."

The nurse, surprised, looked at the man. She had never made such a bargain before. She hesitated, thinking of the risk she might run.

"I can't say anything until I have seen the old one," she said.

"Come and see her."

She dried her hands and followed him.

Digitized by Google

As they neared the house, Honoré said to himself: "Ah, if it is over already!" And the desire he felt manifested itself in his voice. But the old woman was not dead. She lay on her back on her pallet, her arms extended on the purple coverlet, hands frightfully thin, wrinkled, resembling crabs, contracted by rheumatism and years of grinding toil.

La Rapet approached the bed and studied the dying woman. She felt the pulse, listened to the breathing, tapped the chest, questioned her to hear her speak, then, after a final look, went out, followed by Honoré. Her opinion was formed, the old woman would not pass the night.

"Well, then?" he asked anxiously.

The nurse answered.

"Well, she'll last two days, perhaps three. You give me six francs altogether."

"Six francs—six francs!" he cried. "Have you lost your senses? Don't I tell you she will only last five or six hours?"

And they disputed a long time together. As the nurse was going away, and as his wheat would not be gathered in, he at last consented.

"Very well, that's settled; six francs, all included, until the corpse is carried away."

He strode away towards his wheat, lying in the field beneath the broiling sun that withered the stalks.

The nurse entered the house.

She had brought her work, because by the dying and the dead she worked without relaxation. Suddenly she asked:

"Have they administered the sacrament, Mother Bontemps?" The peasant shook her head, and La Rapet, who was devotional, rose hastily.

"Seigneur Dieu! Is that possible? I'll go and get the Curé," and she ran off towards the priest's house at such a speed that the gamins thought some misfortune had happened.

The priest soon came in his surplice, preceded by a choir-boy ringing a bell to announce the passing of God's sacrament. The men working in the fields doffed their great hats, waiting silently until the white vestments had disappeared behind a farm; the women gathering herbs rose to make the sign of the cross. The choir-boy, in his red skirts, walked rapidly; the priest, his head leaning on one side and mumbling prayers, followed; behind them came La Rapet, bent double as if to kneel as she walked, her hands joined as in church.

Honoré, afar off, saw them pass. He called out:

"Where is our Curé going?"

"He is carrying the good God to thy mother, pardi!" replied the choir-boy.

"That's good," said the peasant, returning to his work.

Mother Bontemps was confessed, received absolution, and the priest went away, leaving the two women alone.

La Rapet looked at the dying woman curiously, asking herself how long she would last.

The day was declining; a fresher air entering the chamber in puffs caused the picture of a saint on the wall to dance grotesquely. The little window-curtain, yellowed and covered with fly-specks, seemed to be struggling to fly away like the soul of the old woman.

She lay there silent, her eyes expressing indifference to death so near. Her breathing sounded harsh in the silence.

As night fell Honoré came in and approached the bed. He saw that she was still living.

"How goes it?" he asked, as he used to do when she was indisposed.

Then he sent away La Rapet after the injunction.

"To-morrow at five, without fail."

She replied:

"To-morrow—five o'clock."

She arrived at daybreak, when Honoré was eating his soup, which he had prepared himself.

"Well, has the mother passed away?" she asked.

He replied, with a cunning look in his eyes:

"She is much better," and he went out chuckling.

La Rapet was disquieted as she approached the bed, angry to find the old woman in the same position. She understood that she might last two, four, even eight days, and she was furious at the man who had played her the trick, and the woman who would not die.

She set to work, nevertheless, her eyes fixed on the wrinkled face of Mère Bontemps.

Honoré came in to lunch. He seemed happy, even jeering. Then he went out. He was harvesting his wheat under very favourable conditions.

La Rapet was getting exasperated. Every minute that passed seemed to her to be robbing her of money. She had a desire, an insane desire, to take that old hag, that old witch, by the throat and stop, with a little squeeze, the feeble breath that was stealing her time and money.

Then she thought of the danger, and other ideas came in her head as she approached the bed.

"Did you ever see the devil?" she asked.

"No," murmured Mère Bontemps feebly.

Then the nurse began to tell stories to terrorise the poor, dying creature.

A few moments before one died the devil appeared, she said. He carried a broom in his hand, an iron pot on his head, and screamed horribly. When one saw him it was all over, life would go out in a little while.

Mère Bontemps, moved with terror, tried to turn her head to look into the shadowy corners of the room, as if she expected an apparition. Suddenly La Rapet disappeared at the bottom of the bed. In the closet she found a sheet and wrapped herself in it. On her head she placed an iron pot, whose three feet curving outward resembled horns. She took up a broom in her right hand, and with her left she lifted a tin wash-boiler, letting it fall upon the floor with a resounding crash. Then stepping up in a chair she drew aside the curtain at the foot of the bed, and appeared gesticulating and screaming shrilly under the iron pot that covered her face, menacing with her broom the old peasant woman.

Overcome with an insane look, the dying woman tried to raise herself to flee. She struggled partly out of the bed-clothes, then fell back with a deep sigh.

It was over.

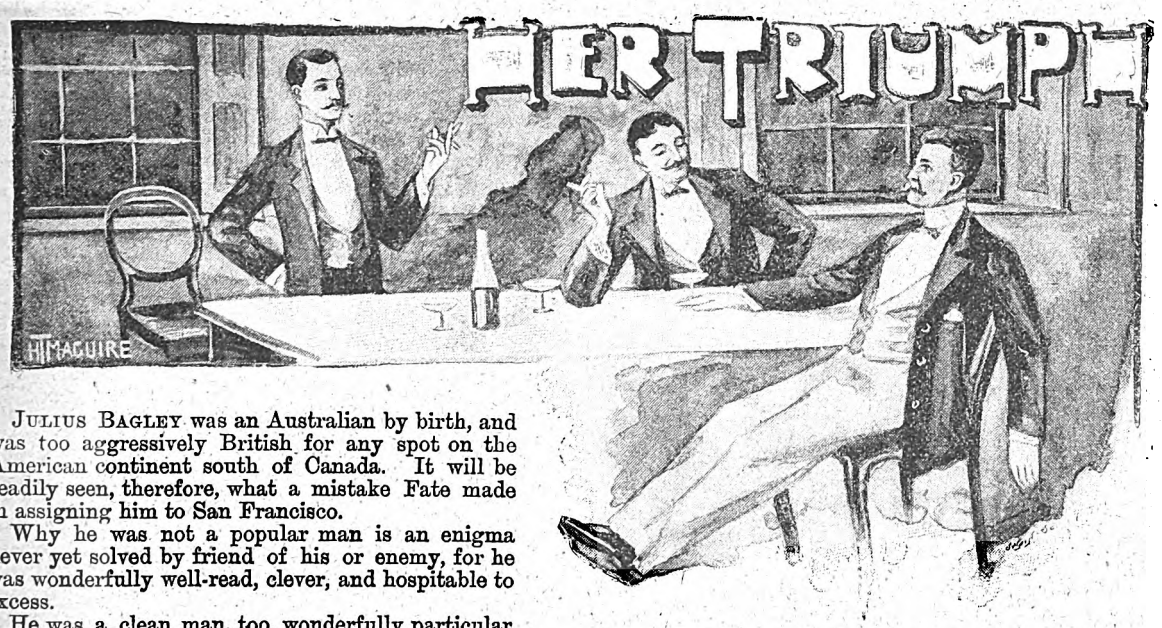
And La Rapet tranquilly put everything back in the closet, and with experienced hands closed the eyes of the dead. She laid a saucer of holy water on the bed, and sprinkled the room, then kneeling down, began to repeat the prayers for the dead, that she knew by heart, having learned them as a matter of business.

When Honoré entered in the evening he found her still praying, and he calculated that she had made twenty sous out of him, because she had watched three days and a night, which made only five francs instead of six which he owed her.

Le Vier.

Digitized by Google

HER TRIUMPH



Julius Bagley was an Australian by birth, and was too aggressively British for any spot on the American continent south of Canada. It will be readily seen, therefore, what a mistake Fate made in assigning him to San Francisco.

Why he was not a popular man is an enigma never yet solved by friend of his or enemy, for he was wonderfully well-read, clever, and hospitable to excess.

He was a clean man, too, wonderfully particular about his appearance—clean morally, we are grudgingly obliged to admit, as well as clean physically.

When it is announced that he was a trifle below five feet in height, it is unnecessary to add that in order to make the most of his inches he ever stood as upright as a bantam chicken, and habitually wore a top hat in preference to anything lower.

In happy moments he cited history to prove that intellect lodged from choice in understood men. Napoleon was a favourite with him.

He belonged to the proper club in the town, and played cards admirably; but possessed such a vicious knowledge of what was correct play that never an acquaintance of his breathes who would be Bagley's partner of his own volition. He was unpleasant when he lost, to be sure; but he was so particularly disagreeable when he won, that those whom Fate provided to be his partners invariably succumbed to a reprehensible desire of losing the game for him.

Another vice of his was that he never became genially intoxicated. Drink he did, and sometimes hard; but its effects was to render him more Britons-never-will-be-slaves-y, and more anxious to improve upon his height than ever. Moreover, an extra glass was apt to bring to abnormally good memory some dead-and-buried rule of whist, over which our games mostly broke up in heated and unfriendly discussion.

Nor did he get on well with women. He was so prone to construe every remark of theirs into something personal and derogatory to his dignity, and to answer it sneeringly as such, that he and they had ill times of it together. Poor beggar! he tried to be amiable and fascinating, that I know. I sometimes felt very sorry for him. When he had some particularly bad dig, he would ease his tension by blowing off to us the bad training of American women. They didn't know their place. They had too much to say in outside affairs—stupid say, too. They were allowed to be impudent from their youth up. Their parents were to blame and their husbands, too.

"For goodness' sake, Bag, why don't you marry and show us what ought to be done?" growled young Grosvenor one night.

"I intend to," answered Bagley. "I intend to marry a woman with no dashed notions of independence, if I can find such a one on this free—dashed free—soil of yours. If she can't read or write, so much the better, so many less the chances of her wasting her time and getting into trouble. All a woman wants to know is how to cook well and how to mind her own business and to keep things tidy."

"Fine qualifications for a housekeeper; but say, Bag, would you find such a woman the brightest of companions?"

"Companions—stuff! A man's companions should be men," he announced blatantly, rearing his pompadour. He wore it extra long, so as not to depend entirely upon his boot-heels for additional inches.

"Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat," shouted Grosvenor, puffing himself out.

We were uneasy lest this might provoke a squall, but Julius had a grasp on a subject that interested him, he was loath to let it go for the common occupation of taking offence.

"When a man provides a woman with a home and food and clothes, he has a right to expect perfect obedience from her," he resumed stridently. "But if she is allowed several years' fling, as young girls are, he won't get it from her. Worse than all, a man really never can be sure of what he has married, so schooled are women from infancy in keeping their bad traits from cropping out. The safest thing to do is to pick out some neglected, modest girl, and train her. Teach her your ways, so that there will be no clashing of wills, no family jars. My wife shall have had no experiences before I marry her."

"But you'll keep her bountifully supplied afterwards, eh?" demanded Grosvenor rather impudently.

"What do you mean?" demanded Bagley ferociously of us all, whom he surprised grinning covertly at each other.

We hastened to explain that nobody meant anything in the least, and stuck to the lie till it saved us;

Digitized by Google

nevertheless we held privately to the opinion that Bagley was just the man to vent upon a wife and family all those petty brutalities of temper and speech that good manners obliged him to veneer in society.

That summer he spent a month in the mountains at a third-rate hotel, kept by a miserly little Frenchman. We couldn't discover any attractions about the place, but Bagley assured us that the fishing was good. In the autumn he went up there again, and on his return to the city he announced that he was married. He married the innkeeper's daughter, brought her to the City, and went promptly into housekeeping.

"The next time you saw off your hair, consult me."

If I confess that we were simply wild to see what sort of a woman he had married, I only state the case mildly. Our fever of expectation was aggravated by a fear that she might be such an ignorant dowdy that every pride would keep him from inviting us to the house. But we didn't know him. Matrimony—the first month of it—brought all his good points to the surface, and he one day invited Grosvenor and me up to dinner with such hospitality and enjoyment that very shame prompted us to refuse. But we went.

The house was a cosy little box, prettily furnished (Bagley was thrifty), and Mrs. Bagley fairly captivated us. Not that she was ravingly beautiful, for she was not; but she was very sweet looking, and slim, and shy, and appallingly young—she couldn't have been over seventeen. She hardly spoke a word of English either, but she did the honours of the house so charmingly and showed herself so infatuated with everything Julius said or did or thought, that we went away that night actually pleased with Julius ourselves.

Of course, we called again and again; but bit by bit, as always happens, we began to see behind the scenes a great deal. As the newness of his situation wore off, all traces of Julius's real self showed through and began to make affairs lively.

For one thing, he shamefully took advantage of her ignorance of English to badger her into making mistakes, at which he would roar loudly, and the poor little thing would laugh too, and pretend to be as pleased as pigs herself, in spite of the tell-tale flood of colour that would rise up to her hair roots.

Her name was Desiree, but he said it was too big a mouthful, and called her Sarah "for short." She smilingly begged him to call her Daisy, if he objected to Desiree, but Sarah he stuck to, and Sarah it was except when an extra stress of bad temper provoked him to "Sal."

Now this matter of a name might seem a slight thing, but after a woman gives up her surname, if she can't keep her christian name, what rights has she?

Desiree (for so we got to calling her in defiance of Bagley) was indeed ignorant—she scarcely could do more than sign her own name—but her ignorance had been forced upon her, for she was the most intelligent little lady I ever met. The way she began to pick up information from the papers and the quickness with which she mastered the language was simply marvellous.

We used to play cards up at Bagley's until twelve and one o'clock, and little Desiree would get so sleepy that she would almost tumble out of her chair, but Bagley would not let her go to bed. He must have represented it to her that it would be an insult to her guests, or so we judged from a chance remark of the little woman, and we made up our minds to clear out at ten. We did it once, but on the occasion of our following visit she begged us to stay so pathetically and glanced such imploring glances to her husband that we felt sure he had blown her up for driving us away. So of course we stayed.

After a few months Bagley got tired of showing off his wife and began to train her. The first public exhibition of his method occurred on Independence Day. Grosvenor and I had gone up to Bagley's to take him and Mrs. B. to an officers' dinner at the Presidio.

Desiree came into the room all smiles and blushes. She wore a brand-new dress, and her hair, which was orginally combed straight back from her forehead, was curled, and curled profusely. She looked radiant, pretty, and knew it, and turned her glowing face to Bagley for approbation. He scowled, and replied:

"The next time you saw off your hair, consult me. When you have gone into your room and brushed that fizz off your face I'll take you out with me, not before."

It was her first act of independence, in honour of the day, perchance, and he resolved to nip it at once.

The colour that deserted Desiree's face must have crept into mine, for I felt it sting me.

"Don't you like it, Julius?" asked she, with a catch in her voice, but smiling bravely at us, as if she enjoyed her lord's little eccentricities.

"No! I don't like it! Let me know if you are going to do as I ask or if you are not, because time presses."

"I am afraid eet will look vairy funny combed back, it ess so short. Just to-day, Julius, do let me, please."

She looked at me anxiously, with a nervous dread of his refusal, which made Grosvenor and me want to kick ourselves for seeing.

Bagley hung up his hat, sat down ostentatiously, and opened a paper. The courageous little woman stood nervously in the middle of the floor and tried it again.

Digitized by Google

"Will you not let me go out wiz you onless I comb it my hair back, Julius, dear?"

"Either do as I tell you, or don't do it!" answered he angrily, turning upon her fiercely. "But not a toe do you go as you are! Understand that."

A look of outraged dignity displaced the intreaty on her face, and I was filled for a moment with unholy joy, expecting she would rebel, but she did the wisest thing, perhaps, in turning to Grosvenor and me, and saying sweetly:

"Wait for me the moment, please; eet will not take but a little while to make a scaircrow of myself!"

She left the room swiftly to hide the tears that filled her eyes.

Bagley wisely wrapped himself in his paper and never showed his nose above it until Desiree came back looking sweet and demure enough without her pretty curls, but lacking every trace of her former radiance and beauty.

This scene was the first of many others and in all of them Desiree showed the same sweetness and extraordinary submission, but it was easy to see that as time passed she bore with him more and more from principle, and less and less from love.

For a while our visits ceased, and when we resumed them, Mrs. Bagley had a wee bundle in her arms, which she crooned and cooed over with ever increasing delight. Bagley grew more bearable, too, and showed off his son and heir with a pride that almost resembled love.

Then a new set of persecutions began. The little bundle would be put to bed, and its mother would be forced to leave it, and sit by her husband's side and listen to how he was going to bring up his youthful son.

"My boy shall run in the streets as soon as he can stand. I won't have any woman molly-coddling him;" or, "My son is going to be a man. I won't have him fall into the clutches of the Catholic Church, or of the Episcopal Church, either. One psalm-mumbler about the house is enough." And the poor woman would murmer: "Yes, Julius," or "No, Julius," and grow pale and nervous, and smile all the time feebly, to show what a perfect loving understanding existed between her husband and herself.

Once her baby cried, and she started up to go to it, but Bagley made her sit still, and held forth on a new subject.

"Worst management in the world to take a child up the minute it cries! It puts a premium on fuss and disturbance. Let it cry!"

"But, Julius, babie is vairy young yet. Oh, leesten to the poor sweetheart! Julius, it hurts me to hear that babie cry!"

"Just stay where you are. No baby is too young to learn obedience. If you begin to pamper it, you will never leave off. I know what I am about. Sarah, let it cry, I tell you."

So Desiree sat and listened to the wails, and dug her hands into each other, and kept her strained face turned towards the door until the feeble little voice trailed off into a melancholy silence.

If ever a woman was tortured in this nineteenth century of progress and enlightment that woman was little Sarah Bagley, and we, friends of hers, respected her as we did a martyr. Her courage was superb. Hers was no fool's submission. She had temper enough flashing in her dark eyes to give way if she felt it right to do so, but you see she was very young and conscious of a certain inferiority to her husband, and I suppose Bagley was the first man that ever paid her any attentions; so many causes combined prompted her to a plan of subjection and obedience as heroic as anything I have ever seen.

If he had only treated her with actual violence we could have knocked him down and had it out with him, but as matters went we were powerless to interfere.

Bagley was fond of his wife and proud of her, especially of her cleverness—a quality that he formerly underrated in woman—but he was treating her like a dog, actually breaking her in as one would an animal. Heaven knows how she stood it. He went his strongest when any of us were near, just to demonstrate that he lived up to his precepts. Perhaps he felt safer when we were by, for a wife will put up with loads for appearance's sake.

We would have cut the man at the very start had we not felt that we showed ourselves truer friends of Desiree by sticking to him.

He was proud of his methods and he was never tired of holding forth what he would have done in such and such circumstances.

"Hubbard's a fool!" he said, one evening at the club, when we finished telling the last report of Hubbard's high-stepping better half. "A fool; I wouldn't put up with a thing like that for a moment."

"No?" I asked sneeringly. "Tell me what you'd do?"

"Do? I'd smash something. There's nothing like

Mrs. Bagley had a wee bundle in her arms.

hurling a Cologne bottle through a looking-glass for stopping any woman's tongue. I've done it, and I know."

Poor little Desiree! We did not doubt it, not one of us.

Digitized by Google

"Come home to dinner with me," he continued affably. "Sarah has been wondering where you have been hiding lately. Come."

I have been keeping away for a fact. The truth is, I was fairly sick of the scenes up at Bagley's, and half angry with Desiree for putting up with them. But hers was not the nature that rebels, and I kept away for nearly three months.

"Come along," urged Bagley.

"But, man," I expostulated, "it's eight o'clock. They'll never keep dinner for you all this time!"

"Won't they? Come and see!" and Bagley laughed an ill-natured laugh, which told me that his wife had been trained in many unsuspected directions.

It was after eight o'clock when we arrived at his house, and Desiree looked as nearly angry as I ever saw.

She looked very pretty, too, and was carefully dressed.

"Most singulaire time to come home for dinner," she remarked promptly. "We were going to the theatre, too; did you forgotten it, tell me?"

"Well, you see, we are not going after all," he answered sourly, for he was particularly taken back at her reception of him, since he had invited me up especially to show me that "dinner time" was simply whenever he chose to dine, not before nor after.

She honoured me with a laughing welcome when she saw me, and then gave an order to the servant to bring in the dinner.

Bagley was in a shocking temper, and carped at the position of every spoon on the table. Failing to draw tears or apologies from his wife, he began in an overbearing way to make fun of her appearance, sneered at her theatre finery, donned for nothing, and objected to roses in her dress. She ignored him with her usual gentle tact, and tried to keep up a spirited banter with me, although her breast heaved, and her colour deepened at his downright insults.

Her calmness merely irritated Julius to a frenzy. When the soup came on it was naturally only lukewarm, and little circles of grease floated on the surface of each plate. The plates were of fine china, and hand-painted by Desiree. She had evidently had them brought on for my benefit.

"Bah!" ejaculated Bagley in a brutal fury. "I have told you again and again that I won't drink swill, and I won't. Now, will you remember it?"

Crash! At the question he had swept the plate off the table to the floor, where it lay in twenty pieces in a pool of greasy soup that soaked rapidly into the rich carpet.

I held my breath. Desiree held hers also, and looked for one wild, dismayed moment into her husband's fiery eyes. Then she recovered herself completely.

"You are right," she says, with at least three r's. "Perfectly right. It ees swill. Bah!" And without the quiver of an eyelash she swept her plate superbly into the middle of the room, and the two greasy pools crept amicably towards each other. Then she rang the bell, and calmly ordered the joint to be brought on.

I must say for Bagley that he knows when he has gone far enough; he took his cue from his wife, ignored the chaotic messes on the carpet, and allowed the meal to proceed to a really pleasant conclusion. But he was simply dumstruck with surprise. The conversation, as might be expected, was formal, and I did most of it—which was also to be expected. Bagley was aware that by going into the crockery business herself his wife spiked his biggest gun. The man was dazed.

Desiree had a blazing colour in her face and looked dangerous, but she invited us into the parlour after dessert with the suavity of a duchess, and never weakened once, not even when the distant tinkling of bits of soup-plate demonstrated that the work of reconstruction was going on in the dining-room. I was really afraid to leave the house, so I swallowed my objections to him as a man and a brother, and stopped to play chess with Bagley.

At ten o'clock, as was his wont, young Julius woke up and howled. After a period of irresolution, his mother arose.

"Sarah," began Bagley, with an ominous polish of tone, "sit down. Let him yell himself to sleep. It's good for him."

This last argument destroyed the balance.

"Stuff!" said Desiree with a fine appropriation of her husband's favourite ejaculation. "If it ees good for him to yale, it ees bettair for him to be attended on." And she decidedly left the room.

It was but five minutes' work for me to checkmate after this, and after the achievement I made a frantic and successful attempt to get out of the house. I was no longer afraid for the madame. In her young eyes was the strong dawn of a resolve to defy Church and State and get a finger in her own pie at last. And she did.

I told the tale all over San Francisco. You can't imagine how pleased Bagley's friends were. We rallied around little Sarah to a man, and, taking advantage of a month's absence of Bagley (he was sent on business by his firm), we took her and an aunt of Julius' to many amusements, and cheered her up, and did some training on our own accounts. In two days' time the frizz reappeared, double the quantity of it, too.

That was several months ago. She snubbs Bagley now as often as he needs it, and never turns a hair. She isn't half as sweet as she used to be, but who could expect it?

She has found her tongue at last, has got a grip on the language, and rattles away with twice the volubility of an English woman, and with a finer stock of idioms.

Bagley is just nowhere when he begins to argue with her, for she has a nimble wit, which invariably turns the laugh on him, even when she is in the wrong and knows it.

When she gets tired now she goes to bed. On cold nights she thinks nothing of enjoying the warmth of the parlour as long as possible by putting up her hair in curl papers under the very eye of the Queen's subject. Once or twice she has overturned our hands at whist, and yawningly sent us home. She is really a little spitfire, but who can blame her? If she hadn't been curbed to the kicking point, she'd be trotting along as good as gold to this very moment.

We uphold her hands, as it were, and egg her on, and the fun is immense. But the trouble is, this sort of thing is so apt to end in divorce.

JULIA SCHLOMM.

Digitized by Google

The Echo of an Old Romance.

There is not, in Ireland, a more romantic, wilder, or uncivilised spot than the one on which stands Durrie Castle, with its background of venerable mountain pine, that on three sides forms a green curtain between itself and the outer world. Tall, dark and grim, its ivy-garlanded towers look down upon a silent sheet of water and beyond to a rough bogland broken by precipitous or sloping glens graced by hazel, holly, and every description of copsewood. Now and then appear patches of fallow pasturage on which shy white cottages have sprung up, as do daisies in tall meadow grass; while over and above all rises the cloud-kissed peak of Mount Erigal, like the finger of God pointing to eternity.

We had all gone up there for the grouse-shooting, at the urgent invitation of Sir John and Lady Allison, who, having rented the castle from its (then) present owner, had torn themselves away from the frivolities of a season at Cheltenham, to study more primitive life among the Celts.

The house was like all buildings of ancient date, more or less sombre and inhospitable, the rooms being panelled in oak, the beds heavy four-posters, and the walls covered with oil-paintings, from some of which the frames were rotting away. A general air of stuffiness pervaded the place, and Lady Allison, herself a sunbeam, protested that, notwithstanding the introduction of every modern convenience, even the kitchen remained a veritable mausoleum.

A party of young people, however, fresh from city life, can soon change a wilderness to a rose garden; so, what with the butterfly costumes, fluttering ribbons, and gilt fans of the ladies, added to the undress uniforms and dashing manners of a rollicking quartet from the "Queen's Own," we had soon "turned the temples of Egypt into Belgravia," and startled the sleepy echoes by peals of hearty laughter.

It was on the fifth day of our visit to Durrie Castle—that—after the ladies had retired—we men, having put on our smoking jackets, gathered about the open grate in the hall; for the evenings were cool, and a nightcap of sherry is never so spicy as when warmed by pink shadows from a blazing fire of pine logs.

Sir John Allison had, I remember, been unusually jolly, rattling off tiger experiences in the Indian jungles till we younger fellows became uproarious in applause, when suddenly and unaccountably a silence fell upon us—for myself I can best liken it to that oppression in the air which precedes a thunderstorm.

At last Derlick, a youthful Lothario, brought to bay by conventionalities, broke the spell by asking:

"I say, Sir John; Durrie Castle dates from the Reformation; are there no romances interwoven with its history? It seems to me," he added, glancing at an oil painting suspended over the fireplace, "as if that young woman must have broken some hearts in her day."

All eyes turned to the portrait, which was that of a beautiful girl, dressed in a white satin gown of the Elizabethan period. No words can describe the glory of her dark eyes, which, like moons of fire, challenged admiration from beneath partly closed lids. The mouth tender, yet full of lurking coquetry, was made more winsome by a dimple in the rounded chin beneath it.

"By George!" I exclaimed, rising to examine the picture more critically. "One might almost conceive it possible, by extending the hand, to assist her down from that frame, and see her come tripping among us. I can fancy her tapping Allison on the shoulder with her fan."

Our host shivered. The light from the wax candles on the table threw trembling shadows on his face, and I observed that it paled, as he moved uneasily in his chair.

"My dear fellows," burst from his lips, with spasmodic utterance, "there is a story connected with that picture which has driven every would-be tenant from Durrie Castle for the last two centuries. Notwithstanding the fact that each successive owner has, in turn, remodelled the house, torn down, refurnished, changed and beautified——" he paused and, looking eagerly in our faces, whispered parenthetically: "The ladies must know nothing of this; they would fly the country like a flock of birds. It has only recently come to my ears, through the garrulous tongue of old Halloran, the under-gardener."

Colonel Drumgoole and de Long had been leaning forward, their eyes glued to Allison's face. Both dabbled in hypnotism, electro-biology, spiritualism and the like. De Long picked up Sir John's unfinished sentence.

"Notwithstanding all this remodelling, Durrie has a ghost?" He spoke with serious interest.

"A very uncanny one," returned our host. "It seems that in the days of Elizabeth, this young girl, a Miss Dorothy Cavendish, then serving as waiting-maid to the Queen, attracted the eye of Essex, the sovereign's favourite. You may guess the sequel. Dismissed from Court, and pursued by the vengeance of the angry lady, Miss Cavendish fled to Ireland, to hide herself with Papist friends in Durrie Castle. Jealousy was spurred on by bigotry, and the Queen sent Walter Stuart, a spy in the guise of a peacemaker, who asked, and obtained, an interview with Dorothy, in a turret chamber of the north wing. The one in which you sleep, Drumgoole." Drumgoole started, and I saw his fingers, long and white as a woman's, interlace themselves till the veins which made blue tracery in them stood out like cord.

"The exact nature of what passed during that interview, I do not know, but threats must have been followed by a struggle, during which Stuart's hands, clutching at the girl's throat, left blue marks on the fair skin. Then, so I was told, she broke from him, and springing through the window ran along on a narrow ledge that encircles the tower, holding on with both hands to the ivy. What she suffered at that terrible moment who can tell? The slender stems of the vine breaking and giving way beneath her despairing fingers while balancing himself, in hot pursuit was a bloodhound, ready to hurl her to more certain death in the darkness below. Derlick! you are a fatalist. Tell us if what follows was the vengeance of God or pre-ordained? With one foot on the narrow ledge and a hand outstretched to seize the fluttering skirts of his victim, Stuart was paralysed to inaction by a wail of agony, that, starting among the pine trees like the soughing of wind, spread over the entire valley. Tipping the crest of Erigal, the moon came up, piercing its way through a rugged mass of grey clouds, and flinging icy shadows on the castle walls. Horror, perhaps in anticipation of his own deed, perhaps at that awful and mysterious wail of the Banshee, froze the blood in his veins. Casting one terrified glance at the abyss beneath him, his fingers relaxed their hold, and, grasping wildly at the ivy in his descent, he fell, like Apollyon, to the bottomless pit."

Digitized by Google

"The girl?" panted Derlick, with parched lips. Even I, his companion through many a skirmish, and a worshipper of facts, laid down upon the table a wine-glass, whose contents trembled in my unsteady clasp.

"Miss Cavendish escaped. How she climbed back through the window and found her way to her friends one may surmise; but it is said that Stuart's murderous fingers left an indelible stain upon her white throat. You will observe that in the portrait she wears a neck-band of black velvet."

Was it my fancy, or did the fair Dorothy blush under the concentrated gaze of our curious eyes? In the flickering candle light it seemed to me that her red lips parted in a half-uttered sigh.

"Positively," exclaimed de Long, "I can understand the Queen's jealousy Such a woman as that would melt the heart of a Trappist monk."

"Did Elizabeth pursue her rival any further?" This from Derlick, who accompanied his question by a nervous glance over his shoulder. I, too, had thought I heard the fluttering of a fan.

"No, I believe that Dorothy was allowed to reach Scotland unmolested, where, as the wife of Sir Donald Gower, she passed a life of semi-seclusion; but it is said that the ghost of Stuart haunts the north wing of Durrie Castle, and that he will yet wreak the Queen's vengeance on any direct descendant of Lady Gower who may occupy the chamber from which she fled. Come, boys! off to your rooms. I'll wager the ghost will not bother a pack of unbelievers like us. What? Frank not able to finish his nightcap? Has a bugaboo story succeeded where cannon balls failed?" I thought his merriment forced. Drumgcole's lips, like narrow threads of scarlet wool, parted in a feeble smile.

"On the contrary," he retorted, "I am about to prove myself a hero by sleeping in the haunted chamber. Apparently Sir John has forgotten that my mother's name was Gower."

He picked up his candle, and scoffing at Allison's earnest offer of another apartment, nodded a brief good-night, and the party dispersed. It was then eleven o'clock.

* * * * *

Shortly after midnight I was awakened from a first doze by a curious noise in the chamber overhead, occupied by Drumgoole. Half dazed, I sat up in bed, rubbing my eyes and listening with attentive ears. The first idea conveyed to my semi-conscious brain was that the Colonel was chasing something back and forth across the floor. Then I heard his window thrown open, as if by an eager, impatient hand. A thrill of unexplained terror sent the blood with electric force against my throbbing temples, as I sprang out of bed, with the vague idea of rushing to Frank's assistance; but, at this instant, a sudden tempest of wind, uprising among the pine-trees, hissed through their branches with weird effect; then, increasing in fierce velocity, swept over the valley like the snarl of a wolf or fox in its death agony, while simultaneously something black, and obscuring the moonlight, shot past my window, cleaving the air in its swift, downward course like a scimitar.

Pinned to the spot by a lethargy of horror, it was some moments ere I could summon courage to throw open my bedroom door and run out into the hall. At the head of a staircase leading from the floor below I met Sir John Allison, and the moonlight, shining through a hall window, showed that his face was bloodless as white marble.

"Great Heavens, McArliffe!" breathed he huskily. "What was that cry? Did you hear it?"

I gripped his arm, and, with a quick convulsive movement, drew him back into the shadow of the heavy damask window curtains.

Something was descending the upper stairs, whose banisters were composed of solid oak panelling as high as a man's waist. It was Drumgoole. He was in his night clothes, than which his face had no more colour, and both hands grasped his throat; while from between his lips, drawn, and revealing the lower teeth, came at intervals a wolf-like cry, expressive of mortal agony.

"The Hand! The Hand!" he repeated. "Take it away! The Hand!"

Allison sprang forward.

"Frank!" he exclaimed soothingly; "what has happened, old fellow? What has——"

The question froze unfinished on his lips; for, at that instant Colonel Drumgoole, swaying to and fro like a storm-tossed tree, fell at our feet, and bending over him we observed upon his neck the blue mark caused by garroting fingers.

What explanation have I to offer? None that can be accepted by a materialist like myself. For five weeks the Colonel lay between life and death, raving incoherently of horrors that no pen could portray, but which were ascribed by the doctor to a fevered imagination. At intervals, starting up in bed, he renewed the cry of that terrible night, begging protection from "The Hand! The Hand!"

Later, nursed back by Lady Allison with tenderest solicitude to convalescence, he showed an unwillingness to talk, replying to any direct questions by a shudder, and a pathetically uttered "Don't speak of it," that commanded silence.

Once only, just before his departure, did he indirectly, but of his own accord, refer to the occurrence.

I found him one evening standing before the portrait of Dorothy Cavendish with deep interest. Conscious that someone observed him, he turned quickly, hesitated a moment, then murmured more to himself than to me:

"Poor girl! Poor girl! Oh! I know what she suffered."

Ida Down.

Digitized by Google

The Return.

The ball had commenced at seven o'clock that evening, and now, at nine, it was high tide, the sailors said, as they wiped the perspiration from their foreheads between the quadrilles.

This night they gave themselves up to pleasure—these stout fellows of Tréport—in the hall at the gates of the town. They danced in their fisher's dress; they jumped and stamped their heavy feet upon the floor, their hands open and squarely placed upon their partner's backs. The women were buxom creatures, in rude health, whom the men grasped as they would presently their oars. The violins screeched, the horns sounded, skirts whirled, laughter rose, and the many sounds united in a tumult louder than the bellow of the rising sea.

When Jean Maquenem entered, dressed in the simple uniform of a foot soldier of the line, a grey-haired waiter pointed out a corner masked by a pillar, and disdained, no doubt, as inconvenient. Jean Maquenem placed himself there and looked about him. Five hard years he had passed far away from his native village. He was about twenty-five, with blue eyes, rather deeply set, strongly built and of healthy complexion. His smile was frank, and there was nothing about him to betray the existence of any fierce passions or to indicate their absence. In fact, he was an honest fellow, a little romantic and somewhat timid.

He had sought out a place apart, wishing to be recognised unexpectedly, and rejoiced naïvely in thinking of the embraces he was about to give and receive. As he sat there, memories of his youth crowded thick upon his mind, awakened by the sight of his former companions in toil. With them, during years gone by, he had towed the boats along the channel, passed the nights upon the sea, cast the nets and worked the ship, and been buffeted by the wind and waves and rain. He also had danced with them in this hall, where he found nothing changed but himself.

But more than all else it was Marguerite Couplet whom he would rejoice to see again. As far back as he could remember she had been mixed with his life. Although simply the daughter of an innkeeper and a fisherman, from childhood she had loved to adorn herself, to remain at home, and to play less boisterous games than her comrades who ran about the quay with their boy companions. She grew to be one of the most beautiful girls in the province. No other woman had stirred the heart of Jean Maquenem as she did when she walked abroad, dressed in her short red skirt, showing her slender ankles and pretty feet incased in leather shoes whose wooden soles clicked upon the flagstones; her graceful waist moulded in a tight corsage, her cap with long violet bands tied under her chin, and great gold ornaments of Norman pattern hanging from her ears. And he had pleased her so much more than the others, that for eighteen months he had remained her lover, and when they parted she vowed to await his return.

Soon he saw her descending the stairs for a quadrille. She was taller and browner, but still very beautiful. A red kerchief with blue flowers was about her shoulders, and tied behind her waist, showing a corsage of the same shade of brown as her skirt. Her sleeves were red, and the bands of her cap dark lilac. Yet this riot of colours did not detract from the fresh, sea-tanned beauty of her face, where shone two eyes sparkling with pleasure. When she smiled she showed two rows of teeth as white and even as those of a young wolf.

The soldier noticed all these details with keen pleasure. Yet his joy would have been greater if Marguerite had not been dancing with a big, handsome fellow who treated her familiarly—a fisher, named Pierre Dominique Malatre, whom Maquenem recognised at once by his nose, like an eagle's beak, his broad forehead, and superb breadth of shoulders.

Chance brought this group under the balcony, to the place even where the dreaming lover sat leaning on his elbow against the pillar. His impatience overcame his timidity, and in a voice loud enough for the girl to hear he called twice: "Marguerite! Marguerite!" She turned her eyes, recognised her old-time sweetheart, blushed very red under her complexion like a sunburnt nectarine, and continued the dance without responding. She said only some words to Pierre Dominique, who looked also at Maquenem, nodded his head, and drew his partner into the crowd.

Digitized by Google

This welcome was quite natural, but the soldier remained stupidly gazing at them over his empty glass. Instinctively, as dogs feel a look of kindness or of anger, he was sensible of an air of coldness or estrangement, but reassured himself with the thought that the surprise and embarrassment of meeting him before three hundred people had nonplussed the girl. He waited until the end of the quadrille, counting on approaching and speaking to her, but scarcely had the orchestra scattered abroad the last measures of their music, than he saw Pierre Dominique advancing, who gave him an ardent embrace and seated himself by his side, saying:

"Hé! La Grise, how goes it?"

It was the nickname of his boyhood, which he had not heard for years. He felt a singular, indefinable emotion of mingled pleasure and pain. Pierre Dominique continued, looking his comrade straight in the face with his yellow eyes—the colour of sand—such as sailors have sometimes:

"You have arrived in time to be present at my wedding. Two weeks more and you would have missed it."

"So much the better that I am here," said the soldier. "And mine will not be much later. Whom are you going to marry?"

"You sly dog! You know as well as I!"

"On my word of honour, I do not."

"An old sweetheart of yours, la Petite Couplet."

"Marguerite?"

"The Couplets have not two daughters, I suppose. Does that astonish you? Did you think she was going to remain four years alone, sighing for your handsome eyes, like a fish on a table gasping for water? Four years to live on hope! Know you, that it is hard for a woman. Ma foi! I presented myself, I pleased her, and here we are."

"And if I have remained faithful to her?" interrupted Maquenem, thunderstruck by this revelation.

"And if Paris was made of butter it would have melted long ago," replied Pierre Dominique with a hearty laugh. He continued to jest with a lightness of spirit and a confidence in himself which crushed his rival, who felt constrained by his uniform in the presence of this stolid fisher, this clear-eyed Hercules, whose breast was moulded in his knitted jacket. He was ashamed of his regulation moustache and short hair when he looked at the curling locks and thick beard, black and shining, of the sailor, who shook, in speaking, two earrings made of circles of gold in which rolled little round blue stones from the Alps. Presently the sailor left him and he mechanically dragged himself over to the table where Marguerite sat drinking with her parents.

He kissed her upon both cheeks, with the kiss of one who walks in a dream, and he could not have told whether her face was cool or burning. Her parents questioned him naturally upon his past life and projects for the future, and Marguerite laughed with such frank gaiety that the poor soldier's thoughts were in a whirl. When he arrived alone at the door of the inn where he had engaged his bed for the night, he thought confusedly, how lucky it was that he had not gone first to the Couplets to surprise his betrothed.

Yet he did not resign himself easily to his lot, but reflected much, and finally took the only course which appeared reasonable. to speak with Marguerite herself.

He dressed himself in his best next morning, but with sinking heart and little hope. He guessed that his costume of lignard would not please the young Normande. More ardently, more fiercely than ever, he felt returning his old love for the sea, and to reach Marguerite's home he took the street which led along the harbour and through the fishmarket.

It was the hour of marketing. Many recognised Maquenem, and greeted him with a word in passing, but they had no time to loiter. It was the sea, the great sea, which urged them forward, which called back the empty ships that it might cast into them anew its overplus of monsters. It roared yonder at the end of the pier, shouting to them all to hasten—that its rising tide would stay for none. He traversed the market, and reached, with mechanical steps, Marguerite's door.

The sailors' tavern, kept by Mme. Couplet, was upon a narrow street near the harbour, and at this hour deserted. Everyone was at the market. Marguerite generally left to her mother the task of purchasing, and Maquenem counted on finding her alone.

Marguerite was kneeling before the stove, whose cover she had removed, and was furiously scraping off the rust with an iron hook. She turned as the door opened, and greeted Maquenem with a cordial "Bonjour," and asked him what he would have to drink, interrupting herself to apostrophise her stove.

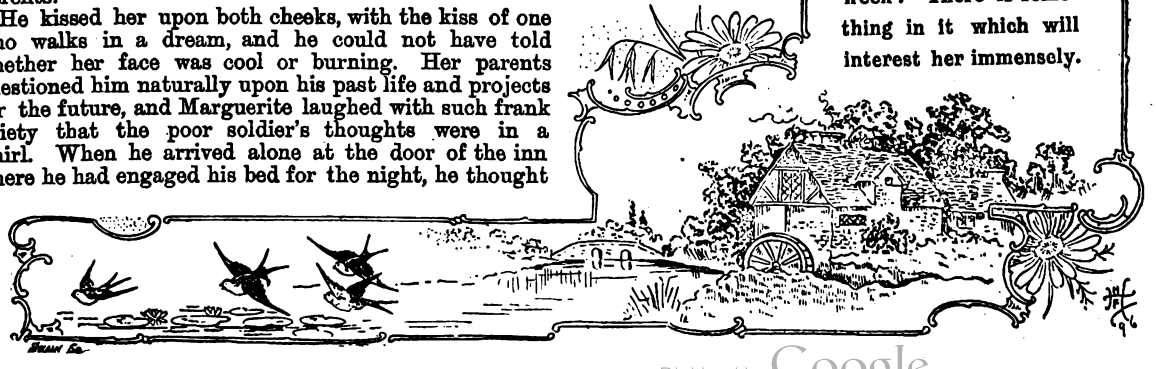
She rose quickly and shook the dust from her skirts, served Maquenem, and calmly, without affectation or coldness, seated herself near the window and began knitting.

The soldier was silent, and instinctively Marguerite ceased to speak. At last, with the superhuman courage of the player who throws his last coin upon a card and turns it quickly, he said:

"Marguerite, why have you deceived me?"

"I have not deceived you," she replied. "You departed to take up a landsman's life. I thought you would do like all the rest. Their fiancées await them, and when

Has your wife or your mother or your sister seen Home Notes this week? There is something in it which will interest her immensely.



Digitized by Google

they return the men do not want them because they have grown old and are no longer their ideals. It is better to quit than be quitted, is it not? Those who await for years the return of their sweethearts do so because they can find no others." And she uttered a burst of false laughter, such as is common to all coquettes, grandes dames, bourgeois, or women of the people—when they jest at vows they have broken.

"Each to his character," responded the soldier. "I have kept my promise well. Now that I have returned, you should keep yours, or else you are heartless."

"Heartless!" she cried. "That is a little too strong. What if I had amused myself with the messieurs from Paris during the summer, like many others? They have proposed to me oftener than the week has days. And then I would have married you afterwards? Heartless! You would wish that I sit for ever sighing here alone! No, you are not jealous, you! You would make a fine husband!"

"I love you so!" he interrupted, casting in her face this irritating and foolish reason. Then he told her of the hopes he had cherished: how happy would have been their peaceful life; that a fisher's bride is never sure in the morning that the cruel sea will not drag her husband down before night.

"I am sprung from a race of sailors, and my husband will be one," said Marguerite.

Then he supplicated her, saying she was part of his life, reminding her of their old friendship, and how unhappy he would be if she wedded another, and much else straight from his heart.

"I love him passionately," she answered simply.

"Well, adieu!" said the soldier, after another silence. He placed upon the counter the price of his glass, and departed.

During the days which followed he lived outwardly as if nothing had happened. He organised his little house, bought some sailor clothes, and showed his intention to take service once more on one of the fishing boats of the port. He tried again, but unskilfully, to equal his boyhood companions in the terrible toil of the sea. He still loved Marguerite as only the simple know how to love. He loved her so much that he forgave her. But there was in the world one creature whom he did not pardon—Malatre. Maquenem hated him with an hatred like that of Othello for Cassio.

One January morning, the day before his wedding, Pierre Dominique was returning from Dieppe, whence he had gone to buy some ivory ornaments. He followed the path which lay like a narrow ribbon along the edge of the cliff. It was an immense solitude. The night mist had dampened the grass, which slipped and crackled under his feet. But the sailor marched gaily, calculating to himself for the twentieth time the cost of his wedding and his establishment, when a hundred steps from him, by a hillock, he saw a black mass lying across his path, and thought it was without doubt some coastguard overpowered by smugglers.

He advanced and recognised Jean Maquenem, who rose at his approach, saying simply:

"I have watched and hoped for your coming for an hour, Pierre Dominque."

"And why?" demanded Malatre, who stopped short, made defiant by the other's gaze.

"To revenge myself. You have stolen my promised bride. You must not marry her. I forbid you. Swear to me that you will say 'No' at the church to-morrow, or, as I live, you shall not pass."

"Who goes to the chase loses his place," responded Pierre Dominique gaily, believing Maquenem insane, and, from his piteous mien, judging him harmless. "If the girl loves me better than you, you should take in your horns and say adieu!"

"You shall not pass," replied Maquenem.

"Do not anger me," said the other, "or I will break your head." As he was very cool and cared little for a useless battle, he sprang forward and pushed Maquenem violently aside, and started to run in the direction of Tréport, followed by his rival who reviled him and called him, "Coward!"

Malatre ran fast, but rage seemed to double Maquenem's strength. He made prodigious bounds, and fell like a tiger upon the other's back, who, his blood burning with anger, turned and replied to the onset with a blow which would have felled an ox, but which the madman received without faltering.

Face to face, foot to foot, they began a wordless battle, the fierce blows resounding heavily. Maquenem ducked to escape a furious stroke that would have ended him, and seized the other round the body, as he was almost falling from the violence of his futile blow. So powerful was the sailor that he resisted some moments the cruel embrace which cracked his bones. Thrice was he lifted from the ground and thrice fell upon his feet. Maquenem, at the end of his strength, the veins of his forehead swollen to bursting, raised him a fourth time, and they rolled together upon the earth.

By a quick movement of his shoulders, Pierre Dominique recovered himself and forced Jean Maquenem beneath him. The latter did likewise, and each of the two combatants in turn threw over the other, and this strange, struggling, two-headed monster descended slowly the gentle slope of the hillside, like a cask that one starts rolling from a mountain top.

"Wretch!" cried Pierre Dominique suddenly, "we are going into the sea!"

The descent was steep now; the abyss ten steps away; but their course was unchecked.

"In the name of God, let me go! Let me go!" cried the sailor.

Maquenem, with nostrils contracted and cruel eyes, gave a last frantic heave with his shoulders, and together they rolled over the edge and fell upon the rocks far below, against which the rising sea dashed angrily the army of its waves, as impotent in their fury to beat down their walls of stone as is a passionate love to vanquish indifference in the heart of woman or the inexplicable cruelty of Fate.

PAUL BOURGET.

Digitized by Google

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY No. 9.]

HIS MAIDEN EFFORT.

"I TELL you, Arnold, you are making an ass of yourself."

"I know I am," said the individual addressed, with something like a groan, "but what can I do? If I only had the courage I would clear out of Brighton this very night, but I can't, and that's the end of it. Why would I stay?"

"The girl doesn't want me, Johnson, that's clear."

Johnson blew a big cloud of tobacco smoke.

"It is not clear that the girl does not want you, but it is clear that you showed your hand too soon. The idea of a man proposing to a woman he has known only three days!"

"You need not say any more about it," said Arnold, throwing away his half-smoked cigar and picking up his hat.

"Sit down, old man," said the other; "I do believe that I have an idea. I'm going to do you a good turn. Leave it to me to find out for you what is the exact state of affairs."

"There is no use," said Arnold wearily; "and, besides, you'll make a mess of it. What is your plan?"

"Oh, it is very simple," said Johnson; "and I shall not make a mess of it. I shall supply her with a rival. It will be very easy to see from the way Miss Ralston takes it how you really stand in her eyes. Since women have no scruples about employing artifices, why should we?"

"But what will the other girl say? Will she consent to serve as a tool in this way?" asked Arnold dubiously.

"Oh, I'll make that square. My cousin, Miss Erskine, is coming down to stay with us. She is the dearest girl in the world, and would do anything for me. Just leave it in my hands. You shall see how she will enter into the spirit of the thing. But remember this, the success of the whole business will be in your chucking that infernal reserve of yours to the dogs. You must be as light as air, and go about with her as if quite oblivious to the fact that there is a Miss Ralston in the place."

With many misgivings, Arnold consented to be a party to the deception. He felt as if he were a prospective party to a burglary, or hatching conspiracy against the State.

On the evening of Miss Erskine's arrival, he dressed himself with special care and went up to the house. He was prepared to be very ill at ease with his fellow-conspirator.

But the young girl who was sitting beside Mrs. Johnson, in the drawing-room, showed no signs of conscious participation, though the proposer of the scheme had told him that she had been told all about the situation and had given her promise of assistance.

Among those who came in later was Miss Ralston. Johnson felt that his plot was going to be a success, when he saw Arnold take no more notice of her than to bow stiffly.

He wondered a little at the gift for realistic acting which his friend had suddenly and unexpectedly developed.

To look at him and Miss Erskine, you would have said they were friends of very long standing. His triumph was increased, though it was dashed by just a little remorse, as he saw Miss Ralston watching them with a peculiar look in her eyes.

"She does care for him," he said to himself; "but it serves her right to get this lesson."

Mr. Johnson gave her an opportunity of talking to him, but she made no allusion to the other couple for a long time.

Finally, she asked him how long Arnold and Miss Erskine had known each other. She seemed surprised, though she tried to hide it, when told that they had met for the first time that day.

During the next week the comedy progressed gaily. The hero and substituted heroine walked together, played tennis together, and were generally inseparable.

One evening on the pier, Mr. and Mrs. Johnson saw them passing the place where the lady sat for whose benefit the play was arranged.

"We won't have to keep it up much longer," said Mr. Johnson; "that is gloriously well acted."

But Mrs. Johnson said nothing.

All Arnold's old mopishness has flown away, too. The consciousness of coming success seemed to have settled down on him. He was no longer impatient, and instead of being the worst, had developed into the best company in the world.

Johnson one day told his wife that he believed Providence had cut him out for a diplomatist.

Every sign given by the person deceived he watched with the keen eye of a doctor observing the details and development of a pet case.

Early next week he had to go up to town. At the end of three days he came back. He was quite curious to know how the plot had progressed during his absence. Arnold was the first person he saw as he descended from the train.

He knew that there was something wrong from the expression of his face.

"Well how have things been going while I was away?" said he, with a fine professional interest.

"Splendidly," said Arnold; "you shall be the first to congratulate me, old man. It was all settled this afternoon."

"I do," said Johnson, wringing his hand with a vigour that made the other wince; "and I hope she won't be angry with me for planning the deception we played on her. Miss Ralston is a fine girl, old fellow, but a hard one to manage."

"Miss Ralston!" said Arnold; "why, my dear boy, your cousin, Miss Erskine, promised to marry me to-day."

Digitized by Google

MAGDE MORRIS.

BY WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," "Through the Valley," "Six First-class Passengers," etc., etc.

CHAPTER XXIV.

As Flame Amidst Straw.

Georgina, during the first few weeks of mourning, faced life in a new spirit. She was trying to use her influence to win Sefton to a better and happier frame of mind. Why not now, she asked herself, though so late? Her husband was only a weak man, and she a woman of strength and character. She could not analyse his strange emotions, ever varying day by day. Sometimes he would not speak at all; occasionally he conversed in a half-veiled, sarcastic mood, but always he seemed to be thinking. She would watch him for perhaps an hour at a time, sitting before the fire, his body sunk low in an arm-chair, his brow wrinkled, his lips moving. When she addressed him he would start as if he had been hit, and turn his eyes reproachfully upon her without replying. Now all this was distinctly trying to Lady Ravenscroft's temper, but the enthusiasm of reform was upon her, and she exercised it by petulant fits and starts.

In her efforts to improve her own stunted nature, which she considered had never had fair play, as far as religion was concerned, she discovered that her husband's feelings and impulses were contagious. His morbid conjectures and bitter jeers caught her like flame amidst straw, kindling all that was bad in Georgina to a mighty blaze.

At first she tried preaching at Sefton. But arguments and reproofs on his hardness of heart and general demoralisation only appeared to increase his fits of sulky silence or outbursts of almost childish rage.

"Can't you leave me alone? I'm sick of being nagged at," he would exclaim, dashing from the room.

Then, in despair, Lady Ravenscroft turned to the shelves of the old library, and read sermons upon influence.

She learnt pages by heart, and repeated them in the night watches, when despair laid its icy fingers on her pillow, and brought forth drops of agony upon her brow.

"It is not mere words that turn men," she murmured. "It is the heart mounting uncalled into the expression of the features. It is the eye illuminated by reason—the look beaming with goodness. It is the tone of the voice, that instrument of the soul, which changes quality with such amazing facility, and gives out in the soft, the tender, the tremulous, the firm, every shade of emotion and character."

But even as she spoke, Georgina knew full well that she could never inspire confidence or attract goodwill in the man her treachery had made her husband. While endeavouring to exert a good influence, she could only convey by words what her looks and affectations or exaggeration of manner perpetually resisted. It was a hopeless uphill struggle, and one which the woman would never have attempted save for the image of a dead child beckoning her on from the summit of the steep and stony incline.

It was like swimming in an ocean without a shore, seeking the light of the sun in a midnight hour.

So the days crept by, and Lady Ravenscroft and Sefton were as far apart as ever.

It was one Sunday evening that Georgina finally realised the hopelessness of her good intentions, and the fiery nature of that absent-minded husband she sought to guide to higher things.

She had been to church for the third time that day, and the peace of God's house appealed to her, though she joined mechanically in the service. Her thoughts were with John Reginald in the graveyard without.

When she returned she found Sefton had not waited supper, glad of the excuse to avoid her society.

She ate her solitary meal in silence, and rejoined him in the drawing-room. He was standing with his elbows on the mantelpiece, and one foot upon the brightly-polished fender.

As Georgina approached he turned and spoke.

"Why do you desecrate the church," he asked, "by your presence? You know you are a bad woman, yet you stand before God and the congregation, shameless and defiant, in my pew! You kneel on the very cushion where my father knelt before you—under the frowning monument of our ancestors! Do you ever think, when you look at it, of the sorrow and pain you brought on my mother—the curse you laid upon our family? When you talk to me of Heaven, have you forgotten that your kisses helped my father step by step down to perdition? I always knew you as a traitress, but at least I hoped you were not a hypocrite."

Georgina started back and gasped as Sefton delivered these hideous truths. She opened her lips to speak, but her throat was parched and dry.

"Why do you do it?" he hissed again, coming a step nearer. "Is it that you think me fool enough to be taken in by this assumed virtue, this acted sanctity?"

Georgina's speech came at last. She stretched out her hands in an effort of self-defence.

"I have discovered," she answered, "that holiness is happiness, I am groping after light. I have realised at last the awful truth which the whole world appears to disregard, the possibility of every individual departing with the dawn of to-morrow—yes, with the dawn of to-morrow—who will answer for a day? who will vouch for an hour? Think of it coming, perhaps to-night, upon you, Sefton, upon me! What could we say now if those skies were rent asunder? Is the day of probation over? Yes! Is all ended? Yes! Great God! no more time for repentance? No! Another year, another month, another day, or hour, before we go hence with our sins upon our heads? No, again no, no, and for ever!"

Georgina's passionate words broke forth from her inmost soul. She felt she had answered well, but the cold man surveyed her unmoved. Would nothing touch him? nothing banish that horrible smile which had become stationary about his lips?

Digitized by Google

"Go on," he said calmly. "I would hear more of your terrific anticipation of futurity. I, too, believe there is a God, who will revenge the wrongs of His people. In that dread judgment I shall call on Him for vengeance!"

As Sefton spoke of retribution, his eyes grew bright as stars—wider, and fiercer; while his shattered mind dwelt upon the torments in store for the wicked.

He saw Georgina pale, and he exulted in her wretchedness, finding mad delight in her gathering despair.

A glad thought struck her in the midst of this storm. They had never mentioned their child since his death. Surely now if she held him up between them it must calm the troubled waters.

"You taunt me with hypocrisy, you make a mock of my religion," she answered; "but surely you will let me worship in peace, when I tell you I am endeavouring to fit my soul to meet John Reginald again?"

The name awoke Sefton's wild passion to merciless vehemence. Poison was in his life blood, he approached Georgina with the resistlessness of fury.

"You think," he muttered, "that such as you will foregather with that innocent, pure spirit, the child whom death robbed us of? because your blood was in his veins, therefore he was not worthy to perpetuate my name. You have the audacity to tell me, in another sphere, that your soul will be allowed to mingle with his. No, Georgina, he has been gathered to the 'inheritance of saints.' What claim can you have to that title?"

Sefton's madness in no way lacked magnetism. He was, without knowing it, breathing his spirit, and transferring his image to Georgina. There was a fund of poison in his character, infused by insanity, which taunted the woman as she listened to his cruel condemnation.

"See, now," he continued, "the worthlessness of your striving! You have missed the light—your sun has set—it went down for ever upon the prostrate body of your lover as he lay out there," pointing to the window, "under the shrubbery trees. He is with the accursed. You had better go to him."

A great change gradually came over Georgina as she drank in Sefton's sentences.

Her feeble footsteps, staggering along the narrow way, halted. She turned back almost with a sigh of relief.

She nodded her head mechanically, and turned towards the door.

"Don't go," said Sefton. "I've not done with you yet—I want an answer."

"To what?"

"Well, to all this talk, my pious lady!"

"Good! You shall hear. To-night I returned from church with the full hope that in time I should see the dawn of a brighter day break over our strained and miserable home. In this last hour I have tasted the horror of waiting for a dawn that never comes. Imagine yourself, Sefton, sitting through a long night, watching for the first streak of daybreak in the dark firmament above. Let the hour of morning come and bring with it no light! The outcries of a terror-stricken world would fill the air, growing momentarily more wild and frantic at the loss of the sun. A chill creeps on. I can feel the frosty winds howling across the freezing earth. The heart of the sea is frozen, and all the fellow-planets that have lost their sun become mere balls of ice, swinging silent in the darkness. I am cold now, Sefton, outwardly and inwardly. I care no more to mourn our son. You have placed him beyond my reach; you have torn out my mother's heart and trampled it under foot. All that was human in me you have turned to brute beast. How long does the lioness mourn her cubs? The world is still fair, though the future may be dark. I will taste its pleasures while I can. If I shut myself up here with you I shall go mad. Shock propriety, shall I? Oh, yes, perhaps; but life is so short. I might have been a good woman—it was just touch and go—but you must needs meddle and intervene! Now I have told you straight, take the consequences of your action. Watch the ruin of my soul, and bear it with you to the grave!"

Sir Sefton laughed. The sound came full, free, and unrestrained.

"What a scene of tragedy and comedy!" he exclaimed. "You talk as if sin were new to you, the 'ruin' of the thing you call your soul a novelty."

Georgina's teeth chattered, for the raw east winds of misery swept through her motionless body.

She saw her hopes crumble, knowing at last that her influence was not strong enough to operate on the mind of her husband. The weapons she believed in barely an hour ago seemed to have snapped into a thousand splinters. They were useless, and she stood empty-handed, flung from the heights to bitterest depths again. Reform! There was no such possibility for women like her, or men of Sefton's nature. From head to foot she felt herself a mass of discord, her spirit untuned without a nerve at unity, her sensibilities crushed—her religion dead.

The removal of her child to an invisible existence might have raised Georgina to noble habits of thought and feeling, and turned her attention to the future world from gross and transitory interests. Already the dim shadow of awakening faith had in a few brief moments of inspiration changed to a substantial and glorious reality. But Georgina was destined to tread thorny and uncommon paths—to see the sacred bond of parent and child scoffed at by a mad and reckless husband, made so by her own act—herself alone to blame from beginning to end!

She moved slowly to the door, exhausted by her late passion, yet still smarting under Sefton's cuts.

"What is my whole life but continued insult?" she cried on reaching her own room, and turning the key with a little hissing sound between her lips. "For me there is no sympathy—no love! I have fallen beneath sympathy, and death robbed me of affection. Nature has implanted the thirst—the passion for love in my soul ever since John Reginald lay cold and stiff, murdered by my carelessness—my vanity! Where are my resolves—the vague ideas of a better lot dawning for Sefton—and for me? Hope spread her unused pinions in vain. Hope is one of the faculties—the feelings—that died for ever in my heart to-night. It must be war to the end now, the infinite chasm between us growing wider."

Georgina spoke breathlessly. Her thoughts and words came ever swiftly like a rushing torrent, and, strangely enough, it never entered her head that Sefton's mind was deranged.

"I have money," she continued, "to go my own way; but then he would be glad—thankful to be rid of me! And a wife living apart from her husband—well, there is a peculiar ignominy about that; you hold yourself up as a public illustration of failure!"

Georgina flung forward her arms and beat the air. Her character had not changed since the morning she shattered her looking-glass wilfully after Sir Reginald's death.

She was the same impulsive, passionate, vindictive creature, dwarfed and stunted by the withering influence of misfortune. The dead do not know their want of life, and so this woman, whose moral sentiments were palsied by the interweaving of all that might have been good in her with a system of scheming, pushing, hypocrisy, and self, self—always self—first and foremost, must needs become degraded!

Now hate reigned uppermost in her mind—a hatred of the world, a horror of everything.

Suddenly her eyes grew feverishly bright, and the very terror of the thought that came over her was a pleasure, purely emotional, born of the love of sensation. And the thought grew swelling in her brain, till her senses reeled, chairs and sofas swam before her gaze.

"To do that!" she gasped, "to do that!"

But as yet she could not speak the thought, for it parched her lips, burnt her throat, and racked the very fibres of her being.

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXV.

Self Dissection.

Georgina spoke to herself in low disjointed sentences.

"Moral courage, that is all I need. Duty, yes, I like the word, for it is my duty to seek the punishment I deserve. In me, the spirit of self-sacrifice, the spirit of martyrdom shall be gloriously displayed. Conscience and the divinity within my soul spurs and goads me on. I feel already the kindling energy, the solemn joy, inspired by pain and peril in the cause of justice. Oh! the blessed laws of England, that will free me from the bondage of the flesh, and give me the power of lowering Sefton's pride to the dust. I will place myself in the way of scorn, and advance to meet a death more suited than any other to bring infamy on the name of Ravenscroft."

Still dazed by excitement, and eager to revenge herself upon Sefton, she again went forth to the contest, entering her husband's presence with a blanched, ghastly face, and hair dishevelled.

"Why have you come back?" he asked, and she noticed he had not moved since she left him, but stood in the same unnatural attitude, with drooping shoulders and protruding chin.

"To tell you," she replied, "that your cruel taunts and desperate unbelief in me have not utterly quenched the light of revelation!

"I have found strength in my sorrow, strength that even conquers the fear of death. I can laugh at you now, Sefton, for some deep power, hitherto latent within, has sprung up, enabling me to look above material Nature. You might as soon try to pluck the sun from his sphere, or storm the skies with earth's artillery, as move me now from my purpose."

"What are you driving at?" he questioned sullenly. "I thought you had done with your fanatical rubbish for one night."

Georgina drew nearer. She lowered her voice, and the words seemed choking her as she continued:

"When I spoke to you just now of 'shocking propriety,' and 'tasting life's pleasures,' I meant to go back to the gay world, have my fling, and throw off the shackles of sorrow. But I see it is impossible. There is a secret weighing down my heart, a voice urging me on to give myself up to justice. Sefton, you remember how strangely sudden was our child's death. Look me in the face, and say why and how you thought he died!"

Her husband's eyes were bloodshot and staring as they returned her gaze.

"Why and how?" he muttered, "why and how!"

"Yes. Was it from natural causes?" He bent his head.

"You ask a riddle."

"Then listen, and I will give you the key. You remember how he slept at the ball?"

"Perhaps—he—was—dying—then?" There was a deep streak of red across Sefton's brow as he gasped out this sentence.

Georgina covered her face. "You are right," she confessed, "he was dying by my hand!"

"Yours?"

"I drugged him in all innocence, but, nevertheless, I am his murderess. For this crime I intend to die; to-morrow I give the story to the world. A Ravenscroft at the gallows! Think of it, husband, for you are my husband. In the sight of God and man we are one flesh, the vow and covenant is between us still. It is part of your being that will meet a felon's death."

He looked her up and down, as if her wild words were but the outcome of some torturing nightmare. Yet she spoke with a certain intelligence and vigour that surprised him.

"How dare you invent such a dastardly lie!" he burst forth, "you are trying to fool me with this mad talk, to satisfy your craving for tumult. If you did drug him I suppose the dose was not poisoned intentionally."

Georgina listened, a numb apathy creeping over her, which, joined to stubborn determination, hardened her set lips and deadened the light in her eyes.

"I am better out of the world—let me swing for it!" she whispered hoarsely.

"Wretched woman!" he cried, starting forward, and laying his hands roughly on her shoulders, shaking her in his desperation.

"If it was your doing, then let the weight of guilt be buried in your own breast, with the dark past that is gone. You stole the name of Ravenscroft when I was too weak to resist. You shall not sink it lower in the mire!"

"I am not your slave—at least my conscience is my own! I repeat—the grave has no horrors for me now, nothing can stand between the soul and God's mercy. This is a way of atonement. I shall not shrink!"

Georgina spoke boastfully. She only saw the picturesque side of the wild notion, her calmer mood and reasoning nature had yet to assert itself.

Gradually her lofty bearing and high flown allusions to conscience awoke in Sefton a supreme sense of the ridiculous.

Remembering himself to be the murderer, his unhinged brain saw suddenly a distorted joke in this tragic situation.

He broke into a weird peal of ribald mirth.

"Good," he cried—"very good! Give yourself up, be a fool to the end. Drink your cup of shame! Drink my health in it, Georgina—a health to the illustrious name of Ravenscroft!"

As she listened to his horrible laughter, and realised he had actually given his sanction to her sacrifice, a feeling of revolting fear leapt like flame into her blood.

The whole scene of court and scaffold passed before Georgina's mental vision. She heard the hisses of a multitude, and saw in fiery letters: "Confession of Lady Ravenscroft" glaring at her from vulgar posters. Her enthusiasm was sinking—sinking. Her moral courage had given way.

Sir Sefton was sharp enough to see it, though she said nothing. He chuckled inwardly.

"The illustrious name," she murmured at last, catching at an opportunity to retrace her steps without loss of dignity. "For the sake of that alone I would forego the privilege of dying, and carry on my burden of life."

"Fine sentiments," he replied, the mocking smile playing about his mouth. "But all women are cowards. You no more dare face the rope——"

"Hush!" with an imperative gesture; "do not goad me to the folly against which you have been pleading."

"Then in the name of our dead child, Georgina, let the subject cease. You have polluted his memory by pretence, affected fervour, theatrical show, and display! Better remain cold than pretend to feel, for in truth nothing is so despicable as noisy, assumed enthusiasm. Not one genuine emotion has risen to the surface in all your brag and bounce. Forced ardour, fictitious zeal, cant and humbug! Moral courage is not one of the virtues of our times, so don't imagine you possess it. But after all, there are compensations. You have been very amusing this evening, and it is the first time I have laughed for many a night."

Georgina could have borne anything better than that last remark, for its very truth made the sting more bitter. She raised her hands as if to ward off a blow, and fled from the room disgusted with herself.

Her emotions were at a standstill. She was too weak to sacrifice herself in atonement, she knew that the moment Sefton gave her free permission to be "a fool to the end." But how her life was to continue, and the future work out, she could neither guess at nor surmise.

"I suppose I shall fall back on the inevitable consolation of pursuing pleasure, and confiding in riches, fleeting transitory possessions. Not a very animating prospect, after what I had dreamed might be. Fancy looking for sunshine across a sky which has frowned on me for years, whose clouds are charged with tempests! It was childish and absurd. The chilling blast of Sefton's sneers would check the most promising spiritual vegetation. Flowers cannot flourish when choked by thistles or briars, nor bloom in a climate cheerless and dreary."

Digitized by Google

So she excused her evanescent mood, trying to forget the humiliating situation in which she found herself.

"Sefton would brand me with every epithet of meanness and inconsistency," she said, creeping into bed with aching head and burning temples, "so perhaps I had better live up to my reputation."

This was her last thought before she fell asleep.

The following morning Georgina awoke with a resolve.

"I must go away," she said, "for change of scene with cheerful people. I wonder what the Humpherys are doing? They have a perfect genius for amusing themselves, and study the art of killing time, not always an easy matter to accomplish! They know how to conquer the greatest foe of mankind—idleness. Their highest ambition is to enjoy life and escape being bored. At the present moment I feel the need of energy and movement!"

She shook her pillows, and rang for her breakfast in bed.

Luxury in every form was dear to Georgina's soul, yet her thoughts ran on complainingly.

She counted her grievances, till they were more in number than the hairs of her head, and mingled tears with strong coffee and buttered toast.

"If you mean to enjoy yourself," she declared, "it is no good going about it half heartedly. I am sick of the drizzling rain of sorrow, last night's good drenching downpour has cleared my horizon. I will put my misery behind me, and investigate the science of pleasure!"

She touched the bell again, too lazy to stretch out her hand for the novel that lay on the table.

"My book," she said, pointing to a yellowback, in which the heroine nobly gave herself up to justice, to save a murderer she loved. Georgina remembered the incident with a wan smile. "And a telegraph form," she continued. "Do I want a pencil? What a question! Am I to write with my fingers? Now wait, and take it down when it is ready." She addressed the form to Mrs. Humphery:

"I am sinking from ennui, won't you come to doctor my depression, and cheer me up?"

"A nice message for a bereaved mother to be sending through the telegraph!" said Georgina's maid indignantly to the coachman, as he rode off with the missive. "She wants to be cheered, does she?"

The girl turned away with an expressive grunt, for Lady Ravenscroft's overbearing manner made her highly unpopular in her household.

Mrs. Humphery answered the wire in person, descending upon Ravenscroft Park like a whirlwind in chiffons.

She poured forth a list of engagements "cut" (as she termed it) for the pleasure of seeing Georgina again.

"I have oceans of delicious plans if you will really be sensible, rouse yourself, and enter into them. All the tonic you need is a little harmless fun and frivolity (not too diluted with water) to put iron in your blood. Only let me prescribe, follow my treatment, and all your morbidity will dissolve. Drown the memory of the immediate past, and, if you value your reason, take a holiday from your husband. It positively gives me the blues to look at him—poor man. How he must have worshipped that child!"

"He has a naturally gloomy temperament, and is quite in opposition to the scheme of the world—pleasure! But I really believe he enjoys moping."

As Lady Ravenscroft and the irrepressible Mrs. Humphery wove schemes for the future, Sefton chafed at the presence of his wife's friend.

"It is abominable," he muttered, in the privacy of his study, "Georgina has not even the decency to mourn her son."

(To be concluded.)

SEE PAGE 363.

NEW CONDITIONS.

Jumbled Story Competition.

No. 12.

In order to lessen the amount of work undertaken by competitors in pasting up the separate lines of the story in these competitions, each line is now numbered, and all that readers need do is to write clearly on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order they believe to be correct. The title and author's name are jumbled up, and should be correctly given.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the reader whose solution first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Six Prizes—one of £5 and four of £1 each—are
5 September 14th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reaches this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose key is most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.

No. 9.

No competitor succeeded in correctly putting together Jumbled Story No. 9. The nearest competitor was Mr. H. P. Wright, 72, Evelina Road, Nunhead, S.E., to whom £5 has been forwarded. Each of the following competitors has received £1: Miss C. Buggins, St. John's Cottage, Chestnut Grove, New Malden, Surrey; Mr. F. L. Hill, 28, Lyham Road, Brixton, S.W.; Mr. E. Page, Wraysbury, near Staines; Mr. Bernard Ford, 96, King Edward Road, South Hackney; Mr. J. Ross Smyth, 11, Burrell Street, Crieff, N.B.

IN SHORT STORIES

dated October 3rd will appear the opening chapters of a new serial story by Mr. GEO. C. WALLIS, entitled

"The Last King of Atlantis," dealing with the strange lives lived by those who once inhabited this lost continent.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Digitized by Google

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

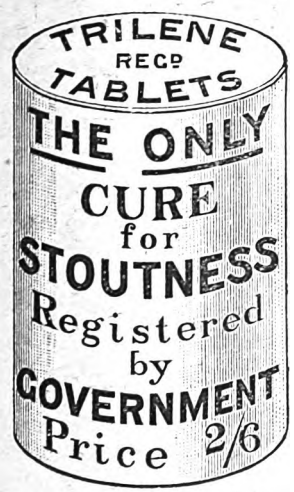
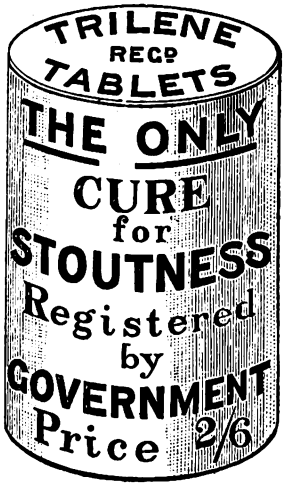
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, Finsbury Pavement, London.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich.
"GENTLEMEN,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Illustrated Family Novelist, November 30th, 1895, says: "A great many women who are plump by nature worry about their stoutness. However, there are some perfectly safe remedies for embonpoint, among them being the Trilene Tablets, which are not only safe, but absolutely beneficial to the general health, and speedily produce the desired effect."

"1, Letterstone Road, Fulham, S.W.
"SIRS,—I found myself decreased and better for your treatment, and can get about more freely.
"Yours sincerely, F. E. GODDEN."

"6, Brighton Terrace, Hull.
"MRS. JOHNSON has much pleasure in saying she has derived great benefit from your Tablets."

"3, Castle Road, Deal.
"MRS. J. PEARSON is glad to say she is much thinner."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.
MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

"Bretton West, near Wakefield.
"MISS L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of Tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

"Claremont House, Shrewsbury.
"DEAR SIRS,—I have nearly finished your Tablets, and cannot speak too highly of them. They do me good in many ways, being a valuable tonic and bracer up of the nervous system, and, being of a gouty tendency, they have also done me good in that way. I am very much thinner.
"Yours truly (MRS.) K. M. ANNAND."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.
MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2 stone, and am much better in health."

Extract from Bury and Suffolk Times, June 15th, 1894: "Miss Atherton sings and dances as piquantly as ever, and is a marvel of agility, considering how much flesh she has put on of late. Her friends should induce her to take a course of Trilene Tablets, about which I hear wonderful things. One portly acquaintance of my own by merely a few weeks' use of these little Tablets, has reduced his bulk perceptibly. I am assured the Tablets are harmless and tasteless, and that the Trilene Company in Finsbury Pavement, London, are doing an enormous and ever-increasing trade."

486, Market Street, Whitworth, near Rochdale.
MISS GRINDROD writes: "Have had one 2s. 6d. box of Trilene Tablets, and am 5lb. lighter."

2, Chariot Street, Hull.
MR. JUBB, Chemist, says: "My customers speak highly of your Tablets."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.
MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½ stone, and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.
MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17 stone, was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15 stone."

Aspern, 29, King's Hall Road, Beckenham.
MISS S. WOODHOUSE writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that your Tablets are really a safe cure for stoutness; they have cured me, and I am a perfect figure now."

MRS. GIBBON, of Radford Cottage, Bitterne, says: "I have derived great benefit from your Tablets, especially abdominal."

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.
MRS. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in four weeks."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

VALUABLE MONEY PRIZES OFFERED EVERY WEEK.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 404. FOR WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 26TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

GRAND PIONEER REDUCTION SALE

By Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son, the well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement. Super-eminent.—The Queen's Royal Household Prudential, Eclipse, and Alarm Carpets and Hearthrugs, etc. (Reg.). Amazingly interesting, instructive, and detailed Grand Reduction Catalogue post free, if, when writing, you mention this paper.

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a Carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2s. 11d. TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).

This is a wonderful step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, with on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

	Each.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft., Reduced Sale Price	4/9	9ft. by 15ft., Reduced Sale Price	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft. " " "	5/11	12ft. by 12ft. " " "	12/9
8ft. by 9ft. " " "	7/6	12ft. by 13½ft. " " "	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft. " " "	8/6	12ft. by 15ft. " " "	15/9
9ft. by 12ft. " " "	9/6	12ft. by 18ft. " " "	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft. " " "	11/6	12ft. by 21ft. " " "	22/6

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

"Neal Lodge, Upper Norwood, S.E., January 18th., 1896.

"The Dowr. Lady Abercromby is pleased with the 'Prudential' Carpet she ordered."

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.

Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg)., to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ..... 7s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 26/9/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques nd P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 943.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"SHORT STORIES" best suit the mood of this eager, restless age, so

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

Ready-made and to measure, may be briefly and simply set down as

"ABSOLUTELY the BEST VALUE in the WORLD."

MODEL 583 is one of the latest up-to-date designs made in that ideal fabric, The John Noble Cheviot Serge. It has a smart well-cut Bodice, with the back shaped to the figure and the front pleated at the waist.

10/6. There is a pretty Yoke Collar, and the whole is very daintily trimmed. The Skirt is a full, wide, tailor-made design. Price, for complete Costume, only 10/6; safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

SKIRT ONLY, as sketched, 5/6; carriage 6d. extra.

SIZES IN STOCK fit figures 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust, under arms; skirts being 38in., 40in. and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

COLOURS. — Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cinnamon, Electric Blue, Fawn, Grey, and Petunia.

John Noble's Knockabout Frocks,

With long full sleeves, saddle top, and pocket.

Sizes	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42 45in.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/- 5/6

Sent Carriage Paid 4½d. extra.

"AN IDEAL SCHOOL OR HOLIDAY GARMENT FOR GIRLS."

AN UP-TO-DATE FASHION VOLUME, containing numerous choice designs of Ladies' and Children's Costumes, sent, together with Patterns, post free on application. PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES."

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ARE YOU LOOKING for the cheapest and best firm to supply you with Wood for FRETWORK & WOOD-CARVING?

Send for price list. EST. 25 YRS.

PETER PATRICK,

Wharfedale Saw Mills, OTLEY.

VARICOCELE.

Its speedy and painless cure by the latest and most improved method of treatment for this disease. Send for Illustrated Leaflet, entering fully into the subject. It is the only reliable and effective means of curing this disease without operation. Sent sealed post free for taree stamps, by

E. FORBES, 57 and 58, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CORPULENCY CURED By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 39

Sept. 26, 1896.

S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

Dr. Mackenzie's ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

GLOSS JUST LIKE CHINA.

Every man likes his shirt, collar, and cuffs to look exactly like china. It is very easy, too, to get the effect. You have only to rub some of Redford's China Gloss on the linen before ironing, not mix it with the starch, and then you have a beautiful polished surface. A shilling box, containing enough to last for a month or two, sent free by post on receipt of thirteenpence by Redford & Son, G. Dept., 30, Oxford Street, Liverpool.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

HAIR DESTROYED. On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Road, Lambeth, London.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

No. 404.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week ending September 26th, 1896.

SLEEP NO MORE!

"And then it started like a guilty thing, Upon a fearful summons."
HAMLET.

BASEST of all men is he who betrays a trust.

Nothing could be urged in the defence of Edgar Mostyn: not youth, or lack of experience, not hastiness, not temptation from others—as far as one might judge not passion. No man standing between good and evil ever had better reasons than he for following the right path, and experience would not suffer him to go wrong by mistake. Yet he sinned—and the sin was at once great and contemptible.

When Basil Redstock had been married about a year, business made it necessary that he should leave his wife and home for several months. There were some mines to be looked after in a wild district where he could not take Eva. A maiden aunt, old, deaf, stupid, came to the house to stay, and several of Eva's companions were expected. But there ought to be a man about, as a protection against burglars. Basil's best friend was Edgar Mostyn, a bachelor, and man-of-the-world, yet one whose reserved speech and upright conduct had always repelled the breath of scandal.

"He is a man," said Basil—and Mostyn knew that he had said it—"to whom I would without hesitation intrust every penny I had in the world—my own good name—everything."

So Mostyn came to live in the house of his friend on his friend's request that he should guard and protect his wife.

At first Eva was never without the company of girl friends. Presently they ceased to come; perhaps it was accidental, perhaps she was less urgent in her invitations. During the last month, she and the old aunt and Edgar Mostyn were alone much of the time. The aunt would grow sleepy in the evenings; besides, she was deaf.

All rights reserved.]

When Basil Redstock returned, Mostyn, who was a man of perfect self-control, welcomed him with cordial smiles and hearty speech. But the weak woman, sick with terror, scarcely knew what she said and did.

Basil was not suspicious by nature—yet he was not a fool.

On the evening of the third day after the husband's return, as Mostyn sat alone in his bachelor quarters, a note was brought to him. It had been left at the door by a woman. In the trembling, illegible scrawl, he, with difficulty, recognised the handwriting of Eva Redstock. The note read as follows:

"What have I done! I cannot tell how it has happened but he knows all. He said he would kill me if I did not confess, and I was almost crazy. He means to shoot you, I know, for he took his revolver and went away. I wish he had killed me—I wish I were dead."

Mostyn stared blankly at the paper for some moments after he had finished reading its message. Here was a catastrophe in a form he had not foreseen; for such weakness was quite out of the pale of his understanding. At last he tore the note to fragments, and tossed it into the fire.

"Well," he said, with a savage scowl, "it is a scrape—a bad one. So he means to shoot, eh?"

Presently Mostyn arose and opened a drawer in his desk. He took out a revolver—not a toy article, but one of the sort that can be made to shoot straight, and to kill—and began to turn it over in his hands. A touch on a half-concealed spring, and the chambers rolled out.

From the same drawer he brought a piece of cloth, a small bottle of oil, and some cartridges.

It took a little time to clean, oil, and load the weapon. While he was thus engaged, Mostyn thought the situation over after this wise:

"He does not know how to shoot, and if I meet him in the street and he draws, I can safely risk his first fire. I know that revolver of his; before he is ready for a second, I can—h'm, it would be a bad business, if I should

Digitized by Google

—the whole thing is going to come out anyway, if he tries the shooting business. Ruin me, of course; but I don't care to give up my life just because a woman is a fool. What a fool she was! If she had only denied it, that would have been something—but to confess all!—Yet how if he should come on me from behind? Well, that is not like Basil Redstock. He is a chivalrous fellow, and I imagine will not shoot without warning."

When the pistol was loaded and in perfect order, Mostyn slipped it into a leather sheath and left it upon the desk. Then he sat down by the fire and thought—not of the immediate danger—for he was ready now to meet that—but of the man and the woman who had that day lived a tragedy on his account. Such thoughts were surely not pleasant; yet he remained an hour beyond the time when he usually retired, staring into the flames.

The living apartments of Mr. Edgar Mostyn were two rooms in the second storey of a large residence building. The parlour was in front and looked out over the street. The neighbourhood was quiet, although not far distant from a populous thoroughfare. When he was ready to go to bed, Mostyn, as was his custom, threw wide open one of the front windows. He stood for a moment gazing into the street, which was brightly lighted by the moon and empty of people. Then he closed the blinds, and went into the inner room.

There was in the lower hall of the house a large clock which struck the hours. Shortly after Mostyn stepped into bed, midnight sounded. He lay very still for a time and thought of Eva. Then he turned over into another part of the bed and thought about Basil. And presently he heard the clock strike one.

Then he became restless and tossed about. It was a bad scrape, and it worried him. Even if he saved his life he must expect to part with his reputation, for the affair would make a horrible uproar. What a fool that woman was—what an unspeakable fool!

Two o'clock.

The bed had become disagreeably warm, and he raised himself on his elbow, that the cool air might come under the clothes. The attitude made him think of the way actors die on the stage. Would a man who was shot take this position? He wondered how it would be with himself, if that first bullet from Basil Redstock's weapon should take effect. Pooh! It was a toy affair, incapable of hitting a mark ten feet away. There was very little chance; of course there was a chance, merely a chance. He dropped back in bed.

Then began to see pictures of what might happen. He is walking down the street—Basil comes up from behind—calls out to him—shoots—he falls into the gutter. He is coming out of the front-door of the house—someone calls to him—it is Basil Redstock—a shot—he falls forward on his face on the steps. He is at his desk in the office—a noise of someone speaking—he looks up—it is Basil Redstock—a report—a flash of light—smoke—he drops out of the chair in a heap on the floor—blood on the carpet.

Now the pictures began to follow one another more rapidly. He was whirled along through the various places where business or pleasure might take him in the course of the day; always it was the same—a sudden cry—Basil Redstock—a shot—Mostyn falls—blood. As they came faster, the details grew dimmer, until at last the whole seemed an indistinct haze, in the midst of which he could only see Basil Redstock, with arm upraised and he himself falling—falling——

He was nearing sleep. One moment more and he would have been free from the torment of consciousness, but in that instant he heard a cry from the street, loud and clear, the voice of Basil Redstock.

"Mostyn! Coward! Come out and be shot!"

He sprang up in bed—stunned into terror. After the last word was spoken, there was stillness, stillness in the house and in the street—stillness so complete that it roared in his ears.

There was no chance to think it a dream, for on hearing his name called Mostyn had instantly shaken off his drowsiness, and was thoroughly awake to what followed. There could be no question either about the origin of the cry; Basil Redstock—crazed, perhaps—stood in the street—in the middle of the street—before the house, and was calling to him to come out. Evidently he was armed, and the instant Mostyn should appear would begin to shoot.

Mostyn climbed slowly and noiselessly out of bed, and groped his way into the front room. He had no distinct plan of action, but when, by the moonlight that struggled through the chinks of the blinds, he saw the revolver lying on the desk, he took it out of its sheath and went towards the window that overlooked the street.

Here he could see plainly, yet not be seen.

There was no one in the street. It was empty and silent, as when Mostyn had looked down upon it a few hours before.

Where was Redstock? Had he gone away, or was he hiding in the dark shadows? Mostyn strained his eyes but could see no sign of him.

Suddenly he remembered that the cry must have been heard by others in the house—and, for that matter, in all the neighbourhood about—for it had rung out loud and shrill in the quiet night. He listened, expecting to hear the sound of people moving about. But silence continued. Minutes passed—two or three, five, ten—but no sign of Basil Redstock in the street—no sound in the house.

So he turned and put away the revolver on the desk and went back to bed. Now he began to think it all over anew.

The weakness and folly of Eva Redstock had been a surprise, but, in the name of heaven, what possessed Basil? Was he insane—or drunk—or had he actually thought that Mostyn would respond to such a challenge and "come out and be shot"? Really, it was quite incomprehensible. But it was none the less a disgrace.

And four sounded from the clock.

"Four in the morning! and not a wink of sleep yet. Three must have struck when I was only half conscious. In an hour more it will be daylight. I must get to sleep or I shall be a wreck to-morrow—a wreck—a wreck."

"Mostyn! Coward! Come out and be shot!"

The words struck into the man, half dozing in his warm bed, with a sudden and icy chill. They sounded very loud, as if Redstock were within a few feet of the house—on the pavement or the steps. There was no longer question but the cry must have been heard, at least by those who occupied rooms in the front part of the dwelling, and Mostyn waited breathlessly for something to happen. But the stillness which followed the cry remained unbroken.

At last he sprang from the bed, shivering like a man with the ague, and peered again through the blinds of the front windows. There was no one to be seen. The moonlight had given away to the first streaks of dawn; and, as he stood looking out, the clock below struck the hour of five.

Digitized by Google

To attempt sleep now was idle, and he slowly began to dress. The cry was not heard again.

When Mostyn was ready to leave the room, he put the sheathed revolver into his pocket. He stood for a moment in the front doorway and looked searchingly across and along the street, before he ventured out upon the steps. On his way down town, he slackened his pace at every corner and glanced about, right and left and behind, in the stealthy manner of a man who is afraid of his own fears. Several times he imagined that he saw Redstock coming, and he stepped into a doorway and waited with his hand on his hip-pocket, until the suspected person cam e near enough to show that he was not the man.

"I did not know that I was such a coward," he said; "I am not a coward. A night without sleep has made me nervous. Besides, if I am not always on my guard, I may be taken unawares."

He went to his office, and, lighting a fire, began to turn over the work which he had planned for the day. The place was deserted and still. A sudden, rapid step approaching his door brought him to his feet with his hand behind him. It was only the newsboy, who, as he tossed the paper through the half-open door, caught a glimpse of the white face and staring eyes of Mostyn, and thought that the man must be struggling with the latter end of a debauch.

"This will not do," said Mostyn, mechanically taking up the paper; "I must control myself better or people will begin to suspect——"

He unfolded the sheet and began to read, his eyes running hastily across the row of headlines. Suddenly he cried out with a word that was between an oath and a prayer, and then grew so still that one might have thoughthim changed to stone.

Basil Redstock was dead. He had shot himself—accidentally, the paper said—through the heart.

The article filled the better part of a column, for Mr. Redstock was a well-known man, and his death was a strange, sad tragedy, over which the reporter fondly lingered. He had gone to his office, so it was stated, on the evening previous with the design of making up some arrears of correspondence. In tossing the papers in his desk about, he had come upon a revolver, which he had picked up and started to load. Through some carelessness on his part, the weapon was fired while pointed at his breast, and the shot had proved fatal. The report was heard by several persons in the building, and, forcing the door, they found a tableau which told the entire story as plainly as though each act had been witnessed and recorded. On the desk were letters laid out to be answered and recorded. Drawers were open and papers scattered about, showing that he had been in search of some document when he happened upon the weapon. In the centre of the desk was a box of cartridges and the pistol, ramrod, and cleaner, and near the feet of the dead man lay the weapon, four chambers empty, one loaded, and one filled with a shell.

This discovery was made at eleven o'clock in the evening.

When he reached the end of the narrative, Mostyn laid down the paper and stared at the wall. He was dazed for the moment, and could not make an effort to accommodate the facts that he had just read with what he had known before. At last it became clear to him, for one thing, that Redstock was dead, and he heaved a long sigh of relief.

That danger was passed.

Was it an accident? he asked himself; or was it not more likely a suicide, with this arrangement of things about the desk cunningly designed for the purpose of throwing off suspicion? Well, what did it matter? Mostyn's secret was safe.

"Safe," he muttered: "safe—but hold;—the people at the house—they heard him cry out to me from the street—they must have heard it—why, that can't be—let me see—eleven o'clock?—but it was three o'clock when he called to me—dead at eleven—I know it was three—yes, and later it was five—the second time—impossible—there is some mistake—the paper is wrong—no, I am wrong—but I certainly heard it—three o'clock—eleven o'clock—why, that is five hours—yes, five hours."

Repeating it over and over did not make it any clearer. In the end, the only conclusion which Mostyn reached was that something was wrong—and this meant nothing at all.

As he was ostensibly one of the nearest friends of the dead man, it was natural that he should make inquiries about the accident. A small amount of investigation satisfied him, beyond all doubt, that Basil Redstock had shot himself intentionally, and also that he was dead by eleven o'clock in the evening.

"But that was before I went to bed," thought Mostyn.

That evening he expected to hear his friends at home refer to the strange noises of the night before; but no one spoke of them. Then Mostyn himself told about a drunken man who was crying out in front of the house—about three o'clock in the morning; and surprise was manifested by his listeners. None of them had heard a sound.

Having had no sleep in thirty-six hours, Edgar Mostyn was inclined to retire early. He went to his room at nine o'clock, and as a preliminary of undressing, took the revolver out of his pocket, and put it away in the desk. The act brought back to his mind the singular half-dreams of the previous night when he had repeatedly seen himself shot and felt himself falling. After he got into bed, in the dark and stillness, the weird and awful panorama began once more to whirl past his tightly closed eyes. In vain he tried to drive it away. There was always the same scene—Basil Redstock aiming the weapon, firing, and Mostyn falling.

At last, in spite of it all, he was becoming drowsy, and almost ready to sleep.

"Mostyn! Coward! Come out and be shot!"

There it was again!—loud and clear, almost a shriek. It came from the middle of the street, and was the voice—yes, plainly the voice—of Basil Redstock. Why, he was dead! But this was his voice. What did it mean? A dream? A hoax! Or madness?

Before Mostyn knew what he did, he stood by the window looking into the street. There was no one to be seen. He shivered, and turned back towards the bedroom.

Then he heard a noise of talking in the hall just outside his door. Plainly this time the cry had roused the house; and he hurriedly slipped on a dressing-gown, to be ready, should anyone enter the room.

No one came. Presently he opened the door, and looked out. Two men stood at the front end of the hall in the large bay-window which overhung the street. They were fellow lodgers of Mostyn, and they were conversing with apparent unconcern.

"Did you hear it?" asked Mostyn.

"Hear what?" said one of the men

Digitized by Google

"The—the crazy man yelling in the street."

"Not a sound."

"How long have you been standing here?"

"Ten—fifteen minutes."

Mostyn noticed that one of the windows was open. How was it possible that the cry should have penetrated to his bedroom, to rouse him—half-asleep—and yet be unnoticed by these men standing by the open window.

As he turned this question over in his mind, gazing in dumb wonder at the man who had last spoken, the words came again to his startled ears, this time in a wild and terrible yell.

"Mostyn! Coward! Come out and be shot!"

It was such a cry as might have belched from the jaws of some fierce animal that had acquired the power of speech. It seemed to echo and re-echo through all the house, making the windows rattle and the doors shake, and Mostyn listened for an answering uproar. He looked to see the men at the window turn upon him with horror in their faces, and demand to know what it meant.

But after the sound of the last word died away, the house remained still. The men at the window did not move.

One of them said: "The street is unusually quiet to-night."

"Yes," answered the other; and Mostyn staggered back into his room.

Then the muscles of his body relaxed, and he tumbled into an awkward heap on the floor. It was not a faint; it was the utter exhaustion that comes over a man when, for the first time, he beholds the impossible existing.

An hour passed, and the voice in the street—or in his brain—had been silent. He dragged himself to the bed and fell heavily upon it. Sick and weary with doubt, debate and questioning, he closed his eyes and once more sought for sleep.

"Mostyn! Coward! Come out and be shot!"

Ah! There it sounded again. Well, let it sound. He would sleep—sleep in spite of it.

"Mostyn! Coward! Come out and be shot!"

Louder this time, so terribly loud that Mostyn leapt and fell back, trembling like a frightened child.

And now the awful longing for sleep began to grow upon the brain, as hunger gnaws upon the body.

In the grey of early dawn he gave up the struggle, arose and dressed, and went out of the house to walk in the streets.

He began to drink—whisky, brandy, and, at last, absinthe. It was all like so much water. Thoroughly frightened, towards the close of the long day he called to see his physician.

"What shall I do?" he asked; "I cannot sleep."

The doctor looked at his haggard face and bloodshot eyes, felt his pulse, and listened to his heart. "Overwork and worry," he said; "you must be careful."

The physician was to Mostyn an intimate friend, so he told a large part of the story: how he heard the voice of a dead man calling to him from the street. Dr. Morey listened, with deep interest.

"Tortured and outraged nerves," he said, "played upon by the imagination."

"I do not imagine I hear it," said Mostyn; "I do hear it—plainly—as I hear you speaking now."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the doctor, looking at him askance; "is it so bad as that?"

"Mostyn," he continued, after a moment's pause, "why don't you humour yourself in this matter? It may do good. The next time you hear the cry, respond to it. Go out in the street, and actually convince yourself beyond all doubt that no one is there."

Then he gave Mostyn a prescription, and offered him a hypodermic syringe—to be used if all other means failed.

It was now the third night—sixty hours passed without sleep—and evening was at hand. "Another night like the last," thought Mostyn, "and I shall go mad." He scarcely dared go to his room, although the desire for sleep raged within him like a caged beast.

At nine o'clock he lay down on the bed, without removing his clothes. He purposed to be ready, when the call should come, to run down into the street and defy his imagination with fact.

Hardly had his head touched the pillow, when, for the third time, the visions of death began to flit before him. Again and again he witnessed the old picture, always changing, yet always the same—Basil Redstock aiming and discharging the weapon, and he falling—falling. At last it seemed that sleep could no longer elude him.

In that moment came the cry—louder, fiercer, and more terrible than ever:

"Mostyn! Coward! Come out and be shot!"

Before it ceased ringing in his ears, he was leaping down the stairs towards the door that led to the street.

And now mark how Fate prepares for her victims. In a public-house near by two men had been playing cards, and pouring liquor into their brains. A word—a blow—a slash with a knife—a revolver is out—one runs—the other pursues. Now the fugitive comes round the corner into the street where stands the house of Edgar Mostyn. The door opens and the haunted man rushes down to the pavement. Once more he hears the cry reverberating in the tones of the dead:

"Mostyn! Coward! Come out and be shot!"

And he falls forward upon his face, his heart pierced by the chance-aimed bullet.

CHARLES DWIGHT WILLARD.

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.

No. 10.

The first prize of £5 goes this week to Mr. F. Revelt, 2, Pond Terrace, Lower Clapton, London, whose attempt was the only one completely correct. Each of the competitors whose names appear below have received £1, their solutions being the next most correct sent in:

Miss Sullivan, Hill House, Bandon, co. Cork, Ireland.
Mr. H. P. Wright, 72, Evilina Road, Nunhead, S.E.
Miss Bessie Adams, The Cottage, The Heath, Crayford, Kent.
Mr. E. Scants, 43, Gwendwr Road, West Kensington.
Mrs. C. C. Sloane, 33, Regent Square, W.C.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 11.

The London guinea goes this week to Mr. C. H. Ward, 32, Tasman Road, Stockwell; and the provincial guinea to Mr. E. A. Slaney, 49, Newport Road, Stafford.

The solution of the problem was:

THE LAST KING OF ATLANTIS.

Digitized by Google

A Legend of Amsterdam.

On the Keizersgracht stands a grey and gloomy pile of nondescript architecture, with seven horrible, fantastic heads, carved upon its grim, mould-covered, stone façade.

Generations ago it was the property and the residence of a retired East India merchant who had amassed almost fabulous wealth, and who lived in the most unostentatious and solid style peculiar to the prosperous bourgeoisie of Amsterdam.

It was the custom of this good gentleman to leave his city home early in the season for his country seat in the Haarlemmer Meer, and during his absence the house on the Keizersgracht was left in the charge of an old servant—Anne—who belonged to a class fast dying out in Holland, if not already a feature of its past.

This faithful woman had nursed her master through earliest infancy, and, according to the old custom, had remained in his service after his marriage, attending his young wife and caring for his children in turn. When wife and children had passed away, the responsibilities of the household rested entirely on the willing shoulders of the loyal Anne, and she comforted her master in his days of sorrow, guarded his interests—knowing no others—as her own, and devoted her age, as she had given her youth, to his service.

The other servants came under her control, but during the summer she sent them away to the country house, preferring the peace and quiet of the deserted home to their troublesome society, and undertaking the task of the annual September house-cleaning entirely without assistance. She dearly loved every nook and corner of this old house, where her master and his dear, dead children had first seen the light of the world, and where the eyes of the poor little ones had one after another closed upon it for ever.

She wanted not frivolous maids tripping about among the rooms, bothering her under the guise of assistance. It was a labour of love to get everything in readiness for the return of the master, and she grudged neither time nor strength in the waxing of the floors until one could easily break one's neck by an unsteady step on the slippery surface—in polishing the old brass until it showed one's face as in a mirror, and in carefully dusting and re-arranging the quaint old Delft and Doulton which, together with many a heathenish curio from the strange countries to which her master had journeyed, lined the shelves of cabinets and adorned the tops of the presses and chests.

She carefully wiped the scabbard of one long, curving sword and then unsheathed the blade. Dear Heaven! but it was rusty. Only after a vigorous pull could she drag it from the sheath. Why not rub it up a bit? She was very tired, and this was really an unnecessary, added exertion. But Anne hated rust almost as much as she hated dust, and it was such a satisfaction to her to feel that everything, even these ridiculous swords in their scabbards, were shining with cleanliness. She set about the task, and in half-an-hour it was an accomplished fact.

A storm had been threatening all the afternoon. The wind was sweeping across the canal, the sky was black, the rain beat down with sudden fierceness, and, as she closed the last shutter at the front of the house, Anne saw the figures of two men huddled against the wide, projecting porch, apparently seeking shelter from the rising storm.

In the old Dutch houses, the cellar, or rather, an extension of it, runs out beneath the front porch, and receives light from a small, square aperture cut in the stone. This opening also permits a current of air from the windows of the main cellar, which are larger, also square and cut in the wall, a few inches above the street.

These windows were protected by light shutters. The opening in the front wall was left unprotected, for the stout door at the head of the cellar steps was provided with bolts and bars, and considered a sufficient defence against possible visitors who chose to enter the house by way of the cellar.

Anne placed her candle on the steps, closed the shutters to keep out the driving rain, and busied herself in collecting the firewood strewn over the floor of the cellar. This led her gradually towards the outer cellar, and during a sudden lull in the storm she distinctly heard the sound of voices in subdued conversation.

Advancing noiselessly, she peered through the opening in the wall.

The two men who had sought comparative shelter from the storm were still huddled against the porch. Anne could not see their faces—she was too far below

Digitized by Google

She set about the task.

them, but what they said was perfectly audible, and while she was puzzling over a certain familiar tone in the voice of one of the men, the import of his words fell with a chilling force, which crushed in her every other thought.

"It could be managed without the slightest difficulty," he said. "The old woman is alone in the house, and we can step in here—one after the other."

He indicated with a motion of his foot the opening near which they stood. Anne could have touched it by stretching out her hand. She trembled violently with fear, and was obliged to grasp the stone ledge of the window for support.

"All very good," whispered the second voice; "but if, as you say, there is a strong door at the top of the cellar steps, how are we to get into the upper part of the house, after all?"

"How?" said the first speaker. "There will be seven of us in all. We shall have the necessary implements. We shall break through the door."

"And while we are doing all this," whispered the other excitedly, "what is to prevent the old woman from hearing us—from giving the alarm—from giving us into custody? And then, what of all this great treasure? For that matter, how do you know that anything has been left in the house?"

His companion interrupted him with a contemptuous laugh.

"One question at a time, my friend," he began coolly.

And again Anne recognised something strangely familiar in the soft, sneering voice.

"If, as you say, the old woman hears us at work, and cries out, who will hear her on the Keizersgracht, when all Amsterdam will crawl indoors? How long, too, do you think it will take seven men and a strong axe to cut through a few bolts? Bah! One, two taps, and it is done; a third tap for the old woman, who will doubtless be standing ready to take it, and so much the better, since dead women, like dead men, tell no tales."

Again he laughed disagreeably.

"As for the treasure, I know the house, and the ways of the people, and you will kindly remember that I do not often bungle in these little affairs. However," he added carelessly, "if you are timid, there are still six of us; and, should you leave us in the lurch, you will, at least, keep our secret. Of that I am quite sure."

He spoke with a peculiar emphasis.

The other rejoined instantly:

"Enough! I will be one of you. Now, you wish me to remain here and keep watch while you go in search of the others. Give me your plan now; it will save time and talk."

Anne clung desperately to the window-sill in spite of her shaking limbs, which threatened no longer to support her weight. She was dazed—confused by the revelation of this horrible plan of robbery and murder. Yes, her murder! That was what they were plotting to accomplish. Dear Heaven! What could she do? At least, she must not lose a word.

"Do not leave this spot until I return. Should the old servant leave the house, strangle her from behind."

Anne, with difficulty, repressed a cry of agony.

"I will bring the others as near the house as I dare, and imitate the howl of a dog. If everything is quiet, and we can approach, you repeat the sound. If you are silent, I shall know that the unexpected has happened. We understand each other thoroughly now. One thing more. As I said before, this window," tapping the wall behind him again with his foot, "is better than the others; it has no shutters, and will necessitate less noise near the street. It is just wide enough to admit a man head first, and is not more than three feet from the floor; one can feel for the ground with one's hands, and so draw in the rest of the body. You had best enter first, I last; by that means we shall keep a watch on the others. Give a low 'Cuckoo' when you are safely on your feet within—I shall tell the others to do the same. So, I go now to the 'Roode Leenw,' where the others are waiting, and we will return as soon as it is possible to do so with safety. How lucky it's such a black night. We can begin our work early."

He moved away, Anne intently watching.

"Wait!" called the other softly.

A dim shape rose again, close beside the window.

"You are sure about the treasure? Come, now, is there enough for seven?"

"Ay, man," was the reply; "and for eight—we shall need a man outside to give an alarm if necessary. I tell you there is not only money, but a service of solid gold, and another of silver. In better days I have eaten off both!"

Digitized by Google

He was gone.

Anne, unable longer to stand, sank despairingly to the ground.

She was unconscious of the darkness, for the candle end she had brought into the cellar had long ago burned itself out on the stone steps.

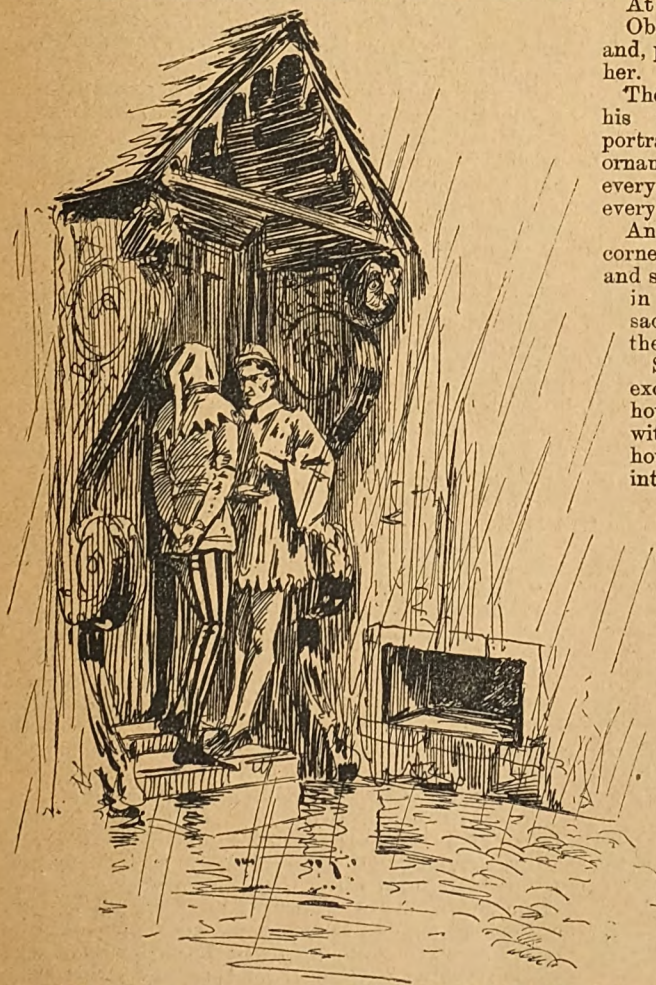
She covered her face with her hard, old hands, and a few heavy tears crept through the knotted fingers. She had lived an honest life. She had served her master faithfully. She had hoped to close her eyes peacefully, at last, in his service. To die to-night, to be murdered, struck with an axe beneath this very roof, where she had spent nearly her whole life, or strangled from behind, should she try to escape from the house! Horrible! Horrible! Would Providence let such a thing be?

She had suddenly a stupid sensation of being another than herself. The rain beat fiercely down. The wind sobbed and moaned about the house, then tore madly over the canal, lashing the placid water to fury. A bell in the town tolled ten strokes, muffled and irregular, through the noises of the storm.

Ten o'clock! So late!

Anne struggled to her feet.

What was she doing here, weeping, inactive, when her life was at stake? Surely there was some way to prevent this awful, needless, crime! This man without, watching, waiting, to strangle her, he could not see in all directions at once. They had not counted on their plan being overheard. They would not expect strategy from her. There were the windows at the back of the house! She could drop from one of them, and, by making a long detour, reach a neighbour, or even the watch in the town. There was a chance of her meeting the other wretches, but it was one in twenty. Here, in the house, she had no chance at all.



The two men . . . . were still huddled against the porch.

Dear Heaven! He was right, the villain! How long would it take seven men and a strong axe to break down a few bolts? She had no time to lose.

She crept through the darkness straight to the cellar steps—she knew every inch of the ground—made her way softly to the door above, opening it as cautiously as though a sound might steal through stone walls and wooden shutters to the wicked ears without.

In the kitchen she lighted a candle, and, shading it with her hand as she passed before the windows, moved quickly towards the dining-room, at the back of the house, the windows of which were consequently furthest from the watcher on the Keizersgracht.

At the door of the library she paused.

Obeying an irresistible impulse, she entered the room, and, placing the candle on a small table, she looked about her.

There was her master's favourite chair drawn before his writing-table, his books, his pictures. The portraits of his children and his wife. The curious ornaments on the shelves, in niches in the walls—everything dearest to him was in the room—yes! and everything of most value.

Anne's eyes fell on the metal-bound chest in the corner. Within it were the two services of plate—gold and silver—heirlooms in the family, and more precious in the eyes of her master than the rolls of bills and sacks of coins and the cases of jewels stored beside them.

She wondered vaguely, in the midst of her strong excitement, how this hiding-place as well as the house itself had become so well known to the robber with the strangely familiar voice. Alas! in an hour's time, perhaps in less, all this would have passed into his hands, this dear room, almost sacred to her, would be desecrated by the presence of these murderous ruffians, and she, the faithful one, who loved the belongings of her master, as she loved her master himself, would be flying along the Keizersgracht, flying for her life.

What! She would then be running away? For her life? Yes, to be sure.

A doubt, perplexing, agonising, crept upon the old servant—slowly at first, then it assumed strength in her thoughts, merging at last into the certainty of a forceful conviction.

Her place was here—here—to defend what had been given into her charge? How? It mattered not. With her life, if need be. This would be better than the abandonment of duty.

A certain exaltation, following upon this righteous resolve, seemed to deprive of all its bitterness even the certainty of the terrible death which was fast stealing upon her. They would find her here, in this room, the dear master and his servants—they would find her dead, murdered, beside the press, cut down at her post of duty! The master would shed tears at this affecting sight, and he would know that she had been faithful unto death. Yes! She would be faithful—to-night—as through all the past she had been to him, and to what was his.

Digitized by Google

She looked again about the room in which she now knew she was to die. Her eyes lingered lovingly on each familiar feature of its furnishings. They rested on the swords she had been cleaning that evening—the last duty she would ever perform in this house which had so long been her charge. No! not the last—one was still to come.

She moved slowly towards the weapons, and laid her hand on one of them—a great broadsword, with a blade as thick as an axe. Moved by some strange influence, Anne unsheathed the weapon, clutched it firmly with both hands, turning it slightly, so that the dim light from the candle played on the dazzling steel.

A single dull note sounded from the town bell. Half-past ten. Perhaps even now her fate was creeping upon her, stealthily along the Keizersgracht.

Remembering the signal, she listened intently for the howling of a dog, but no sound came to her save the moaning of the wind and the beating of the rain.

Suppose the cry was lost in the storm, and that at this moment a head was being thrust through the cellar window, and a pair of murderous hands reaching for the ground!

Her own hands closed nervously on the weapon in her grasp, and unconsciously she lifted it as if to strike a blow.

The action was suggestive—a host of thoughts crowded swiftly upon it, but thoughts so terrifying that the old woman, after abandoning herself to them for one delirious instant, fell suddenly on her knees, and prayed God to snatch them from her heart.

But they pressed in even upon her prayer, and even while upon her knees, with eyes upraised to Heaven, she found herself plotting, planning to foil these cowardly robbers with their own weapons—how she might with this good sword in her hand, station herself by the little window in the cellar; how each man would enter alone, offering his head, as it were, for the blow. The cry was known to her.

Why was she praying to God to help her to resist this voice in her heart, since He Himself must have bidden it speak? Was it not right to defend one's life—"an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth." And, strongest conviction of all—in this way alone could she risk her life to some purpose. Should she succeed, the treasure was safe. Here, on the contrary, of what avail the sacrifice of her life, since the robbers would step over her dead body to rifle the safe of its contents.

"My God! Have mercy upon me!" whispered the old servant, struggling to her feet and seizing the weapon which had fallen to the floor at her side. She took the candle in the other hand, placing first a few matches on the edge of the candlestick; then, closing the library door softly, she swiftly made her way to the cellar steps. Here she extinguished the light and removed her shoes.

Descending the steps without haste, she moved towards the outer cellar, listening intently for the howling of a dog above the confusion of the storm.

She had not long to wait.

As the instigator of the robbery had said—the elements, wild and wicked, lent their aid to the furtherance of the evil deed.

Anne laid her formidable weapon on the ground convenient to her hand, and then fell upon her knees. Again the horror of what she was about to do closed upon her senses.

"Thou shalt not kill!"

The words rang in her ears and were graven in flaming letters in the darkness about her. She was intensely, almost superstitiously religious, but perhaps the fanaticism to which her nature was prone found its greatest expression in her idolatry of her master, and the fetish-like reverence with which she worshipped even his smallest belongings.

The struggle between these two passions of a long, narrow life was sharp and severe. But it was also short.

The words of the simple prayer: "My God, pity me! My God, show me what is right!" repeated again and again, died away suddenly in the old servant's throat. The prolonged howl of a dog sounded above wind and rain. In a moment it was answered by another howl much nearer to the house.

With the necessity for immediate action came the requisite courage. There was no further need of prayer, as there was no further hesitation.

Muffled, stealthy footsteps approached the house. Not a word was spoken that could be overheard by the woman, who stood rigid, with upraised arms, ready to deal the fatal strokes, her burning eyes fixed upon the shadowy opening in the wall so faintly outlined against the darkness of the night.

But her eyes, grown accustomed to the gloom, saw plainly the rounder, darker outline of the man's head which was thrust cautiously forward through the opening; saw even where the line of hair ended sharply against the back of the neck; saw by some second sense of sight where the shoulders followed the head, and the arms were drawn slowly in, one after another, and were extended downwards to reach the ground.

Now!

There was a vibrant shock, a slight resistance; then it went on cleaving through a life. The head fell with a heavy, sickening sound, prolonged by a soft gurgling. And all this with such hideous speed, such appalling silence.

The woman's head swam, and she staggered as she moved a step or two nearer to seize the headless body and drag it through the window. Then she must stoop and push it aside—for the next!

And the signal! She had almost forgotten. Where was her voice?

She made a fearful effort, but the sound—rough, husky, yet harsh; could it be her voice?

"Cuckoo!"

She shivered with anxiety. Would they detect the strangeness of the voice, suspect a trap—fly? Oh! If God would have it so! Suppose, indeed, He did not sanction this awful bloodshed! Was not this murder? And murder deliberately planned, and not one victim, but seven! The prayers rose again to Heaven—this time voiceless, but the same poor words went up from the tortured soul.

"My God! Pity me! Show me what is right!"

A second head, a second blow to sever it from the body, after a pause, as before, to gain the same advantage, only this time an added horror, since the falling head rolled between her feet, and, when afraid to risk a miss-step, she stooped to push it aside with her hands, they touched the hair and beard, wet and warm with blood. Its sickening odour remained upon them, and shaking as with ague, yet with the heat of fever in her brain, Anne dragged the second body after the first, and, as it was that of a slight man, her strong arms lifted it from the ground, and flung it back into the cellar.

Digitized by Google

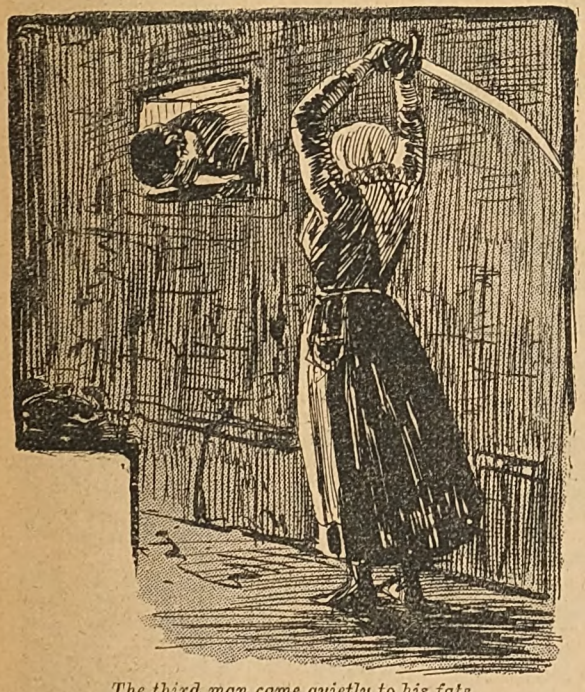
This time she gave the signal in a clearer voice, and as she again took her position to wait for the third victim, she was conscious of a certain lightness, a vague exhilaration, which she could not have analysed had she tried. Her lips still moved in silent prayer, but unconsciously to herself, the words of her supplication had changed, and she intreated only for strength; yes! strength to kill!

The third man came quietly to his fate, as had the two before him, but with the fourth it was different.

He had followed closely on his companion, and Anne had not had time to push aside the preceding body before aiming a blow at his neck.

His hands, feeling for the floor, came in contact with the gaping throat from which the blood still streamed, and passed swiftly over it to the lifeless arms and shoulders.



The third man came quietly to his fate.

"What is this?" he muttered. "Where are you?"

Receiving no reply, he tried vainly to wriggle back as he had come, through the narrow opening from which he dangled head downwards. But his struggle was short and his fate differed from that of his companions only in that his upraised head met the descending sword which crashed through his skull, cleaving it, and striking only one-half from the body.

There was no indecision, no fear, no remorse in the action of the woman who seized the limp figure and drew it in through the window with one vigorous movement of her steady arm. There was no hesitation in the rough voice which gave the cry to which the fifth robber responded. Into the limbs, stiffened by years of labour, a new strength was creeping. The thin blood of age was leaping and dancing like the hot torrent which courses through the veins of youth, urging it to desperate acts of heroism, or of evil. The wrinkled face of the old servant grew flushed and eager; her dim eyes sparkled. The smell of blood was in her nostrils, and they quivered like those of a wild beast. Her thin lips parted over the toothless gums in a smile of hideous cruelty.

The lust of murder was upon her.

The sixth head fell with its horrible, heavy sound beneath a terrific blow from the avenging sword, and angrily, as one impatient of delay, Anne snatched the body of the man roughly by the belt, and flung it violently behind her.

"Cuckoo!" she cried at the window, and her voice was like the growl of an enraged brute.

This time, the head put through the window was instantly withdrawn and a murmur of hushed voices ensued.

The woman within stamped on the ground in her impatience.

She thrust her foot forward. It touched some soft, heavy object. The headless body of a man. She kicked it furiously. Then, as the murmuring continued and the delay waxed longer, she became possessed of rage, and fell to hacking with the sword in her hand in all directions—to the right, to the left, wherever she thought a body lay.

Wait! Suppose it might be heard from without. Anne paused in this drunken carnival of blood, sobered by the fear that the seventh victim might escape her. She turned again to the window. The voices had ceased.

A head was thrust through the opening.

"Are you all there?" whispered a cautious voice. "Is everything all right?"

The woman with the uplifted sword feared to answer, thinking her voice, so near him, might betray her. She had grown cunning in even this short madness that had come upon her.

She bent forward with incredible swiftness, and, before the head could be withdrawn, she seized it firmly by the hair. The man uttered a stifled oath, and struggled to free himself. He might as well have battled with an avalanche. The crazed creature twisted her hard fingers in and out of his hair, dragging his head down inch by inch, and so holding him, as a child might hold a doll, with one hand, she swung her weapon high in the air, and struck off his head with the other. But the body, over-weighted on the outer side of the sill, fell headless into the street.

A shriek of horror rose from the almost paralysed watcher on the Keizersgracht.

It was answered by a howl of triumph from the frantic and bloodstained woman within.

"Seven! Seven!" she screamed. "Seven heads! And they are all mine! all of them mine!"

The man fled for his life.

The sound of his flying steps came faintly—ceased altogether.

The storm had died, and suddenly the moon came out, shone down on the waters of the canal—turgid and troubled—on the dripping trees and the river of mud running along the Keizersgracht, looked in at the unshuttered windows of the cellar, and flooded it with light.

There lay a heap of headless bodies, with the blood streaming from their necks, and from a dozen gaping wounds, dealt by some weapon and with terrific force. Seven heads, all with wide-opened eyes, in which a vague presentiment of terror seemed dawning—all save one, and that was but half a head, smitten from its other half, which might be found clinging to the limp neck of a disfigured body.

Digitized by Google

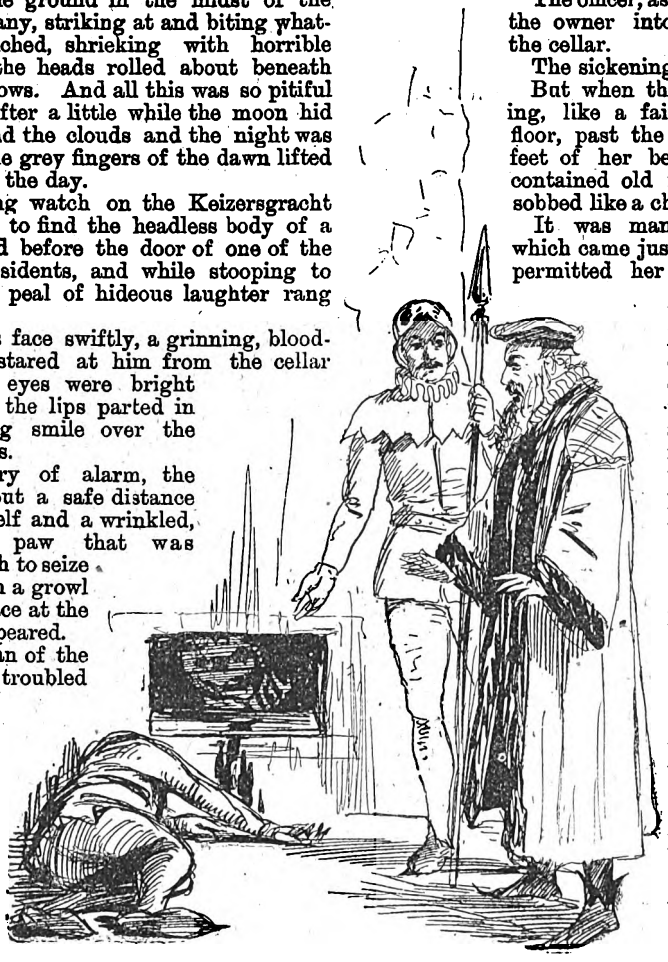
This, too, the moon saw—a little, mad old woman, laughing, chattering, crying to herself, who stared about her with unseeing eyes when first the moon looked in, and then suddenly seeing all, gave way to frenzy, cast herself on the ground in the midst of the ghastly company, striking at and biting whatever she touched, shrieking with horrible laughter as the heads rolled about beneath her furious blows. And all this was so pitiful to see that after a little while the moon hid her face behind the clouds and the night was black until the grey fingers of the dawn lifted the curtain of the day.

The morning watch on the Keizersgracht was horrified to find the headless body of a man stretched before the door of one of the wealthiest residents, and while stooping to examine it a peal of hideous laughter rang in his ears.

Turning his face swiftly, a grinning, blood-stained face stared at him from the cellar window—the eyes were bright and cunning, the lips parted in an unmeaning smile over the toothless gums.

With a cry of alarm, the good officer put a safe distance between himself and a wrinkled, bloodstained paw that was stretched forth to seize him, and, with a growl of rage, the face at the window disappeared.

The guardian of the peace, greatly troubled and disturbed, was about to hurry to the town to seek assistance in unravelling the mystery, when a heavy travelling carriage rolled into view, and he recognised the equipage of the owner of the house.



He pointed to the corpse.

He waited its approach, and, when it stopped before the door, which covered this unknown tragedy, he advanced quickly to meet its occupant.

With a few words of explanation, he pointed out the corpse stretched before the house, and, at the same moment, attracted by the sound of the wheels, Anne's scarcely-recognisable face appeared at the cellar window.

At the sight of her master, who stared at her with an expression of mingled wonderment and horror, she gave a bitter, incoherent cry, and great tears forced themselves from her eyes, and, mingling with the blood which bespattered her face, formed two red and muddy rivulets, which ran heavily down the furrows of her cheeks.

"Anne! Great Heaven!" exclaimed the master.

Then, suddenly regaining his self control, he turned angrily to his servants, who had huddled behind him.

"What are you doing, standing there? Why do you not open the doors? Come, get out your keys."

But in spite of his firm and angry tones, he shuddered as his gaze fell on the ghastly corpse before his door, and the poor distorted face which looked out above it.

The officer, ashamed to betray hesitation, followed the owner into the house, and followed him to the cellar.

The sickening spectacle unnerved both men.

But when the poor, mad creature came creeping, like a faithful dog, over the bloodstained floor, past the mutilated bodies, to kneel at the feet of her beloved master, the pompous, self-contained old merchant broke into weeping and sobbed like a child.

It was many days before the lucid interval, which came just before the death of the old servant, permitted her to tell the whole terrible story.

In her fevered ravings she had betrayed her sufferings little by little, but towards the last the delirium left her, and at the close of one bright autumn day, when the rays of the setting sun lay across her bed, she opened her faded eyes, clear at last of the terrible hallucination which had possessed her mind ever since that awful night.

Her master was summoned and stood beside her with her faithful hands in his, while hurriedly, all-unconscious of her heroism, she told him at what a price she had saved that which he had intrusted to her care. The end came that night.

And so in grateful commemoration, on the grim stone façade of the house on the Keizersgracht were carved the seven heads of the men who were slain in self-defence, and, in the protection of another's property, by the hand of a single woman.

Yes! although one of them was the nephew of the owner of the house, and had many times been made welcome beneath its roof; he, too, with the rest, was copied in death, and perpetuated in stone to the memory of a faithful servant. And all Amsterdam knows the legend. A. S. V. W

KEEP YOUR EYE ON THE BOOKSTALLS

For next week's issue of Short Stories, which will contain the opening chapters of Mr. George C. Wallis' new serial, "The Last King of Atlantis." It is the translation of a parchment discovered in the bed of the Atlantic by submarine explorers, and deals with the life history of Arnon, by turn, pirate, priest, sailor, soldier, courtier, and king.

It is an excellent story in every way, and is well worth following up.

Digitized by Google

THE TURN OF THE TIDE.

The short autumn day was closing in fast as a girl stood at the door of a private studio in one of the side streets off a main thoroughfare in London, watching the retreating figure of her shabbily clad model till nothing but the echo of the weary steps came back through the fading light.

As the last sound of them died away, a man strode rapidly up the street towards her.

"Come in; it's cold outside. I thought you might have been here before this," she said, with a fresh light in her face, as he stopped beside her.

In a few minutes they were sitting over their tea by a crackling fire.

"You are silent to-night—what are you thinking about so deeply?" said the man playfully, putting his hand under her chin to see the better into the face he knew so well.

"I was thinking of my model, she looked so thin and ill, and seemed so tired and forlorn. Do you know lately, since I have had you, I feel so sorry for everyone who is lonely or unhappy."

"Dear little girl," he answered fondly, "it is nice of you to feel like that, but we cannot make everyone happy, or, were it possible, I know you would do so."

"Would not you also?"

"Yes—yes, of course."

She sighed. "Well, if I cannot make everyone happy I hope at least I may never make anyone very unhappy. I don't think I ever have yet. Have you?"

"What nonsense you do talk, child. Why do you ask?"

"I don't know. Except that, much as I care for you, I sometimes see something in your face which warns me that you could be hard and even cruel. Remember, I know so little of you really, though we are to be married when success arrives. Oh, when will that be!"

There was a pause, during which his eyes, wandering over the various sketches pinned against the wall, were arrested first by one, then another of them.

In a minute she went on: "Perhaps it is an indiscreet question, but tell me, have you ever cared for anyone before, as you care for me, now?"

"Not as I care for you, dear," looking at her bright eyes, near his own.

"Am I really the only girl you have ever asked to marry you?" she persisted.

"No."

"Oh!" and she paused again. "You have been engaged before, then?"

"Yes."

"What became of her—did she die?" lowering her voice.

"I don't know. No. I never heard that she died. But don't let us talk of all that," he went on quickly, "it was over so long ago—before I knew you, or had even seen your dear face."

He was gazing with sudden interest at a sketch opposite where they were sitting, of water, and sky, and little else.

"What is that? Surely it is a new acquisition? Where did you get it?"

"Which? Oh, that. Did I never tell you—it is such a curious story. But, you see, when you are here everything else seems to go out of my head."

She fetched an old portfolio from a corner of the studio and then, pushing a footstool beside his chair, settled herself on her lowly seat, and began:

"That is the rough sketch from which that marvellous picture, 'The turn of the tide' (you remember it?), was painted, which was in the Academy some years ago. By-the-bye, did you notice what a long price it fetched the other day on being resold by its former owner? It was a wonderful piece of art."

"Yes, but how on earth did you get the rough sketch of it?"

"You remember I wasn't very well a short time ago, and went over the Border for change and rest? Well, by an odd chance, the place I pitched on was the very place where that picture was painted, and the cottage I took, the very one in which the lady lived who painted it."

"Lady! Impossible! It was too masterly a style to be a woman's."

"So I thought. But I know now who the lady was, and a good deal about her. I made friends with an old woman in the village, who, knowing me to be an artist, one day offered to sell for a few shillings this portfolio you see, which, she said, had belonged to a former tenant of the cottage I had taken, and who had been a great picture maker, as she called it, like myself. Taking my 'find' down to the beach I found a flat rock to sit on, and began my investigations. I confess at first I was a little disappointed at discovering nothing more than some rather crude sketches, though with a certain latent power in them, evidently the productions of a beginner, more or less, and all dated some ten years previously.

"I was just shutting it up when I espied a curiously-concealed flap, out of which I drew two objects. This," holding up a thin manuscript book, "and, to my surprise, the sketch of the picture I remembered so well, and had admired so much—for was it not that day at the Academy which began our acquaintance?—and, suddenly, holding that drawing so, in my hand, I recognised the broad waters and sky stretching away before me as the original of the picture."

Digitized by Google

There was a short silence before, in a lower tone, she added:

"And then, with the gorgeous sunset flaming in my eyes, and the 'weird chuckle' of the gulls in my ears as they fought and chattered on the mud-flats below—for the tide was going out fast—I learnt something of the life that had been lived out in the lonely cottage before I came. It was always very quiet down there—only a few barefooted children sometimes paddled in the water after sundown, when the tide was out as it was then."

The shadows gradually deepened in the untidy studio as the girl began reading a few extracts from the manuscript book by the leaping firelight, the man's hand resting tenderly on her shoulder as she read:

"'March 26th, 1886.—Passing up from the little wayside station over the bit of common-land, no one would guess that just beyond the fringe of weather-beaten pines edging the land and half hiding the wide sheet of water, there nestles close under the cliff a little old cottage amid the straggle of trees, having its foothold on a projecting tongue of land. The trees hide it, and also hide from its inmates' view everything but that which lies directly in front of it which is, water at high-tide. water and mudflat at low tide, twice in the twenty-four hours, and the hills beyond that and the sky beyond and over all.

"'When the water comes weltering in it is as though the cottage were built on piles in its midst; the sea-mews, and gulls, and black scarts, float on its calm breast; the sun sinks in all its wonderful glory of colour over yonder hills and is reflected in ethereal beauty on its shining surface. And then, as the waters recede, leaving rivulets between the islets of mud, the gulls are there, again screaming and chattering and laughing in the weird and desolate way that only gulls can, in lonely places.

"'This is the spot to which I have drifted after the fever of life is spent. Here is peace. In my little cottage by the silent waters, I can pile up the wood on my own hearthstone, and the smoke, curling upwards, adds its brown to the colour of the rafters above, which have upheld the roof over generations who have come and gone; all with their manifold joys, and sorrows such as mine—but perhaps over none quite so lonely as I.

"'It is three years to-day since I left the old life and set up my household gods here. And in the early winter twilights, as I sit by my flickering firelight, they speak of the departed grandeur—gilded grandeur, which crumbled like dry-rot at the first breath of trouble; and now I am glad of this shelter, literally from the storms and winds of heaven, where I am beholden to no one, paying my way with honest coin of my own earning and not with money to which I have not the slightest right.

"'I wished, when I came here, to cut myself off completely from everyone I had known before, and have done so, except in my dreams and recollections. Their photographs are around me, but troubles and poverty have come between them and me. Sooner than linger on, despised and barely tolerated, I have preferred to be as one dead, with the struggle towards fame as my goal. Life could not well be lonelier, and yet it is not altogether unhappy. I am my own mistress at last, and there are no petty jars and frets. I can sit over my handful of fire and be warm. I have my piano and can play the dear old airs I love so well, in the quiet dusk of the summer evenings when the roses are nodding at the open windows, and the salt breeze floats in to mingle with my pot-pourri in the old china bowl beside me. My books and my sketches are around me. I am alone, but the ghosts of the past are always close at hand to keep me company.

"'Sometimes, the remembrance of him and the most bitter humiliation of my life comes to upset my content, though I try to persuade myself that a love which could not face even the reflection from disgrace for its beloved object, was of little worth, but yet I loved him so, and it was all I had, all I ever had in a life that has been so full of sorrow.

"'April 12th.—It is coming! I feel it, I know it. I shall make a great name, a new name, to redeem the old, which was disgraced through no fault of mine. To-day my picture, "The Turn of the Tide,"—was it not well-named?—has been accepted at the Academy. To me it will justify its name. Dear little cottage, how I love you, for you have brought me fame.

"'May 8th.—Yesterday I went up to town. My picture is well hung, and there was quite a crowd round it, an admiring crowd. He was there, talking to a young girl as once he talked to me, looking down into her eyes as once he looked into mine, but his eyes were even more tender than I remember them; and his mouth more cruel.

"'May 28th.—Fame is very sweet. I have had a more than generous offer for my picture, and more than generous criticisms in all the papers. Can I part with the former? Poverty is a stern master. I must. But my little rough sketch—never. I will hide it where no one will find it, so that I may not be tempted by any high price which might be offered, and when I am dead I hope it may fall into the hands of someone who has loved me and can understand the thoughts that were with me as it grew under my fingers.

"'The artist who is painting in this old-world place, was here to-day to congratulate me on my success. I often see him; he is the only friend I have here, or, indeed, anywhere else. It always rests me to be with him—he is so gentle and thoughtful when I have one of my restless, unhappy fits. I sometimes wonder if I am growing to depend too much upon his never-changing sympathy in all my moods. I shall miss him, I confess, when he flits south as he will do when the summer is over, which even here will not last for ever.

"'June 10th.—My artist has been here this evening, as in many past ones—I feel almost young again. He has asked me for that which I thought I had long ago given away completely and for ever to someone with beautiful eyes and masterful ways and a cruel mouth—my love.

"'But is it not preposterous of me to dream of such things? I have begged for two days in which to look into my own heart.

"'I have not been feeling well lately. It must be the result of the excitement of success coupled with the unusual heat we have had for so many weeks. I am so tired, too tired to think any more to night. Good-night, dear gulls, I need not be lonely much longer if I choose.

"'June 12th.—He has been and is gone. At last, at last I am happy! Is is not wonderful to be able to say that? I know that I love him, and I cannot doubt that he loves me, and we are to be married next month, and fight the world together.

Digitized by Google

"'I wish that the pain in my side hurt less. I have promised him to see a Dundee doctor to-morrow about it. But I shall be all right when the cool weather comes. I am happy, quite happy. How sweet the roses smell to-night, and the waters are asleep, and the moon-beams are playing on its untroubled breast I hear only a faint sigh from the trees upon the shore—even the gulls are asleep.

"'JUNE 13TH.—Can it be only twenty-four hours since I shut this book—only twice that the little rivers of water have run in between the cushions of mud impressed with the trident marks of the sea-birds feet? That is all that separates life from death.

"'I went to see the doctor and he told me, very kindly certainly, but inexorably, that he can do nothing for me. Had I gone to him some months ago it is possible he might have been able to prolong life, but that, as it is, he gives me one month! One month in which to live out my life and bid my good-byes, but that I am not to suffer much pain, not until quite the end—thank God for that.

"'I have thought it all over as I came home, and I shall make no visible change in my daily life, nor shall I say anything of this to him who was to have shared the life that is ebbing so fast. Nothing can be done; before the end, when the pain comes, I shall send him away on some pretext or other and on his return—where shall I be?

"'JULY 4TH.—How did I bid him good-bye? The evening has been divine. We sat on the flat stone facing the hills, down on the beach. Everything was very quiet, and we waited there till the sun sank, and the line of dim blue hills was all that divided the opal sky from the opal water; up from the streaks of green and yellow, blue and orange, rose the sepia rocks like a small archipelago of islands. The indescribable beauty of it all wrung my heart. Up behind, in the fir-wood, some youths and maidens were laughing and shouting. Their voices floated down to us on the rock below the bank. They sang a hymn together, and the notes seemed to rise and fade at last into that changing vault of colour above and to die away in the golden glow, at the very gates of heaven. Far, far away a tiny boat crept slowly along under the purple hills.

"'Ah, how the gulls cry! I look out of my little casement-window and see the flicker of their snowy wings glancing in the ghostly moonlight as it sleeps on the mud-flats and shines in the narrow streaks of water. The pain, the pain, how shall I bear it, alone——?'"

The firelight died down. The girl's voice faltered in the quiet studio.

"There it ends," she said, "I suppose she died soon after. There is only her name, not the one she was known by in the Academy catalogue, but I suppose, her real one—after those words."

"What is that?"

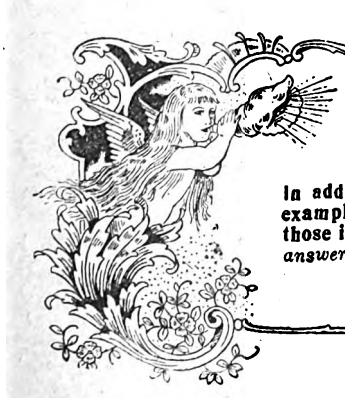
"Marian Dacre."

The man's eyes gleam, his hand shakes like a leaf as he hastily lifts it from the girl's bowed shoulder, his lips are pressed together tightly. But no word escapes him. Only, before he leaves, he says: "There is something in what you have read which takes my fancy—may I have it? I believe I could make something out of it as a story."

* * * * *

Before the summer is over, "The Turn of the Tide" has run through two editions, lifting its author—a man with tender eyes, and a cruel mouth—high and dry into the land of promise, whither he has taken his new-made artist wife, and together they are invited everywhere on the strength of his wonderful book.

VERNER FENTON.



POST-CARD COMPETITION No. 13.

On page 411 will be found two columns of figures. A guinea is offered to the reader who first forwards the correct total, and another guinea to the provincial reader who does likewise. In adding the figures together tot up each digit independently. For example, 12, 124, 79=26, NOT 215. Do not include figures other than those in the column—from 1 to 124. Post-cards only please; and only one answer allowed on each.

Digitized by Google

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY NO. 10.]

THE EVENING BEFORE.

(OUTSIDE Maud's house, and rather dark. Harry approaching.)

Harry (in joyous soliloquy): "Eight o'clock! At this time to-morrow we'll have been married just seven hours and a quarter. Jove! Doesn't it seem queer—and, delicious. I want to see her once more—tell her how much I love her—hear her say how much she—uh! Eh! Confound you; take care where you are going!"

Indistinct figure (which has collided with Harry): "Beg pardon, sir, but I couldn't see. We're putting up an awning frame out here."

Second indistinct figure: "Hi, there; look out for your toes." (Drops heavy scantling almost on Harry's foot.)

Harry (somewhat discomposed): "This is jolly, I vow." (Rings.)

Servant (opening): "Well, you are here at last, are you? Oh, excuse me, Mr. Spooner. Thought it was the man with the——"

Voice (over banisters): "Has he come, James? Tell him——"

Servant: "It's Mr. Spooner, ma'am."

Voice: "Oh! It's only Mr. Spooner, Maud. What can have become of that man? Now, Maud——" (Voice recedes.)

Harry: "Hum!"

(Enter down the stairs, with a dove-like swoop and rustle, Maud, all smiles and happiness at seeing Harry.)

Maud: "Dear!"

Harry: "Oh, Maud."

Maud (staying Harry's impassioned rush): "No, not here, you reckless boy! Don't you notice that carpenter? He's fixing the——and, oh, my darling, I don't know where to take you, for, you see, the florist is at work in the parlour, and then——"

Harry (hopefully): "The music-room?"

Maud: "The presents are displayed there."

Harry: "The dining-room?"

Maud: "No; the caterer's men have possession of that, and the women from madam's are in the library and all my things are being packed upstairs, and——"

Harry (sarcastically): "Perhaps the kitchen——"

Maud (quite seriously): "It's a perfect pandemonium!"

Harry (same): "Or the stable?"

Maud (same): "Why, Patrick says he can't ever stow away—you're laughing at me, you wicked—but I'm simply wild to-night with all this bother—oh! papa's little studio! But it's a mass of confusion, for everything not immediately wanted is put there."

Harry (aside): "Just the place for me, then." (They enter.)

Maud: "Now, dear, we'll have a nice, delightful chat; for, as you know, we've only seen each other four times to-day, and I've so many things to tell you."

Seamstress (opening door): "If you please, Miss Maud, would you step upstairs? That back needs to be fitted again, and——"

Maud: "Oh, Harry, you can't think what trouble we've had with that dress. When it was sent home we found that—— Coming, mamma!" (Exit).

(Harry comtemplates ceiling with what patience he may for ten minutes, when re-enter Maud.)

Maud: "That's settled. Now, to begin again. It's so sweet——"

Maud's mamma (entering hurriedly): "Maud! Would you—oh, good evening, Mr. Spooner!—would you put all those light things into the tin box or the little sole-leather? I think perhaps we'd better——"

Maud: "Any way you like, mamma—I don't care." (Exit mamma.) "And, as I was saying, Harry——"

Bridesmaid (outside): "I'm awfully sorry to disturb you, Maudie, but won't you please come out here for an instant? I don't quite understand how I am to——" (Maud slips out, remaining some time, while Harry listens to the following):

Maud, The bridesmaid, the bell, and various voices: "There's two dozen, I think, of white silk—lilies for the arch over the door—ding! ding!—where's James?—in the bottom of some trunk, I'm sure—if those are roses, bring 'em here—and drive tacks through the dead centre of every one—ding! ding!—Mrs. Smith's compliments, and she sends—three cakes of toilet soap—so please pack the handkerchiefs in—a salad-bowl or soup tureen—for there aren't bags enough to—flavour the creams—and your Paris hat is put—in the ice-chest, where it ought to be—ding! ding!—you must see the floral bell; it's made of—one hundred chicken croquets, sprinkled with—Mr. and Mrs. Snyder's best wishes, mum—and set off by—four dozen dessert spoons—and the minister's fee—tied up in a brown-paper bag!"

Maud (re-entering): "Oh, Harry, isn't this awful?"

Harry: "Well, we'll be at peace now. Come, one little kiss——"

Maud (shrinking away): "Ow!"

Harry: "What is it? Oh!" (Before him stands a messenger-boy, silently holding forth letter.)

Harry (petulantly): "I know well enough what this is!" (Reads letter and tears it up.)

The messenger-boy: "Any answer, sir?

Harry: "No! Off with you. (Exit boy.) You see, Charley has never been best man before, and he's frightfully nervous about it. This is the fifth note to-day from him. He's asking whether he shall wear a white scarf or a pearl-grey one like mine! Let him wear both or neither or none at all, and be hanged to him!"

Maud (tearfully): "Oh, now you're getting cross—I shouldn't think you would—and I don't blame you, it's so exasperating! I've been going through it all day, and I'm just t-t-tired to—de-death——"

Harry (remorsefully): "Poor little girl! There! There! forget all about it, and we'll talk about something else. There! There!" (Brief bliss, broken by voices).

Voices: "Maud! Miss Maud! Maudie!"

Maud (springing up): "Oh, dear, it's no use! Just hear them!"

Harry (in despair): "Well, I'll go. But——"

Maud (tenderly): "But remember, dear, that I love you just as much as if I weren't so awfully busy—getting ready to prove it!"

Digitized by Google

FIGHT PLAY.

A Comedy off the Stage.

By G. Manville Fenn.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A True Wife Speaks.

Another edition of the evening paper had come out, giving the correct news this time, and an apologetic editorial note after three asterisks, regretting the slip that had been made; but Olive had long before this known the real state of the case.

Lady Braetoun, the senior, was prostrate in bed at her son's house, wildly hysterical still, and under the care of her own special doctor, with Olive's maid to attend, for her daughter-in-law had shrunk from her in horror and shame that she could not define, so strange and confused were they in her agonised state. For it seemed to her that she herself was somehow in fault, and that the mother would feel a kind of hatred against her for her son's misdeeds.

There was a peculiarly hard, stony look in her eyes, and her face looked marble in its whiteness behind her thick veil, as she went silently down the stairs and entered the drawing-room, gazing at the heavy, bent figure in a chair, with its back to the window, elbows on knees, and face buried in his hands.

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

At last she glided more than walked to its side, drew a deep breath, and softly laid a hand upon the bowed down figure's head.

"Father!"

Emsworth started up as if suddenly awakened, and gazed at her wildly for a few moments before he could speak.

Then, as if grasping the meaning of her being dressed, he caught at her hands, as he cried huskily:

"Olive, my darling! Oh, my poor child!"

Then his hands dropped to his side, and he shivered in his misery and anguish, for she shrank from his touch.

"Yes; quite right," he said hastily. "You are ready to come away. This is no longer a home for you."

"Father!" she said, in a low, deep voice little above a whisper, as she fixed her eyes on his, and instinctively he winced again, and his eyes vacillated and fell before her stern judicial gaze, which seemed to read his every thought.

"Yes, yes," he said; "I have had a cab waiting. Let us go at once."

She did not seem to grasp his meaning, or to hear it, and she said in the same cold measured way:

"You must have known of all this and hidden it from me."

"My darling! The report was false, and as soon as I had heard the truth from Murray I came on to try and spare you the agony that I knew it must cause you."

"But you knew—all that Lady Braetoun told me in her misery and despair, while she thought that her son was dead."

"Olive, my child!"

"Don't speak to me—for a minute," she said, as she pressed her hands to her temples, "I cannot think. Something like a black cloud keeps coming over my brain."

"Yes, you are suffering terribly; but come—come with me—home, at once,"

"It has gone again," she said, with a piteous sigh, and as if speaking to herself. Then aloud, and in a low, sad tone, but full of bitter reproach: "You must have known—all this. Why did you leave me to find it out in this cruel way?"

"Olive, my own darling," he whispered imploringly, "I believed him to be a manly, upright fellow who had been, as so many are, a little wild. God help me that I should have to speak to my own child like this! How could I foresee that he would behave to you as he has?"

Digitized by Google

"But you have known of that for some time now?"

"Yes," he groaned, as he looked at her as if asking for mercy.

"Why did you not tell me? Why did you let me go on believing as I have believed till awakened from my dream as I have been to-day?"

"Olive, my darling, be merciful to me," groaned Emsworth. "How could I, as your father, come to you and strike such a blow at your faith and love as would make you hate me to the end?"

She stood gazing at him as if her brain was once more numbed, her power of thinking paralysed, and, trembling and ghastly-looking, the old man softly took her hand to raise it reverently to his lips.

That touch seemed to break the ice, and with a wild cry she threw her arms about his neck, to burst into a hysterical flood of tears.

"My own darling! My own little one!" he whispered as he drew her closer and closer to his breast. "Yes, cry—cry, the tears will relieve you. Don't—don't be angry with your poor old father, whose one thought these many years has been to make you happy, and always will be. You shall come home at once with me, and we will go right away and try to think of it all as a bad dream. Law—man and wife—curse all such laws! They shan't stand between us, my darling. Come, can you bear to rest on me again? It is your father, Olive. You can trust him, dear, even if he did hide the truth."

She made an effort to draw herself up, but flung herself upon his breast again and kissed him passionately.

"Where is he?" she said at last.

"Where is he?"

"Yes; take me there at once. I can bear it now. The black curtain seems to have gone."

"Take you—take you there?" said Emsworth, looking at her aghast.

"Yes. I ought to have gone before—directly, but I felt as if I had had some dreadful blow, father, which stunned me."

"Olive, my own darling!" he cried, "you must not—you shall not talk like this. I cannot bear it. You are everything to me—your mother and my child in one. But there, pray don't talk like that. Come, let us go at once."

"Yes, to him, dear," said Olive gently, and she returned his caresses. "They say it is a woman's lot to suffer, dear, and I am going to try and be strong. There, it is all past now. I do not blame you, dear. I have nothing to forgive."

"But, my darling, it is impossible. You cannot go to him now."

"Cannot go?" she cried, flushing slightly.

"No; he has forsaken you and chosen his path. You shall choose yours, and that is along with me."

She shook her head sadly.

"Let him have the place—everything. You shall take nothing away but your own self, the treasure he could not value, and that I shall claim once more as my very own."

"No, dear; no, dear," she whispered, as she nestled to him; "he is my husband."

"He has broken every tie."

"I swore to cleave to him, and, because he forgets his oaths, shall I forget mine?"

"You shall not be weak and foolish," cried Emsworth passionately.

"No, dear, I will be neither; but he, my husband, lies dangerously injured, and am I at such a time to forget the duties I owe him?"

"To such a man—yes."

"No, no, no, dear. I must go—I ought to have been there long ago. It is no time to think of his trespasses now. Come, take me to him quickly, dear."

"I cannot, I will not, Olive; it is madness."

"My heart says no, father. I tell you I must go."

"But do you not see, dear? How can you go there at such a time?"

"By my right to act, father, as his wife. Take me there at once."

It was no longer the gentle, yielding girl who spoke, but the firm woman, in whose eyes were reflected a will stronger than his own, and in place of angry opposition he feebly protested with a gesture.

"Come," she said, taking his hands, and without another word he suffered her to lead him down to the hall, a loud whispering coming through an open glass door, and telling that the servants were assembled below to discuss matters.

The next minute father and daughter were being driven towards Brompton Square.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Facing Temptation.

A pretty-looking maid, very smartly dressed, and whose eyes were red with weeping, opened the door, and stared at the strangers, who pressed forward to enter. Then, recovering herself:

"What is it?" she said. "Missis can't see visitors. The doctors are here, and someone's very ill. Can't see nobody."

"There, my dear," whispered Emsworth; "you hear. Come back. It is better so."

Olive did not seem to hear his words, but stepped forward, and the girl involuntarily gave place.

"Take me to the room where Lord Braetoun is," she said sternly.

Her manner mastered the girl, but she made another attempt.

"But, please, ma'am, there's two doctors with him, and missis said I was to let nobody in."

"Where is he?"

"In the drorin-room, ma'am."

Olive gently pressed her aside, and passed on to the little staircase, upon whose landing, beneath a stained glass window, a number of pots of gay flowers had been roughly thrust aside, and lay broken and crushed as they had been since Braetoun had been carried up from the fly in which he had been brought to the door, and as Olive mounted the stairs there was a quick rustling sound of silk, and, pale, haggard, and dishevelled, Lucy stood upon the landing to bar the way.

Face to face again, Olive with the light from the stained glass window glorifying her pale features, Lucy now in shadow, and for some moments they stood gazing wildly at each other.

Lucy was the first to break the silence by drawing a long, deep gasping breath, and speaking desperately now in her effort to be firm.

"What do you want?"

"Where is Lord Braetoun?" said Olive coldly, and she took another step upward.

"Ill, very ill—with the doctors," panted Lucy. "You must go. No one can see him now."

"Stand aside, please."

"No, no," cried Lucy passionately. "The doctors will not even let me go in."

"Let me pass," said Olive sternly, and she pressed forward till they nearly touched.

"I will not," cried Lucy in an angry whisper. "It would kill him. You cannot—you shall not go."

Olive spoke in a stern, low, unmoved tone of voice, as cold and unimpassioned as her manner was irresistible.

"I must see him—I am his wife."

"Yes," whispered Lucy, as she stood her ground, "and you cannot love him, or you would not risk his life at a time like this. You shall not go."

For answer Olive stepped forward on to the landing, and, in spite of herself, Lucy gave way with a shiver of dread.

Digitized by Google

But, as Olive ascended the second flight, the girl recovered herself, and bounded up after her visitor, caught her by the dress, darted by, and faced round again at the door, across which she stretched her arms.

"This is my house," she cried. "This is infamous. You shall not go in. It will kill him, I tell you. Stand back."

At that moment the door was softly drawn inward, Murray appeared, and as he closed it after him Lucy was fain to give way.

"You here, Lady Braetoun?" said Murray, with a look of pity and surprise.

"Yes. My husband—tell me."

Murray made no reply, and a passionate sob came from Lucy's lips.

"You have killed him—you have killed him!" she wailed.

"Hush! There must be no noise or excitement here," said Murray sternly. Then, with his voice full of the emotion he felt: "Lady Braetoun, this is no place for you."

She darted an angry glance at him.

"Take me to my husband, Doctor Murray," she said haughtily.

"It is impossible now," he said, recovering himself.

"Impossible? I must—I will see," cried Olive, in an angry whisper. "You are in league against me."

He raised his brows a little, and then, speaking more sternly:

"A doctor has but one thought, madam—to save his patient's life. My colleague and I are fighting to do this, and any interruption may prove fatal. No one can see Lord Braetoun now. Will you be good enough to retire?"

"No. It is impossible," she whispered. "Doctor, pray, pray don't you turn against me. You know all."

"Yes," he said, in the same low tone, and his voice was full of pity for the suffering woman by him, for every word sent a pang of misery to his heart. "Yes, I know all, but believe me, I am right. No one," he said, with emphasis, "can see him now, but I promise that you only shall be taken to his side."

She caught his hand in hers and kissed it.

"Now pray be advised by me, and leave this place. You are so short a distance from here, and I will communicate every change to you."

"I believe you," she said earnestly; "but I cannot leave here now. My duty is to stay."

"But I have told you that no one but the surgeon and a nurse can be in the room. Now I must return—pray, pray leave here at once."

"Yes. Go back to him now," said Olive, as she held firmly by the balusters.

"And you will go?" he whispered anxiously.

"No," she said firmly. "No: I shall stay. My place is here."

Murray made a sign to Emsworth at the bottom of the stairs, and he came up and stood on the landing close to where Lucy was leaning against the wall, one hand on the paper, the other crushing a bunch of lilies pressed in the corner half behind a curtain.

"You have heard what has been said, Mr. Emsworth?" he said, in a quick, irritable manner.

"Yes, every word."

"Kindly exercise your influence with Lady Braetoun, and ask her to return home."

"Hush! Do not speak to me," she said, turning her face to the door, and gazing at the beflowered panels as if she would pierce them through.

"It is of no use, Murray," whispered Emsworth; "I can do nothing."

"You must have been mad to bring her," said the Doctor angrily.

"Bring her, man! She brought me."

"But I cannot leave her in this situation. For Heaven's sake get her away."

"Tell me how," said Emsworth bitterly, and he turned to look at Lucy, as if there might be some solution of the difficulty.

At that moment the door was softly opened, and the white cap of the nurse appeared.

"Doctor," she whispered; "come, please, quick!"

Murray hurried in, and as he was closing the door a low, deep groan fell upon the listeners' ears; and as Olive sank upon her knees with clasped hands and laid her head against the panel, Lucy uttered a low, sobbing cry and turned her face to the hall.

Emsworth looked from one to the other, and then, after listening for a few moments to the creaking sounds he heard, as if the two attendants were changing the position of their patient, he laid his hand upon Lucy's shoulder, and then placed his arm about her little waist, for she was evidently on the point of fainting.

"Let me help you downstairs," he whispered.

She turned upon him resentfully, then with a low moan sank helpless upon his arm, and he bore her down to the passage, where the maid was waiting.

"Fainting," said the old man abruptly, "where am I to lay her down?"

The maid opened the door of the little dining-room, and as Emsworth bore her in a piteous voice from a lounge said softly:

"That you, my dear? Oh, how long you've been!"

"Please 'm, it's missis, and she's fainting.—Lay her on the sofy, sir, and I'll fetch some water,"

"Oh, dear; oh, dear," came in a groan; "my poor darling, and me not able to help her! Is that the doctor? My arm's as if it was red hot."

Emsworth was busy arranging his senseless little burden on the couch, and hardly heard the words, while the next minute the little maid was back with a glass of water.

"You please go now, sir. I'll soon bring her to, I'm used to faints."

Emsworth obeyed without a word, and the door was closed after him as he went softly up to the landing, where he could bend over Olive where she knelt.

A good ten minutes elapsed before the silence was broken again, and this time by the re-opening of the drawing-room door, and Murray stepped out, Olive now shrinking away, and holding up her hands to him as if in prayer.

"Much calmer now," he said in answer to her appealing look. "Now, Lady Braetoun, pray be advised. Go back with your father, and wait patiently for the news that I will send you every hour."

"Are you going to stay with him?" she said quickly.

"Yes; I will not go away."

"Ah!" she sighed, and there was again silence, and her father took her hand.

"You heard what Murray said, my dear," he whispered. "Come, be a brave, little woman. You can do no good, you see, so let's go back."

"Father, dear," she said imploringly, "I am suffering; don't, please, make it worse. I have told you. My place is here. Do you think I will give it up to another now?"

"I wouldn't say a word, my own, but it is impossible for you to stay."

"In some people's eyes," she said, with a pitiful smile. "I am going to prove that it is possible, for I will not stir from here till I am allowed to go to Roderick's side. My husband, father."

"Ah—h—h!" cried Emsworth between his teeth.

"It is his time of greatest need. It would be too horrible to leave him now."

Emsworth looked helplessly at Murray, and he bowed his head.

"Everything must give way to my patient," he said. "Take possession of the place and see that your child has proper attention."

This to the father. He turned then to Olive.

"One word," he said gently. "For your father's sake—for yours—I give up everything, and if Braetoun's life can be saved it shall be done; but there must be no excitement, no such encounter as that we have had."

Digitized by Google

Once more she caught his hand and hysterically held it to her lips long enough to send a thrill of mingled agony and pleasure through every fibre of the strong man's frame.

"I will obey you like a child," she said in a trembling voice, "but I must, I will, maintain my place here. Promise me that you will bring me to his side as soon as he can bear it."

She waited, but it was some moments before he answered, and she looked up wonderingly in the grave eyes so full of love, reverence, and pity; but she could not read the first, as he said softly:

"I promise you," and he hurriedly turned and once more entered the room to find his colleague bending over the prostrate patient, the nurse passing out to fetch something needed.

"I wanted you back," he said in a low whisper after an uneasy glance at the door. "You had better speak low, or they will hear, as I could hear nearly every word. Sad case. I pity the poor wife; but she will soon get her divorce."

He gave Murray a meaning look, and a spasm made the listener's face contract. It was instantaneous, and he was listening to the surgeon once again.

"I am going to ask you to spare me for two or three hours, or, if you can give up the time, till the morning, for I have three important accident patients whom I must see. Shall we leave it like this—that if you want me I will come at once?"

"Yes, I will send for you."

"Thanks. I have no one I can ask, or would ask, to go to my people, and it is not just to them to stay for this case. You are, of course, an old friend?"

"From boyhood."

"Ah, yes," said the surgeon, looking down at the motionless form stretched out upon the mattress. "It is a pity—young, of so good a position, with such prospects. But, there, I am not going to moralise; the world is the world, after all. I'm his surgeon, not his judge."

"Then you think——" began Murray, looking at him searchingly.

"Think, my dear sir?" said the surgeon, with a shrug. "Yes; don't you?"

Murray let his eyes fall to the pale, bandaged face, and made no reply.

"You see, as I said before, if he were some robust young fellow, with a constitution, we could have another operation and give him a chance; but anything more than we have done would be fatal, eh?"

"Yes, fatal," said Murray, "at once."

"Yes, at once. There, I will go. I'll come directly, then, if you want me; but a few hours, I suppose——"

They stood gazing in each other's eyes for a few moments, and then Murray was left alone, gazing down at his old companion, who was breathing feebly, his eyelids slightly apart, and cheeks and temples already assuming a terribly hollow look.

And as he gazed, he mused upon what had taken place. The surgeon's words, cynically brutal as they sounded, rang in his ears: "She will soon get her divorce." How soon? In a few hours; and then she would be free!

He went down on one knee, and with the delicate touch of the experienced practitioner, softly raised the eyelid and gazed into the eyes in turn.

A matter of a few hours and then the bright, clever man, the brilliant fellow-scholar of their old days, would be motionless for ever, and Olive freed from the trammels of her unhappy marriage. Free—and then?

He suffered an agony in those brief minutes, for the old temptation came back. It was as if his evil spirit were sneeringly asking how he could be such an idiot as to trouble himself about this worthless being. He had done a physician's duty by him, and prolonged his wretched life, as it was, for years, even to his own misery and despair; while now it was pretty well all over, the case was hopeless, his colleague gave him up, and he must die.

Murray rested on one knee, gazing down at the pallid, shrunken face, changed so rapidly since he was stricken, and self gave way to a higher feeling—the clever student of Nature's mysteries asserted itself, and Roderick Braetoun as he lay there was no longer the man who had caused him an agony of despair—no longer him whom he had, as it were, led to Olive Emsworth's feet, but the suffering patient, one whom it had been the study of his life to try and save from ill. This surgeon had spoken truly when he said that he was weak, and justified in looking upon the case as hopeless; but he was a stranger to the sufferer; he had not studied Braetoun's constitution, and treated him again and again. Why should not he, Allan Murray, with the knowledge that he grasped, make a great, a daring effort, and bring him, as it were, back to life, if not health. It would be almost a miracle, but science was achieving miracles now—at least, such triumphs as the people of a hundred years ago would have looked upon as marvellous.

"I might, perhaps, I might," he muttered; and he softly placed his hand upon the sufferer's breast, and then started and turned sharply, for he had been too intent to notice the quiet opening of the door, and had felt a consciousness of being overlooked.

It was so, for the nurse was standing there watching him.

"Go down and wait," he said in a husky whisper; "I will ring when I want you."

The woman looked at him strangely, but turned and left the room without a word.

Then like a cold chill came the thought of what he was going to do, from his own personal point of view—strive to save the life of his greatest enemy.

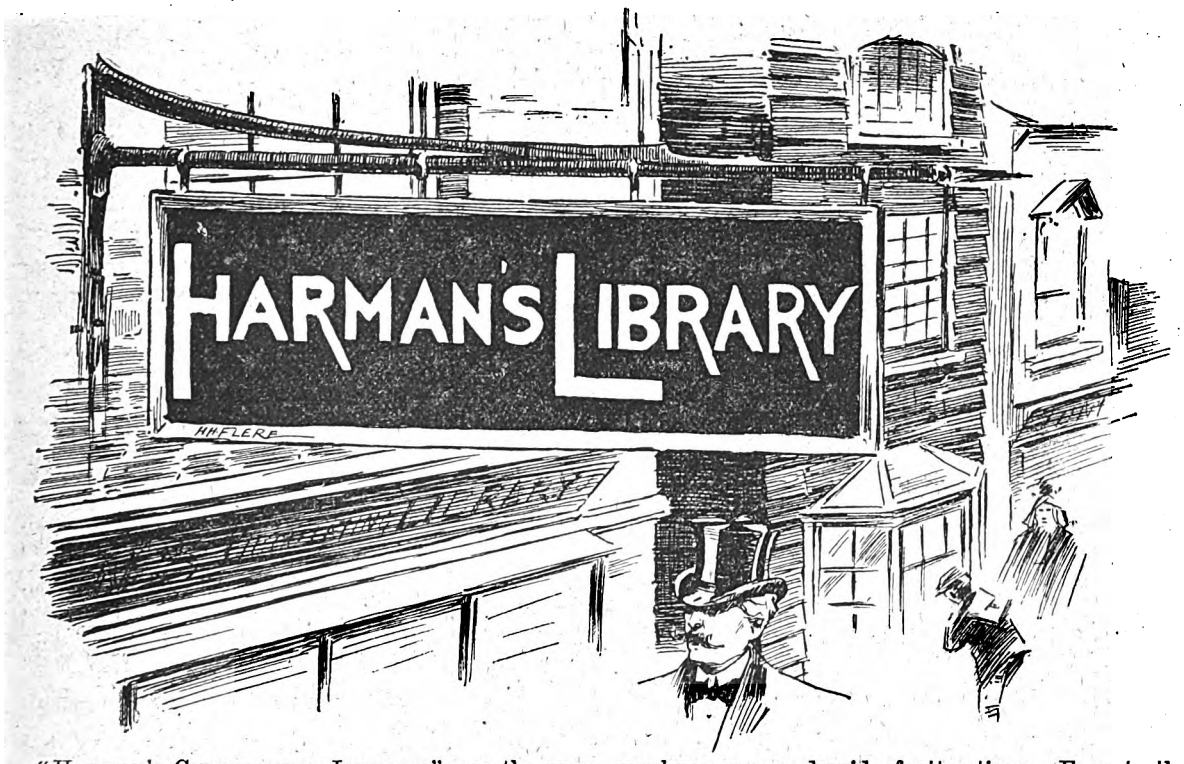
Something whispered to him that it would be madness. If he let Braetoun quietly pass away, a year hence matters might be so changed; Olive might be looking smilingly in his eyes, and he would be knowing true happiness in the love of one of the sweetest women who ever breathed.

The temptation was horrible. He felt that he must succumb.

(To be continued.)

Rudyard Kipling's new serial, for which he is being paid more than a shilling a word, starts in the Christmas Number of Pearson's Magazine.

Digitized by Google



"Harman's Circulating Library" was the way the sign read under the little window.

Properly speaking, it should have been "Miss Harman's Circulating Library," but the lady considered anything feminine unbusinesslike, and so she eliminated the "Miss."

The library was kept in a small shop with one window. The window was large for the size of the room, letting in plenty of light, and so making the place cheerful.

The walls were lined with shelves, and on them stood the books, each volume neatly covered with brown paper, and its name boldly printed with a stub pen on the back.

Down the middle of the shop was a counter on which rested a glass case containing stationery and religious photographs.

Although the library was composed of little besides novels, old and new, good and bad, Miss Harman was a very devout woman. She did not at all approve of novels in such excess, but then, as she very truthfully remarked, without them the library would never "circulate."

There was a room at the back of the library where Miss Harman supplied herself with the necessaries of life, and a room over it where she slept.

She looked upon her surroundings with much pride and satisfaction, and was quietly happy in her own way.

Happiness, after all, is a very relative matter. Miss Harman had struggled bravely through deep waters and found great bliss in being quiet.

She had been educated for a public school teacher, had taken a position in a primary school, met a Dr. Richard Rand at the house where she boarded, and fell in love with him. It is but just to say that Dr. Rand had first fallen in love with her, for Miss Harman was by no means devoid of attractions. Even to the casual observer she was pleasing, with a strong, earnest face, pretty eyes and soft brown hair that rolled back from her forehead in a kind of curl.

Dr. Rand was a young physician, with an extremely limited practice and unbounded energy. His patients were all among the poor, many of them he treated out of charity, and matrimony seemed a long way off.

Then came a dreadful time of sickness among his people, in their crowded streets and houses. A terrible, loathsome disease that all fled from. The young doctor worked like a hero, and died like one. His patience, and courage and kindness will never be written of; his deeds of charity are forgotten, no doubt by those who benefited most; for man at best is an ungrateful animal.

Only one faithful heart worships his memory.

When he was stricken down Miss Harman went to him. She was alone, and he was alone. She had no fear of idle tongues, so she stayed by her hero. She had the comfort of his last words, she followed him to his grave, and then, after she had cried until there were no more tears to shed, she sat down and tried to think what she should do for a living.

She felt herself totally incapable of going back to the public school; she wanted something that would give her more time to herself.

After many trials and disappointments she got the position of companion to an old lady, who was a little deaf and nearly blind. Miss Harman used to look at her and wonder if she too would grow to be as helpless and lonely—only too poor to have a companion. The idea of marriage never occurred to her. She felt that such a thing had become impossible for her from the moment she had stood, a silent figure in black, that bleak March day, by the open grave, and listened to the sharp, quick rattle of the earth, as it fell upon his coffin.

Digitized by Google

She believed in all sincerity that her heart was dead and buried.

The old lady in time became warmly attached to Miss Harman, and, dying, left her a little legacy as a token of friendship.

The legacy was not enough to live on, though it was a great help. Then it was that she opened her circulating library.

"Ain't a boy," said the mite.

It was not in a fashionable part of the town, but mostly surrounded by lodging-houses and small shops. The lodging-houses were filled with students from the university, whose ambitions were great and incomes meagre; the shops carried on every variety of retail trade.

Miss Harman was thirty-five now, and the soft brown hair was showing streaks of grey, which made her look much older. Her eyes, though still her point of beauty, had lost their brightness, sorrow and tears had dimmed them.

Thirty-five! When you think of it, that is comparatively young, even for a woman. Thirty-five and in perfect health; possibly thirty-five more years before her, and no one to live for but herself.

To be sure, she interested herself in the people about her, and was often helpful in time of trouble; but at the best this was only an outside interest. She wanted someone to love who belonged to her. Finally, Fate, who is not always so kind, interposed and gave her what her heart hungered for.

Directly opposite the library was a lodging-house, and in its first floor front lived a Professor from the university.

He was the ideal Professor—completely absorbed in his studies and entirely neglectful of all that pertained to the ordinary affairs and the business of life.

He was always alone; being of an extremely shy and reserved disposition, he had never got further, in a social way, with any member of the university than "Good-morning."

Any other man would have been miserable. Fancy not having a single person who knew you well enough to call you by your first name! The Professor's name was Richard—Richard Blair—and it must have been a long time since anyone had called him "Dick."

One afternoon in May the Professor came slowly home from the university. Usually he was a rapid walker, but to-day there was something in the spring sunshine that made him loiter and carried his thoughts away to green pastures and babbling brooks and shady woods.

The memory of certain days in the country, long ago, came back to him—of blue eyes and bonny brown hair, and a gracious presence, making the world a glorious place to live in.

From force of habit he stopped at the right house and mounted the steps. At the top he was brought from dreams to reality by a small figure that suddenly rose up before him. A tiny bit of humanity that stood, directly in his pathway, weeping bitterly. It had been many years since the Professor spoke to a child, and he was doubtful how to begin.

Just as the silence was becoming embarrassing he thought of a formula he had heard used with effect on such occasions and began hesitatingly: "Don't cry, little boy," and as an afterthought: "Run home to mother."

"Ain't a boy," said the mite with a sob. "Mamma's gone."

This information left him helpless, as he had exhausted his suggestions, so giving the child a penny, he went in.

But he was not to get off so easily, for she followed him; and when he turned, after entering his room, he saw her standing in the doorway.

"Run home, little girl," he said, beginning to feel annoyed, "your mother will want you."

"Mamma's gone," she repeated, and then walking up to him she laid her rosy little cheek, all streaked with tears and dirt, against his hand.

"Pet me," she commanded.

The Professor's intercourse with children was extremely limited, and "petting" them an art unknown. He lifted her up in his arms, however, and that seemed to answer, for she at once laid her golden curls upon his shoulder, and sighed with satisfaction.

"Now sing," she said.

Then it was the Professor realised the seriousness of the situation. He rang for his landlady, and told her how he found the child.

"Yes," she said, she knew her. "She was an orphan, poor baby—her mother had just died. She was going to be put in the 'asylum.'"

The woman came forward to take her, but the child threw both her arms round his neck.

"No, no," she sobbed. "Mamma's gone. I like you. Stay here. Shall stay."

There was no doubt about the clearness and conciseness of her remarks.

The woman stood waiting—of course the child must go—but the tiny arms clung warm and tight. The Professor hesitated, and "he who hesitates is lost."

"Let her stay," he said, "for the evening."

He ordered supper to be brought to his study; he stirred the fire, and put on fresh coal, for the evenings were still chilly, and then he drew up his easy chair, and the mite climbed upon his knee as naturally as if she had been doing it all her life.

Digitized by Google

After looking at him gravely for a few minutes she began abruptly: "My name's Jo. What's yours?" His eyes wandered over the golden head and into the fire beyond, where they rested.

"Dick," he said, half lost in reverie.

"Dick," she repeated, "Dick, I like you."

Soft, warm, lingering lips were pressed against his cheeks, and a responsive thrill shot through the Professor's heart. In an instant he saw his lonely life spreading out before and behind him, and with a sudden longing for love he folded his arms about the child who nestled close to him. From that moment till the end of their lives nothing ever came between them.

He paid Mrs. Toots, the landlady, for taking care of her, and when he was at home she always stayed in his rooms.

Her name was Josephine Burt—but everyone called her "Jo" for short.

She was a quiet child; giving the Professor very little trouble, and always content of evenings in his study, looking at the pictures he gave her, or talking to her doll. Having generally been in perpetual motion since early morning, by eight o'clock she would be sound asleep in one of his big chairs. Then Mrs. Toots would carry her off to bed, and it was entirely by accident if the Professor saw her again until the next afternoon.

It was during one of the many mornings, when Jo was left to her own resources, that she just made the acquaintance of Miss Harman.

The black cat brought about the introduction in a perfectly natural and informal manner. Jo saw the cat in the street and was so delighted with it that she immediately determined to have it for her own.

The cat evidently read her thoughts, and did not approve of them, for, as she advanced, he retreated until, the shop door being open, he was safe under Miss Harman's skirts.

With only her head visible above the counter, and the light shining through her dishevelled golden curls, Jo presented quite an angelic appearance. She looked to Miss Harman like a cherub's head on a Christmas card.

She speedily made known her earthly tendencies, however, with her usual abrupt conciseness, and explained to Miss Harman: "Jo want black cat."

"Jo want black cat."

It never occurred to Miss Harman to deny such an autocratic demand, and the cat, who was evidently a fatalist, yielded without cry or scratch.

Jo now looked about for some place where she could comfortably enjoy her new-found treasure, and, coming round the counter, spied the old sofa.

It was Monday morning, and Miss Harman was very busy. All the books taken out on Saturday night, for Sunday's reading, were being brought in; so Jo remained undisturbed, as no one ever troubled about her till it was time for the Professor to come home.

About midday she demanded her dinner, and they ate it in the room at the back of the shop, with the black cat seated gravely on a chair between them. Of course, Miss Harman knew who Jo was, but she wanted to hear her talk, so by way of starting the conversation she asked: "Who's little girl are you?"

"Dick's."

"Who is Dick?"

"Dick?" looking surprised and puzzled. "Oh! Dick is Dick."

Then seeking information in her turn: "Wha' 'ou cat name?"

"Dick," said Miss Harman, smiling.

Jo's eyes opened wide. "After my Dick?" she asked.

"Oh, no!" said Miss Harman hastily. "Another one."

Digitized by Google

The idea of another Dick in the world was too much for Jo to take in all at once, and she fell into deep thought on the subject. Silent pondering, when one's years are between four and five, is dull work, and presently Jo closed her eyes, and sailed away to the "Land of Nod."

Miss Harman carried her to the sofa, laid a shawl over her, and pushed up a chair to keep her from rolling off. Then, after a moment's hesitation, she carefully cut from its mates a tiny curl, and laid it away—in memory of one of her vanished dreams.

About six the Professor came back from the university—he had stayed late to do extra work—and asked for Jo. Then it appeared she was nowhere to be found, and had not been seen since the morning. For a moment his heart stood still with fear at the thought of losing his darling—his little girl.

He started out to ask for her among the neighbours, and the first place he went to was Miss Harman's, because it was the nearest.

She had been watching for him all the afternoon, and when she saw him coming, opened the door for him.

"Jo is here," she said, "she has been with me all day. Won't you come in, Professor?"

It was the first time they had ever spoken, and the Professor entered rather diffidently. Then from his superior height he caught sight of Jo asleep on the sofa with the cat beside her.

"Ah!" he said, with a sigh of relief, "there she is. I am much indebted to you for taking care of her, Miss Harman; I feared for a moment I had lost my little girl."

He lifted her up tenderly, wrapping the shawl about her with true manly indifference as to whose it might be.

Jo was awake in a moment.

"It's Dick," she said, with sleepy surprise, then, her mind going back to the early problem—"Dick, the black cat's Dick, too, and she says it's named after you." Instantly she was asleep again, but her revelation considerably embarrassed the Professor. Miss Harman came to his aid with the suggestion that Jo had been dreaming.

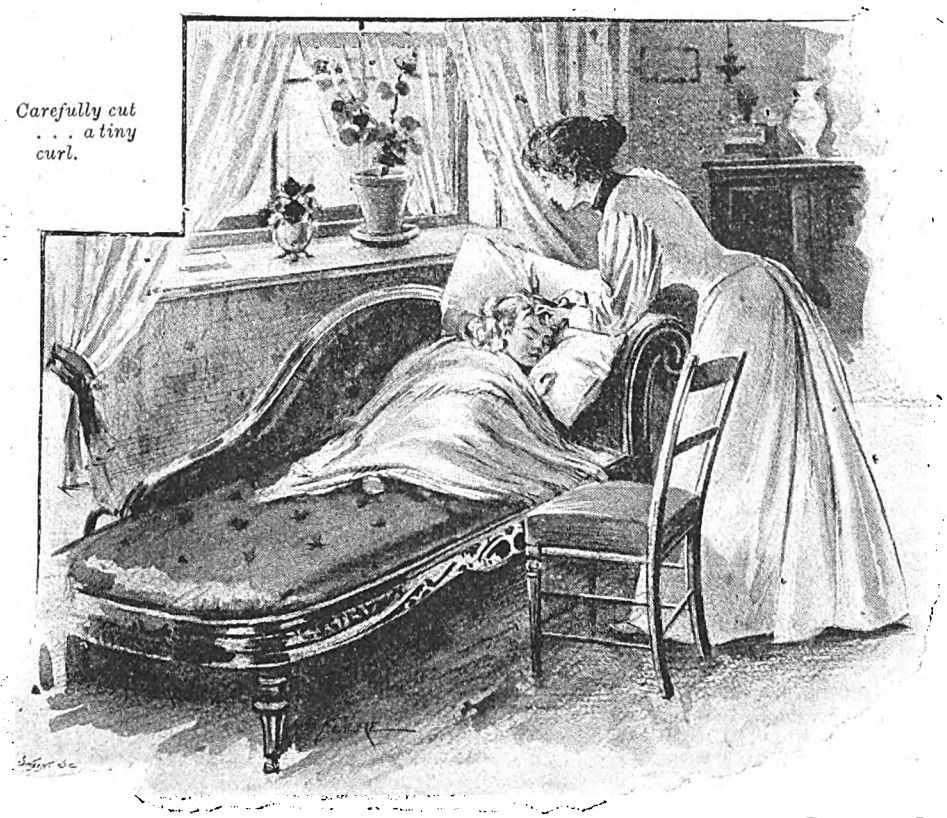
From that day a warm friendship sprang up between Miss Harman and Jo. The child had come into her life at one of the times when she was feeling her loneliness most keenly, and her whole heart warmed to her.

Every day Jo came to her. At first she only stayed to play, but as the weeks went by, her visits grew longer and longer, and Miss Harman fell into the way of sewing up rent garments and supplying missing buttons.

The summer drifted by, and everyone who had means or opportunity left town. Even a number of Miss Harman's customers vanished to "green fields and pastures new," probably to visit country cousins.

The Professor spent his vacation in reading and taking Jo for short excursions into the country. On several of these occasions Jo imperatively demanded that Miss Harman be taken also; but when invited that lady always pleaded attention to business as an excuse—much to the Professor's secret relief.

Jo, however, was a young person of great perseverance, and, having once made up her mind to a thing, was determined to accomplish it. By careful observation she discovered there was one day in the week upon which everyone seemed to be at leisure, Miss Harman among the rest. This day was called Sunday, and when it next came round Miss Harman was duly invited to go a-pleasuring with them.



Carefully cut . . . a tiny curl.

She had seen nothing now for weeks but dusty streets and glaring hot brick pavements. She longed to walk on green grass, under the shade of the trees in pleasant company, and so she went.

That was the beginning, and many other pleasant days came after. They were surprised to find how much they had in common.

As the autumn came on, the Professor got in the way of dropping into the library to take his little girl home, and often stayed to talk.

Digitized by Google

One day Miss Harman gained courage to ask him to let Jo live with her.

"You will see just as much of her," she said; "she will be safer with me, and I am very lonely."

"I, too, am lonely," said the Professor with a sigh, "but Jo has brought me many pleasant hours. I shall be very glad to have her live with you."

Thus it was that Fate was kind to Miss Harman and gave interest to her life. From that time on she lived only for Jo—and that young person—such is the way of life—always cared most for the Professor. He had comforted her in her first real sorrow, and his place in her heart was before anyone else; not even a lover, when she had one, being able to usurp it.

When Jo was about six she was taken ill with a fever. For nights the Professor paced his study floor, anxiously watching the window opposite, where Miss Harman sat by his little girl.

In time the child got better, owing to careful nursing, and was much the same as ever; but during those nights of restless watching a great change had come over the Professor. He had looked into his heart and found there a love of much depth and strength and tenderness for Jo's other guardian.

He raised her hand to his lips.

It took him by surprise, and he was rather inclined to struggle against it, but he soon recognised that she had become too much a part of his life to be lightly dealt with.

Now that Jo was convalescent, the Professor would go over to read to her in the evening. They made a very homelike picture in the little back room. Miss Harman on one side of the fireplace sewing, the Professor on the other, with Jo on his lap, and the table with a lamp between them.

One night, after Jo had yielded to the soothing influence of fairy tales and fallen asleep, the Professor laid her gently on the sofa, and coming back to Miss Harman, asked her to listen to him.

He told her of his youth, of struggling ambition and poverty, of a romantic dream of love, such as young men dream, that he had of necessity been obliged to put away from him. Of how his ambition had, in a measure, been gratified, and that now for years he had been well enough off in worldly goods, but the one thing to glorify life and to make it beautiful to live was denied him.

"There is yet a hope," he said, "that this great good may come to me, and I am asking for it now. It is your love."

Miss Harman looked at his kind, earnest face for a moment in silence, and then she gave him her hand.

"Professor Blair," she said, and she spoke softly, for her voice was full of tears, "it is useless to hope. What you ask can never be." For between her and the man before her rose another face, and she knew that too much of herself was buried in the past ever to be resurrected.

He raised her hand to his lips with old-time courtesy. "It was presumptuous of me," he said, "to expect it. Forget, if possible, all that I have said to-night and for Jo's sake, as well as mine, let our friendly relations be undisturbed."

The Professor went away for a week on business, so he said, and when he came back his life went on as if nothing had happened.

Sometimes, perhaps, Miss Harman wished things could have been different. So they lived on, side by side, each working for Jo, who went back and forth, making a link of sunshine between them.

MADELEINE BRIDGES.

Just the Book for Bicyclists!

"ON THE DOWN GRADE,"

BY MISS WINIFRED GRAHAM, Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," and other popular stories.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

Digitized by Google

THE REWARD OF COURAGE.

Acidalie, who was a woodcutter's daughter, had of course heard that happiness exists; but she did not in the least know where she should find it. It certainly would not be in the paths of the wild wood, where she often journeyed in company with her father, her shoulders bowed beneath the weight of faggots of thorn, her bare feet among the briars and stones. Neither did she know what it was nor what it looked like, although a secret instinct counselled her to believe that it had the appearance and manners of a good-looking young man, with a proud glance, clad like the son of a prince in blue or rose-coloured satin, brocaded with silver or gold.

"What!" said she to herself one summer morning, as she sat by the side of a road in the forest, "am I fated never to know happiness? And yet I was sixteen last month. If it delays much longer it will have nothing to do with me, for I shall be an old maid."

She grieved so bitterly that the pebbles in the pathway were touched, which is a rare occurrence; for pebbles, as a rule, are not very tender-hearted. They are the rather inclined to be ill-humoured, because they are always being trampled upon without having the power to complain. And little Acidalie did not cease to grieve.

Luckily for her, not far off, there was a good fairy presiding over the wedding of a glow-worm and a fire-fly. As soon as the ceremony was ended she turned to the woodcutter's daughter, and said:

"Come, little one, do not be in such despair. Happiness is never so near as when you think it is far away. Only look across the road. Do you see that young hunter, asleep, with a smile on his lips, under a great, blooming rosebush? He is the king's nephew! Although he has never seen you, he is thinking of you in his dream. Cross the road, go quickly, and sit down beside him. As soon as he wakes he will put his arm around your neck and he will take you away to his palace, where you will be the happiest of princesses." At this the good fairy disappeared.

As for Acidalie she did not stir at first, she was so delighted. Never, never would she have believed that there could exist on earth anything as lovely as the young hunter sleeping under the blossoming branches. At the thought of having him kiss her and take her away with him, she was ready to faint with joy. But she lost but little time over these agreeable ideas, and, tucking up her home-spun skirt in order to run the faster, she started towards the happiness that awaited her on the other side of the road.

Alas! in this forest there were not only good fairies, but also bad ones. It was something like life, in which evil is side by side with good. So a bad fairy, who was presiding over the divorce of a couple of butterflies, turned to the little girl and stopped her with an imperious gesture.

"You must not hope," she said, looking very disagreeable, "that things will turn out like that. What! Attain happiness by only taking a few steps? That would be, indeed, new and curious! Why in that case there would be nothing more delightful than the fate of men or women! I have no idea of such a thing happening. As for you, little one, know that you are not at the end of your troubles. Neither to-day nor to-morrow will you be the happiest of princesses in the palace of the king's nephew."

"Oh! madam, are you as malicious as all that? What displeasure can the satisfaction of a poor girl like me cause you? Anyhow, I have nothing to fear from you. As the good fairy told me to cross the road, no power can prevent me from doing so."

"It is true that one fairy cannot go against the will of another," retorted the fairy, "but she who protects you omitted, in the haste of her kindness, to specify the manner in which you should pass to the other side of the pathway. Go, hurry, run if you can; but look! high up in the air there is a thread of gossamer, trembling light, almost invisible, which stretches from an oak to an elm. Upon this you must walk to get across the road." And when she had thus expressed herself the bad fairy disappeared, not without a chuckle which frightened all the birds in the forest. Even the trillings of a black-headed linnet were suddenly hushed, as the babble of a spring might be silenced by one frozen drop of water.

Digitized by Google

At first Acidalie was unwilling to believe in her misfortune. She started again. Vain attempt. A mysterious power kept her on her own side of the road. It was impossible for her to take a single step forward; she could not even stretch out her arms to the happiness that was smiling in its sleep, so close to her, under the rosebush. Then she burst into tears. What! could it be possible? Was it really true? She would not be seated at the hunter's side when he should awaken, a moment later? He would not take her away, to make her his wife, in the king's magnificent palace?

She raised her tear-wet eyes to the thread of gossamer which stretched from the top of the oak to the highest branch of the elm. Alas! it was so fine, so delicate, ever ready to fly away in the breeze. A wren could have severed it with one stroke of its wing; it would have been a very tiny butterfly that could have alighted on it without breaking it. If Acidalie, having climbed the tree, should risk barely the tips of her toes on this quivering nothingness, she would fall upon the pebbles and break her bones; she would be found dead, covered with blood. Well! never mind: in spite of certain destruction, she would try the only path that offered itself towards the happiness which was so near and so far. Yes; small and frail as she was, ready to weep at the sting of a bee, she would have the courage to brave dreadful death!

She climbed the oak, reached, branch by branch, its leafy, whispering top, leant towards the thread—Oh! how afraid she was! how she trembled! But she only hesitated for an instant.

"Oh, you who are sleeping with a smile on your lips, under the roses! beautiful young man! dear happiness! good-bye, good-bye!" she said, "I have never known you, and I die for love of you. Good-bye! I will try not to cry out as I drop, for fear of frightening you. May the noise of my fall be so light that it will not awaken you from the dream in which you are thinking of me!"

Then she resolutely advanced; and you doubtless imagine that she fell to the stones through the air. Not at all.

Before she had touched the frail-moving whiteness she was changed, by the good fairy, no doubt—and this was the worthy recompense of her bravery—into the smallest of lady-birds, which ran quickly on its tiny feet along the gossamer thread from the top of the oak to the highest branch of the elm. But once across, she turned from an insect into a girl again, sat down by the hunter under the blooming rosebush, and the king's nephew put his arm about her neck, saying: "You are even prettier than my dream! Woodcutter's little daughter, will you be a princess in my palace?"

For so hummed the good wife's spinning wheel—it is in vain that jealous powers try to deprive us of the joys which are due to us. If one has enough courage to deserve the help of the good fairies, one never fails to reach the happiness which is waiting on the other side of the road.

H. Lucelle.

THE TWO SHEIKS.

During the reign of the Caliph Achmed II. there lived about two days' journey from the city of Bagdad, a venerable Sheik, whose reputation as a devout Mussulman extended throughout the entire kingdom.

His habitation was the mausoleum of a Hadji, whose origin was enveloped in mystery, and whose name had been lost to posterity; his memory, however, as a faithful follower of the Prophet was venerated by all true believers, and the odour of his sanctity was an everlasting monument to his many virtues. Many were the miraculous cures said to have been effected at his tomb, and worshippers from far and near were wont to make pilgrimages thereto in order to perform their devotions. Great numbers of them found relief from bodily ills, and many were the gifts the good Sheik received in testimony of their gratitude; the choicest of their flocks and fields, silks and other precious stuffs, and many purses of gold were laid at his feet.

He devoted his entire time to prayer and meditation on the mutability of human affairs, and his renown increased day by day.

The young dervish whom he had taken as a pupil, and whose duty it was to feed the lamp kept burning continually before the sacred tomb, praised Allah that it had been granted him to serve so holy a man; and whenever his duties permitted he could be found listening to the words of wisdom and instruction that fell from the Sheik's lips. His term of probation, however, being ended, he took leave of his master with many tears and soon after attained great renown in one of the neighbouring cities.

Now it so happened that the new dervish, whom the Sheik took as pupil and servant, was a most indolent and good-for-nothing fellow, whose sole ambition was a full stomach, and who, after serving ten years, showed no inclination to better his fortune, as his predecessor had done.

The Sheik thereupon addressed him thus:

"Allah Kerim, God is great! My son, it is useless for you to remain longer in my service; you have attained all the knowledge it is in my power to bestow on you! go, therefore, and seek your fortune in the world; I give you this ass to help you on your journey, and Allah and his Prophet be with you and grant you long life."

The dervish humbly kissed the hand of his patron, and taking the ass by the halter, led him forth, intending to mount him as soon as he had left the precincts of the holy place.

Alas! hardly had he gone a few steps ere he became aware that his companion was woefully lame and decrepit, and that it would be utterly impossible to make use of him. He therefore procured a stout cudgel from a neighbouring thicket, and with many blows persuaded him to continue the journey. Thus he drove him the entire day until well into the night, when suddenly the beast fell by the roadside and expired.

Digitized by Google

"Alas!" said the dervish, "what shall I now do? If I allow this miserable ass to lie where he has fallen, his carrion will in a short time pollute the air, and I, being a stranger, shall doubtless be thrown into prison and bastinadoed. I will therefore dig a pit and bury him here."

He then, with much labour, dug a deep hole, threw the body in, and having covered it decently, sat himself down on the mound to rest from his exertion, and commenced bewailing his mournful plight.

While thus lamenting and weeping, he noticed a body of horsemen, magnificently mounted and attired, riding rapidly in his direction, across the plain. Their attention was at once attracted by the dervish and the mound on which he sat, and upon arriving near by, they halted.

"Doubtless there were two dervishes," said one of the horsemen to the leader of the party. "One of them has fallen by the wayside, and his companion has buried him here and is mourning his loss."

This view of the case seemed to them so probable, and showed such devotion on the part of the mourner, that they dismounted and approached the dervish, offering words of consolation and sympathy.

"Allah be with you and give you long life!" said the leader, who was none other than the Caliph's vizier returning from a hunting expedition. "We see, with much sorrow, that you have lost your brother. I pray you console yourself and dry your tears, for, Allah be praised, we are true believers, and we build a mausoleum over the remains of your departed brother, who is now, doubtless, in the arms of the Prophet, and you shall keep watch over the sacred relics. Be of good cheer, therefore, and take no heed for the future."

The dervish moaned piteously for a few moments, and then looking up, with tears streaming down his face, replied: "Allah is great, and his goodness is beyond human knowledge; yet it is a terrible affliction, my lord, to lose one who has been my companion for these many years, and who in all that time has never given me a harsh word, nor have I ever heard him speak an untruth. Verily, he was a model of patience."

Only after much persuasion, and cheered by the thought that befitting honours would be paid the deceased, was the dervish's grief assuaged: and the party took their leave with the assurance that their promise would be speedily fulfilled.

In a short time a splendid mausoleum was erected over the mound; the eternal lamp was placed before the tomb, and the devoted dervish was installed as Sheik to keep watch over the remains. The faithful flocked in great numbers to the tomb of the new saint, and ere long it had become the most renowned mausoleum in the land.

The wisdom, knowledge and piety of the Sheik were extolled above all others, and many wonderful cures were performed. The blind were made to see, the deaf to hear, and the lame to walk, and in a short time the old Sheik, his former master, found that the rising glory of the new star was speedily eclipsing his own, and that the number of worshippers at his shrine was rapidly diminishing. He therefore resolved to visit the new Sheik, with the hope of acquiring some of the wisdom of which he had heard so much.

The journey was for him a long and weary one, yet he was sustained by faith, and at length arrived at the mausoleum. Who can, however, describe his amazement when he entered and recognised in the occupant his former servant and pupil, whom he had turned away in despair at his ignorance.

The recognition was mutual, yet neither gave any sign, and the young Sheik began to hope that age had so impaired his former master's faculties that he would not remember him. He therefore gave him the "musasir," or sign of salutation, and for several days they performed their devotions at the holy tomb.

One evening, however, as they were sitting alone, the old Sheik bent his head to the other's ear, and whispering, said: "May Allah grant you long life! Tell me, I pray you, by what change of fortune were you enabled to attain this greatness?"

And the other made reply: "My father, all that I am I owe to the miserable, lame and dying ass you presented me with when I left your service; this is his tomb, all merit belongs to him."

For a long time the old Sheik sat in silent meditation, stroking his venerable beard. At length, raising his eyes from the ground, he said: "Allah is great, and Mohammed is his Prophet! What you have told me is passing strange, for learn, my son, that under the mausoleum where I found so much honour and profit lie buried the bones of the sire of thy ass."

C. L. Breidenstein.

NEW CONDITIONS.

Jumbled Story Competition.

No. 13.

In order to lessen the amount of work undertaken by competitors in pasting up the separate lines of the story in these competitions, each line is now numbered, and all that readers need do is to write clearly on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order they believe to be correct. The title and author's name are jumbled up, and should be correctly given.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the reader whose solution first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Six Prizes—one of £5 and five of £1 each—are
5 September 28th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reaches this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose key is most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on 13 believe to be correct, thus:

Digitized by Google

THE NIGHT LORD TAGAWENGEN DIED.

Jumbled Story No. 13.

On a bright morning, early in autumn he was happy, but somewhat anxious.

On his face was the pleased expression of one which few tourists know?"

He was waiting for his wife.

A fierce struggle was raging within him. This laden man, whose mouth, and jaws, and nose turned at a trot from over the bridge, and came on his breast. Occasionally, he raised his hand to storm, a whirlwind of words.

The door opened, and his man came in, bearing a casket of jewels that he had prepared as a surprise when he encountered a group of peasants who were to mount the ascent. The guide approached his tray in his hand, with a note upon it.

He recognised immediately one of the occupants drew a revolver from a cabinet. He placed it towards him.

His wild laugh echoed down the mountain side. His face was very white. He gazed round the room he came to madame, and for a moment, during the many dangers; madame's head grew dizzy; and her hair. It seemed to stifle him. Ah, how well he were so horribly mutilated?

Madame smiled and nodded.

Then he drew the trigger.

His hand trembled, and the bullet did not reach his eyes.

Afterwards, three mutilated bodies in a confused room, after bringing the note, hearing the report of Dupois, and fastened it securely round him. Then opened it with trembling fingers. There was no life, everyone that he had ever known, and set out with a despairing look, noting every detail. Each standing on one of the Grindewald roads, waiting operation, his arms encirled her body.

* * * * *

Three years later he found himself in Switzerland. He stopped in the middle, and turned on the rest.

"Mother of God," he cried, "surely you have to wander over the face of the earth.

Occasionally he put out his hand, and opened a wound in the lower part of his face.

He loved the free life of the mountaineers, the rope from his shoulders, he approached Monsieur anxious to enlist as guides. Without pausing to make your own arrangements."

When, three weeks later, Monsieur Martigny spent with his wife. Finally, his eyes rested on the man and woman, who had robbed him of everything known in his old life. No one recognised him; who delivered them into my hands?"

With a groan he slowly crossed the room, and finally she fell almost senseless into the guide's arms.

Monsieur Salvator Martigny, painter, sculptor, who has done something magnanimous. He seemed steady.

"I trust," he would say, "that madame will find reason, he stepped forward and joined their number.

"She will not be long," he said continually to hate me, I can find lovers. In future, you may do so. She had left his house in the morning in a casket containing a superb tiara of diamonds.

Now, he was waiting for her return.

His man, who had but a moment before left the object reminded him of some happy moment he had almost enjoy. He saw many people whom he had himself. "Ten. Eleven. Twelve. Half-past——"

One morning he was wandering in the Grindewald, holding his wife to his breast, he sprang into the air. air suited him; above all, it would be something to this fellow?"

"What. An excursion which few tourists know? and a peace-offering.

Shortly afterwards the three set out together. What say you, little one, shall we trust ourselves to me now? I am your husband."

And madame his wife, at his side?

They climbed the rocky slopes to the foot of the floor, while the blood streamed from a horrible woman in his arms. Then he shook her roughly.

He could detect the faint scent that came from his brain.

Slowly, and carefully, each step planned before. They climbed the steep mountain sides, the strange mass, tied together by a rope, were found by the guide in front, with bent shoulders, and his head that he loved in life, were in his power.

Monsieur Martigny received it eagerly, and could have done so in the broken-hearted, grief-recovered consciousness he renounced his art, his hand, they ascended the glacier. They encountered peasants at the foot of the abyss.

He found his master lying unconscious on the side, and addressed himself to the gentleman.

"You scoundrel," he cried.

The driver of the calèche had slackened his pace against his head.

It was, indeed, to be hoped that madame would date or address.

Then suddenly, drawing the rope in close, and the revolver, rushed in again.

"Would monsieur like to make an excursion for tourists, when a calèche, drawn by superb horses, as M. Dupois.

"It would be wise, monsieur," said the guide, "if artist, sat alone in his salon.

"Wake up," he cried. "The time has come.

For a moment he gazed silently down on the glacier. On the edge they paused for a moment to we were now to attach ourselves."

He placed his pick against a rock, and taking his knew it.

Finally, he fastened the rope round his own Listen. I am Salvator Martigny. Do you know frightened man.

"Forward!" he cried, and his voice was firm and my peace offering acceptable."

It was written in his wife's hand-writing.

"I left your house this morning for ever. If you do. It was an experience, which, he found, he could waist.

Monsieur Martigny read the words many times.

Digitized by Google

BY MISS WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Author of "When the Birds Begin to Sing," "Through the Valley," "Six First-class Passengers," etc., etc.

PAUPER BLUE BLOOD.

CHAPTER XXVI.

IT ISN'T THE SAME!

"I AM going to Cairo for the season," said Georgina. "The Humpherys have asked me to go with them."

"Really," replied Sefton, not looking up from the book he was pretending to read. "All right, I'm sure I've no objection."

And that was all they said on the subject.

Georgina did not ask what he would do in the meanwhile, for the sole reason that she did not care. He might stay with the Macphairsons, and it would not give her a pang now. She had got over all that. Occasionally it troubled her that the Dowager Lady Ravenscroft had never once visited Ravenscroft Park since her son's marriage. "The recollections," she said, "would be too painful."

As Georgina thought of this, she concluded that she had been badly treated all round, and thirsted for fresh fields and pastures new.

It would be pleasant to stay away till the early spring, return when Ravenscroft Park was growing green again. For in spite of her troubles there, Georgina loved the old place more passionately than ever, especially since wealth had enabled her to deck it to her liking.

She was due at the Humpherys the day before starting, and having sent her luggage on with her maid, asked Sefton to drive her to the station.

He ordered his dog-cart, with one of the youngest and wildest horses.

"You know I dare not sit behind that brute," she said. "Take it back to the stables, and have it changed for something quieter."

"It's too late now, you will lose your train," he replied, springing into the driver's seat, and speaking impatiently. "Come along."

Georgina obeyed, greatly against her inclination, but, knowing her husband to be a first-rate driver, controlled her fears. He gathered up the reins, lashed the horse so that it nearly broke the traces, and galloped down the avenue.

Lady Ravenscroft was too taken aback to speak, till they twisted a corner sharply, narrowly escaping catching the wheel on the lodge gate.

"Do you wish to upset and kill me before I go?" she asked, "for it certainly looks like it. Anyone would think you were drunk!"

He did not reply, nor yet abate his speed.

"Stop and let me out," cried Georgina, suddenly panic stricken. "I've no wish to have my neck broken."

Her terror seemed to please Sefton.

"Oh! you are safe enough," he retorted. "Don't fear for yourself."

She dared not attempt to jump out while the cart was in motion, and her protestations were of no avail. It was with a prayer of thankfulness that she espied the station in the distance, wishing with all her heart she had gone comfortably in her brougham. Sir Sefton watched her alight, raised his hat, and saying he hoped she was not cold, drove away without waiting to see her off.

Cold indeed! Georgina was hot and panting with agitation.

"Why was he so reckless?" she asked herself. "He drove almost like a madman!"

She came to the conclusion it was a petty piece of spite, because she had demanded this small service from him. But her spirits rose as the train whirled her off to London. She threw care to the winds, and thought only of life's pleasures for the moment.

But Sefton dwelt upon her iniquities, which, during her absence, grew and multiplied in his mind, till occasionally he seemed swamped by an avalanche of Georgina's misdeeds!

While Lady Ravenscroft was enjoying the season in Cairo, Sefton received a letter from Douglas Shirling, announcing his engagement to Dolly Blandford, with the usual comment that he was the luckiest man in the world.

"I'm looking out for a place," he wrote. "We want to live in the country. I wish I could find something suitable in your part of the world, but there seems nothing on the market in that direction. If you hear of anything, you might let me know. Dolly and I both disapprove of long engagements on principle."

Sefton drew a long breath as he folded his friend's letter.

There seemed but one answer to it. "Ravenscroft Park!"

In all its beauty, in all its hideousness, he would let it pass willingly—thankfully—into his old friend's hands. What an ideal spot for those two glad souls, just commencing life together! What a miserable home to the fretful and unharmonious natures whom Fate had thrown mercilessly upon each other!

Digitized by Google

"Georgina's presence," he said, pacing the empty room, "has contaminated Ravenscroft Park enough, it is sacrilege that she should inhabit the old ancestral house! I will drive her out. On returning, she shall find I have placed it beyond her reach. For the last time she has set her feet in these doors. And here is my opportunity!" holding the letter aloft.

He wrote quickly, watching the clock to see if he had time to catch the afternoon post.

"Dear Old Boy,—A thousand congratulations. I know it is the wrong way round to put it, but Miss Dolly is jolly lucky to get you; she is marrying the best fellow in the world. Now, about your future home, I have found the very place for you; it is going cheap, too, as the owner is dying to sell. Come down the first day you can, and see over it. But I'm forgetting to tell you the name—Ravenscroft Park. Yes, I expect you will open your eyes, yet I am writing this in regular down right earnest. Of course, if the child had lived it would have been different. But, as you know, my domestic affairs are not very rosy."

"I wonder how Douglas will take it?" he thought, folding the sheet.

The letter caused a good deal of surprise at Ermyn Way, but Douglas Shirling was delighted. Of all the places in the world Ravenscroft Park was the one he coveted. The very next day he wired to Sefton to expect him, and though he was somewhat startled by the alterations made by Georgina he saw they need only be temporary.

"Of course, if you buy the place you will do away with all this tawdry gilt and painting," said Sir Sefton. "These wall papers are positively disgusting—my wife's idea of beauty!"

But he did not add that by no word or hint had he betrayed to the absent Georgina this idea of selling their home. She was completely and entirely in the dark. Now and again she sent him newspaper cuttings mentioning her name as being at various entertainments, but their correspondence was thus limited, and she never even knew if he received them.

He wrote to his mother, however, and broke the news that Douglas Shirling had made him an offer for Ravenscroft Park, which he was about to accept. It came like a thunderbolt in her calm, uneventful life. Though she had set her face against visiting Georgina, she still clung to the desire that Sefton should live in the place and keep it in the family.

She wrote him a most urgent letter, imploring him, if there were yet time, to reconsider his decision.

"I can't see that it makes much difference either way," said Eva, talking the matter over with her mother. "We never go to Ravenscroft Park now."

The girl spoke sadly, a yearning in her voice.

"But you don't want to, Eva; you could not wish to associate with that woman! She has brought nothing but misery upon your brother."

"Oh! no," with a little shudder. "Of course, I never liked her, but I should love a good prowl round some day by myself, over the old house and grounds. Now I suppose it will go, and we shall never see it again."

"That depends on Sefton's answer. I asked him to write at once."

The letter was anxiously awaited by both mother and daughter.

Sefton replied by return, telling them he had accepted Douglas Shirling's offer by word of mouth, but no agreement had yet been signed.

"If you knew," he wrote, "how wretched I am here, I do not think you would regret the place. Won't you come down with Eva and see for yourself? If, after going over the house, you still want to keep it in the family (though I have no heir), well and good; it shall be Georgina's to the end. But I fancy when you see the trace of her hand in every corner, and remember that her friends are the people that infest these bedizened rooms, you'll agree that dear old Douglas and his wife are fitter inmates."

"I shall go," said Lady Ravenscroft, "if only for an hour."

"It is a tiring journey from town, unless you stay," declared Eva, glancing at her mother's delicate, pale face.

But Sir Reginald's widow shook her head. She would not sleep a night under Georgina's roof even in her absence.

"We will go to-morrow, Eva," she said, "and you shall have your prowl."

The girl was delighted; she longed to revisit her old haunts.

The arrival of his mother made Sefton strangely nervous. He had a perfect terror of tears, and sadly feared she would break down as they passed the spot where her husband died. But the Dowager Lady Ravenscroft was quite self-possessed and calm. He noticed she averted her head as if not wishing to look, but that Eva glanced back several times while driving to the hall door.

They neither of them spoke, as they passed up the broad staircase to Georgina's outré drawing-room. Numerous photographs of herself in affected attitudes adorned the mantelpiece, and the sight of her face gave Sefton's mother a strange pang of pain. Eva was the first to remark on the alterations.

"It isn't a bit the same," she cried in a dolefully disappointed tone. "I don't like it half as well, do you, Sef?"

"No," he replied, "Ravenscroft Park is to me only a memory now; I love it no longer."

The sight of his mother there amongst Georgina's knick-knacks seemed like a ghost of his happy youth, before the blow fell.

Eva wandered round the room with a discontented expression, then out into the hall and passages, and up into the rooms she had inhabited in her childhood. The nursery door was locked. She rang for a maid to open it. But her old crib, kept in latter years for the benefit of dolls, had been taken away, and a disused cot that was strange to her, stood in its place.

"I suppose John Reginald slept here," she said, in an awed undertone, "the poor little nephew I never saw."

"Yes," replied the maid, "he died sudden, he did! But there! the servants do say as this is an unlucky place, and they don't wonder a child could not live in it."

"Then tell them from me," replied Eva indignantly, "that they talk a great deal of nonsense. I was born and brought up here, so was my brother."

With this convincing statement she turned away from the cot in which John Reginald had been foully murdered by his father's hand.

When she rejoined her mother, she found her leaning over a desk, in which Sefton unlocked a drawer, and drew out a large document. He took up a pen, and looked Lady Ravenscroft straight in the face.

"Here is the agreement. Have I your sanction to sign it?"

She bowed her head, and spoke tremulously, her voice vibrating with emotion.

"Yes, Sefton, yes, indeed!" Then she turned to the girl, and placed her arm lovingly round her.

"Eva is right," she said. "It isn't the same!"

And Eva thought, as she gazed wistfully up into the calm blue eyes, that her mother's heart was broken.

Sefton wrote his name with a flourish, flung done his pen, and stretched his arms with a ringing laugh.

"Done!" he cried. "By Jove! what a sell for Georgina!"

"Do you mean to say she doesn't know?"

"Rather not! That's where the joke comes in."

Digitized by Google

CHAPTER XXVII.

"Only for Life."

"Delightful, being so far away from England and getting the Society papers," drawled Georgina. She had cultivated her drawl on the voyage out, in imitation of a beautiful woman, whose natural fascination carried off what must necessarily have marred one less gifted. This latest form of slow and languid speech in Lady Ravenscroft occasionally drifted into a lisp, which proved singularly irritating and unattractive.

But on account of her money and position tuft-hunters and fortune-seekers continued to pet and spoil Georgina till her conceit and affectation knew no bounds. It had been rumoured that she was a divorcée, and she had even received several proposals of marriage on the strength of this assertion.

"Nothing wildly exciting," continued Lady Ravenscroft, turning the leaves of the periodical lazily and running her eye across the pages. "The usual gossip—weddings and long-waisted women in fashion-plate finery. Hulloa! What's this?"

In the last three words she dropped her drawl and caught her breath sharply.

Mrs. Humphery looked up to see Georgina's fingers trembling as she held the paper, her eyes dilating, while her colour came and went in quick succession. She devoured the paragraph without speaking, being in truth too dumfoundered to utter a word.

"What is the matter, dear? No bad news I hope. You look quite staggered!"

"Staggered!" muttered Georgina, rising to her feet, and clutching the page fiercely. "I should rather think I was!"

She breathed the words through clenched teeth, though her lips twitched nervously.

"I won't believe it! I can't!" she continued. "He would not dare to go to such lengths. It is impossible."

Mrs. Humphery's curiosity was now thoroughly aroused. She tried to take the paper from Georgina, but Lady Ravenscroft snatched it back with a hasty: "Listen; I'll read."

For a moment the print danced before her eyes. She placed one hand upon her forehead and cleared her throat.

"We hear with regret that Sir Sefton Ravenscroft has sold Ravenscroft Park, one of the oldest family estates in England. The fortunate purchaser of this ideal seat is the Hon. Douglas Shirling, second son of Lord Gatton. His marriage with Miss Blandford will probably take place in the spring, and he is to be congratulated on securing so charming a residence. We herewith present to our readers a picture of Ravenscroft Park, whose historical interest is known to all."

"Now," cried Georgina with tragic emphasis, "come and tell me if I am dreaming? Is this some horrible nightmare, or can you confirm with your own eyes that mine have not deceived me?"

Mrs. Humphery re-read the lines, and gazed upon the portrait of Georgina's home with a doleful shake of her head.

"No doubt about that, Georgy, dear. It's gone as sure as a gun! Your husband has taken advantage of your absence to make you houseless. I call it one of the meanest tricks that was ever played, and I feel it is all my fault for asking you to come with us. Thank goodness, Jacoby does not treat me like that."

Georgina felt paralysed, an icy chill crept through her veins. She did not realise till it was gone how much she prided herself on the possession of Ravenscroft Park.

"What will you do?" asked Mrs. Humphery.

Georgina started as if waking out of sleep. Then she folded her arms in a masterful manner, and replied:

"Go back at once, and tell him what I think of him!"

"Yes, but that will not give you back Ravenscroft Park."

Georgina moved to and fro like a caged panther, she was too furious to think of anything practical. Her wrongs were eating their way into her soul.

"I must return and demand the truth," she muttered. "Perhaps there is some mistake. How could Sefton ever face me again if he had done this thing, and after all the money I spent in improving his place! Oh! the ingratitude of husbands!"

"The average man," declared Mrs. Humphery, "is the incarnation of selfishness! In Jacoby I have an angel, a diamond of the first water."

"Oh! for mercy's sake don't talk to me of Jacoby's virtues now, unless you wish to drive me mad!"

"Who is taking my name in vain?" asked Mr. Humphery, entering the room.

Georgina poured forth her troubles, and asked him to find out how soon she could depart. Jacoby was intensely sympathetic, but protested against her leaving.

"It's too bad, just as we are having such a rattling gay time, and everyone is at your feet," he declared.

"Do not talk of gaiety to me; I am thoroughly knocked over by the loss of Ravenscroft. I could have borne anything better. Besides, it looks so bad for us, just as if we'd smashed or something. I can't think what induced Sefton to part with it, even though Douglas Shirling tempted him with fabulous sums. It is not as if money mattered, and what his mother will say is past my imagination. She'll never forgive him—never!"

Georgina's wrath increased as she dwelt on her husband's unexpected action. She nearly drove her maid distracted over the packing, finding fault with everything, and flinging herself on the sofa, demanded eau de Cologne and sal volatile. The Humpherys at last grew weary of her lamentations and perpetual self pity, involuntarily heaving a sigh of relief as they bade her good-bye.

Throughout the voyage Lady Ravenscroft's temper showed no signs of abating. She preserved a gloomy reticence, informing those who pressed their acquaintance upon her, that she had "something very serious upon her mind," and "required solitude in which to consider."

After this hint they left her alone, and she nursed her grievance day by day, until it was commonly said on board that Lady Ravenscroft had never once been seen to smile. Yet hers was the silence of extreme vexation and displeasure, more than actual sorrow.

She wired the news of her return to Sir Sefton, and the intelligence caused him some dry amusement.

"Great Scott, what a meeting ours will be!" he said. "She has scented a rat, and will return with her claws well displayed. Not that they are often hidden. But I care nothing for them now, since Ravenscroft Park is beyond her reach. I've paid back two blows for the many she has dealt me—the child and the house. I took them both from her. All good things go in threes. What shall my last move be, to wipe off the old score?"

Sir Sefton's eyes glistened.

He felt like a cannibal scenting blood as he fingered his wife's telegram.

Georgina felt strangely lonely when she arrived in England. Not that she had expected to be met by her husband. She came straight to London, and took rooms at the Grand Hotel, writing from there to demand an interview the following afternoon. Her excitement was intense as she awaited his coming in her private sitting-room.

Sefton was at his club; he dared not stay with his mother, knowing, in his calmer moods, that he was no fit companion for her or Eva.

He dreaded lest they should suspect the terrible chaos of his brain; see him in his darkest moments, devoured by an inward fiend, who swayed his actions and destroyed his will!

Georgina's summons brought joy to his soul. At last he had got the upper hand, and could triumph over her. He went, prepared for her fury, with scorn in his heart and a smile on his lips.

Digitized by Google

She did not advance as the servant announced him, but watched the door close in silence. Then she took a step nearer, the slouching step he had almost forgotten, and spoke in acid tones.

"What have you to say for yourself, Sefton? How can you account for selling our home during my absence, without consulting me? Have you forgotton that I spent hundreds of pounds on the place?"

"Shirling gave a long price," he muttered, his eyes flashing, "you have nothing to complain of as far as hard cash is concerned. He would not let me sacrifice Ravenscroft Park, as I would have done to get rid of it. Douglas is a straight chap, and he'll do credit to the old house, instead of bringing it to disrepute!"

"Then, money apart, what right had you to treat me in this disgraceful manner? I am your wife before all the world; in that position I claim your consideration. I demand justice. I have never disgraced you. I bore your sullen temperament uncomplainingly, till you outraged my feelings beyond measure, and declared war! Then I accepted the challenge and took up arms. We have fought—figuratively speaking—for the last year."

"Then can you wonder," he cried, "that my patience was exhausted, and the perpetual friction made me loathe and hate the house in which you were mistress? Are you surprised under the circumstances you have just named, that I thanked God when Ravenscroft Park passed into new hands? It's beyond the clutch of your greedy fingers—you can contaminate it no longer!"

His words seemed to stifle Georgina with fury, but she saw reproaches were useless, and divined a surer way of cutting Sefton to the quick. Drawing herself up to her full height, she laughed scornfully.

"You can take the place away," she cried, showing her even white teeth, "but not the name which is secured to me for life!"

The shot told. That bitter taunt burnt into his soul, rang in his ears, goading his unhinged mind.

"For life! Yes, for life, but only for life!"

Why should this worthless existence continue, that had brought a curse on the Ravenscrofts since the days of his father? Why should her poisoned breath flow on, to defile the air?

He checked this sudden rush of deadly thought with an effort. Mad as he was, he knew an attempt to terminate that life would bring damage to himself. He was still sufficiently sensible to realise his name was less sullied by Georgina bearing it, his blue blood less tarnished by her relationship, than if he were detected as a murderer. He restrained his wild desire to grasp her uncovered throat, for this consideration which alone allowed her to retain life and the name!

She saw that her shaft had made a profound impression, and congratulated herself accordingly.

"You are right," he said at last, "as Lady Ravenscroft I should have honoured you. God help me, I only remembered you were a Pluff!"

He turned sadly to the door with bent head, and slow laboured gait, like a man utterly broken, weighed down by sorrow.

"Why are you going?" she asked. "Have you nothing more to say? No comment to make upon the future? What is to become of me? Where am I to live?"

He put his hand to his forehead, as if these questions bewildered him.

"Wait!" he replied. "Give me time to consider. I will come again this day week. Then I may be able to talk over definite plans. Now my head is in a whirl. Let me go!"

He flung off the detaining hand she laid on his arm. It was the first time she had touched him since he entered the room.

Something compelled her to stand back, and watch him pass from her sight without another word.

Sefton returned to his club, muttering again and again to himself, "the name is hers for life!"

He sank into a low chair before the fire, and did not hear a friend who addressed him with some casual comment. He sat there for hours, lost to the world and his surroundings, as a man working out a great problem. His acquaintances gave up attempting to draw him into conversation as this silent mood lasted and increased.

After a time, however, a change took place. Sefton brightened up, surprising his friends by greeting them in the old light-hearted manner of his youth.

He was smoking and telling stories one night after dinner with Francis Stephens, a former friend, when he mooted the idea uppermost in his mind.

"I say," he began, somewhat hesitatingly, "you know I sold Ravenscroft Park."

"Yes."

"Well, I want another place. The fact is my wife's rather upset about it, and I mean to make up for the loss by getting, if possible, something that she will like even better. I had thought of an old castle which I might rebuild. I believe I've heard you mention some ruins near your shooting-box."

"Rather! I know the very thing for you, in one of the loveliest spots of Derbyshire. It's on my shooting—an old feudal castle. I can't imagine why some romantic-minded person has not scented it out before. The walls and turrets are there, and, with a little art, one of the finest castles in England could rise out of the ruins. If you would care to see it, my gamekeeper and his wife would make you comfortable at my box and show you the place. You can then judge for yourself of its possibilities."

Sefton thanked him warmly, and accepted his offer.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Georgina's Castle.

Sefton went to Derbyshire the following day and was apparently enraptured with the old ivy-grown walls. He roamed about the place like one in a dream, appearing especially fascinated by a turret, still in fair preservation, being well roofed in. The top room commanded a beautiful view, and from admiring the fair scene just bursting into early spring verdure, Sefton exclaimed approvingly at the old oaken door, which he moved slowly to and fro on its rusty hinges. It was in wonderful condition, the lock even answering to the mighty key.

"That is a fine piece of carving," said Sir Sefton, pointing to the panels.

"Yes, sir," replied the gamekeeper. "We often use this room for luncheons when shooting, though it's rather gloomy, the windows being so high and small."

Sefton returned to town jubilant, and kept his appointment with Georgina, entering the room smiling agreeably, his step light and his voice cheerful.

"Well," she asked, "have you anything worth telling me?"

"Yes. I have not been idle since this day last week. My future plans have formed and need only your approval to complete them."

He took her hand and patted it. His attitude surprised her.

"What—are—these—plans?" she asked uncertainly.

"Listen. I thought seriously over your words, Georgina, and came to the conclusion that I had not treated you fairly. I cannot get Ravenscroft Park back. I sold it in a temper, and must abide by my folly. For all that though, you shall not suffer. You must have a place—a home—worthy of you, and the noble name you bear. I have discovered a castle in Derbyshire, the beauties of which are beyond description. At present it is merely a ruin, but we will build it up together, and bury our past differences under its mighty turrets and lordly walls. Do you think this is possible, Georgina, my wife? Will you help me to raise my life to a higher standard? Will you mould two fallen edifices to their former stature?"

Digitized by Google

A gasp of joy broke from Lady Ravenscroft. She wound her arms about his neck, and kissed his lips. He felt as if a serpent were strangling him.

"Now you speak honourably," she said. "You have seen yourself in your true colours, and can pity me!"

Then clasping her hands joyfully, she cried:

"A castle, a beautiful castle. Oh! Sefton!"

"Yes, one in which you can make merry, free from the ghosts of our old sorrows. We will fill it with guests, and wake up to the joys of existence. When will you come to your castle, Georgina?"

"To see it?" she asked.

"Yes. It is on Francis Stephen's land, and he says we may stay as long as we like at his shooting-box. Suppose we go down together, remain a week or two, and get an idea of how we like the country."

"Lovely! It would be a chance of exploring the neighbourhood," replied Lady Ravenscroft, her spirits rising at the idea. She drew her husband to the sofa, and side by side they wove pictures of the long future, vague with unrealities.

When Sefton left he had arranged what train they should go by, and saw, as he bade his wife good-bye, that her eyes were bright with unshed tears. But they were neither tears of joy nor sorrow, only triumph, pride, exultation!

The journey to Derbyshire in no way fatigued her, for Sefton appeared in quite a new light, that of a devoted husband, anxious to please her every little whim.

They spent the evening amicably before a blazing fire in Francis Stephen's sporting sitting-room, and the following morning Sefton declared he would take Georgina alone to see the Castle for the first time in all its wild solitude.

"You can walk three miles," he said; "it's such a jolly spring day."

Lady Ravenscroft declared she would enjoy nothing better, and they started at a brisk pace.

Before they had gone far Sefton asked her to wait while he, on some trifling pretext, returned to the lodge. He met the gamekeeper at the entrance.

"We've changed our plans," he said hurriedly, "and are returning to London to-day. We want you to keep our luggage, as we shall be back again in a week or two. We'll find our own way back to the train after looking at the ruins."

With these words he bade the man and his wife good-bye, and hastened to rejoin Georgina.

They strolled through the beautiful scenery, talking of many things. The trees were bursting into bud; the birds were singing wildly for joy that spring had come.

"There! what do you think of it?" cried Sefton, when the first peep of the castle came in view.

Georgina broke into a run, almost childlike with excitement. "Beautiful! beautiful!" she exclaimed.

He followed her delightedly.

"Do you think you will be happy there?"

She nodded her head, too breathless for speech.

Together they explored the quaint old remains of that noble building, coming last to the Turret Chamber.

"Now you will see the view," said Sefton, pointing to the narrow slits of windows.

As Georgina crossed the room he closed the heavy oak door, and turned the big key. She was gazing in dreamy wonder at the space beneath the blue, when he leant over her, his hot breath fanning her cheek, his eyes dilating, and one fierce hand grasping her shoulder, while the other flung out into the mild sweet air a large rusty key. It whirled down—down—down! She watched it without grasping the meaning, and turned in questioning surprise to her husband.

"Did you see," he muttered, "it has gone, the key of Death and Hell? Escape woman if you can!"

Georgina read the awful truth in his look. With a shriek she rushed to the iron-clamped door, but it did not yield to her frantic efforts, only wild peals of mad mirth rang round the walls. The terrible reality crept over her, paralysing her limbs. Sefton had made exit impossible. She was locked away in this deserted castle, with the brainless horror of what had once been—man!

She staggered to the window, and screamed till her voice died with parched hoarseness, while Sefton listened unmoved.

"So this," he muttered, when she sank in a shuddering heap on the uncarpeted floor, "is the end of Lady Ravenscroft and her name! You wanted me once, do you want me still? Do you crave for me now that nothing can separate us? I bound myself to you from the first. I share your fate to-day. Together we have lived in a purgatory worse than death, together we will die in our castle, Georgina! How do you like the exchange? This is better than Ravenscroft Park!"

She rose on her knees, livid and trembling; her voice came in a whisper, though she was not yet hopeless.

"They will come from the lodge, they must find us, save us!"

Sefton smiled.

"We have gone to London by the afternoon train, I told them!"

A moan of abject despair parted Georgina's lips.

"You brought me here with murder in your heart! It was premeditated!"

"Are we not better out of the world, you and I? Hands soiled with the blood of a child, hearts rank with sin, souls accursed!"

Georgina leapt to her feet. "Is this your revenge for John Reginald?" she cried.

Sefton's eyes grew radiant.

"No, I killed your son, he is there now in the corner, can't you see, under the silk hangings? I leant over the cot so"—crossing the room—"I crushed the breath out of his body, I robbed you of him, and of Ravenscroft Park, now I take your life and give you mine. Have I repaid your trespasses against me sufficiently, do you think? Is the old debt wiped off? Speak, Georgina, justice is done, speak and own the truth. My father's honour is avenged, and the name of Ravenscroft stamped out for ever! Confess here in the tomb, I have done my uttermost, I have defied Fate!"

"Murderer!" she yelled. "Oh, God! my son! my son!"

She rushed to where the visionary cot had stood, and fell upon her face.

* * * * *

In the agonies of thirst and starvation, Georgina stretched her emaciated hand through the narrow window and clutched the air. Her eyes started half out of their sockets, she was past recognition.

Her husband had fallen into a state of coma, his body shrunk to a skeleton.

Georgina's head fell forward, she died with her hand stretched outwards to the sky.

Sefton dreamed of a sweet face in a green lane, and murmured "Norah!"

It was his last word.

THE END.

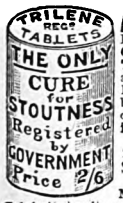
POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cormforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16½st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Pinsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 185, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

"JUNO" CYCLES

Are the Very Best.

JUNO Safeties. Roadsters, 28lb.; Racers, 22lb.

JUNO Lady's Safety a Specialite.

Send at once for JUNO Catalogue, sent post free to any part of the world, interesting and valuable to all. METROPOLITAN MACHINISTS' CO., LTD., 75 and 76, Bishopsgate Without, London, E.C.

N.B.—Every JUNO Guaranteed. MENTION PAPER.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.

VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1. £5, Sept. 1. £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

HAIR DESTROYED

permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. R. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T D." 87, Strand, London.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON,

Drum in position. 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

FAC-SIMILE OF

ROYAL TESTIMONIAL!!!

ROYAL TESTIMONIAL!
ROYAL TESTIMONIAL!
ROYAL TESTIMONIAL!
ROYAL TESTIMONIAL!

Berlin
Alsenstrasse
Feb 25th 1896

"Koko" for the hair, is the best dressing I know it keeps the head cool, promotes growth, and is in every way excellent.

Princess Hohenlohe
Schringen

KOKO FOR THE HAIR

Eradicates Scurf and Dandruff, Prevents Hair Falling, Promotes Growth, and is the Best Dressing for the Hair. Perfectly Harmless, Clean, Cooling, and Invigorating. 1/-, 2/6, and 4/6 sizes, of all Chemists, or post free from THE KOKO-MARICOPAS CO. LTD., 11, Gray's Inn Road, London.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL: THE LAST KING OF ATLANTIS, COMMENCES THIS WEEK.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 405. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 3RD, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

Dress at First Cost.

NEW AUTUMN FABRICS.

PATTERNS ARE NOW READY,

And will be sent in order of application received.

NOVELTIES in Silk and Wool Figured and Chiné Etamine, Broché and Fancy Shot Repps, Glacé Silk Poplins and Mélanges, Canvas Cloth in Black and Colours; Venetian, Covert and Melton Cloth Coatings, Frieze and Cheviot Coatings, Repp, Poplins, Vigoyne and Habit Cloths, Mohair Brochés and Alpacas, Black and New Dress Materials: Endless variety, at all prices.

Regd. Trade Mark.

DRESS LENGTHS FROM 3/11 TO 48/-

Patterns on approval Post Free.

No Agents. Sole Address THE

BRADFORD MANUFACTURING CO. LTD.,

Depot S. S.—BRADFORD, YORKS.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 60lb. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 65lb. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL.

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

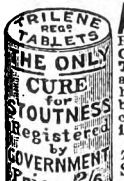
ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.—131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

Dr. Mackenzie's ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

70 NEW SONGS (words and music), Piano Pieces, Dances, etc., with packet of Freeman's exquisite Scent and Booklet of racy reading, 12 Stamps.—Turner's Piano and Music Depot, London Rd., Preston

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL, mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

S.S. PEARSON'S £100 COUPON. No. 40 Oct. 3, 1896, S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 74, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair

FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE,

and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.

VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 405.] For the Week ending October 3rd, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

OR,

The Romance of a Lost Continent.

By Geo. C. Wallis, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

TRANSLATOR'S INTRODUCTION.

LONDON, May 27th, 1963.

THERE has been much speculation of late—amongst that large class of people who have little better to do—as to the relative merits of the twin discoveries of aerial and submarine navigation which have so revolutionised the conditions of life within the last half-century.

The enthusiasts of mechanical flight point with pride to the speed and directness of modern travel, to the defiance we can bid to the severity of winter journeys, to the stamping out of war with all its horrors, to the ease with which the hitherto inaccessible regions of the Poles and the interiors of continents are now mapped out and known, and to the greater accuracy of astronomical observations taken from stations suspended above the clouds, where the observer can always depend upon a clear sky.

To this the advocates of the claims of submarine navigation reply by referring, with equal pride, to the splendid security of voyaging under water, where the ship is ever in a calm; to the vast stores of sunken treasure recovered by the various governments; to the great increase in our geological and biological knowledge which a thorough examination of the sea-bed has given; to the quantities of chalk, coral, lime, pearl, and sponge, which are now easily taken from the depths; to the great facility for deep-sea fishing now afforded; and last, but not least, to the historical relics that have been dug up from submarine excavations, bearing witness to the existence of nations which flourished when the proportions of land and water were different to the present.

This latter claim of the "submarines," I think, turns the scale in their favour. From this the reader may surmise that I am one of those who have little else to do than discuss these profitless questions. In justice to myself, however, I must say that I am a submarine by experience as well as by conviction, and that I have brought up from the sea-depths the material on which my conviction is founded.

Amongst other things we submarines have traced out the shores and mountain ranges of Lemuria, that vast continent now buried under the Indian Ocean; we have discovered and marked out the thickness and limit of every reef and every shifting sand on all the coasts of the world; and, above all, have discovered and systematically explored the greater part of the submerged land once named Atlantis.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

For centuries its very existence has been looked at as an idle dream by the majority of thinkers, but now we know its sunken shores, its buried cities, its river-beds, and mountain chains; some of its history, many of its customs, a little of its religion. Since the Sealion first sank down on the ooze-covered ruins of one of its towns, and brought to light some of the iron implements of its long-forgotten people, a great advance has been made in our knowledge of the world's past history.

We now know that Atlantis was a continent whose shores once stretched from the western bounds of Europe to the eastern coast of America, and afterwards, gradually at first and at last suddenly, subsided till it reached its present level, and the ocean shut off the new world from the knowledge of the old. We know that it was a kingdom and that its people were a warlike race, in language and beliefs akin to the ancient Egyptians, a maritime and colonising nation, once having great dependencies in Africa and America. We know that it supported a large priesthood and boasted many splendid temples, and that its religion consisted mainly in the worship of a trinity—three spirits in one—with a number of lesser gods, and the belief in a future state called the shadowland, wherein was supposed to be an everlasting garden of delight.

All this we knew before my great discovery of last year, and the classical legend of Plato, so long considered false, is now acknowledged on all sides to be either a remarkable coincidence, or due to the rumours of Atlantis which must have reached Europe from the Atlantian colony in Nubia. The later hypothesis seems to me the correct one when we recollect the tradition of the ancient Ethiopians—that they came originally from a country in the west, beyond the sea. Professors Herr and Unger, who in 1861 suggested that Atlantis united Europe and America in the Miocene period, giving biological reasons for their belief, and the writer of the article in the NATURAL HISTORY REVIEW* on "The Atlantis Hypothesis in its Botanical Aspect," are now avenged on their critics. But all this is to the story I have to tell as the dancing of the dry bones of scientific research is to the nervous, forceful action of a living novel.

On the 8th of February, 1962, I set out in the Octopus—an ugly name, by-the-way, for a splendid ship—from the Government Docks in the Thames, to assist in the work of exploration on the Atlantic bed, taking with me three scientific men and a crew of capable sailors. Travelling on the surface of the sea at the uniform rate of one hundred miles an hour, we reached our destination in a little over a day and a half, and prepared to sink to the ocean floor. Some of my colleagues were new to this mode of pursuing knowledge, and M——, in particular, though chosen by the Bureau of Science from forty eager applicants for his post—that of geologist to the ship—openly wished that he had been among the thirty-nine rejected and forlorn!

However, I told him to keep cool, and that I would answer for his safety in the silent depths. The engineer then pulled the actuating lever of the mechanism, the sliding doors closed automatically and hermetically, and with a slight rocking and a muffled roar the great ship sank through the yielding waters. M—— clutched the furniture of the cabin, and looked at the dense darkness outside the thick glass windows with scared eyes, his face turning pale. Then I touched the light signal, and streaming past the window, the glare of our search-lamps lit up the still water. Great monsters of the deep, open mouthed, flashed past as we sank down, lithe-bodied snake-like creatures twirled and twisted as the ray of light swept over them, scintillating sparks shot up from below as invisible denizens of the sea dashed through the line of our vision, and, except for the faint muffled wash of the water on the curved steel sides of our vessel, all was deathly calm. I looked at my manometer after a few seconds had passed.

"We shall soon be resting on the solid earth," I said to M—— "with a pressure equal to some hundreds of atmospheres on our hull. Look out for the blue hills of Atlantis!"

As I spoke I signalled for more light, and looking through the most illumined window we saw the dim, misty peaks of the submarine mountains rising into the glow of our electric rays, and very soon the Octopus settled gently down upon a wide, ooze-covered plain, not many yards from where another ship was lying, with a score of dark figures creeping slowly about on the ground near her. It was the old Sealion, which I knew to be then engaged in the work by the American Congress, and so we lost no time in donning our diving suits and joining them on the sea-floor. The scene was magnificent, the dense darkness all around contrasting vividly with the brilliant area lit by the search-lights, into and out of which so many strange forms of life were passing and repassing, that the effect was kaleidoscopic.

The men of the Sealion were laying a blasting charge, and, deciding to join forces with them, we laid a hand to the work, and soon had the compound of litrolite in a Harrison patent case connected to the time-fuse set for twelve minutes. That done, we scrambled on board our vessels, and, setting the engines to work at their utmost speed, dashed away from the spot. Exactly on the stroke of the thirteenth minute a dull, red orb of fire appeared for an instant in the black water behind, then vanished, immediately followed by a rending thunder-crash that caused the ships to toss and shiver in the shaken sea. Returning, we found that a great portion of the calcareous deposit had been broken up, revealing the long-hidden ground.

We repeated the operation till a large portion of the sea floor was laid bare, and then, renewing our store of air by releasing some of the solidified atmosphere* in our reservoirs, took pick and shovel and set to work.

It proved a rich field for our labours, and on the 13th the Sealion, having filled her hold with what was deemed a good collection of valuable antiquities, rose to the surface and set her prow for home. Three days later—that memorable 16th February—we made the crowning discovery of the expedition.

On that day, for the first time, I succeeded in inducing M—— to venture from the ship and accompany me to the ruins of a large city we were then exploring. It appeared to have been a large and populous city in the palmy days of Atlantis, but was so wreck-strewn that it must have suffered some great disaster even before sinking under the waves. About a mile from the outskirts of it, to the north, the weed-hung walls of what must at one time have been a tower of immense size and strength, jutted from the sea-bed. Judging from the dimensions of its base and the slope of its sides, it could not have been less than a hundred feet higher than the Eiffel Tower of Paris, or just fifty feet lower than the Tower of Babel, which Yankee emulation erected in Chicago in 1907.

Walking over the rough ground, hampered by our heavy helmeted suits, was no light toil, and M——, unused to this method of locomotion, stumbled once for every three or four steps he made. Something unusually heavy caught my feet whilst laughing at my friend's antics, and stooping, I found a large, thick roll of beaten copper, green with verdigris in places, but untouched in others, doubtless having been well covered by dirt and fallen masonry before the lime deposit had formed on it. I took it to the ship without attaching any extra importance to it, and soon afterwards, having as much weight in as her hull could lift, floated the Octopus to the surface, and put her head about for England.

When I came to examine the roll of copper I found to my surprise that it contained a number of sheets of parchment similar to dry papyrus leaves, well fastened in between the metal folds, and written closely over in the Atlantian

* NOTE—(1862) p. 149.

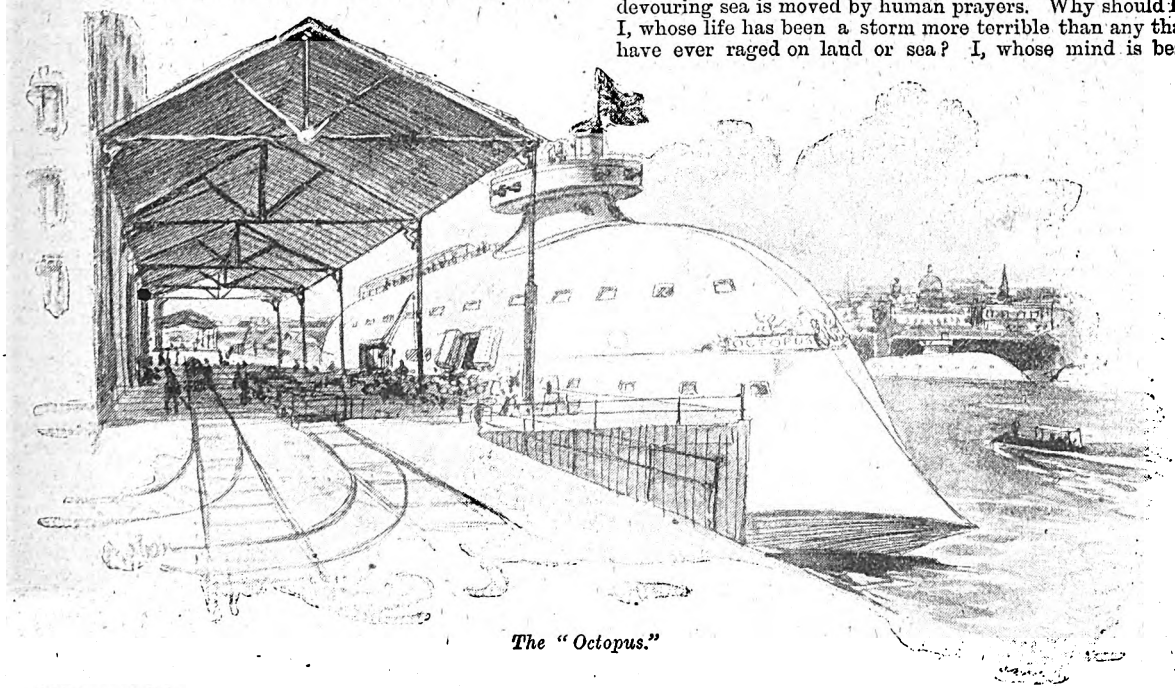
* Professor Dewar (1893 or thereabouts) was, I believe, the first to successfully accomplish this solidification.

Digitized by Google

character. My curiosity was roused, and, leaving all our other finds in abeyance, I resolutely set myself the task of translating, by Richard's key,* the whole of that lengthy, ancient MS., which I have named "The Last King of Atlantis."

The news of my discovery has already been bruited abroad, and several experts in archæology having confirmed the accuracy of my translation, I think the time has come to give the story to the world. The chapter divisions and headings, and some of the terms used, are, of course, of my own choosing, but in substance I can affirm that the English version is a true reflex of the famous manuscript, which may now be seen by the curious in the British Museum, Atlantian Section, No. 48.

Of the story I need say little, since the history of the last king of that most unfortunate country, who went through the most desperate adventures in Nubia, Egypt, and Mexico, cannot fail to interest the reader on its own merits.



The "Octopus."

With regard to the supernatural appearances and priestly premonitions of which Arnon tells, particularly the vision of Isis, the thousand years sleep by Marenso, and the last words of Briseis, I venture no opinion. Modern science will probably question their reality—modern scepticism certainly will—but I have thought it better to tell the story as its author put it down, rather than break the continuity or detract from the interest of the oldest autobiography in the world.

F. Ernest Hamlyn, F.R.S.

CHAPTER I.

On the Shore of Life.

Swiftly flows the foamy tide on the sullen shores of the Bay of Kronos; heavily boom the breakers on the distant bar; hoarsely screams the seamew in his wheeling flight; resistlessly tosses the ocean far and wide in its restless majesty; sobs and sighs by turns the rising, threatening gale. 'Tis an even presageful of storm, of mighty conflicts of wind and sea and rain, and I, Arnon, sitting here in my lonely watch-tower, already seem to feel the massive fabric rock and sway before the fierce impetus of the tempest's breath. But though the gale should roar ten thousandfold its worst, and the very heavens be rent asunder or the earth be split in twain, it will not move me nor stay my hand from writing, unless in the sudden shock of elements and worlds my spirit and my body be torn apart with one fell stroke of fate.

Yes, the storm is rising, and the sky, already sparkling with the light of a thousand stars and silvered with the gleam of the crescent moon, will soon be swept from end to end with the rolling banks of curling cloud, passing, re-passing, and over-passing one another, or charging in confusion hither and thither, until the thunder rolls and the lightning darts its deadly shafts at the stolid earth below, riving the giant trees and ploughing furrows in the very rock.

Let it come! I shall heed it less than yonder granite column heeds the fanning of a firefly's wing, or yonder all-devouring sea is moved by human prayers. Why should I? I, whose life has been a storm more terrible than any that have ever raged on land or sea? I, whose mind is best attuned to the crash of empires, the fall of kings, the rallying cry of battle, or the thunders of a people's praise?

Yet, oh! thou who read'st this—it may be in ages after I am gone to the shades—think not that the sound of conflict is the only melody that has moved this heart. You shall hear without straining of ears to listen, above and through all the other notes in the harmony of life, the grand keytone of an undying love. And should you in your incredulity mistrust my words, I hold your unbelief of small account—care for it less than I care for the tempest that is already warring without my solitary chamber overlooking the heaving bay.

Yes, read, and you shall learn how time and circumstances have filled up for me the sixty years that lie between this day and the day on which I first gave vent to a wailing cry. You shall learn how the mightiest power the world has ever known has been humbled to the dust by the very magnitude of her victories and the squandered luxury of her unsurpassed prosperity; how I have been, in turn, pirate, captive, priest, sailor, soldier, courtier, and king; how, through all the wreck of wealth and name, and all the gain of war and cunning, and all the shadows of my transient loves, one great affection has held me in its chains for good and ill for now nigh forty years: and how the surging, restless ocean

* Richard has been aptly termed the Champollion of the 20th century.

Digitized by Google

ever creeping forward with insidious steps, treacherous, cat-like, has seized upon our country, pace by pace, until but a curving reef now remains of our beloved Atlantis, the mistress of the seas.

It makes the salt tears start to my eyes e'en now, as I think of it, for out there, beyond the white-crested bar, is buried under the waves the quiet glade where first I breathed my love to Briseis. Back! ye bitter memories, and let me write—as the wind rises higher and higher, and the billows dash further and further up the tower—faster, faster!

I clung to the lowest step of a stairway.

* * * * *

Faintly limned upon the misty background of the past, the first image that my memory can clearly trace is a vision of the ocean that I love so well. I see myself, a tiny youth, wandering alone upon a strip of sand at the foot of a frowning cliff, so high above my little black, curl-covered head that I thought the top must surely be above the sky. To the right of me the sand and shingle lay in a narrow path at the base of the beetling crags, nor could I see its end; while to the left it ceased, and the rock-bound coast curved out upon the sea, fading away in sullen greyness far as the eye could reach.

Above, far above the giddy height where the sea-birds wheeled and screamed their harshest notes, the sun shone fiery in a heaven of cloudless blue, heating the rocks and pebbles till the skin was blistered by the very touch of them, and it seemed as though I were walking in an open furnace. Shelter I could not find, and out there in front of me, temptingly, tantalisingly, lay the sparkling liquid sea, rising like a dark, cool bank beyond my reach.

As I stood and gazed with all the wonder of childhood, a mast, and then another, and then a sail, and last a ship, appeared on the rim of the sea, moved slowly across and disappeared in reverse fashion at another point. Angrily I shook my tiny fist at the vessel, for not coming to take me off the lonely shore, and when it came not nearer for all my demonstrations, sat down on the hot sand and wept a flood of petulant tears.

Strangely enough, I remember that I seemed to know, instinctively, the nature of that moving speck on the sea, and from that have been led to think that I must have been abandoned on that desolate beach by an unnatural parent; but whether it be so or not, it has never been granted me to know. At the end of my life's journey I am still ignorant of its beginning. Since the day I woke to find myself an outcast, alone with the careless elements, I have never lost my hold on the thread of memory. Before then I can only recall a few faint flashes of intelligence, darting meteor like across a sky of densest gloom.

A glimpse of the sea in calm and storm, the recollection of a ship with its banks of oars, a few fierce dark faces, and one face unlike the others, calm and lovely, with a look of motherly tenderness; that is all the first half-dozen years have left me, and that little even grows fainter with the gathering age of time.

After I had cried until I was tired, the more especially as there was no one whom the sound could annoy, I ceased my pettish bewailings and set about to pry into my surroundings, as is the wont of children left to themselves.

The tide was ebbing when I first gazed at it, but now as I have turned my steps to the right and trotted along close to the towering cliffs, it turned, and each roller breaking on the shore sent its spray further up the sand. Presently the part on which I walked, as far from the sea as I could get, began to swell and then to sink beneath me, and presently the waves washed my little bare feet at each step. Soon I was wading in the bubbling surf and drenched to the skin by the salt spray that curled up, dashed itself in mighty impotence against the unresponsive rock, and then fell down upon me in a soaking shower.

It was not so very long before I was lifted off my feet, and then and there learnt the useful art of swimming. I am inclined to think that I had been in the water before then, so well did I progress in the rude lesson, but whether it was so or not, I managed to keep myself above water for a considerable time, assisting myself, whenever possible, by the ledges and angles in the cliff-face. At last, tired and bruised by the buffetings of the rough and thoughtless waves and the heavy knocks I received when swung sharply up to the hot, steaming rock, I began to feel my little strength give way. I called for help, screamed, wept, and called again, but all to no purpose. Beyond me lay the sea, without a speck to mar its glittering surface. Above, the sun shone pitilessly in the same unclouded sky.

Now I was nigh to the end, and in a very short time my struggles would have ceased, so that this history would never have been written, when, with a last despairing effort, I seized a projection in the rock that rose so menacingly above me, and clung to it with all the tenacity of a limpet. And I found when I had hung there till my breath came back, that above it was another like projection, and then another; and I saw that I clung to the lowest step of a stairway cut out of the solid stone, leading up I knew not whither.

This put fresh nerve into my little mind, already aged in experience in the last hour, and with eager joy I began to slowly climb the narrow steps. About a third of the height from the summit the cliff frowned outwards, so that no one on the top could see the rough stairs, and at that point they ceased, the last step being the threshold of a dark, wide-mouthed cavern, in whose depths, as I peered, shone sundry curious gleams of light. A few more tottering strides and I was within, groping round for something on which to lay my weary body.

Digitized by Google

I slept long and soundly, waking with the rays of a newly risen sun shining full into the mouth of the cave. Then I saw that the place which I had so opportunely found was a very roomy cavern stretching back into the heart of the cliff for many fathoms, and lined on each side with long, rude, wooden shelves, on which stood rows of clumsy-looking earthen jars, and underneath which were several huge boxes, fastened down by ropes as thick as my own arm.

But what attracted my attention most were several heaps of shining stones that lay upon the floor, which sparkled in the sunlight like a myriad points of fire; and several long, square bars of a dull, yellow metal, which seemed to have a curious glow in the glare of day. For awhile I played with those strange toys, the shining stones, then, impelled by the pangs of hunger, began to search the cavern for something wherewith to appease my appetite. I was not long in discovering it. One of the earthern jars was full to the brim with deliciously cool water—none of the purest, I imagine, but quite good enough for my undiscriminating years. In another jar I found a plentiful supply of nuts, which wonderfully satisfied my cravings.

Then I went and played again with the pretty stones, and before long, feeling still sleepy, I lay down and passed into the land of dreams with all the carelessness of youth, one arm, upon which my head was pillowed, clutching one of the bars of yellow gold, the other hand still grasping the largest of the brilliant diamonds in its chubby fingers.

Thus I lay when they found me, and I was roused by the sound of voices.

It was still light, though the day was drawing to its close and one star shone bright and clear through the open mouth of the cave. By the faint light that found its way in, assisted by the flickering glare of half a score of torches stuck in sockets on the wall, I could distinguish some fifty men grouped around me in various attitudes, some amused, some angry, and all astonished.

One, who appeared to be the chief, dressed in a short tunic of dark cloth, pulled in round the waist by a belt from which hung axe and dagger, and wearing a pair of huge, high leathern boots with square-cut toes, was the first to address me, and it seemed as though I had heard the language he spoke from my birth upward.

"How came you here, youngster?" he asked roughly, giving me a slight kick with one of his dreadful boots to emphasise the question.

"Up the steps, when the water was too high for me to stay below," I answered, getting on my feet, and likewise on my dignity, which even then was not small.

"Ah!" cried he who questioned me, "and pray, what were you doing in the water below? And mind, young one, you answer me civilly, or I treat you to another kick."

I told him, not flinching in the least, but looking him boldly in the face, all that I could remember of myself, scanty as it was; but he only seemed puzzled the more.

"What were those men like whom you last remember?" he asked at length.

"Big and fierce and ugly, like all these," I said, waving my arm round comprehensively, "and one was thin and evil-looking, like that man," I added, pointing to a cadaverous individual who stood a little aside, regarding me fixedly with his piercing eyes. There was a general laugh at this sally, but the thin man, heeding it not, bent forward and solemnly caught me a stinging buffet on the cheek.

"Hold! Zerah!" cried the Chief, "the young one is but small and thou art strong. 'Twas a coward's blow. And he spoke truth, I swear!"

An angry scowl was all the reply Zerah made to this, but before he had finished the grimace I had recovered from the effects of the knock-down blow, and, with eyes blazing and teeth clenched, had snatched up and hurled at him one of the largest diamonds near my hand. The jagged jewel struck him full force on the nose, notwithstanding his dodging, and tore off a piece of the none too superfluous flesh on that large-boned facial ornament, and then drew blood across his cheek, raising a great weal in its track.

Overawed by the rest, the injured man made no effort at retaliation, but retired to the further end of the cave to restore his ugly visage to a state of comparative serenity, contenting himself meantime with the evilest of glances and the grimmest of smiles.

"'Tis a spirited lad, Didron!" said one of the men, addressing the chief after the roar of laughter at my act of defiance had subsided. "Methinks he would make us a handy novice aboard ship."

"Art right there," answered Didron, meditatively stroking his tawny, tangled beard; "yet I should like to know how he came hither. Thought I that he belonged to any who have discovered our hiding-place, I'd put an inch of cold steel across his gullet before I threw him out."

"'Twould be safest to cut his conceited throat in any case, and so make sure," growled Zerah, from the semi-darkness.

"Right, old curmudgeon!" said another, checked abruptly, however, by Didron, who said:

"As Nimno has remarked, the lad is plucky, and has a stout heart; we will take him to ship with us, and he shall join our band, when he shall have come to years of discretion."

So I was put into a corner and thrown something to eat, my masters having more weighty matters on which to talk.

One of the earthenware jars was full to the brim.

In a few days we put to sea, reaching their ship from the bottom of the steps by a couple of boats.

She was a long, low, murderous-looking craft, with high curving ends, the stem terminating in the graven head of a hideous tiger, with glaring eyes and gaping jaws showing the sharp gleaming teeth. On either side of the vessel was a bank of oars, pulled by fifty captives, bound together and constantly urged on by the application of a knotted leathern thong. For use when the wind was favourable she carried a huge lateen sail, which put us through the water swiftly as a shark after its prey. The crew, apart from the hundred miserable galley slaves, numbered two hundred brawny-armed, iron-souled, rough-looking fellows, mostly with dark, grizzled beards, and scarred, weather-beaten countenances, telling of many a storm encountered, many a fierce brush with foe on land and sea, and many a deed of evil import.

Digitized by Google

In fine, they were a gang of pirates, who harried the southern seas and the southern shores of Atlantis, the ship on which I was embarked was their stock-in-trade, the Ravager, and the cave I had so opportunely discovered was their secret treasure storehouse, wherein was hidden the gold and silver and precious stones that they could not at once dispose of. And a very secure hiding-place it was.

As I have said, it could not be seen from the cliff above, nor reached from the sand below when the tide was out, nor could a ship get near enough to enable its crew to discern its whereabouts if they did not know where to look. As the Ravager stood out into the offing I noticed that the strip of sand, upon which I had battled for my life with the rising waters, was unreachable by any direction than from seaward, being rounded off at each end by bold, jutting headlands, standing out sharply against the great green sea beyond.

With sails stretched taut by the favouring breeze, to the great delight of the hapless slaves, the Ravager ploughed her way across the ocean, and after many quiet days cast anchor in the harbour of a solitary islet lost in the immensity of the tropic sea. This was the pirates' home, where their wives and children lived, secure from the vigilance of the royal warships.

Here in this lovely spot, Didron the Chief adopted me as his son, in lieu of one who was dead, naming me Arnon, after the lost one, and bidding me be as a brother to little Viol, his only living child. This I gladly promised, feeling myself almost a man, in spite of my scanty years. Then, after a short rest, the anchor was upheaved, and the Ravager once more stood out into the trackless waste of waters.

The pirates had not met with much good-fortune of late, and their settlement needed things other than diamonds and gold. Also many of the crew had no wives in the islet, but had love-maids in distant ports. So all hands were willing and ready to spread the sail and clean the decks and polish their weapons, singing a rude war-chant the while, as the ship swept out of sight of their island home.

CHAPTER II.

The Son of a Sea-King.

Merrily sped the ship on the dancing waves as the sun climbed higher and higher in the heavens; loudly groaned the hundred slaves, and louder yelled the crew, when the wind failed, the lateen flapped idly on the mast, and the hundred oars dipped in and out of the water with a rhythmic sound.

Little Viol, my foster-sister, went with us on my first trip. Didron would rather she had not, but the little maid was wilful and spoilt through having no mother to keep her waywardness in check, and insisted so strongly and wept so prettily that the stern-faced chief was fain to yield to her intreaties. So she came on board to gladden our hearts, to amuse us with her quaint sayings, and vex us with her ceaseless questionings.

On that first voyage she and I struck up a boy and girl courtship, to the great relish of the crew, who teased us both unmercifully. But little we cared for that; I, indeed, answering jest with jest and taunt with taunt, for, feeling secure in Didron's protectorship, and finding, moreover, that the rugged-mannered pirates liked me all the better for my bluster and sharp tongue, I grew intensely conceited, and spoke and behaved as if on equal terms with every man on board.

Dear little Viol! I think I see her now as she looked through all those busy years I fought with the pirates and grew to manhood's age and stature. Small she always was, but sweet and dainty, as though such loveliness must needs be dealt out to the world in little quantities. Her wavy, sunny hair streamed down her shoulders in luxurious masses, seeming to clothe her in a garment of brightest gold, and to crown her head with an amber glow. Her cheeks were mantled with the rosy tinge of southern blood, and her eyes shone softly beneath their delicate arches as the eyes of a timid fawn. Small wonder is it that I braved a thousand daily torments on her behalf! E'en now, when her memory is overshadowed by a deeper, stronger, more abiding love, the memory of little Viol can sometimes give my heart a flutter, and set my soul a-longing for what can nevermore be.

Foremost amongst my tormentors was surly Zerah, whose face still bore the scar where my missile had struck him, and for which he never forgave me. Day after day, and especially when Didron's glance was averted, the great brute would pour out his clumsy jokes and blunt-edged jeers, and set me to work on the most irksome tasks, all of which insults I treasured up in my revengeful mind, waiting my time to pay him back in earnest.

As the years sped on, I grew in strength and skill. My hand was cool and steady in the whirl of the fiercest fight, my thews and sinews toughened and enlarged till I could hold out a full-sized man at arm's length and think light of it, and one stern grasp of my iron fingers round a foeman's throat could squeeze out his very life. I was also tall and broad of chest, and when I gained my twentieth year and stood on the threshold of full manhood I was the strongest, most daring, and most trusted of all that jolly band, so that Didron himself, feeling the chill of age creeping on him, looked upon me as his successor, and sometimes, when his life-blood coursed more sluggishly than was its wont, sent me out with the Ravager under my own command. Then, when the pirate-spirit came strongly upon him again and the thirst for action thrilled through all his veins, the old war-dog would once more take his place, tramping the deck of the good old ship with an air of mastery, and interlarding his orders with a profusion of words strong as the stiffest breeze that ever blew on the briny sea.

On one of these latter occasions, after we had stowed the treasure of three deep-laden argosies within our secret cave, Zerah and I found means to end our quarrel.

I was talking to Viol on the open deck while she busily plied her distaff, seeming but careless of my presence, though at intervals not very far apart, when our eyes met, mine read love writ plain in hers; when, in the midst of our quiet communing, like an ice-cold hurricane tearing through a leafy summer glade, came Zerah, chaffing and grumbling, and setting my teeth on edge with his cantankerous lugubrations.

At last, finding that I heeded not his sneers, he lost his temper, abusing me, and then my little Viol, as bitterly as his evil tongue could wag.

"'Tis a pretty sight," he said, with a fiendish smile, "to see our novice a-mooning about and taking his ease like a noble, when his betters have to shoulder-to and work in fair weather or foul! And 'tis a better thing that this yellow-haired chit should be aboard to keep your idleness in countenance. Surely I think our chief has no shame left, that he flaunts his love-child here in our faces!"

"Gods!" I cried, springing to my feet and snatching my sword from my belt, "look to yourself, viper, for by the beard of Amarunth, I'll wash out this insult in your life's blood!"

I had suffered his tormenting and clumsy jokes long enough, but when he turned his vile tongue against my darling and mocked at her motherlessness, the cup of my anger was full and my wrath was roused to action,

Digitized by Google

Then out flashed his sword, and the bright blades struck fire as we crossed them in savage shock, and then stood still, glaring and watchful, as old Didron, marking the jostle of arms, came hurrying up. He asked what made us fight, and a chorus of voices told him, for Zerah's coward sneer had been overheard by more than one.

"But that Arnon has taken up the sword against you, accursed wretch, this once stout arm, old though it be, should cut you to the earth like a stalk of corn," was all the old man dare trust himself to say to Zerah, thereafter bidding us go on.

But now Viol rushed between us and clung to me with all the feverish strength of a fearful maid, imploring, bewailing, beseeching, sobbing, intreating me not to put myself in danger, till I was well-nigh unmanned and my steadiness of nerve was gone, while Zerah stood and watched us, a confident grin upon his swarthy features. With a cry I roughly shook off my troublesome maid, who was at once seized by Didron, and, grasping my sword more firmly, I turned to my enemy.

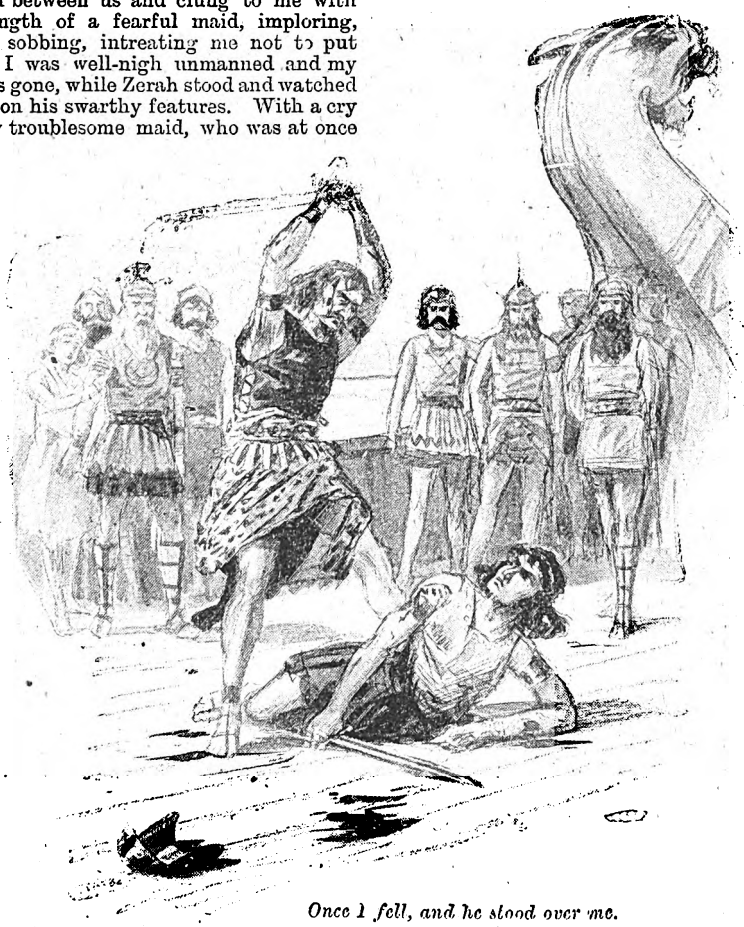
"Now, miserable wretch," I cried, "prepare to enter the shadows, for by all the Spirits you shall not live to see to-morrow's sun."

"Now, insufferable cur," he answered, his face livid with rage, "nerve yourself to feel the jaws of the monsters of the deep, for their prey shall you be before night falls."

Then we began in deadly earnest, thrusting, cutting, parrying, fencing, springing, advancing, and retreating, till the red blood flowed about the deck from each of us, and our arms grew weary with the struggle, though for a time neither gained advantage. Once I fell, and he stood over me with arm raised high to strike the fatal blow, but before the hissing blade had cleft the air one half its journey I had kicked his foot from beneath him, prostrating him headlong at my side. Once I had him on his knee, and the point of my weapon at his breast, but ere I could send the sharp steel home he had wriggled out of my grasp like an oily snake and stood upon the deck.

I began to perceive that my strength was matched by his skill, my youthful energy by his sober experience, and remembering that muscle is sometimes overcome by cunning, I resolved to save my strength and tire him out. On this our combat became a slow one of feints and passes and wary watchings for a false move, and of this my foeman tired, seeing as well as I that I must surely wear him down. So with a shout he threw himself upon me, sword and dagger and all, and down I went under him like a sapling felled by a single stroke of the woodman's axe, my blade flying out of my fingers a dozen paces down the deck. Then up at him I sprang like a tiger-cat, fastening one hand upon the wrist that held the dagger (I feared not his sword at such close quarters), and the other upon his throat. These I grasped and held like a leech, wavering not one item in my forceful clasp for all his writhing and plunging and his ashen face, for now my strength and build began to tell.

Soon his sword dropped from his free hand, his dagger fell from his nerveless fingers, his eyeballs rolled in horrid motions, his heart ceased to struggle, his breath stopped in the narrow passage I held so tightly, and Zerah lay still at my side.



Once I fell, and he stood over me.

Thereupon out broke the crew into a cheer, and old Didron called me his son, bidding me throw the carcase out to the sharks; and little Viol knelt by me and wept tears of joy for my safety, and, woman-like, a tear of pity for the wretch I had slain. But of all these voices I heeded only Didron's, and lifting the lifeless body high in the air, flung it overboard as far as my enfeebled arms would allow.

We were then sailing through a blue sea thickly covered with lumps of yellow weed, in which said weed live countless hordes of little crabs of the same sickly hue, and as the hideous body sank beneath the weeds, then for a moment came to the top again, out poured these ugly creatures, crawling over the carcase. When I saw this I said:

"So may all such wretches perish!"

And old Didron bowed low his head, thanking the gods for having given him such a son and rid him of such a pestilent follower.

Oh! it was a stirring life, was ours, in the days when buccaneering was an honest trade and a pirate was an honourable man. True, we waylaid ships and took their treasure and their women and slaughtered their crews if they resisted us, and made raids on the littoral towns, but so, in sooth, did our enemies the warships of the king if so it happened that they stood in need of men, or arms, or food, and made no discrimination, whilst we were ever ready to aid the poor and the distressed, wherefore many a needy fisherman would liever see a pirate ship upon his horizon than a vessel with the royal flag.

Yes! ours was a happy life when all is said and done. 'Twas calm and peaceful when we lay at ease in our fairy isle, drinking the sweets of success, and disporting ourselves with our wives and sweethearts, while the good ship was being repaired and fitted for her coming voyage; 'twas better when we sallied forth and laid tribute heavily upon the vessels of the rich merchants who plied between Atlantis and the spice-laden East; 'twas better still when the Ravager cast anchor in the harbour of a wealthy town and levied blackmail to a fabulous amount upon the trembling citizens; but 'twas best of all when we met a pirate-foe upon the sea—a rival who dared to hunt within our chosen waters—and with crashing of timbers and riddling of sails, with fierce clashes of arms and shouts of hatred upon men's tongues plentifully as beads thickly-strung upon a thread, our tiger-headed ship rushed on to battle and to victory!

Digitized by Google

Then did the blood course swiftly through the willing veins, and the hand grasp weapons eagerly, and woe to the foemen who crossed our path when the pirates' wrath was roused, for come sun or rain, or calm or direst storm, we jolly fellows rested not until our rage was quenched in streams and pools of reddest gore!

Sorrowfully I write this, looking back through all the years, and fain would have you bear in mind that we were not always in such angry mood. For our own sakes that was well.

A week had scarce gone since I had thrown Zerah to the crabs, when, it being my watch in the early morn, I saw a ship bearing down upon us with all the speed the slaves could row, and pressing hard behind, twenty lengths from her stern, a royal warship foaming through the water, her five hundred oars sweeping the sea with majestic regularity. It was a fellow pirate, pursued by a ship of the king. Not a moment did old Didron hesitate.

"Grappling-irons ready!" roared the old sea-king, his grey eyes sparkling with joy at the coming fight. "Art blind?" he went on impatiently, seeing the men hang back. "See not 'tis our old friend Sanaboul? On, then, and shear off the enemy's oars!"

The men sprang forward at this, all eagerness, and down we bore upon the pair of flying vessels. Sanaboul saw us, guessing our intent, and so, when he reached us, slewed round his ship till both our prows pointed to the oncoming foe. As we rode together, with barely the breadth of the oars between us, Sanaboul called from his deck:

"Good cheer, old comrade, thou comest but just in time!"

The old sea-dog answered that the last hour of the day is better than no time to-morrow. "And," said he, "if we strive but well, the king shall know of what mettle we seamen are made. Ha! ha!"

Now our ships parted slightly, and resting on our oars (for it was a dead calm) we stood silent, waiting the coming of the great warship. Then, when her prow was near upon us, our vessels sprang forward and closed inward upon her with a sudden shock, shipping oars as we touched, and one on either side of her we tore along, grinding slowly down her banks of oars, splintering, breaking and cracking them as though they were twigs dried in the sun, and hurling the luckless slaves in her hold, hither and thither in wild confusion, breaking the limbs of many, and killing not a few. And when we got alongside, our men who steadied the chains, threw the hooks and grip irons over the bulwarks, making the vessels fast, so that the royal ship was locked in our embrace. And then from both sides we poured in upon her with shouts of defiance.

Then began a struggle long and terrible, for our two crews together did not so much as equal the number of our foes, and these, moreover, were greatly helped by having a score of expert slingers in the rigging, and at the prow and stern, from whence their leaden bullets fell amongst us like a deadly hail. But fiercely we fought, chanting the Ina-ana, or war song of the seas, and ever as we battled our feet were planted further on their deck. Soon we met our friends from the further side, and Sanaboul stood side by side with Didron, as wild and dangerous a pair of tough old warriors as ever trod the timbers of a worthy craft.

Together strove that brawny couple, plying their swords so well upon the host of foes that it seemed as though they stood in the harvest field, mowing down the corn shaken by the wind. And like a field of corn blown here and there, yet coming no nearer, was that host of enemies. For a time no hurt came to these two, yet at each cut or thrust of their long, keen blades a foeman fell upon the slippery deck, and of all who fell none ever rose again, for behind and about them pressed we, with all the lust of blood in us, like wolves howling for their prey.

Now we had cleared the slingers from the stern, and cut down the mast which held the sail ropes, so that only the forward end of the royal ship was held by her crew, and seeing this, and that they were fast losing ground, their leader pressed to the front, and, grasping his huge, heavy-bladed axe, fell upon our chiefs fighting in the midst of the turmoil. They saw him, and both blades leapt up, like lightning flashes, to ward off that fearful blow. Like a reed snapped by a falling oak Sanaboul's sword broke short in his hand, and the awful weapon, crashing down through leathern helm and head and armour, clove through his body as though a splitted block of wood, and, falling to the deck, was there transfixed, quivering.

'Twas a mighty stroke, such as I have never seen since, but by its own greatness it cost that chief his life, for before he could wrench it from the deck, Didron's blade, with the swiftness of a thought, had cut his head in twain. With a wild cry of exultation, I placed myself at my leader's side.

"Well done, my son," said he; "but seek not to guard me. I feel that my hour has come now that my friend is dead. Yet I—I shall make my grave amongst the bones of our enemies."

How we wrought that day against those stern and bearded warriors of the king! At last we bore them down and slew them, one and all, till not an armed foe remained on board. But—maledictions on the evil thing—a fatal bullet from a sling guided by the hand of Amarunth, the god of death, sent Didron to join his friend in the Land of Shadows, even as the victory was nearly won.

Then, with one consent, they made me, Arnon, their leader, and for want of men to work both ships, what remained of Sanaboul's crew, with much persuasion, came on board the Ravager; and their ship, together with the royal vessel, we sank by boring auger holes in the barnacle-covered bottoms. The slaves of both vessels and the wounded of our enemies went down with them, for we were not minded that any news of our deed should reach Atlantis, lest we brought down stern revenge upon ourselves and our wives and children.

But how those wretches shrieked and cried for help and mercy as they felt the ships sink under them, and the water creep higher and higher! It makes my blood chill even now, when I recall that mad, despairing yell. Some, indeed, sprang overboard, but such soon perished, either by the sharks or the arrows of my men, and the rest, for all their fear, ventured not to meet their end that way.

That was the dark side of my pirate life, and now, scanning it from the vantage point of a life's experience, I shudder at my own misdoings, and wonder that the earth has borne with me so long.

After making sundry further captures I returned to our island home, taking with me the sorrowing Viol and the body of the old chief. We buried him with Sanaboul, on the slope of the little hill where our olden leaders lay, and being now enriched by our long, successful cruise, we rested from our voyaging for a year and a half, till our wounds and sicknesses were healed and cured, and by which time fully two-score of the young men who did not yet know more of the sea than the smell of it, were ready to take ship with us.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY NO. 11.

TOO MUCH BLUE.

SEE PAGE 442.

11 Early on a fine summer morning, an old man
33 was walking on the road between Brussels and 20 Namus.
119 Having a good deal of time to spare, he amused
75 himself by watching the operations of a painter,
45 who, mounted on a ladder placed against the front
93 of a wayside inn, was busily employed in depicting 17 a sign suitable to its name, "The Rising Sun."
18 The old man commenced walking backwards
98 and forwards before the inn, the painter, mean-
104 time, continuing to lay on fresh coats of the 79 brightest blue, which appeared to aggravate the old
87 gentleman very much.
106 At length, when the sign-painter took another
124 brush full of blue paint to plaster on, the spectator
22 could endure it no longer, and exclaimed severely:
110 "Too much blue!"
82 The painter looked down from his perch, and 12 said, in that tone of forced calmness which an 105 angry man sometimes assumes:
74 "Monsieur does not perceive that I am painting
73 a sky."
70 "Oh, yes, I see very well you are trying to paint
123 a sky; but I tell you again there is too much 26 blue!"
2 "By St. Gudula, this is too much!" exclaimed
113 the painter, coming down from his ladder, at no
16 pains this time to conceal his anger; "I should like 61 to see how you would paint skies without blue."
30 "I don't pretend to much skill in sky-painting;
15 but, if I were to make a trial, I wouldn't put in too
109 much blue."
28 "I tell you what, old gentleman," cried the 13 insulted artist, crossing his maul-stick over his 84 shoulder, and looking very fierce, "I dare say you 125 are a very worthy fellow when you are at home; but 63 you should not be let out—alone."
4 "Nonsense!" exclaimed the critic, as he snatched
100 the palette from the painter's hand. "You deserve
68 to have your portrait painted, to serve for the sign
34 of the 'Flemish Ass!'" In his indignation he 127 mounted the ladder with the activity of a boy, and,
92 with the palm of his hand, effaced the chef d'œuvre
69 of Gerald Douw's great grandson's third cousin.
78 Then, using merely the point of his finger and 5 the handle of a brush, he sketched, in masterly
80 outline, three Flemish boors, with beer-glasses in 32 their hands, drinking to the rising sun, which 97 appeared above the horizon, dispersing the gloom
43 of a greyish morning sky. One of the faces 83 presented a strong and laughable caricature of the 51 supplanted sign-painter.
108 The owner of the inn was the first to cry
88 "Bravo!" and even Gerard Douw's cousin nine
99 times removed felt his fury calming down into 71 admiration.
50 The old man was about to descend from the 42 ladder, when a gentleman, riding an English horse,
40 made his way through the crowd.
90 "That painting is mine!" he exclaimed in French,
6 but with a foreign accent. "I will give a hundred 89 guineas for it!"
1 "Another madman," exclaimed the native genius.
23 "Hang me, but all these foreigners are mad!"

"What do you mean, monsieur?" said the inn- 41 keeper, uncommonly interested. 29
"What I say—I will give one hundred guineas 67 for that painting," answered the young Englishman, 44 getting off his horse. 47
"That picture is not to be sold," said the sign- 52 painter, with an air of as much pride as if it had 96 been his own work. 118
"No," quoth mine host, "for it is already sold, 59 and even partly paid for in advance. However, if 91 monsieur wishes to come to an arrangement about 122
it, it is with me that he must treat." 94
"Not at all, not at all," rejoined the Flemish 64 painter of signs, "it belongs to me. My fellow- 116 artist here gave me a little help out of friendship; 86 but the picture is my lawful property, and I am at 31 liberty to sell it to anyone I please." 10
"What roguery!" exclaimed the innkeeper. 27
"'Rising Sun' is my property. Fastened on the 120 wall of my house, how can it belong to anybody 46 else? Isn't it painted on my boards? No one but 121 myself has the smallest right to it." 66
"But suppose that I don't choose to have it 72 sold?" said its real author. 77
"Oh, my dear monsieur!" said the innkeeper, 62
"I am certain you would not wish to deprive an 56 honest, poor man, who can scarcely make both ends 25 meet, of this windfall. Why, it would just enable 112 me to lay in a good stock of wine and beer." 101
"Don't believe him, brother," cried the painter; 55
"he is an old miser. I am the father of a family; 38 and, being a painter, you ought to help a brother 60 artist, and give me the preference. Besides, I am 76 ready to share the money with you." 107
"He!" said Master Martzen. "Why, he's an old 115 spendthrift, who has no money left to give his 57 daughter as a marriage portion, because he spends 9
all he gets on himself." 128
"No such thing; my Susette is betrothed to an 24 honest young French cabinet-maker, who, poor as 65
she is, will marry her next September." 54
"A daughter to portion!" exclaimed the stranger 95 artist; "that quite alters the case. I am content 53 that the picture should be sold for a marriage 103 portion. I leave it to our English friend's 14 generosity to fix the sum." 58
"I have already offered," replied the best bidder, 102
"one hundred guineas for the sketch just as it is. 7
I will gladly give two hundred for it if the painter 39 will consent to sign it in the corner with one 126 word." 114
"What word?" exclaimed all the disputants at 111
once. 36
The Englishman replied: 48
"Meissonier." 49
The whole party were quiet enough now, for they 21 were struck dumb with astonishment. The sign- 85 painter held his breath, glared with his eyes, 117 frantically clasped his hands together, and fell 35 down on his knees before the great French painter. 19
"Forgive me!" he exclaimed, "forgive me for 37
my audacious ignorance." 3
Meissonier laughed heartily; and, taking his 8 hand, shook it with fraternal cordiality. 81

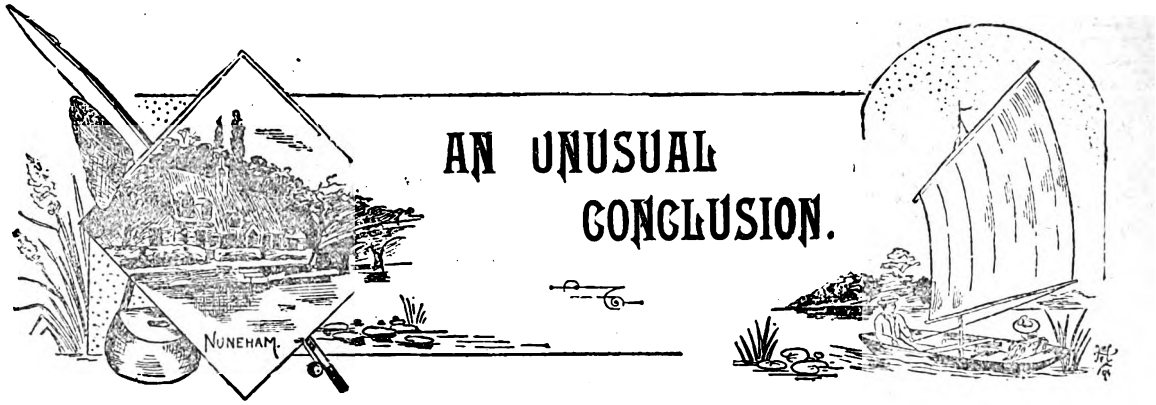
Digitized by Google



AN UNUSUAL CONCLUSION.

Mr. Clarke Randolph was stupefied by a discovery which he had just made—his wife no longer loved him, and the man who had stolen her from him was his nearest friend, Henry Stockton. If there had been the least chance for a doubt, the unhappy husband would have seized upon it, but there was none whatever.

Let us try to understand what this meant to such a man as Randolph. He was a high-bred, high-spirited man of thirty, descended from a long line of proud and chivalrous men, educated, refined, sensitive, generous and brave. His fine talents, his dash, his polished manner, his industry, his integrity, his loftiness of character, had lifted him upon the shoulders of popularity and prosperity.

He had been married four years. His wife was beautiful, winsome, and intelligent; and she had always had from him the best devotion that a husband could give his wife. He and Stockton had been friends for many years. Next to his wife, Randolph had loved and trusted him above all others.

Such was the situation. At one stroke he had lost his wife, his home, his best friend, his confidence in human nature, his spirit, his ambition. These—and essentially they were all that made up his life, except the operation of purely animal functions—had gone all at once, without a moment's warning.

Well, there was something to be done. A keen sense of the betrayal, a smarting under the gross humiliation, urged him to the natural course of revenge. This, as he sat crouched down in a chair in his locked office, he began systematically to arrange, struggling earnestly to bring his mind under control and direct his thoughts into coherent forms. The first idea—always first in such cases—was to kill. That, in the case of a man of his spirit and temperament, was a matter of course. Fear of the legal consequences found no place within him. Besides, suicide would settle that exceedingly small part of the difficulty.

So it was first decided that as the result of this discovery three persons had to die—his wife, his friend, and himself. Very well; that took a load from his mind. An orderly and intelligent arrangement of details now had to be worked out. A plan which would bring the largest results in the satisfaction of a desire for revenge must be chosen. The simple death of these two, the bare stoppage of breath, would be wholly inadequate. First, the manner of taking their lives must have the quality of strength and a force which in itself would have a large element of satisfaction; hence it must be striking, deliberate, brutal, if you wish; revolting, if you are particular. Second, it must be preceded by exposure, denunciation, publication, scorn, contempt, and terror.

Randolph was in the act of leaving his office to go and buy a revolver, when he was startled by what he saw in his office mirror. It required a moment for him to recognise his own reflection. His face was unnaturally white, a discolouration was under his eyes, which had a glassy appearance, his lips were pressed tightly together, the corners of his mouth drawn down, large dark veins standing out on his temples. Fearing that if, while in this condition, he should apply to a gunsmith for a revolver, he would be refused, he stood for some time before the mirror trying to restore the natural expression of his face. He kneaded his lips to remove their stiffness, pinched his cheeks to bring back their colour, rubbed down the ridged veins, and scraped a little of the white plaster from the wall, and with it concealed the dark colour under his eyes. Then he went forth with a firm step, bought the revolver without difficulty, tried it, satisfied himself that it was reliable, loaded it, put it into his pocket, and returned to his office.

For there were certain matters of property to be attended to. He had a considerable fortune, all his separate posession; his wife had brought him nothing. He now felt clear minded enough to dispose of his estate intelligently. He drew his will—a holographic instrument—devising his wealth to various persons and benevolent sccieties.

He glanced at his office clock. There would be four long hours yet before the time for going home to dinner. How should Randolph employ these weary hours? There was nothing to do, nothing even to think of. He tried to read a newspaper, then a book, and failed; looked out upon the crowds which thronged Princes Street; counted the cabs awhile; tried other things, failed at everything and then sat down.

Something was beginning to work in the wretched man. Let us see! His wife, whilst pretending the warmest affection for him, was receiving the attentions of a traitor in the house; she had wrecked his life, had driven him to his death. Really, therefore, she had swept aside all the obligations which the marital relation imposed. In essence she was no longer his wife, but a criminal enemy, who, with deliberate and abounding malice, had destroyed him. He could go to the grave with a willing heart, but he could not permit her to live and enjoy his downfall and gloat over his destruction. But would she really do that? And then, she was a woman!

Digitized by Google

In spite of all that she had done, she was a woman. A strong man, his strength reinforced by a revolver, employs deception to bring a woman into a room, locks the door, insults, humiliates, and terrifies her, brandishes a revolver, and then kills her like a rat in its hole. Can a brave man, of mature judgment and in possession of his faculties, do such a thing? Why, it would not only be murder, but cowardice as well. No; it could not be done. She was still a woman, with all the weakness, all the frailty which her sex imposed. It could not be done.

After all, it would be far sweeter revenge to let her live, bearing through life a brand of infamy. That would be much better. She would lose her high position and the respect of her friends; the newspapers would publish her shame to the world, pointing her out by name as the depraved woman who had betrayed her husband and driven him to suicide; they would have her portrait in their columns; her name and crime would be hawked in the street by loud-crying newsboys. Not only that, but she would be stripped of all the property which she had enjoyed so much. She would be turned adrift upon the streets, for no one would help her, none have a kind word for her, none give her even the respect which money might command. Being thus turned out upon the world all friendless and alone, and soon taking to drink, as such women always do, down she would plunge into a reckless career, sinking lower and lower, losing her beauty, becoming coarse, loud, and vulgar—such a life would be infinitely worse than death, such a revenge immeasurably vaster than the pistol. Then it was finally decided that she must live and suffer.

The man who had stolen her from him.

As to the friend—as to Stockton, the betrayer, the sneak, the coward—he should die like a dog. That decision could not be reconsidered.

These things being settled, the wretched man re-read the will. As the woman was to live, she must be mentioned in the document. He tore up the will and wrote another, in which he bequeathed her one shilling. Then he wrote out a separate statement of the whole affair, sealed it, addressed it to the coroner, and placed it in his pocket. It would be found there after a while.

Well, why this trembling in every member, this unaccountable nausea, this unconquerable feeling of horror and repugnance as the draft of the picture was contemplated? Did instinct arise and dumbly plead for mercy? What mercy had been shown that mercy could be expected? None whatever. There was not only revenge to be satisfied, but justice also. Still, it was horrible! Admit that she deserved it all, deserved even more, she was a woman! No act of hers could deprive her of her natural claims upon the stronger sex. As a woman she had inalienable rights which even she could not forfeit, which men could not withhold. And then, where could be the benefit of adding physical sufferings to mental? One surely would weaken the force of the other. The lower she should fall and the deeper her degradation, the smaller would become the efficiency of her mental agony; and yet mental suffering was the kind which it was desired should fall upon her.

It would be well, therefore, to leave her some money—a considerable amount of money—in order that, holding herself above the want which in her case would lead to degradation and a blunting of the sensibilities, she might suffer all the more keenly—in order that the memory of her shame might be for ever poignant, for ever a cause for the sharpest regrets. This would be better in other ways; her shame published, she could never associate with those fine characters who had been her friends; her lover dead and his memory disgraced, he could not be present to console her; for society she would have only those whom her fortune would attract, and they were not of a kind to satisfy such a woman as she; she would always be within sight of the old life and its pleasures, but just beyond the pale—near enough to see and long for, but too far to reach, and for ever kept back by the cold glance of contempt, the disdain of the high circle in which she had been reared.

Therefore, it was better to leave her the bulk of his fortune. So he tore up the second will, and wrote a third, in which, while naming her as his principal legatee he incorporated the story of her shame. He felt better now than at any time since his discovery. He walked about the room, looked out of the window, then sank into his chair again.

Digitized by Google

Then, having faced the proposition that he had been considering his own case all along, he found the situation to be somewhat like this: He had a certain understanding which should operate to remove him from influences which with men of inferior conceptions would be more powerful; not being a brute, he should rise above impulses which a brute is constrained by its nature to obey. So much was clear. Then, what should he do? He pondered this long and seriously.

Was it possible to wipe out the past with exposure, humiliation, shame, and blood? He had been proud of her, he had loved her, he had been very, very happy with her. She had been his inspiration, a part of his hopes, his ambition, his life. True, she had undone all this, but the memory of it remained. Until this recent act she had been kind, unselfish, gentle, and faithful. Who could sound the depths of this strange mystery; who measure the capacity of her resistance; who judge her frailty with a righteous mind; who say that at that very moment she was not suffering unspeakable things? And then, was there anyone so noble of character, with integrity so unfailing and so far beyond temptation, that he might say he was better than she? Compassion is an attribute of a noble character. The test of manhood is the exercise of its qualities.

What good would come from this revenge of humiliation and exposure? It would not mend the wrong, it would not save life; it would be only proof of the vanity, the sense of self importance of the injured one. Would it be possible to spare her? Yes. That finally was settled. She should live, she should have the property, she should be left to enjoy life as best she could without the shadow of stain upon her name. That were the nobler part, the test of manhood. And then, the past could not be forgotten!

Randolph felt so much better after arriving at this decision that he marvelled at himself. He walked about the room feeling strong and elastic. He tore up the will because it charged her crime upon her; tore up the letter to the coroner; collected all the scraps of paper and carefully burnt them. Then he drew a new will, free from stain, leaving all his property to his wife. He did not only that, but he wrote her a letter—formal, of course—merely saying that he had found his life a mistake; this he sealed, addressed, and placed in his pocket.

Stockton—the false fiend, the betrayer and destroyer—he should die, he should die like a dog. But not with a stain on his name—that were impossible, because it would reflect upon her.

Here was a new situation. The two men would be found dead, likely in the same room—the friend and the husband. What would people think? A duel? For what reason? Murder and suicide! Who had handled the weapon, and for what possible cause? The road which suspicion would travel was too short and wide. The fair name of the wife was to be guarded—that had been decided upon, and now it was the first consideration.

Nor was that all. She loved him—that must be so. What would be the benefit of removing him from her life? It would be merely revenge—revenge upon both of them; and where lies the nobility of such revenge? If they both should live, both go unexposed, they might be happy together.

After all, whom would that disturb, whose pleasure interfere with? Surely no sound of their happiness could penetrate the grave; violence would be done to none of Nature's laws. Why should they not be happy? If they could, why should they not? Was there any reason under the sun that charity, compassion, and a high manhood could give why they should not be happy?

But suppose that she should suspect the cause of her husband's suicide; this would likely poison her life, for the consciousness of guilt would give form to suspicion. The result would be an abhorrence of self, a detestation of the participant in her sin, a belief that the blood of her husband was upon her head, and a long train of evils which would seriously impair, if not wholly destroy, the desired serenity of her life. Was there any way to prevent the birth of such a suspicion?

Yes; there was a way. As soon as Randolph had worked it out he felt as if an enormous load had been removed from him. His eyes shone brightly, his cheeks were flushed, and a look of pride and triumph lighted up his face.

He returned to his chair, removed the revolver from his pocket and laid it on the table; wrote his wife an affectionate letter, in which he told her that he had just become aware of an incurable ailment which he had not the courage to face through months or years of suffering and begged her to look to Stockton for friendship and advice; wrote to Stockton, charging him with her protection; burnt the last will that he had made and drew a new one, in which he left them the property jointly, on condition that they marry within two years. Then, with a perfectly clear head, he laid down his pen and sighed, but his face was bright and tranquil. He picked up the revolver, cocked it, placed the muzzle against his temple, and without a tremour of a nerve he pressed the trigger.

W. C. Morrow.

SEE NEXT PAGE.

Jumbled Story Competition.

No. 14.

In order to lessen the amount of work undertaken by competitors in pasting up the separate lines of the story in these competitions, each line is now numbered, and all that readers need do is to write clearly on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order they believe to be correct. The title and author's name are jumbled up, and should be correctly given. Only one attempt is permitted from each person.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the reader whose solution first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Six Prizes—one of £5 and five of £1 each—are
5 October 5th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reaches this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose key is most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on 13 believe to be correct, thus:

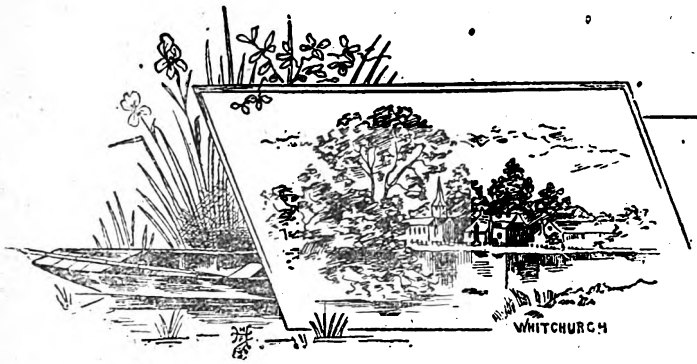
Digitized by Google



ETCHER'S CHOICE PIN.

Jumbled Story No. 14.

In the Rose Garden were forty maidens, the dark-eyed beauty. But while the Prince talked with the hedge and came suddenly upon this lady, who blossoms, in and out of the winding paths; and borne on the wings of the bees and the breath of the nightingales.

She was happy herself, and wanted her friends to clad in pale green the colour of the new shoots on rose-petals.

In the farthest corner it was known that the fluttering of a dainty dress, green, the colour of the golden hair.

Suddenly a murmur stole through the garden, the approach of the Prince, sank upon the soft moss, and, though he turned quickly into the next path pale, new shoots on the rose-trees, caught his eye. He had become quite pale. "You know," he confer great honour upon his wife, was justified in and the Prince's choice must be perfection.

A beautiful girl stood near. He spoke to her. Prince had come.

The Prince was to choose a wife.

Granting this, surely the Prince, who was to great and unusual privilege in this choice. He seeks the rose-trees.

He could not tell whether it was the sunlight course?"

Instead of following the path, the Prince parted from one fair face to another, ever pictured some noblest daughters of the kingdom.

As he passed on, a languid brunette paused at music of the wind and water, but she had no deep eyes.

The neck and shoulders were daintier than any excitement of the hour, dreading, yet longing for fairer face, hidden from sight in the winding wind!

Just then a gleam of gold through the trees again, there was nothing to be seen.

As he turned away from the fountain, the branch must have deceived him.

He was modest, and did not consider himself in his approach. He stopped to speak with the rose, and the pretty head glistened with a mass of her, he saw through the branches a slender figure, playing in her fair hair or in the heart of a rose; dazzled him.

"I wish to speak with you," said the Prince.

The lady's little hand slipped behind her.

"I must give him good and sufficient reason for are you besides the most enchanting of women? You deny yourself every virtue and every grace. You sing? I have not heard your voice; it must any way perfect; but naturally a man, however frail the selection I make. Tell me of yourself! What wonderful in any way.

No, she was not wise; the Prince was mistaken.

"I wish to put my ring on your little hand."

The lady bowed.

Such a slippery little hand! It stayed not a share in her happiness. But no! She was not too forward: one too serious; another too light—Prince would hear her later.

She was poised ready for flight; and the Prince, kissed her.

"I am your choice, and I can love you. Is it nothing of art; this one was too retiring; that one surrenders her life to his.

"But I must talk with you first," said the Prince. What are you? What can you do?"

This lady knew nothing of music; that lady knew my happiness and trusts my discretion.

No, she was not noted for benevolence and looked up with some suggestion of mutiny in her hand, as if to detain her.

"But shall your lover be less to you than your guitar was by the fountain. She could sing; the be purest melody."

No, the lady did not play. She liked to hear the word, though one by one he passed them by.

Some posed on the raised marble brim of the paths.

"Then you are fond of music? You play, of some, overcome by the perfume of the flowers, the friend?" cried the Prince. "I am unhappy! Give a careful search.

And the Prince put the ring upon her finger and continued nervously, "my father has given me a moment in his grasp, but the lady paused and had until now so successfully eluded him.

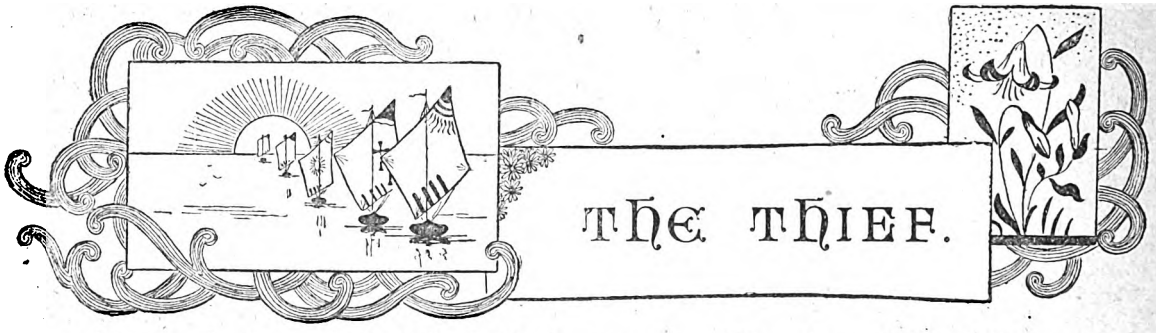
No, she did not sing, but loved to hear the fountain; some walked, with regal tread, among the who felt no inclination to seek further, caught her and cooled their feverish cheeks on the dewy enough?" she answered, smiling at him.

Quietly he entered; and his eyes, wandering was, it vanished so quickly that he fancied a waving he be, expects perfection in the woman who 'Twas only a momentary glimpse, for, whatever it me peace by telling why I should choose you. She answered with easy grace. Yes, she played; her patience with her guitar.

Yet for each and all the Prince had a graceful charity.

BESIE LOUECHER.

Digitized by Google



THE THIEF.

It was Saturday evening, and a few intimate friends had just had their cup of tea in the pretty little apartment of Madame Gilbert in the Rue de Rennes.

Two years had already passed since the death of Colonel Gilbert. His widow lived modestly and quietly, concentrating all the affection of her romantic soul upon her son André. He was scarcely eighteen, of a delicate constitution, somewhat weakened by too rapid growth, and had not yet ceased to show towards his mother the most demonstrative affection and an almost timid respect.

He was a fresh-faced boy, whose blushes came quite charmingly in the society of ladies. This evening the gathering was a little more numerous than on most Saturdays, but still entirely informal, and Madame Gilbert's tiny parlour looked especially dainty and attractive. Madame, herself, was quietly and gracefully attentive to the unexpressed wants of her guests, and moved among them, a charming presence, in the rich, perfected beauty of her thirty-five years.

Suddenly a friend of André, who had been seated on a cushioned seat by the window, bent forward to listen to some sound outside. The strident voice of a newspaper vendor could be heard in the street intoning——

"Here y'are! Just out! Full account of the horrible murder of a ra-r-r-r-ra!"

The end of the sentence was lost in the roar of a passing omnibus. A moment later the same voice repeated its doleful chant.

In the parlour all listened, and each tried to be the one to distinguish the end of the phrase. After several ineffectual attempts the auditors smiled at one another, shook their heads, and gave it up, and the conversation was resumed, while the clamour gradually died away in the distance.

"It is the same story every day," said some one. "A new murder, a new victim. I should like to add a new prisoner; but that would not be true, under the present conditions of impunity in crime."

The man who had just spoken immediately obliterated his face behind his large cup, below which appeared his short, black beard, streaked with grey. He was a former prefect of the Empire, and was well known by most present to have been an admirer of Madame Gilbert before her marriage—and after it, some said. However, he had disappeared for some time, and this was the first evening he had joined the little circle to offer salutations to his former friend. He had been received in the presence of all graciously, without surprise or effusion, or apparent resentment.

A member of the Institute replied to him:

"I do not know if the Government is really responsible in these matters. At all events, it is discouraging to consider that in spite of the most perfect laws, and in spite of whatever personal precautions we may adopt, our very existence is constantly at the mercy of an violent scoundrel we may meet."

"Yes," said Madame Gilbert, "we have all our plans for the future. We guard our health and our resources; it sometimes seems as if we might spare ourselves the trouble."

"A madman passes," suggested a red-ribboned violinist, "and a vagabond bullet from the revolver he is wildly brandishing lands in my head!"

"Or else," adds the large and comfortable wife of the academician, "a discharged cook revenges herself by a last seasoning to our salad."

Madame Gilbert enumerated still other general cases.

"Sometimes it is a beggar who kills you without any special animosity, and sometimes, on the other hand, it is a wretch who has no other excuse but his hatred——"

"Or his love," concluded the ex-prefect, with a vague, sad smile.

Then it was who could relate the most anecdotes founded upon experience, upon reading, or upon the tales of some absent friend. Murders were recalled which had been committed in railway-carriages, in boxes at the theatre, in private rooms at restaurants. Night attacks were recounted—servants who had choked their masters, in flagrant violation of the best recommendations; finally, a miscellaneous assortment of parricides, fratricides, and infanticides.

Insensibly the gathering had become tragic. The newsboy's voice, as he repassed across the street, startled them again. The guests had by this time risen to go, and as they said good-night some of them told of the particular terrors which had always haunted them. A lady, who had a pretty talent for painting on porcelain, confessed frankly:

"Nothing frightens me like the thought of those frightful wretches who slip into your room with a false key, or by forcing the door. I am hardly in bed before this terror seizes me. I try to sleep, but my fear is too strong. Oh! Heavens! if my door should slowly and mysteriously open! And if a face should appear, as pale as my own, but set, fierce and determined! My mind sees this face clearly. Every night its features appear before me. Ah! if it should become a reality to-night, to-morrow night, what should I do? What should I say? What would become of me?"

The two blonde daughters of this lady surrounded her with a charming expression of saucy courage.

"Yes, yes, darlings," sighed their mother. "We three wouldn't amount to much if a thief got among us."

"I know what I should do," said the elder. "If that happened, I should just pretend I was asleep, so there!"

"For me," said the younger, "I should be afraid of betraying myself, if only from curiosity. Oh! I am sure

Digitized by Google

I should risk at least one eye. Then I should say very quietly: 'Mr. Thief, take all you want to from here. I shall not stir; I shall make no outcry, if only you don't touch me!'"

"This kind of apprehension," said Madame Gilbert, "has never troubled me. For one thing, I have faith in my safety-locks, and then I know thieves are such cowards that that makes me brave. Still, Madame, I have, like you, the uneasy loneliness of a widow."

"But," interrupted the other, "you are not alone. Your son's room is within the sound of your voice."

"My son! Do you suppose, then, I would call that poor child to help me? To see him massacred?"

With his sententious authority the academician interposed:

"Rest assured, Madame Gilbert, that a son can be massacred no more easily than a husband."

At first this judicious remark silenced for a moment the mistress of the house, but then she answered with a little grimace. And this little grimace expressed a preference so decided for one of the two species of love which divide a woman's heart, this little grimace was so defiant of polite hypocrisies and unfriendly comment that everyone laughed uproariously, as all in a group they said good-night, protesting that they had stayed much later than they meant to, although it was then only half-past ten.

Only one person, the ex-prefect, lingered a little in the hall, with intentional awkwardness getting entangled in his overcoat.

From the back of the parlour, Madame Gilbert, sure that all were gone, scolded. "Come, André, get to bed at once. You are entirely too tired. Didn't you notice how badly you were looking to-night?"

(Every evening she asked him the same question with the same solicitude. "Not at all, mamma," her big boy would say, shrugging his shoulders. And this perfunctory reply was all that was necessary to reassure, until the next evening, this mother, like many another in her daily and unnecessary alarm.)

"André went to find a cigar for me," murmured a voice, whose familiar, though half-forgotten, vibrations made her quiver from head to foot.

And the speaker, returning towards her, with hurried step, said humbly, but passionately:

"Ah! If you would let me explain, defend myself. Yes, I was very wrong to let anything come between us! But I have repented, I do repent, and I love you more than ever! Jeannette! Jeannette!" he cried, in a suppressed voice.

She clasped her hands, and her face was marked by so many conflicting emotions, that one would have found it hard to tell whether this superb woman crushed between her white hands her anger or her grief.

"Do you dare?" she faltered at last. "I never can—silence. Here is my son!"

When, under her supervision, the maid had put in something like order Madame Gilbert's little parlour, and she had herself, according to her invariable custom, examined the locks of the doors leading to the great stairway and that of the servants, she shut herself into her own room. Once there, an unusual languor depressed her nerves. Instead of being in bed in less than a quarter of an hour, as was her usual habit, she forgot herself for double that time, dreaming in the depths of an armchair.

Across the corridor she heard André undressing, going back and forth; after a little, silence fell all around her. Her fingers, which were mechanically taking down her hair, became clumsy and were entangled in its meshes. Her mind was very busy.

"What did this return signify? What was the explanation he spoke of? What had come between them? It was all a mystery. But why had he said anything, unless he wanted to marry her now that her mourning was over?"

She rose, and going to her dressing-room, stared long and earnestly into the full-length mirror. A little later when she put out the lamp, lit the tiny nightlight, and went to bed, it was twenty-five minutes to twelve.

"Oh!" she thought, "was I sufficiently reserved?"

Instead of the sleep she hoped for she could get only a dizzying succession of broken naps and confusing dreams.

"No, no, in the future she owed herself without reserve to the adoration of her son. All the flame of her ardent soul should burn henceforth for that sole object. Ah, maternal affection was the only affection that was not deceptive and disappointing."

For some minutes she slumbered. But the rattle of a carriage woke her suddenly; a confused terror mingled with her vague remembrance of the recent conversation. Without knowing why, she listened to the last faint echo of the rolling wheels. And after it had died away the keen tension of her ears perceived in the neighbouring corridor a faint creaking.

"How silly I am!" she thought. "Even if it should be anyone, couldn't I reach the window at one bound? Then to smash out a pane and scream for help would be easy. What burglar would not fly before this unexpected energy and the certain response to the noise I would make? A man is only a man, after all."

And with this wise reflection, hearing no further noise, she buried her head in her pillow, determined to go to sleep at last. Nevertheless the thought of him took hold of her again. What audacity of him to come to her reception! After his base desertion which had forced her into a distasteful marriage! She remembered with remorse how little she had given to her husband, and her remorse turned to anger as she remembered how he, on his part, had neglected her. Again the widow's eyelids opened nervously.

Suddenly the blood in her veins seemed to congeal with supernatural horror.

There—just at the foot of the bed—the curtain was moving. And on its silken folds appeared a large hand, a scarlet hand. Madame Gilbert, terrified, incapable of articulating a sound, hoped at first that she was mistaken. Still she dared not move, not even an eyelash, as she lay still; sunk deeply into her soft pillow and far back in the curtained darkness of her bed. The absolute stillness was weird and alarming.

But presently the clock began to strike midnight. Every stroke seemed to Jeannette to prick into her like needles. By almost imperceptible degrees the portière was gradually raised.

As the clock was on the stroke a monster appeared!

It was a scarlet face, frightfully cut in two by a green moustache, beneath a nose of the most fiery red, which looked like a beak. Between two red horns was a mass of shaggy green hair. This frightful head peered into her recess, leaning upon the scarlet hand a chin from which hung a long green beard. The gaze of the apparition, fixed beneath its green eyelashes, sought the terrified gaze of Jeannette, shrinking in her dark corner. She felt herself carried far beyond the limits of what she had supposed a bearable terror. For she recognised them well, those eyes which sought her own with such sombre fierceness. They were surely, surely the eyes of her dead husband come to life again. Yes, she recognised them, without the relief of the slightest hesitation. And she recognised, too, that fierce moustache, and long beard, so diabolically coloured by those horrible vapours!

Digitized by Google

But what did he want, this returning spirit, who had never returned before? Why did he come this very night? And just after him! What fatal precision!

After a few torturing moments the fantastic being showed his full figure. He was tall and thin, clothed in black, with a white cravat, and held stiffly his bony arms, terminating, the left, in a green hand, and the right in a scarlet one. His long, narrow feet were covered with varnished boots ending in an incredible point. He advanced upon the carpet one step, then another. Then he glided forward in spectral fashion for several steps, and paused, wavering lightly on his toes.

The lips of the widow were incapable of forming a prayer. Her flesh crept at the sight of this phantom. Still gliding nearer to the alcove, the tall figure of the demon at last stood between the curtains. The shadowy light of the nightlamp illuminated the weird colour of this face, transformed and yet too familiar, alas!

By a last gleam of determination Jeanette lay still, with her eyes closed. No sound in the room, no sound in the street, no sound in the world!

The burning breath of a mouth close to her face seemed to scorch her. Pierced to the marrow by the intolerable breath, she felt her eyelids tremble and her skin shrivel. A nervous twitching in every joint seemed to seize her, and made it almost impossible to lie still beneath her covering. As soon as the flaming breath on her face seemed extinguished, an intense desire to see took possession of her. With the most minute care she slightly opened her eyes.

Oh! horror, the apparition was still there. But now its back was turned, its shoulders showing angular through its coat, like the fleshless bones of a skeleton. The green and the scarlet hand, working together with satanic skill, had opened wide without a sound the great glass doors of the wardrobe, whose hinges usually creaked so noisily.

Jeannette Gilbert had recovered her calmness sufficiently to seek the protection of God. She was about to make the sign of the cross, when the green and red devil as if he had divined this Christian impulse, turned suddenly towards her. His excited eyes flashed towards her a gleam whose power, more and more recognisable, she had often experienced.

She could see that his green hand was fumbling among a heap of rich laces, one of the few remnants of her wedding trousseau, and that the scarlet hand was plunged into a jewel casket, where the widow had herself recently put away her wedding ring. In her corner she could hear only a slight rustling as he moved the things. The silence and the supernatural mystery of all his movements stupefied her.

The strange visitor appeared about to close the door of the wardrobe when his hand fell upon an atomizer. With solemn gravity he sprinkled the perfume liberally upon his hair, his beard, and his scarlet cheeks. That finished, with one turn he vanished behind the portière.

The heavy drapery shook after his sudden disappearance, and long after the widow watched with a fascinated apprehension the folds wavering. When at last the thick hangings were still again, by a mighty effort Jeannette sat up in bed. She pinched herself, even pulled out an eyelash, to make sure she was awake. She spoke aloud to herself, but doubted the sound of her own voice.

While she was lost in doubt, the outside world, whose existence had seemed to her interrupted, renewed its tranquil course. A heavy waggon rumbled along the street. Half-past twelve sounded. Outside some wayfarer passed, piercing the air with his cheerful whistling. This manifestation of accustomed realities soothed Jeannette's heart. Her lungs dilated as she drew a full breath of relief.

Hastily she threw on a dressing-wrapper, and impatient to assure herself that the Thing—whether phantom or nightmare—was quite gone, she passed on tiptoe out of her room.

The parlour was still in comparative disorder after the modest reception. The dining-room was deserted. In the kitchen, the hall, nothing was visible. Courage was returning to Madame Gilbert, but not calm. As she passed along the hall on which opened the two sleeping-rooms, a strong desire seized her to see her son, to look with mute admiration upon that dear head in its innocent sleep, which no phantom had the right to haunt. With tender timidity she opened the door softly and with careful precaution.

The room was empty. The faint light showed her that André's bedclothes had not been disturbed. With a despairing cry the wretched mother sprang forward. On the mantel she saw a taper, lately blown out, for a tiny spark still smoked on the wick. Across a chair the clothes André had worn that evening were thrown carelessly; on the table by the bed lay a comb and brush; a pair of boots stood in the corner.

The distracted mother rushed back and forth, seeking, fumbling here and there, and lamenting audibly. On the top of the half-open drawer of the bureau lay two new silk gloves. One was green, and one was scarlet. Below them white cravats, silk handkerchiefs, other gloves, a box of envelopes.

Boldly the poor mother flings out what yesterday she arranged so carefully. At the bottom of the drawer she finds a square card, engraved. She reads it eagerly.

"Madame la Comtesse Antonietta de Clem begs the pleasure of M. André Gilbert's company on the evening of the Mardi Gras. A cotillon will be danced. Guests are requested to appear in costume."

A sudden light dawned upon Madame Gilbert's bewilderment. She understood all! Hastening back to her room she went over the contents of her wardrobe. Yes, that was it. From the pocket-book hidden below the laces a hundred-franc bill had been taken. In the casket, where the widow's rings were with her gold-pieces, two louis, perhaps three, were missing. "My poor son!" groaned the mother. "My poor son!"

How easily now could she explain the most mysterious details. In her bitter reflections she could see her son's eyes, so changed by fear and deceit that their usual gentle expression was replaced, by some mysterious heredity, with the hard, threatening look of his father.

Before daylight Madame Gilbert, through her tears and prayers, heard the furtive steps of the prodigal son returning to his room. Cold shivers ran over her frame. But they were shivers of pity and of triumphant love. She was lost in tender pity for André, for herself—and for another!

And, prostrate before her ivory crucifix, she listened to the counsels of a mysterious voice murmuring in her heart that human happiness is constantly built up with the broken fragments of past joys!

Paul Hervieu.

Digitized by Google

"THADDEUS," said Bessie to her husband as they sat at breakfast one morning, "did you hear anything strange in the house last night? Something like a footstep?"

"No," said Thaddeus. "I slept like a top last night. I didn't hear anything. Did you?"

"I thought so," said Bessie. "About two o'clock I awoke with a start, and while it may have been a sort of waking dream, I was almost certain I heard a rustling sound out in the hall, and, immediately after, a creaking on the stair, as though there was somebody there."

"Well, why on earth didn't you wake me up, Bess?" returned Thaddeus. "I could very easily have decided the matter by getting up and investigating."

"That was why I didn't wake you, Teddy. I'd a great deal rather lose the silver or anything else in the house a burglar might want than have you hit on the head with a club," said Bessie. "You men are too brave."

"Thank you," said Thaddeus, with a smile, as he thought of a certain discussion he had had not long before at the club, in which he and several other brave men had reached the unanimous conclusion that the best thing to do at dead of night, with burglars in the house, was to crawl down under the bedclothes and snore as loudly as possible. "Nevertheless, my dear, you should have told me."

"I will next time," said Bessie.

"Was anything in the house disturbed?" Thaddeus asked.

"No," said Bessie. "Not a thing, as far as I can find out. The maid says that everything was all right when she came down; the cook apparently found things straight, because she hasn't said anything."

So Thaddeus and Bessie made up their minds that the latter had been dreaming, and that nothing was wrong. Two or three days later, however, they changed their minds on the subject. There was something decidedly wrong, but what it was, they could not discover. They both were awakened by the rustling sound in the hallway, outside their room, and this time there was a creak on the stair that was unmistakable.

"Don't move, Thaddeus," said Bessie in a terrified whisper, as Thaddeus made a brave effort to get up and personally investigate. "I wouldn't have you hurt for all the world, and there isn't a thing downstairs that they can take that we can't afford to lose."

Thaddeus felt very much as Bessie did, and it would have pleased him much better to lie quietly where he was

Digitized by Google

than run the risk of an encounter with thieves. He had been brave enough in the company of men to advocate cowardice in an emergency like this, but now that this same course was advocated by his wife he saw it in a different light. Prudence was possible; cowardice was not. He must get up, and get up he did; but before going out of his room he secured his revolver, which had lain untouched and unloaded in a drawer for two years, and then advanced cautiously to the head of the stairs and listened—Bessie meanwhile having buried her face in her pillow, as a possible means of assuaging her fears. It is singular what a soothing effect a soft feather pillow sometimes has upon the agitated nerves if the nose of the agitated person is thrust far enough into its yielding surface.

"Who is there?" cried Thaddeus, standing at the head of the stairs, his knees all of a shake, but whether from fear or from cold, as an admirer of Thaddeus, I prefer not to state.

Apparently the stage whisper in which this challenge to a possible burglar was uttered rendered it unavailing, for there was no reply; but that there was some one below who could reply Thaddeus was now convinced, for there were sounds in the library—sounds, however, suggestive of undue attention to domestic duties rather than of that which fate has mapped out for house-breakers. The library floor was apparently being swept.

"That's the biggest idiot of a burglar I've ever heard of," said Thaddeus, returning to his room.

"Wha—wha—what, d—dud—dear?" mumbled Bessie, burying her ear in the pillow for comfort now that she was compelled to take her nose away, so that she might talk intelligibly.

"I say that burglar must be an idiot," repeated Thaddeus. "What do you suppose he is doing now?"

"Wha—wha—what, d—dear?" asked Bessie, apparently unable to think of any other formula than this in speaking, since this was the second time she had used it.

"He is sweeping the library."

"Then you must not go down!" cried Bessie, sitting up, and losing her fear for a moment in her anxiety for her husband's safety. "A burglar you might manage, but a maniac——"

"I must go, Bess," said Thaddeus firmly.

"Then I'm going with you," said Bessie with equal firmness.

"Now, Bess, don't be foolish," returned Thaddeus, his face assuming a graver expression than Bessie had ever seen there. "This is my work, and it is none of yours. I positively forbid you to stir out of this room. I shall be very careful, and you need have no concern for me. I shall go down the back stairs and round by the porch, and peep in through the library window first. The moonlight will be sufficient to enable me to see all that is necessary."

"Very well," acquiesced Bessie. "Only do be careful."

Thaddeus donned his long bath robe, put on his slippers, and started to descend. The stairs were so dark that he could with difficulty proceed—and perhaps it was just as well for Thaddeus that they were. If there had been light enough for him to see two great, glaring eyes, that stared at him through that darkness out from the passage-way at the foot of the stairs upon which he turned his back when he went out into the porch, it is not unlikely that a very serious climax to his strange experience would have been reached then and there. As it was he saw nothing, but kept straight ahead, stepped noiselessly out upon the verandah, crept stealthily along in the soft light of the moon, until he reached the library window. There he stopped and listened. All was still within—so still that the beating of his heart seemed like the hammering of a sledge upon an anvil by contrast. Then, raising himself cautiously upon his toes, he peered through the window into the room, the greater part of which was made visible by the wealth of the moon's light streaming into it.

"Humph!" said Thaddeus, after he had directed his searching gaze into every corner. "There isn't anybody there at all. Most incomprehensible thing I ever heard of."

Rising, he walked back to the verandah door, and went thence boldly into the library and lit the gas His Crept stealthily along.

verandah observations were then verified, for the room was devoid of life, save for Thaddeus's own presence; but upon the floor, before the hearth, was a broom, and there were evidences also that the sweeping sounds he had heard had been caused by no less an instrument than this, for in the corner of the fireplace was a small heap of dust, cigar ashes, and scraps of paper, which Thaddeus remembered had been upon the floor in greater or less quantity when he had turned out the gas to retire for the night.

"This is a serious matter," he said to himself. "Something is wrong, and I doubt if there have been burglars in the house—but I can ascertain that without trouble. If the doors and windows are all secure, the trouble is internal."

Every accessible door and window on the basement and first floors was examined, and with the exception of the verandah door, which Thaddeus remembered to have unlocked himself a few minutes before, every lock was fastened. The disturbances had come from within.

Digitized by Google

"And Bess must never know it," said he. "It would worry her to death," and then there came a thought to Thaddeus's mind that almost stopped the beating of his heart.

"Unless she has discovered it in my absence," he gasped. In an instant he was mounting the stairs to hasten to Bessie's side, as though some terrible thing were pursuing him.

"Well, what is it, Ted?" queried Bessie, as he entered the room.

Thank Heaven, she was safe!

"Nothing much," said Thaddeus, in a moment. "There is no one below,"

"But what could it have been?"

"I haven't the slightest idea," said Thaddeus. "unless it was a stray cat in the house. The sweeping sound may have been caused by a cat scratching its collar—or purring—or—or something. At any rate, things appear to be all right, my dear, so let's go to sleep."

Thaddeus's assumed confidence in the rightness of everything, rather than his explanations, was convincing to Bessie, and she in a very short while was sleeping the sleep of the just and serene; but to Thaddeus's eyes there was no more sleep that night, and when morning came he rose unrefreshed. There were two problems confronting him. The first was to solve the mystery of the swept library floor; the second was to do this without arousing his wife's suspicions that anything was wrong. To do this first he deemed it necessary to remain at home that day, which was easy, but how to do so without explaining why, was the point that bothered him. He solved it to his satisfaction very shortly, however. He summoned a messenger, and sent by him a note to one of his neighbours, requesting him to send a fictitious telegram telling him that his presence in town that day would not be required. This, he judged, would come to him at the breakfast table, and could be turned off as a pleasant surprise both for himself and Bessie.

It worked as Thaddeus had intended.

"Isn't it nice that it happened this morning?" she said. "You will be able to make up for your loss of sleep last night."

"Yes," said Thaddeus. "It's great."

Breakfast passed off pleasantly, in spite of a great drawback: the steak was burned almost to a crisp, and the fried potatoes were like chips of wood.

"Margaret seems to be unfamiliar with the art of cooking this morning," said Thaddeus.

"So it would seem," said Bessie. "This steak is horrible."

"The worst part of it," said Thaddeus, "she has erred on the wrong side. If the steak were underdone it wouldn't be so bad. Isn't it a pity some one can't invent a machine to rarefy an overdone steak?"

The morning was spent by Thaddeus in the "noble pastime of snooping," as he called it. The house was searched by him in a casual sort of way from top to bottom for a clue to the mystery, but without avail. Several times he went below to the cellar, ostensibly to inspect his coal supply—really to observe the demeanour of Margaret, the cook. Barring an unusual pallor upon her cheek, she appeared to be as she always had been; but with the housemaid it was different. Mary was evidently excited over something, but over what Thaddeus could not, of course, determine at that time. Later in the day, however, the cause of her perturbation came out, and Thaddeus's effort to keep Bessie from anxiety over the occurrence of the night before was rendered unavailing. It was at luncheon. The table was set in a most peculiar fashion. The only china upon it was from an old set which had been discarded a year previous to the time of the story, and Bessie naturally wanted to know why, and the housemaid broke down.

"It's—it's all we have, ma'am," she said, her eyes filling with tears.

"All we have?" echoed Bessie, in surprise. "Why, what do you mean? Where is the other set?"

"I don't know," protested the housemaid.

"You don't know?" said Thaddeus, taking the matter in hand. "Why don't you know? Isn't the china a part of your care?"

"Yes, sir," replied the maid; "but it's gone, sir, and I don't know where."

"When did you miss it?" asked Thaddeus.

"Not until I came to set the table for lunch."

"Was it in its proper place at breakfast time?"

"I didn't notice, sir. The breakfast dishes were all there, but I don't remember seeing the other plates. I didn't think to look."

"Then it wasn't a cat," said Bessie, sinking back into her chair; "we have been robbed."

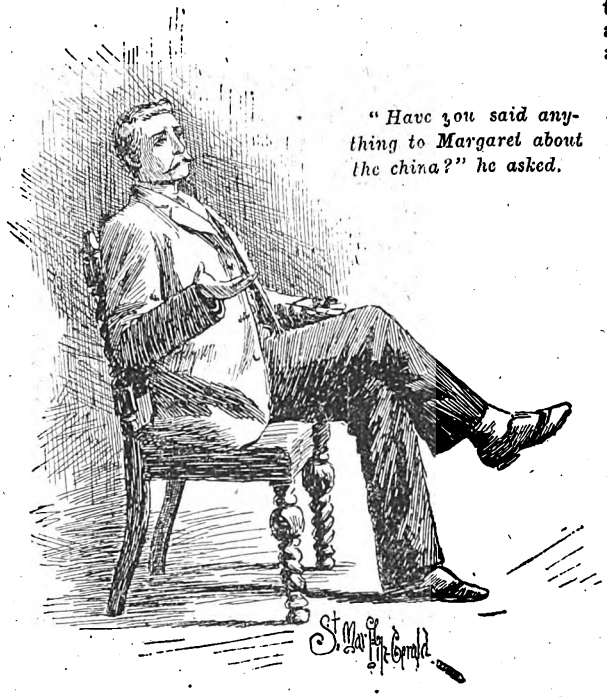
"Well, it's the first time on record that thieves have ever robbed a man of his china," said Thaddeus calmly. "Have you looked for the plates?" he added, addressing the housemaid.

"No, sir," she replied simply. "Where could I look?"

"That's so—where?" said Bessie. "There isn't much use looking for dishes when they disappear like that. They aren't like brooms or buttonhooks, to be mislaid easily. We have been robbed, that's all there is about that."

"Oh, well," said Thaddeus, "let's eat lunch, and see about it afterwards."

Digitized by Google



"Have you said anything to Margaret about the china?" he asked.

This was quite easy to say, but to eat under the circumstances was too much for either of the young householders. The luncheon left the table untouched; and when it was over, Thaddeus, calling his man into the house, wrote a note to the police station asking for an officer in plain clothes at once, and dispatched it by him with the injunction to let very little grass grow under his feet on the way down to headquarters. He then summoned the housemaid into the library.

"Have you said anything to Margaret about the china?" he asked.

"Yes, sir," she replied.

"What did you say?"

"I told her as how wasn't it funny the way it had went, sir."

"And what did she say?"

"Nothing, sir. Only she seemed to think it was funny, because she laughed."

"And what did you say then?"

"Nothing, sir. Margaret and me have very little conversation, because she don't fancy me, and prefers talkin' to herself like."

"H'm!" said Thaddeus. "Talks to herself, does she?"

"All the time, sir," returned the housemaid, "and she seems very fond of it, sir. She laughs and says things and then laughs again. She does it by the hour."

"How long has this been going on?"

"About a week, sir. I noticed it first last time I had my day out. I didn't get in until eleven o'clock, and I found her sitting at the table havin' a supper and talkin' and laughin' like as though there was folks around."

"She was entirely alone, was she?" asked Thaddeus.

"Yes, sir."

"What did you do when you came in?"

"I said good-evening to her and sat down opposite to her at the table, where there was a place set, and I told her I was glad she had something to eat and had a place set for me, because I hadn't had any supper and I was hungry, sir."

"Did she make any reply?"

"No, sir. She looked at me kind of indignant and turned out the gas and went up to bed, leavin' me in the dark."

Thaddeus's brow grew thoughtful again. It wrinkled into a half-dozen lines as he asked:

"Why didn't you speak of this before?"

"It ain't for me to be tellin' tales, sir," she said. "All cooks as I've lived with is queer like, and I didn't think any more about it."

"All right," said Thaddeus. "You may go. Only, Mary, don't speak of the plates again to Margaret. Say as little to her as you can, in fact, about anything. If you notice anything queer report to me at once."

The housemaid left the room, and Thaddeus turned to his desk. It was plain from his appearance that light was beginning to be let in on places that up to this point had been more or less dark to him, although, as a matter of fact, he could not in any way account for the mystery of the vanished plates any more than he could for the sweeping of the library in the still hours of the night. He had an idea as to who the culprit was, and what that idea was is plain enough to us, but the question of motive was the great puzzle to him now.

"If she did take them, why should she?" was the problem he was trying to solve; and then, as if his trials were not already great enough for one day, Bessie broke excitedly into the room.

"Thaddeus," she cried, "there's something wrong in this house. My best table-cloth is missing, our dessert spoons are gone, and what do you suppose has happened?"

"I don't know; a volcano has developed in the cellar, I suppose," said Thaddeus.

"No," said Bessie. "It isn't as bad as that—but the milkman has called to know whether we want the cream for dinner or for eleven o'clock, according to the order as he understands it."

"Well," said Thaddeus, "I don't see anything very unusual in a man's needing to be told three or four times what is expected of him."

"But I never ordered any cream at all," said Bessie.

"Ah!" said Thaddeus. "That's different. Did you tell Partinelli so?"

"I did, and he said he was sure he wasn't mistaken, because he had taken the order himself."

"From you?"

"No, from Margaret."

"Then it's all right," said Thaddeus. "It's a clue that fits very nicely into my theory of our recent household disturbances. If you will wait I think things will begin to develop very shortly, and then we shall be able to dismiss this indictment against the cat we thought we heard last night."

"Do you think Margaret is dishonest?"

"I don't know," said Thaddeus. "I shouldn't be surprised if she had friends with taking ways. In other words, my dear, I suspect that Margaret is in league with people outside this house, who profit by her mistaken notions as to how to be generous, but I can't prove it yet."

"But what are you going to do?"

"Set a watch. I have sent for a detective," said Thaddeus.

Digitized by Google

This was too much for Bessie. She was simply overcome, and she sat squarely down upon the arm-chair, which fortunately was immediately behind her. I think that if it had not been she would have plumped down upon the floor.

"Detective!" she gasped.

"Exactly," said Thaddeus; "and here he comes," he added, as a carriage was driven up to the door, and one of the plain clothes police descended therefrom.

"You would better leave us to talk over this matter together," said Thaddeus, as he hastened to the door. "We shall be able to manage it entirely, and the details might make you nervous."

"I couldn't be more nervous than I am," said Bessie, "but I'll leave you just the same."

Whereupon she went to her room, and Thaddeus for an hour was closeted with the detective, to whom he detailed the whole story.

"It's one of the two," said the latter, when Thaddeus had finished, "and I agree with you it is more likely to be the cook than the housemaid. If it was the housemaid, she couldn't have stood your examination as well as you say she did. Perhaps I'd better see her, though, and talk to her myself."

"No, I shouldn't," said Thaddeus; "we'll pass you off as a business acquaintance of mine up from town, and you can stay all night and watch developments."

So it was arranged. The detective was introduced into the family as a correspondent of Thaddeus's firm, and he settled down to watch the household. Afternoon and evening went by, but without developments, and at eleven o'clock every light in the house was extinguished, and the whole family, from the head of the house to the cook, had apparently retired.

At half-past eleven, however, there were decided signs of life within the walls of Thaddeus's home. The clue was working satisfactorily, and the complete revelation of the mystery was close at hand.

"She disappeared just like that."

The remainder of the narrative can best be told in the words of the detective.

"When Mr. Perkins sent for me," he said, "and told me all that had happened, I made up my mind that he had a servant in his house for whom the police had been on the look-out for some time. I thought she was a certain Ellen Malony, alias Bridget O'Shaughnessy, alias many other names, who was nothing more nor less than the agent of a clever band of thieves who had lifted thousands of pounds of swag in the line of household silver, valuable books, diamonds, and other things from private houses, where she has been employed in various capacities. I couldn't understand why she should have made way with the dishes and Mrs. Perkins's table-cloth, but there's no accounting for the tastes of people in that line of business, so I didn't bother much trying to reason that matter out.

"After we'd had dinner and spent the evening in Mr. Perkins's library, the family went to bed, and I pretended to do the same. Instead of really going to bed I waited my chance and slipped down the stairs into the dining-room and got under the table. At eleven o'clock the maidservants went up to their rooms, and at a quarter-past there wasn't a light burning in the house. I sat there in the dining-room waiting, and just as the clock struck half-past eleven I heard a noise out on the stairs, and in less than half a minute a sulphur match was struck almost over my head under the table, and there stood the cook, her face livid as that of a dead person, and in her hand she held a candle, which she lit with the match. From where I was I could see everything she did, which was not much. She simply gathered up all the table fixings she could, and started downstairs into the kitchen with them. Then I went up to Mr. Perkins's room and called him. He put on his clothes and got out his revolver in less than two minutes, when we stole downstairs together, leaving Mrs. Perkins with her boy's nurse and the maid.

"In a second we were in the laundry, which was as dark as the ace of spades, except when the light from four gas jets in the kitchen streamed through the half-open door. Mr. Perkins was for pouncing in on the cook at once, but I was after the rest of the gang as much as I was the cook, and I persuaded him to wait; and, by thunder, we were paid for waiting. It was the queerest case I ever had.

"That woman—looking for all the world like a creature from some other part of the universe than this earth, her eyes burning like two huge coals, her cheeks as yellow and clear as so much wax, and her lips blue-white, with a great flaming red tongue sort of laid between them—worked like a slave cleaning the floor, polishing the grate, and scrubbing the table. Then she dusted all the chairs, and producing the missing table-cloth, she laid it, snow-white, upon the table. In two minutes more, the lost china was brought to light out of the flour-barrel, polished up, and set upon the table, enough for twenty people. The dining-room things I had seen her take, she arranged as tastefully as anyone could want, and then the finest lay-out in the way of salads, cakes, fruits, and other good things I ever saw was brought in from the cellar. To do all this took a marvellously short time. It was five minutes to midnight when she got through, and then she devoted three minutes to looking after herself. She whisked out a small hand-glass, and touched up her hair a bit. Then she washed her hands, and pinned some roses in her dress, smiled a smile I can never forget in my life, and opened the kitchen door and went out.

"'She's going to give a supper!' whispered Mr. Perkins.

"'It looks like it,' said I. 'And a mighty fine one at that.'

"In a minute she came back with a pail in which were four bottles of champagne, in her hand. This she took into the cellar, returning to the kitchen as the clock struck twelve.

"Then the queerest part began," said the detective

Digitized by Google

"for ten minutes by the clock people were apparently arriving, though, as far as Mr. Perkins or I could see, there wasn't a soul in the kitchen besides Margaret. She was talking away like one possessed. Every once in a while she'd stop in the middle of a sentence and rush to the door and shake hands with some, to us, invisible arrival. Then she'd walk in with them, chatting and laughing. Several times she went through the motion of taking people's hats, and finally, if we could judge from her actions, she had them all seated at the table. She passed salads all round, helping each guest herself. She sent them fruit and cakes; and then she brought out the wine, which she distributed in the same fashion. She also apologised because some cream she had ordered hadn't come.

"When the invisible guests appeared to have had all they could eat she began the chatty part again, and never seemed to be disturbed but once, when she requested someone not to sing so loudly for fear of disturbing the family.

"Altogether it was the weirdest and rummest thing I'd ever seen in my life. We watched it for one full hour, and then we left because she did. At one o'clock she apparently bade her guests good-night, after which she gathered up and put away all the eatables there were left—and, of course, everything but what she'd eaten herself still remained—cleaned all the dishes, restored them to their proper places in the dining-room pantry, and went back upstairs to her room.

"Mr. Perkins and I didn't know what to make of it. There wasn't a thing stolen, and it was quite clear to my mind that I'd done the woman an injustice in connecting her with thieves. She was honest, except in so far that she had ordered all those salads and creams and things from time to time on Mr. Perkins' account, which was easy enough for her to do, since Mrs. Perkins let her do the ordering. There was only one explanation of the matter. She was a victim of hallucinations, and I said so.

"'I fancy you are right,' said Mr. Perkins. 'We'll have to send her to an asylum!'

"'That's the thing,' said I, 'and we'd better do it the first thing in the morning. I wouldn't tackle her to-night, because she's probably excited, and like as not would make a great deal of trouble.'

"And that," said the detective, "was where Mr. Perkins and I made our mistake. Next morning she wasn't to be found, and to this day I haven't heard a word of her. She disappeared just like that," he said, snapping his fingers. "Of course, I don't mean to say that anything supernatural occurred. She simply must have slipped down and out while we were asleep. The front door was wide open in the morning, and a woman answering to her description was seen to leave the Park station, five miles from the Perkins' house, in the 6.30 train that morning."

"And you have no idea where she is now?" I asked of the detective when he had finished.

"No," he answered, "not the slightest. For all I know she may be cooking for you at this very minute."

With which comforting remark he left me.

For my part I hope the detective was wrong. If I thought there was a possibility of Margaret's ever being queen of my culinary department, I should either give up housekeeping at once and join some simple community where every man is his own chef, or dine for ever more on tinned meats.

REGINALD BAIRD.

THE MOST LUXURIOUSLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE IN THE WORLD.

The October Pearson's.

PRICE SIXPENCE. NOW ON SALE.

CONTENTS:

The Story of the Dance. E. Kenrick.
A great number of most beautiful pictures have been obtained for this article, illustrating the characteristic dances of the nations.

Converted. (COMPLETE STORY.) Robert Barr.
Illustrated by Warwick Goble.

Ways that are Dark. Robert Machray.
Illustrated by Frank Feller.
The ingenious methods employed by poachers to entrap their victims are here pictorially described.

The Golf Club.
Written and Illustrated by Harry Furniss.
Mr. Furniss displays his literary and artistic talents to great effect in dealing with the humours of golf.

The Muse of Tragedy. F. Frankfort Moore.
(COMPLETE STORY.)
Illustrated by R. Sauber.

A Real Island of the Blessed. J. Brand.

A Weather Forecast. Mrs. Donaldson.

The White Slaves of England. R. H. Sherard.
No. 4.—THE CHAIN-MAKERS OF CRADLEY HEATH.
Illustrated by H. Piffard.

Secrets of the Courts of Europe. Allen Upward.
Second Series. No. 4.—"THE WHITE THREAD."
Illustrated by Hal Hurst, R.B.A.

Life on Board a Battleship During the Manœuvres. H. M. Wilson.
The photographs which illustrate Mr. Wilson's article, and the interesting information he supplies, combine to make a most realistic description of life on board a man-of-war.

The Effect of Sunshine upon Englishmen. John Le Breton.

The God Pan. (COMPLETE STORY.) Huan Mee.
Illustrated by H. G. Burgess.

Royal Thrones. Mary Spencer Warren.
The authoress has here collected the most complete set of photographs of the thrones and throne-rooms of the chief kingdoms of the world that has ever been published. The reproductions from these photographs further enhance the artistic beauty of this luxuriously illustrated number of the magazine.

Wisdom Let Loose. W. L. Alden.
Illustrated by Charles May.

How I Wrote a Certain Novel. Sir Walter Besant.
Sir Walter Besant has been good enough to furnish us with some interesting particulars, and materials for illustration, of the circumstances which led him to write one of his most famous novels.

Ancient Military Types.
Illustrated by Crow.

Tattersall's, Past and Present. Basil Tozer.
This world-famed horse-repository is described by Mr. Basil Tozer, and is illustrated with an exceptionally interesting series of photographs and drawings.

Almost a Pauper. (COMPLETE STORY.) Percival Lane.
Illustrated by A. Kemp Tebby.

The Editorial Mind.

Digitized by Google

THE THREE LOVERS.

In one of the private parlours of the best hotel in the small town of X—— three young men were sitting in deep meditation around a table, sulkily smoking their cigars, and taking at intervals a sip of beer from the large glasses which they had in front of them.

Neither uttered a word. The prolonged silence commenced to become uncomfortable and oppressive, when Robert, the chemist, jumped up, and, striking the table energetically with his fist, exclaimed: "For heaven's sake, say something! We have been now sitting here a full hour, and do nothing but mope! It is enough to drive a man mad!"

"You are right. It is enough to drive a man mad!" remarked William, the cashier of the only bank the town could boast of, and with a melancholy smile he passed his hand through his glossy black hair.

"The old man is crazy!" now roared the third one of the company. "Totally crazy! I really believe his passion for gymnastics is so strong that he would force his daughters to marry circus clowns or acrobats instead of giving them to ordinary but highly respectable business men! But before I permit that my darling Ida be led to the altar by such a madman, then we both would rather"——the rest was lost in a few unintelligible words, seemingly containing some fearful threat.

"Not so loud, dear John!" the more thoughtful William tried to calm him. "Not so loud. There are people in the adjoining rooms who might overhear us, and if Mr. Grothe should find out that we speak of him in such a disrespectful manner, he would for ever exclude us from his family circle. Rather let us put our wits together and see if we cannot discover some means by which we may make the old gentleman change his views!"

"Make him change his views?" sneered the thoroughly provoked John. "That simply shows that you do not know old man Grothe! He is the most stubborn man I ever saw, and whatever he puts into his thick head he will carry through, and no arguments will make him alter his ideas! Just ask your Fanny. I know it from Ida."

"Yes, my darling Rose often complained to me about his obstinacy," chimed in Robert, with a sigh. "One can feel sorry for the poor girls."

"And still more for ourselves," grumbled John, running excitedly up and down the room.

"Sit down!" begged William, taking the resisting John by the arm and forcing him down on a chair, "so, and now let us once more talk the matter over quietly and come to some conclusion."

The friends moved closer together and, for the hundredth time, began to form plans for getting out of the perplexing situation in which they found themselves. All three were young men between the ages of twenty-five and thirty, and up to the time of our narrative had little cause to find fault with their fate. Healthy, fairly good-looking, holding good social positions, and having ample fortunes, they seemed to have a natural right to their desire—to marry the girls of their choice; and the three beautiful daughters of the wealthy, retired baker, and now omnipotent Mayor Grothe, were by no means opposed to becoming the wives of Robert, William, and John.

They were deeply in love with each other, and yet there was an insurmountable obstacle which prevented the attainment of their wishes. The old gentleman, whom our three friends were so anxious to have for their father-in-law, had one great passion, and to gratify the same he seemed willing to sacrifice the happiness of his children. Grothe, from his boyhood on, was an enthusiastic athlete, and when young ran away several times to join a wandering circus.

His father had great trouble to suppress this passion of the youngster, but finally succeeded, and made him adopt the baker's trade, a calling which he and his ancestors had followed. After his father's death, young Grothe continued the already flourishing bakery business, and carried it on so successfully that now he had retired with a large fortune, and shortly before the time of which our story speaks, his fellow citizens gave him a high proof of their confidence in his abilities by electing him Mayor of the town.

Throughout his long career, however, and notwithstanding his business and increasing family demanded most of his time, Grothe remained true to the passion of his youth. Whenever a travelling circus appeared in town he witnessed every performance, and his judgment on the quality of the same, and especially the gymnastic turns, was never questioned, and considered that of an expert. He received the Bee, a newspaper published in the capital, regularly every day, and always made the amusement notices his particular study, with the view of discovering new specialities. He was the first one to learn of any improvement introduced by an athletic club, no matter in what part of the globe, and it was this, his passion or fad, which gave to his native town one of the best athletic clubs in the country.

Grothe was founder, president, and general manager of this club; his whole being was wrapped up in it, and he paraded the twenty-five members in public as often as there was an opportunity for doing so. He presented the club with an enormous silk banner, and whenever the Grothe Athletic Club accepted a challenge from some other association to compete for a prize, it marched out with the banner carried at its head, and almost invariably was led to victory by it.

Grothe was proud of his club, which gained a far-reaching reputation for its excellence, and as the members of it belonged to the best families, it was only natural that the whole social life was guided by it, and, of course, the president and his handsome daughters were the centre of this small world.

The fresh beauty of the girls had brought many suitors for their hands to the house of papa Grothe, but they had never shown any preference for anybody. However, this state of affairs had changed since the last summer night's festival of the club.

On that occasion, there were three young men who paid considerable attention to the girls, and it was soon apparent that they had found favour in the eyes of the latter. All three were friends, and having been brought up in the capital, were perfect strangers to the good people of X—— until a short time ago, when they settled in the place, but through their open ways had already gained everybody's goodwill. Robert had established a new chemist's shop, William had accepted the position of bank cashier, and John was sent there by the railway company as stationmaster.

Digitized by Google

Unfortunately, all three were very poor athletes, and though they joined the club, they principally did so to please their prospective father-in-law. They rarely participated in the gymnastic exercises taking place in the club hall every evening, and the feats which they performed on the horizontal bars, etc., were such that President Grothe disgustingly remarked they were the worst attempts ever made in his club. He assured them that he would never allow his daughters to marry men whose physical developments made them unfit for good husbands and fathers, and he made a vow that he would only accept such sons-in-law who could prove their superiority in all-round athletic sports, and offer a fair guarantee to surround him with a lot of healthy grandchildren.

In vain did his daughters try to overcome his opposition; in vain did the three lovers try to convince him that he was making a fool of himself and his children unhappy; Grothe remained firm. They conspired, they used stratagem, all without success, and every new conference which they had on the subject gave no other result than to strengthen their opinion that the old man was crazy.

This was also the outcome of to-day's session, and after three hours of animated discussion, they had again found no way out of their difficulties.

Finally the chemist rose. "I am obliged to leave you now; it is late, and I am going to take the early morning train for the capital; there are some drugs which I have to purchase, so I have decided to go there myself. I will be back in a day or two. Good-night!"

"If you would find there a remedy for our cases, it would be preferable, and do us more good than your poisonous drugs!" called John, the stationmaster, after him, and then, accompanied by William, he left the room.

Late the next afternoon the chemist was standing in one of the prominent streets of the capital, looking with curiosity at some bill-posters, which announced in glowing terms and colours the different entertainments taking place in the theatre, etc. Suddenly he received a tap on the shoulder. He turned round, and was agreeably surprised to find himself face to face with his cousin, the editor of the leading newspaper of the capital.

In a few words Robert told him for what purpose he had come to the capital, and that, having finished his business, he was going to spend the evening at some theatre, mainly to get rid of a bad attack of the blues. The journalist looked at him searchingly, took out his watch, and, finding that it was only six o'clock, said: "This suits me admirably. Your train does not leave before midnight, and, as I have nothing better to do, I trust you will permit me to remain in your company. We will, first of all, have a good dinner; there is nothing better to drive away the blues; then you shall tell me what is troubling you, and we will afterwards go to the Concordia Theatre, where we will enjoy a splendid variety performance. Do not shake your head so gloomily. I have made up my mind to restore your good humour, and I'll do it."

The two cousins soon entered a prominent restaurant, ordered a choice meal and a bottle of wine, and then settled down to a pleasant chat.

It was long before the dinner was finished that Robert had made a clean breast of his and his friends' troubles, and the editor, who listened attentively to his tale of woe, showed his sympathy by calling old man Grothe by the hardest names he could think of.

With contracted brows he silently sat for a few minutes, as if absorbed in deep thought, touching neither food nor drink, when all at once his face cleared up, and, giving his cousin a hearty slap on the shoulder, he joyfully exclaimed: "Why, dear boy, I have a great idea. I'll get you all out of your difficulties in spite of Papa Grothe. In eight weeks, at the latest, you will be engaged to the girls you love, and the tyrant himself will have to join your hands, and, what is more, will glory in having you for his sons-in-law. I am willing to put up a year's salary as a guarantee that what I say will come true. But now let us go. It is high time. Later on I will tell you all."

Fifteen minutes later both were seated in one of the boxes of the Concordia Theatre and enjoying the performance of a number of variety artists. The programme was a lengthy one, and just before the last number was reached, the journalist whispered to his cousin: "Now, Robert, look out; here comes the promised remedy for your case!"

The curtain rose. The stage showed a few trapezes hanging down from the flies, and two horizontal bars. The orchestra began to play some lively air, and, rushing up to the footlights, came three clowns, who bowed to the audience smilingly, though on account of their grotesquely painted faces it looked more like a grin, and, tumbling over each other, they swung themselves upon the trapeze and bars as agile as little monkeys.

In quick order they now executed such marvellous gymnastic feats that the whole audience sat spellbound, and hardly dared to breathe. It was just that their names appeared in extra large type on the programme, and they fully deserved the title which accompanied the same: "Bob, Billy and Johnny, the Three Kings of the Trapeze."

When their turn was finished, the applause which followed was deafening. Again and again they had to come out and acknowledge their thanks, and it took some time before they were allowed to retire and the audience showed itself willing to leave the theatre.

Our two cousins found an exit which led direct to a side street, thus avoiding the rush of outpouring people, and here the journalist addressed his companion as follows: "Pay close attention, now. I will explain my idea so that you three lovesick fellows may gain the consent of the old man Grothe to marry his daughters. By-the-bye, I suppose you and your friends will not mind spending a few hundred marks for that purpose? No? All right! Besides, Bob, Bill, and Johnny are friends of mine. I have brought them out, puffed them up in my paper to their hearts' content, and never charged them a pfennig for doing so. They are, therefore, under obligations to me, and will do just what I want. We are going to meet them in ten minutes in the café adjoining the theatre, when I will introduce you to them and give you the necessary instructions. It will be a capital joke on your future father-in-law and you will benefit by its outcome."

* * * * *

During the following few weeks the society of the good old town of X—— was in a flutter of excitement. The ladies held mysterious conferences with their dressmakers, wardrobes were emptied of their contents, old dresses were ripped apart, and, after being trimmed with all kinds of glittering ornaments, tinsels, etc., made up into gorgeous-looking costumes. The most intimate friends, who never kept a secret from each other, now observed deep silence about their doings and all that, because within a short time the event of the year was going to take place—the great masquerade ball, which the Grothe Athletic Club gave annually at its hall.

Digitized by Google

Rumour had it that this ball would outshine all its predecessors, and that there was especially one feature among the many surprises which the members of the club had prepared that promised to create a sensation, for it had leaked out that the three youngest members would give a performance on the horizontal bars and trapeze such as had never been witnessed before. It was known that the three young men had practised for weeks behind closed doors, and that the president had granted the use of the club hall for that purpose, but as they otherwise kept the utmost secrecy about the affair, everybody looked with real impatience to the coming event.

It was also given out that the great editor of the influential daily paper would come from the capital to be present at the festival, and that he would afterwards write one of his brilliant reports about the same, which, printed in his paper, would be read by half the people throughout the country. President Grothe, in consequence, was in the best of humour. He had a pleasant word for everybody, and told his daughters not to spare any money for their ball toilets, as he wanted them to appear worthy of his dignified and exalted position.

Finally the so ardently longed-for evening arrived. The large club hall was crowded with masqueraders, and though the disguises were in many instances so slight that friends easily recognised each other, everybody had the good sense to keep up the deception, not to spoil his neighbour's pleasure.

Among the many peasants, gypsies, monks, nuns, flower-girls, soldiers, etc., etc., there were three grotesque clowns, whose droll capers were noticed by everybody. They called themselves Bob, Bill, and Johnny, and were billed on the programme for a special performance, which was to take place on a stage erected on one side of the hall. Of course, everybody knew that behind those masks were the suitors of Grothe's daughters, and, in fact, the chemist, bank-cashier, and stationmaster did not deny their identity.

The merry clowns were observed to be in constant attendance on three masks, dressed alike, representing water-nymphs, and it was not difficult to recognise hidden under reed-grass and water lilies, the beautiful daughters of the president. About half-an-hour before midnight a tall gentleman of distinguished bearing, attired in a black domino and wearing a black silk mask appeared among the dancers. He approached the clowns, whispered a few words to them, and then all four left the hall to reach the stage from the rear entrance.

There everybody had previously been prepared for the performance of the clowns, and trapeze as well as horizontal bars were in their right positions. The black domino, after satisfying himself that they were unobserved, opened a small side door and admitted three more men, who after throwing off their long ulsters, showed that they were wearing the same clown costumes as our three friends. They were the genuine Bob, Bill, and Johnny, from the Concordia Theatre.

For one moment the six clowns looked at each other in silence and then broke out in a hearty laugh, until the black domino hurried the three false acrobats out through the side door and locked it. He now gave the sign for the performance to begin. The orchestra stationed in front of the stage played a lively polka, the curtain rose, and Bob, Bill, and Johnny rushed out on the stage, bowed to the audience and, leaping up to the trapeze and horizontal bars, commenced their astonishing gymnastics.

Everybody was completely taken by surprise, and most of all, President Grothe. What he now saw was beyond his comprehension, and that three young men, whom he always considered worthless fellows, could perform such feats, was almost too much for him.

But it was reality. There were the three clowns, who only a few minutes before had danced with his daughters, executing with ease, before his very eyes, the most difficult turns, such as the best member of his club would have been unable to imitate; and as the gymnasts now left the stage, ending their performance with a double somersault, he gave the signal for applause, which made the walls rattle. Bob, Bill, and Johnny, in the meantime, hurriedly left the stage through the side door, and made room for their counterparts, who now appeared behind the footlights, bowing with the same grin on their faces, an acknowledgment for the generous applause. At this moment the clock struck twelve.

President Grothe rose ceremoniously from his chair, and commanded in a loud voice "Masks off." The three clowns followed everybody's example and took off their gaudily painted gauze masks, and, behold! there was no further doubt possible, the bold performers had been the chemist, bank cashier, and stationmaster.

Shortly afterwards the artistes appeared in the hall, and with them the strange gentleman in the black domino. He was the great journalist from the capital, and our friends immediately introduced him to the President, who received him with great respect, and at the supper, which now followed, assigned him to the place of honour at his right. Opposite them sat the clowns with the three water-nymphs.

After the roast had been served, President Grothe rose to deliver a speech on his favourite subject, "Athletic training," and in the course of his remarks he called the attention of the assemblage to the performance which they had just witnessed, and asked them to fill their glasses and drink to the health of the three great gymnasts, whom he now proudly introduced as his future sons-in-law. Three cheers were given with a will, and everybody hastened to congratulate the happy couples.

Then the editor addressed the company. In well-chosen words he cited many cases from ancient and modern history to prove what a powerful factor love always had been and still was. In the present case it had made out of simple business men acrobats who would be a credit to the best circus, but—and here he faced the president: "Our friends have a worthier calling. Once, under the régime of Prince Carnival, they have condescended to give their gymnastic productions, and we all have seen that these were of the highest order; but let this proof of their love and devotion suffice; they have now the good fortune to enter the inner circle of a highly respected family; let them henceforth devote all their time to make their wives and Papa Grothe happy!"

Everybody applauded. The president, with tears of joy in his eyes, embraced the speaker and assured him of his regret that he did not possess a fourth daughter; a man like him he would accept as son-in-law, though he had no athletic accomplishments whatsoever.

ERICH FLIESS.

Digitized by Google

My Financial Career.

When I go into a bank I get nervous. The clerks make me nervous; the wickets make me nervous; the sight of the money makes me nervous. The moment I cross the threshold of a bank, I am a hesitating jay. If I attempt to transact business there, I become an irresponsible idiot. I knew this beforehand, but my salary has been raised to £22 a month, and I felt that the bank was the only place for it. So I shambled in and looked timidly round at the clerks. I had an idea that a person about to open an account must needs consult the manager. I went up to a wicket marked "Cashier." The cashier was a tall, cool fellow. The very sight of him unnerved me. My voice was sepulchral.

"Can I see the manager?" I said, and added solemnly, "alone." I don't know why I said "alone."

"Certainly," said the cashier, and fetched him. The manager was a grave, calm man. I held my £22 clutched in a crumpled ball in my pocket.

"Are you the manager?" I said. Heaven knows I didn't doubt it.

"Yes," he said.

"Can I see you?" I asked, "alone?" I didn't want to say "alone" again, but without it the thing seemed self-evident. The manager looked at me in some alarm. He felt that I had an awful secret to reveal.

"Come in here," he said, and led the way to a private room. He turned the key in the lock.

"We are safe from interruption here," he said; "sit down." We both sat down and looked at one another. I found no voice to speak.

"You are the detective, I presume," he said. He had gathered from my mysterious manner that I was a detective. I knew what he was thinking, and it made me worse.

"No," I said. "To tell the truth," I went on, as if I had been prompted to lie about it, "I'm not a detective at all. I've come to open an account. I intend to keep all my money in this bank." The manager looked relieved, but still serious; he concluded now that I was a son of Baron Rothschild, or a young Gould.

"A large account, I suppose," he said.

"Fairly large," I whispered. "I propose to deposit £22 now and £10 a month regularly." The manager got up and opened the door. He called to the cashier.

"Mr. Montgomery," he said unkindly, "this gentleman is opening an account; he will deposit £22. Good-morning." I rose. A big iron door stood open at the side of the room.

"Good-morning," I said, and stepped into the safe.

"Come out," said the manager coldly, and showed me the other way. I went up to the cashier's wicket and poked the ball of money at him with a quick, convulsive movement, as if I were doing a conjuring trick. My face was ghastly pale.

"Here," I said, "deposit it." The tone of the words seemed to mean, "let us do this painful thing while the fit is on us." He took the money and gave it to another clerk. He made me write the sum on a slip of paper and sign my name in a book. I no longer knew what I was doing. The bank swam before my eyes.

"Is it deposited?" I asked in a hollow, vibrating voice.

"It is," said the cashier.

"Then I want to draw a cheque."

My idea was to draw out £2 of it for present use. Some one gave me a cheque book through a wicket, and some one else began telling me how to write it out. The people in the bank had the impression that I was an invalid millionaire. I wrote something on the cheque and thrust it in at the clerk. He looked at it.

"What! are you drawing it all out again?" he asked in surprise. Then I realised that I had written £22 instead of £2. I was too far gone to reason now. I had a feeling that it was impossible to explain the thing. All the clerks had stopped writing to look at me. Reckless with misery, I made a plunge.

"Yes, the whole thing."

"You withdraw your money from the bank?"

"Every penny of it."

"Are you not going to deposit any more?" said the clerk, astonished.

"Never." An idiotic hope struck me that they might think something had insulted me while I was writing the cheque and that I had changed my mind. I made a wretched attempt to look like a man with a fearfully quick temper. The clerk prepared to pay the money.

"How will you have it?"

"What?"

"How will you have it?"

"Oh." I caught his meaning and answered, without even trying to think, "In twenties." He gave me a twenty-pound note.

"And the two?" he asked drily.

"In twos," I said. He gave it to me and I rushed out. As the big doors swung behind me I caught the echo of a roar of laughter that went up to the ceiling of the bank. Since then I bank no more. I keep my money in cash in my trousers pocket and my savings in gold in a sock.

E. A. Nash.

RESULT OF

Jumbled Story Competition.

No. 11.

More than one competitor succeeded in correctly putting together this story, and the prizes have therefore gone to those whose attempts first reached this office. £5 has been sent to Mr. Wm. Millard, The Schools, Ascot, Berks; and £1 each to Miss B. Mellin, 35, Onslow Road, Fairfield, Liverpool; Mr. Wm. Boyle, Harbour Office, Swansea; Miss M. Mellin, 8, Swiss Road, Fairfield, Liverpool; Mr. P. A. Kay, Sandhurst, Swiss Road, Fairfield, Liverpool; Mr. L. Cundell, 144, High Street, Southampton

Digitized by Google

THE EMPTY BOAT.

It was in December, about two o'clock in the morning. Baron Louis Monnier was returning from his club to his apartments in Grenelle Street, finishing his cigar. The clearness of the winter's night inspired him to walk. He turned up his large fur collar, put his hands in his pockets and started across the Pont Royal.

The Seine was not yet frozen, and the Baron, reaching the middle of the bridge, stopped to admire the fairy-like picture the city presented, with the deep shadows of Notre Dame and the Palace of Justice brought out by the blue light of the moon, while upon the dark water of the river the reflection of the lights quivered and lengthened.

"My! It's cold," said he, buttoning the last button of his coat.

He had just started again, when his attention was drawn to a dark object which was turning around and around in the middle of the Seine. As the object grew more distinct, the Baron recognised a boat adrift. No one was in it, as the two oars were lying uselessly across it. In the solitude of the night this empty boat slowly moving by itself was appalling.

Louis Monnier foresaw immediately some tragic scene, accident, or crime of which the shores and the stars had been the only witnesses. He no longer felt the cold, but remained standing on the parapet, viewing the boat, its clumsy seats, its tarred boards, and its heavy oars, used so lately by an unknown hand.

The waif was very near the bridge, when the Baron was drawn from his reverie by the approach of an individual who ran up, and stopping near him leant upon the parapet and contemplated the boat with an air of frenzy.

Louis Monnier noticed the figure of this man, his black beard, his white face, his ulster of large plaid (which was prominent under the gaslight). He saw him bend over a moment when the boat reached the arch, then crossed the bridge in order to see it again as it came out. A minute later, the unknown walked away rapidly, taking the left bank.

The Baron, slightly puzzled, followed him with his eyes, and saw that he ran along the quay, in the direction of the Pont de la Concorde. Finally the man took the pavement in front of the houses; stopped a second to shake hands with a wine merchant, who was closing the front of his shop, then began to run. He reached the Pont de la Concorde and leant again over the parapet to watch the boat pass under.

Monsieur hesitated a moment whether to follow him, then thinking it was the affair of some lunatic or drunken man, he turned into the Rue du Bac, and lighting another cigar, in order to dissipate the dismal impression which the little boat had made, went home.

The Baron soon lost all thought of this adventure. Eight days after he was quietly drinking his absinthe at a little table on the Boulevard about six o'clock.

The temperature was mild, the Boulevard gay and animated. After taking a sip, the Baron began to read a paper. He looked over the various items, when suddenly, while reading a long article, he began to tremble, and returning to the first line he read each word carefully.

The article concluded with the words:

"A crime was committed on Monday last, at a place up the river called Joinville-le-Pont, under mysterious circumstances. A woman named Louise Sauvêtre, who ran the ferry, and lived alone in an isolated house on the border of the Marne, had suddenly disappeared. The day before yesterday morning her body was found, caught by some willows, a hundred yards below that place. A wound in the neck made by a knife proved that the unfortunate was the victim of an assassin. Suspicion rested upon a countryman of twenty years, who lived on the opposite shore. This individual emphatically denied all knowledge of the crime, but circumstantial evidence pointed towards him, as a knife, probably like the one used, was found in his house. He was arrested. The boat used as a ferry has disappeared.

"It is supposed that the affair took place in the following fashion: About eight or nine o'clock in the evening the young man hailed the woman Sauvêtre, and crossed the river with her. After cutting her throat and throwing her into the water, he returned to the right bank and pushed away the boat, whose presence on that side would awaken suspicion.

"The little old house of the victim was entirely stripped. It is true, only insignificant sums were found at the presumed assassin's house, but it is supposed he cautiously buried somewhere the two or three thousand francs which the ferrywoman had saved. This young man, Thomasseau by name, had served two sentences for poaching. He tried to evade the law now by affirming that on the night of the crime he saw an individual approach the river and call the ferrywoman. But as no other neighbour knew of this incident, it was deemed improbable. We will keep our readers informed concerning this dramatic affair."

After reading the article two or three times, Baron Monnier placed the paper on a chair, and crossing his hands upon his stick, he began to reflect profoundly.

That drifting boat which the article mentioned, was it the one he had seen whirling down the Seine to the Pont Royal? The date coincided—it was, indeed, Monday of the week preceding. Supposing the crime had been committed about eight o'clock, it would certainly take five or six hours for the boat, slowly borne by the current, to reach the centre of Paris. It was probably on that night that it had drifted seven or eight leagues without being perceived or stopped by anyone. Perhaps, it was only a coincidence after all; with the enormous number of boats on the Seine, two could easily become loose at the same time.

Digitized by Google

Monsieur Monnier tried to distract his thoughts, but he could think of nothing else. The strange individual, who had watched the boat pass under the bridge; the anxious desire of this man to follow the wreck puzzled the Baron the more he reflected upon it. Hypothesis followed hypothesis, until he became convinced that this stranger possessed alone, perhaps, the secret of the drama which was enacted on the Marne eight days ago.

What ought he to do? His conscience told him to go to the Prefecture of Police, who were still engaged in the inquiry; but indolence, ennui, the necessity of testifying in the courts kept him back. He thought to himself that his deposition was very unimportant, that perhaps it would be laughed at, and after all the law was able to unravel it alone.

However, if the inquest should be wrong, if the man arrested should be innocent? The charges brought against him were indeed serious!

At all events Baron Monnier put the matter by until the next day in order to see what turn the affair took; then, as it was time to dine, he arose, and following the Boulevard des Capucines, went to his club.

The next day, after a sleepless night, during which he recognised the duty imposed upon him, the Baron entered the Prefecture of Police about three o'clock. At the sight of his card, which bore one of the most conspicuous names in all Paris, he was received in the private office of the chief, without waiting.

He excused himself first for bringing evidence which doubtless would have no interest; then in a few words, he related what he had seen on that Monday night, the empty boat, and the individual who persisted in following it the length of the quay.

When he finished he renewed his excuses smilingly, but the chief interrupted him: "Your deposition," said he, "on the contrary, is of extreme importance; the description of your individual corresponds exactly to that of the man whom Thomasseau has described. Would you repeat it?"

"Certainly. Medium height, slight, very black beard, in double points; an ulster——"

"With large plaids? That is well. As to the hat, Thomasseau said a soft felt—but returning to Paris, the assassin, if he is the assassin, would change all that. Now, could you put us on the track of this man?"

"I saw him stop a second to shake hands with a wine merchant."

"The address?"

"The first shop upon the quay on the left bank, going from the Pont Royal to the Pont de la Concorde."

"Very well. Evidently this man is a regular customer. Now, one minute, and I am at your service; will you please be seated, Monsieur le Baron?"

The chief approached the telephone, called the bureau of police near the Pont Royal, and gave a description of the individual, with the order to go to the wine merchant's for information.

"It is strange," said the chief, seating himself again at his large desk, opposite Monsieur Monnier, "that chance serves us better than logic to find a criminal! Sometimes all indications are gathered, all the acquaintances of the victim are sounded, and when everything is settled, some unexpected revelation abruptly illuminates the affair. It is most often a detail of apparent insignificance."

"Then you believe that the assassin——"

"Is the man whom you met Monday night. If I dared, I would say already that I am sure of it."

"But you have no proof, and only a slight similarity in the description which you already possess."

"Well, but the presence of this individual upon the bridge. His delirious obstinacy in following the boat, which, perhaps, he had expected there for some time. His action, or the place, or the object haunted him. Ah! Here is the response!"

The electric bell of the criminal rang. The chief received the message and returned to his place.

"The individual is captured," said he. "They found him at the tavern. He will be here in five minutes. Then we shall know!"

Soon the agents entered with the man. He was livid, his face was distorted. The chief made him sit down, and brusquely demanded:

"How long have you known the woman Sauvêtre?"

"I? But——"

He hesitated, fearing to compromise himself even by denying the acquaintance.

"Reply."

"I knew her very little. I saw her once last year, crossing the Marne."

"Well, that is enough. Now, what were you doing upon the Pont Royal on Monday of last week, at two o'clock in the morning?"

"At two o'clock, upon the Pont Royal?"

"Yes. This gentleman saw you."

The man lost his head, finding the interrogator so well informed, and at once fell into the trap which had been laid for him.

"And what were you doing about eight o'clock in the evening, the same day, in front of the house of this woman Sauvêtre?"

"I—I returned to Joinville to take the train."

"That is sufficient. We know the rest. For what motive did you assassinate this poor woman?"

"I assassinate her? I?"

"Do not try to deny it. We know all!"

After some more hesitation, the criminal ended by confessing, uttering a cry of despair. Later, he told the manner in which the crime came to him. He was left without money or resources, and knowing the woman Sauvêtre had saved up some money, he planned a most mysterious crime. After it, he returned to Paris, but the haunting of the crime began to beset him. After running from café to café the shock increased, as he found himself alone. Then the thought of the boat drifting alone came to him. He had waited for it to pass forty or fifty minutes, at the Pont Neuf, crazed by this expectation.

After his recitation he was seized by a nervous spasm, and it took the two agents' strength to prevent him from smashing his head against the wall. The chief thanked Monsieur Monnier warmly for bringing a telephone to justice.

"Oh," said the Baron, "I am happy to rescue from your hands the poor, innocent fellow Thomasseau."

Parry Shute.

Digitized by Google

A Comedy off the Stage.

By G. Manville Fenn.

CHAPTER XXV.

Before the Dawn of Day.

Allan Murray was not the only one to whom temptation came that night, when four women suffered agony such as they had never known before.

Neither of them closed her eyes in restful sleep, but sat communing with self as the hours slowly crept along.

Olive, in spite of effort and persuasion on the part of her father, passed the night on the landing by the drawing-room door, taking mechanically such refreshment as Emsworth brought her from time to time, but never stirring from her jealously-guarded post. Lucy kept her long watch between tending her suffering aunt, who would not even take to the couch, declaring that if she did she should die before the surgeon could come again, and insisting upon sitting uneasily in the chair.

From time to time, though, the girl stole out to the foot of the stairs to wait till she saw Emsworth doze off in the seat he had taken upon the landing by the flowers, and then she crept up step by step in the dark till she could see the top of the drawing-room door, within which lay all she loved on earth. Then, not content, she crept higher, step by step, till she could see Olive seated with her head resting on her hands.

Strange thoughts passed through the girl's breast as, keeping in the darkness, she watched that bended form with a deadly hatred, growing more and more powerful, till it seemed to carry all before it like a flood.

Why had she not killed her before? Then this woman who had come between them would not have kept her from Braetoun's side. It would have been so easy—so very easy, but never one half so easy as it would be now. She could have forgiven her if she had kept away; but for her to come at a time like this, strong in her position, and force her to take a place like a servant in her own house, where all had been so happy only a few hours before! While now she had to creep and steal up just to watch the door, when she would have given the world to have crept to Braetoun's side, just to touch his hand—to wait till he grew well, for she felt that if she could do that it would be impossible for him to die.

And this woman who called herself his wife, and was always trying to steal away his love from her who had won it first, was the cause of all her misery—for the doctor's orders had no place in her mind just then.

The night wore on, and poor Aunt Duncan moaned and bewailed her fate, till again and again Lucy stole out to rest, and crept out to watch the panels of the door whenever Emsworth dropped asleep, and each time that deadly, desperate thought kept on growing till it was like a black cloud, and overshadowed the whole place.

"It would be so easy," she kept on thinking; and as the day approached the idea grew simpler still of execution. There was a tea-cup on a bracket close to Olive's hand, taken with loving care by Emsworth. Olive must have something of the kind to keep her there alive; she did not want to spoil her beauty now, and make Braetoun hate her. That would be useless. Roderick would be ill for weeks, perhaps, and this woman, his wife, would stay, and she, the woman who loved him with all the strength of her untutored nature, would be forced to keep away and suffer. Olive would suffer, too, in her way, and people would say afterwards that she died broken-hearted of grief, and how easy it would be for her to die broken-hearted of grief. A few drops of some subtle fluid poured in the cup that was always going up and down, and she would be there no more, and she who loved him so would be at peace, and always at his side.

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

Digitized by Google

Temptations were strong that night in the little bijou residence the house agent extolled and its mistress loved to deck with flowers, for the other sleepless woman, Mary Jennett, the favourite nurse whom Murray trusted, and had sent to many cases, had her strange thoughts, engendered by a wild idea that more than once the great doctor had looked upon her with pleasant eyes—with looks which might mean a great future to her. These thoughts she had fostered till Braetoun's last bad illness, when something she had seen had changed her feelings to those of hate.

For she had divined the truth, and henceforth Murray had occupied a different position in her eyes, while Olive would not be safe with her, she told herself, if some day she were called in as her nurse.

She was very sleepless, for a strange suspicion had taken possession of her soul, and she too watched through the long hours of that fateful night—watching the patient carefully—the doctor more.

For from time to time Murray did things she had never before seen in her experience; and to her distorted vision they could mean only one thing—fatality to one possibly on the brink of death, and who, left alone, might live.

And she said to herself ought she not to interfere and try to save him, when it was to her evidently all with the intent of getting the patient out of the way, for reasons she knew well. But why should she interfere when revenge was ready to her hand, and she would have the great doctor who had slighted her well under her thumb? Revenge, perhaps love; who knew what else beside? The patient was nothing to her—a poor weak creature, with a life not worth saving, so she moved in and out with the keen eyes of some nocturnal creature, noting every action as she busied herself softly in the room, and watching as keenly through the narrow opening of the folding doors, when, at a whisper from Murray she had to go there to wait.

And the night glided slowly on, the only one apparently at peace being Roderick Braetoun, as he lay back there in the shadow that seemed to grow blacker as the day approached.

"Would they call it murder if they knew all?" said Nurse Jennett to herself, as she stood close to the narrow crack, where one fold nearly touched the other, and saw that Murray was on one knee, bending over Braetoun; and she drew her breath through her teeth with a faint, sibilant sound.

Then all at once she drew back, still watching, for Murray rose slowly, and stood gazing down at the motionless figure on the mattress; and he was still standing there watching, when a faint light behind the blind threw off his figure as a tall, black silhouette.

For the day was beginning to dawn.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Aunt Duncan Clears a Block.

"Curious problem, the human being, sir," said the surgeon that same morning. "When I left you last night I never expected to see him alive again. Slept well, I suppose?"

"Yes," said Murray quietly, as the surgeon bent over and examined Braetoun, and then proceeded to dress and re-bandage the injury to his head.

"Well, it is wonderful—quite a lesson to one never to be in a hurry to give up. At the same time one must not be too sanguine, or I could readily say he may pull round after all."

"I think he will now," said Murray gravely. "Of course, his condition is still extremely critical."

"Of course, of course: but he is a different man this morning."

The surgeon finished his task, and then attended Aunt Duncan, who insisted upon being taken home.

"I should never get better here," she said irritably.

"Better wait a few days, madame," said the surgeon.

"No, not an hour," she said. "If I'm to get better I can't do it with that young man dying upstairs all night and all day long. I want to go home."

The result was that after the surgeon had gone, refusing to undertake the responsibility, Aunt Duncan sent the maid to summon Murray, who came down and found her in a high state of excitement, protesting to her niece that she was quite well enough to go, while Lucy vainly strove to calm her.

The sight of the irritable old woman and the pale-faced, red-eyed niece brought up a fresh train of thought to Murray's mind, and after a short examination of the Aunt's condition, he answered her appeal at once.

"Yes," he said; "I think you might be moved, and that you would feel more at rest and better at home."

"There, my dear," she cried triumphantly, "that other doctor don't know his business. I can feel I shall be much better at home. So you order a fly—I won't have a squeezy cab—and take me back home at once."

"No, Auntie," said Lucy coldly. "You know I can't leave: you must stay, and let me nurse you here."

"Now, don't you turn neglectful to your poor old Aunt when she's bad, and throw me over like that, my dear. You don't want to kill me, do you?"

"No, Aunt; you know I don't."

"But how am I to know if you talk like that? It will kill me if I stop here. All night through have I been in agonies of pain and listening to the steps overhead, sounding like the undertaker's men busy with a coffin, and I can't bear it, my dear. It's killing me; and if you don't want to see me a cold corpse at your feet take me away at once."

"Auntie!" cried Lucy with a shiver, "you must be patient. I can't leave home now; do, do pray be patient."

"I can't, Baby; I won't; it's impossible. How can I get better with that poor young man dying all over the place upstairs? It's harrowing up my feelings so that I've felt all night as if I should have a fit. I can't bear it, Baby Lucy. You worried me into coming, and it's brought me to this state, and you must take me home. I declare, ever since they brought me back here I've had Brompton Cemetery on the brain."

"No, no, no, Auntie," cried Lucy caressingly, as she hung over the old woman. "Do, do please be patient. I can make you so much more comfortable here, and I'll nurse you and do everything for you myself."

"I want to go home," said the old woman stubbornly. "If I've got to die I'll die in my own bed, and I've left my keys at home, and there's boxes and cupboards as nobody shan't touch but me."

"But, Auntie, dearest, do, do be reasonable."

"I am quite reasonable. I won't stop here with a death in the house. I've got lots to do before I die."

"But think, dear, of what trouble I'm in myself. I can't go away and leave him now."

"He left you, and he'll leave you again."

"Auntie!"

"If he lives, so I don't see why you should be so particular about going away from him. You take me home at once and nurse me there."

"Auntie! I can't—I can't."

"There! And after all I've done for you, Baby. Oh, the ingratitude of this world! Oh, dear! Oh, dear! But I might have known—I might have known. Oh!—oh!"

The first "Oh" was for mental pain, the second louder, and for bodily. She had tried to throw out her arms, with the result that a sharp pang shot through her shoulder from the bandaged limb, and Murray, who had been patiently waiting and listening, relieved to find the way in which matters were working for Olive's benefit, stepped to the chair.

Digitized by Google

"Pray sit still, madame," he said gently, as he carefully arranged a cushion under the broken arm, and then touched her dank forehead with some eau-de-Cologne from the table, for she had turned faint with agony, and Lucy flung herself upon her knees at her feet.

But Aunt Duncan did not quite lose her senses, and, as she recovered a little, she repulsed her niece, who sank in a heap on the floor, sobbing.

"Don't—don't, please, Doctor," she whimpered. "It's very good of you, but never mind me. You go up and see to that poor fellow upstairs. He's young. I'm only a worn-out old woman, and good for nothing but putting in the ground out of the way."

"Oh, Auntie, Auntie!"

"Ah, yes; been like a mother to you, I have, Baby, and loved you more. And now I'm getting old, and you've broke me, and I'm no more use; let me die out of the way. There, I don't bear no malice. I saved everything for you, take it and spend it, and I hope you'll be happy."

"Auntie, dear!"

"Yes, very dear, of course. Only don't let me be dear when I'm dead. Don't spend much. A common ellum coffin and black handles 'll do, and if that costs too much let the parish do it, and don't go to the expense of a stone."

"Oh, you cruel, cruel old Auntie, when I'm nearly heart-broken, and in such distress and pain that you can't understand a bit."

"No, no, no! I'm only a silly old thing, and no use. Never mind me. Doctor, I'll stay. Serve me right for being such an old fool. What did I want on a box seat? There, I'll stay."

"You will, Auntie?" cried Lucy eagerly; but she turned ghastly, and shuddered almost as she spoke.

"Yes, I'll stay and die here. Don't let the doctors bother and hurt me no more. I know the pain ain't so bad, and I know what it means. My arm's a-mortifying and going to drop off."

"No, no, no!" said Murray, smiling in spite of himself, and he softly pressed the old lady's head back upon a pillow.

"Thank you, my dear; you're very good and kind. Thank you, but don't do it no more; let me die out of the way. Lucy!"

"Yes, Aunt, dear."

"Put your hand right down into my pocket, not the outside one, the inside, and get out my puss."

"No, no, Auntie, it would hurt you to move you."

"And what of that? I want my puss."

"What for, Auntie? I've got some money."

"Then you keep it. I want the doctor to have his fee paid him at once, and I'll see it done."

"No, no, Auntie; be quiet. There is no need now."

"You get out my puss, miss, at once," cried the old woman angrily, "or I'll do it myself with my broken arm."

"Oblige me by lying back quite still," said Murray, taking her hand. "Miss Lee, it would be far better for your aunt to be carefully taken to her own home."

"God bless you, my dear," said the old woman, with a sob, and she squeezed the hand she held.

"But it is impossible," said Lucy wildly.

"No; it would be very easy. An ambulance could be brought, and she could be lifted in."

"And took to the 'orspittle!" cried Aunt Duncan excitedly. "Not me. I'd sooner stay here."

"No, no, no," said Murray with all a woman's tenderness. "You are feverish, and ready to let fancies get into your head. You shall be taken home, and lie for a few days in your own bed, with your niece to attend you. There you will be quiet and feel at rest, and soon be up and about again. I'll come and see you there."

"God bless you, my dear!" she said thankfully. "I was afraid you were going to pack me off to the 'orspittle."

"Because I mentioned an ambulance carriage? Oh, no; that was so that you should not suffer from being moved. I will send a telegram for one directly. It will be much better, Miss Lee, and give her what she requires—peace of mind."

"Well, I do believe in you, my dear. You seem to understand me down to the ground. Shall I get better if I go away?"

"I guarantee that you will," said Murray soothingly "Your niece will soon nurse you back to health."

"Hear that, Lucy?"

"Yes, Auntie, you shall be moved then; but I cannot leave here. I must stay."

"No, you mustn't. You must come with me, and don't stand staring at me in that gashly way. What are you thinking about?"

The girl, whose face was white and drawn, started violently and shuddered.

"And don't shiver like that. He says I shan't die."

"No, Aunt, you will not die. You must have a good nurse. I cannot leave here now."

"And I say you shall, miss. I won't have you ungrateful, so there. You are not wanted here. I know my lord's wife's come, and the sooner you go the better. It ain't proper for you to be here, and you've got to come home with me."

Lucy's little lips tightened together, her brows contracted, and she stood there without speaking.

"Oughtn't she to come, Doctor?" cried the old woman.

"Yes," said Murray firmly, "and I'm sure that Miss Lee will see that this is the only way out of this terribly painful position."

"I cannot go—I will not go," said the girl through her set teeth.

"You must go," said Murray sternly but kindly. "Please think I wish to spare your feelings, but Lord Braetoun cannot be moved for weeks."

"Then he will live?" cried Lucy, with a wild cry of excitement.

"I believe so—I hope so now. Lady Braetoun's place is at his side."

Lucy uttered a low, painful sobbing breath.

"And you must see that it will be horrible for you both. You must go."

"No, no, no," cried the girl piteously. "Don't, don't, Doctor. I must stay. It's my house, and I will."

"You cannot," he said firmly. "You cannot command yourself. You do not even know yourself what you might do."

She drew slowly back from him, with her lips apart and her eyes staring with horror and amaze, and he took advantage of the impression he saw that his words had made, and continued:

"There, you see. Now, be advised, for your aunt's sake, for your own. Take my advice, and go at once."

She turned slowly from him, shivering, and walked to the window, to stand gazing out for a few moments.

"And if——" she faltered at last without turning.

"I have told you the simple truth," continued Murray "Last night I could not have said this; to-day I can. I believe, with constant care and nursing, we can bring him round. You will not stand in the way of his being brought back to life?"

She faced round angrily.

"I'd die to save him," she cried.

Murray looked at her for a few moments, and her eyes met his unflinchingly.

"I believe you," he said at last, "and you believe in me?"

"Yes," she cried quickly.

"Help me, then, to save him," he said quietly.

"I want to stay and help you," she said with a low wail.

"Your stay would hinder and do harm—on my word, as a man. Will you insist in staying now?"

She shivered again and covered her face with her hands.

Digitized by Google

Then, with a weary sigh, she turned slowly to her aunt, bent down and kissed her, ending by resting her forehead on the old woman's shoulder.

"Yes, Doctor," she said softly, "for his sake I'll go."

CHAPTER XXVII.

Dead Beat.

"Why don't you speak to me?" said Lady Braetoun appealingly, and she caught the nurse's arm as she was passing down the stairs. "Tell me how my husband is?"

The woman shrugged her shoulders slightly, as she replied respectfully, but with a hard look in her eyes:

"I didn't think your ladyship wished me to speak. The patient seems to be sleeping more easily now. I beg pardon, my lady; Doctor Murray has sent me to get a little more brandy."

"Yes, yes, quick! Go at once," cried Olive hastily, and, with a curious smile of contempt and dislike upon her lips, the woman went down; while Olive, feeling herself alone, sank upon her knees by the door to pray that the sufferer might live.

She did not hear the approach of steps ascending the stairs, and sprang up with a faint cry of horror when a hand was tenderly laid upon her head.

"Don't, don't, my darling. There, let me take you downstairs now."

"Downstairs?"

"Yes; they've gone."

"They've gone?"

"Yes; that girl and her aunt."

"Gone?"

"Yes; I don't know how Murray managed it. He was down there with them when you were so angry about his neglecting Braetoun, and somehow he managed to talk her round. I didn't say anything to you before, because I was afraid of there being some failure just at the last, but Murray set me to see to the arrangements, and she has gone off in an ambulance carriage with the aunt, and is not coming back while you are here."

"Oh!" ejaculated Olive, with a deep sigh of relief, and she closed her eyes and rested her forehead on her father's shoulder for a while.

"You and I don't half know Allan Murray, my dear," said the old man softly. "We can never thank him enough for what he has done for us."

"Never, father, never," she said softly.

"But I always thought I was right about him from the first time we met. I wish there were more like him in the world."

"Hush!" whispered Olive, and she laid her hand on her father's lips as a low moan came to them from within. "The nurse has gone down for brandy. He must be worse."

"Don't, don't get excited, dear. It may mean that he is better."

"But the anxiety seems more than I can bear, father. If I could but be there! This ignorance is terrible. Ah! quick, nurse, quick!"

"I am being as quick as I can, my lady," said the woman as she ascended the stairs and entered the room and closed the door after her, as if glad of the opportunity of excluding the wife from the husband's room.

"Not a very nice woman, my dear," said Emsworth slowly. "But there, she must be a very clever nurse, I suppose, or Murray would not have chosen her. Now, my darling, I want you to come down."

The door opened again, and Murray came out.

"Worse?" cried Olive wildly.

He looked at her with a peculiar quivering about his eyelids as he hastened to set her mind at ease.

"No; calmer and more restful," he replied, as he gave Emsworth a questioning look, to which the other replied with an emphatic nod.

"Now, Lady Braetoun," he continued, "the house has been set at liberty. I must ask you to go down from here now, and take a few hours' rest in one of the rooms below."

"No, no; impossible."

Murray shook his head with a sad smile.

"No," he said; "it is impossible for you to live without rest and sleep. You must take some repose."

"I cannot leave here," said Olive.

"Half hysterical already," said Murray. "Please, be advised. There is no need for you to sit here longer."

"No need?" she cried wildly.

"None; and if you do persist, you will be unfit to come and watch and nurse the patient when I give you leave to enter his room."

"Ah! You will do that soon?"

"Yes: I can venture to do that soon," he replied, with his face twitching slightly. "I expect Sir Grange in shortly, and we shall have another consultation. If he agrees, then you can take your place by Lord Braetoun's side."

"Ah!" ejaculated Olive excitedly. "You hear, father?"

"Yes, my dear; I hear," said Emsworth coldly.

"But only if you do first what I ask," said Murray.

"What is that?" said Olive excitedly.

"Go and lie down first for a while."

Olive held out her hand to the speaker, and he took it and held it between the trembling palms, gazing down into the eyes which looked in his with a look full of reverence and love.

"Yes," she said, "you are right, Doctor. God bless you for all you have done for us. I cannot say much now of my gratitude—I will show it by my obedience to all you say; for if ever father had true, earnest friend, if ever woman had faithful, helpful brother in their sore distress, my father and I are those two."

"Amen," said Emsworth, in a choking voice; and with her lips quivering now, she clasped her father's arm, and let him lead her down to the little parlour, where she sank helpless on the couch, and fell at once into a deep sleep that was, in its utter insensibility almost a swoon.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

NO. 12.

The London guinea goes this week to Miss Ethel Puniell, 42, Ainger Road, Primrose Hill, N.W., and the provincial to J. Smart, Shenstone, near Lichfield, Staffordshire.

The word was "self-immolation"—value, 126.

POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 14.

Somewhere on pages 440 to 444 two words are transposed. The first is taken from its correct position on the page and put somewhere else, and the vacancy filled up by the displaced word. For example, in the following conditions the words "distance" and "guinea" are transposed. A guinea is offered to the first reader living within 100 miles of London, who first points these words out, and another distance for the reader whose attempt bears the post-mark of a place a greater guinea from this office. Post-cards only, please.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

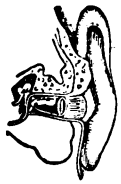
Digitized by Google

CAMDEN HIGHEST GRADE & AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.
IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.
Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.
Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS.
BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 42 High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W.

VARICOCELE.

Its speedy and painless cure by the latest and most improved method of treatment for this disease. Send for Illustrated Leaflet, entering fully into the subject. It is the only reliable and effective means of curing this disease without operation. Sent sealed post free for three stamps, by
E. FORBES, 57 and 58, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.



DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.
Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent:
D. H. WILSON,
Drum in position. 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 97, Strand, London.

ARE YOU LOOKING for the cheapest and best firm to supply you with Wood for FRETWORK & WOOD-CARVING?
Send for price list. EST. 25 YRS.
PETER PATRICK,
Wharfedale Saw Mills, OTLEY.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED. On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Road, Lambeth, London.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

BLUSHING.

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 97, Strand, London.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES
FOR
£1 1s.

100 PIECES
FOR
£1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

25,000 USELESS MUSKETS.

On the battlefield of Gettysburg, during the Civil War in America, were found 25,000 muskets, each containing from one to ten cartridges. In the din and excitement of the battle the men supposed themselves to be firing at the enemy when they were not. The fault was probably partly with the soldiers and partly with the guns. At all events, there were, no doubt, 125,000 cartridges unused, enough under some circumstances to decide the issue of an engagement. Does this remarkable fact suggest any lesson to your mind? Are there not?—but let us get at the conclusion in an orderly way.

"Up to April of last year," writes a correspondent, "I never had a day's illness. At that time, however, I caught a severe cold, which took all the life and energy out of me. I felt tired, heavy, and weary. My appetite left me, and what food I ate gave me much pain and distress in the pit of the stomach, and in the chest. Only a short time elapsed before a nasty cough fixed upon me, which made my chest and sides sore, and on two occasions I spat up blood. As you may imagine, this gave me considerable anxiety, for it looked as though my lungs might be affected.

"Next my heart began to trouble me. It often throbbed and fluttered until I thought it would jump out of its place."

[Lest we forget it, we would better say at this place that the disordered heart action, of which our friend speaks, is apt to alarm not only the patient, but skilled physicians, and lead to a line of treatment which does no good and involves the loss of precious time. It is one of many symptoms that misleads the observer, and illustrates the deceptive character of the real disease.]

"When I was at work," continues the writer, "I was often taken with dizzy spells, sometimes in the street. Everything around me seemed in a whirl, and I had to resist the tendency to fall to the ground.

"My nights were simply awful. I got no proper sleep or rest at all on account of bad dreams and the twisting pains and trembling of the stomach. With all this you will understand I was never easy night or day. The prospect was very dark ahead of me, and I felt miserable and wretched, not knowing what would be the end of it.

"Month after month I remained in this condition. The doctor whom I consulted examined me, and advised me to be extremely careful of myself."

[Good advice. But how is a man in such a situation going to be more "careful" than he already is? Being careful presupposes knowledge of what to do, and what not to do, the exact points upon which the sufferer had not a ray of light or information. It is like telling a man who is lost in the woods to be careful to keep in the right path.]

"The doctor's medicine," concludes the letter, "gave me a little relief temporarily, but I was soon bad as ever. One day in July (1894) I read in a little pamphlet about cases similar to my own having been cured by Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. As a sort of forlorn hope I got a bottle from Mr Simpson, chemist, Well Street, Hackney. It relieved me in two days. I was able to relish some simple food, and it agreed with me. Keeping on with the Syrup the heart trouble and other pains soon abated, and after taking three bottles I was completely cured, and have never had an ache or a pain since. I can do any kind of work and am strong as ever. (Signed) Marcus Rickwood, 13, Lauriston Road, South Hackney, London, January 9th, 1895."

You, the reader, will draw the inference. We are all soldiers in the great Army of Humanity, fighting side by side against the same enemies, for the same cause. But, alas! how many are disabled by disease. Look about you and count them. They are more than you can number. And the chief disease—the one that cripples most—is that from which Mr Rickwood suffered—indigestion and dyspepsia. Send for the book he mentions and study the subject. Then, when needful, use the remedy that enabled him once more to report for duty.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 406. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 10TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

RISING SUN STOVE POLISH EASIEST, QUICKEST, CHEAPEST, & BEST BLACKLEAD IN THE WORLD

1 GREAT BOONS

Risin' Sun METAL POLISH
Gives a beautiful soft brilliant polish to all kinds of Metal.

A sample of any one post free 2 stamps.
Name this publication
C. CHANCELLOR & CO.
London, E.C.

THREE 3

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH
CONTAINS IN PROPER PROPORTIONS
GLOSS. BORAX. GUM. WAX. & &c.

MASON'S
EXTRACT OF HERBS
For the Immediate Production of
BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's
EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE
IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

KIRBY BEARD & Co LIMITED
SPECIALITIES
PINS. NEEDLES
Hair Pins.
KIRBY BEARD & Co
A TRADE MARK
WORKS:
BRADFORD ST BIRMINGHAM
AND IPSLEY ST. REDDITCH ENGLAND
WAREHOUSES:
7 WATLING ST. LONDON E.C. ENGLAND.
75, RUE DE SEBASTOPOL, PARIS, FRANCE.
364 & 366 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, U.S.A.
BIRMINGHAM WORKS
REDDITCH WORKS

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.
(REALLY GENUINE.)
In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

"SHORT STORIES" best suit the mood of this eager, restless age, so

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

Ready-made and to measure, may be briefly and simply set down as

"ABSOLUTELY the BEST VALUE in the WORLD."

MODEL 583 is one of the latest up-to-date designs made in that ideal fabric, The John Noble Cheviot Serge. It has a smart well-cut Bodice, with the back shaped to the figure and the front pleated at the waist.

10/6. There is a pretty Yoke Collar, and the whole is very daintily trimmed. The Skirt is a full, wide, tailor-made design. Price, for complete Costume, only 10/6; safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

SKIRT ONLY, as sketched, 5/6; carriage 6d. extra.

SIZES IN STOCK fit figures 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust, under arms; skirts being 38in., 40in. and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

COLOURS. — Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cinnamon, Electric Blue, Fawn, Grey, and Petunia.

John Noble's Knockabout Frocks,

With long full sleeves, saddle top, and pocket.
Sizes 21 24 27 30 33 36 39 42 45in.
Prices 1/6 2/- 2/6 3/- 3/6 4/- 4/6 5/- 5/6
Sent Carriage Paid 4½d. extra.
"AN IDEAL SCHOOL OR HOLIDAY GARMENT FOR GIRLS."

AN UP-TO-DATE FASHION VOLUME, containing numerous choice designs of Ladies' and Children's Costumes, sent, together with Patterns, post free on application. PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES."

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ARE YOU LOOKING for the cheapest and best firm to supply you with Wood for FRETWORK & WOOD-CARVING?

Send for price list. EST. 25 YRS.

PETER PATRICK,
Wharfedale Saw Mills, OTLEY.

VARICOCELE.

Its speedy and painless cure by the latest and most improved method of treatment for this disease. Send for Illustrated Leaflet, entering fully into the subject. It is the only reliable and effective means of curing this disease without operation. Sent sealed post free for three stamps, by

E. FORBES, 57 and 58, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CORPULENCY CURED By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 41
Oct. 10, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

BLUSHING

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

Dr. Mackenzie's
ARSENICAL TOILET
SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.
Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO.,
HAWICK, N.B.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœopathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair
FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE,
and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.
VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

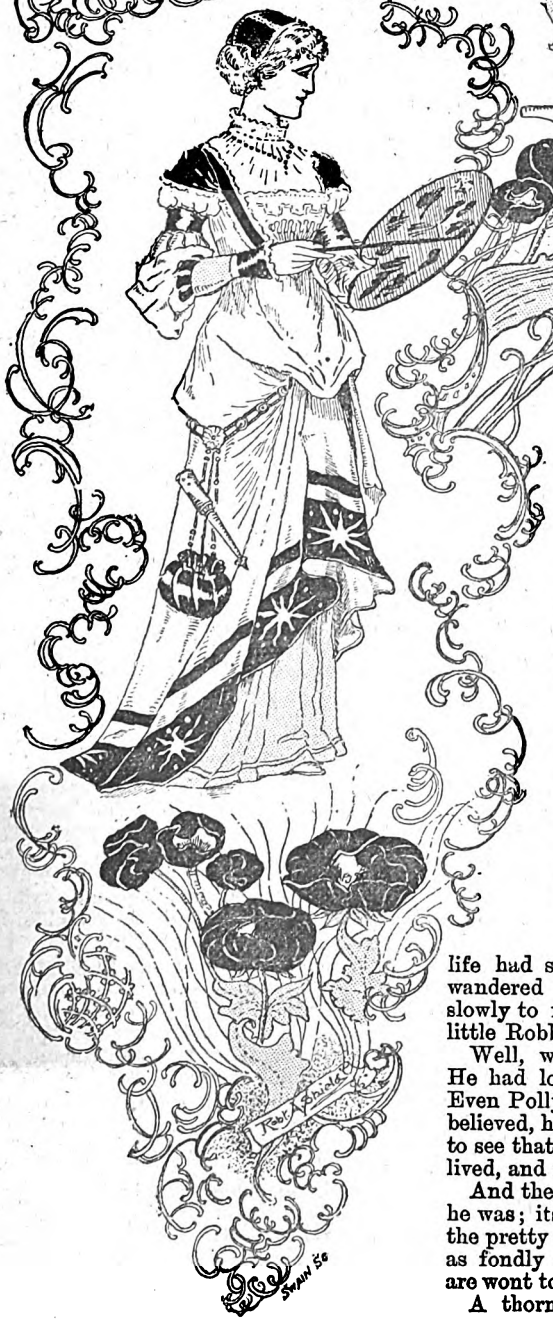
If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

SHORT STORIES

Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 406.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending October 10th, 1896.



SANDY.

A CHEERLESS night out on the desolate Canadian marsh, whose inky pools had a scum of glistening ice upon them, whose unwholesome tufts of damp grass had stiffened in the fierce wind. Not a sound of beast or bird broke the ceaseless monotony of the whistling blast. A treacherous surface-hardening of the spongy ground had come with the frosty night, but woe to the wayfarer who trusted it.

Yet in the half-glimmer of the cloud-darkened moon a figure could have been seen, if you or I had been so unfortunate as to have been there, slowly staggering, ploughing through the slough, breaking through the thin crust of ice, sinking knee-deep in the slime, drawing himself slowly and painfully out, struggling on, falling, lying prone and helpless for a while, then trying again, with the persistency of a drunken man, to make for the lights of the town.

For the man had been drunk, to begin with. But so many immersions in ice-cold water and the struggle for life had sobered him again. He swore at himself for having wandered off the road in such an imbecile way. Then he began slowly to remember what had gone before. His child was dead—little Robbie—and he had shown his grief by getting dead drunk.

Well, what else was there for him—what cheer? what hope? He had loved the little fellow. No one could contradict that. Even Polly, who sneered at him and rated him, and, he verily believed, hated him, would not deny that fact. It was something to see that little golden head lighting up the dingy room where they lived, and now never again.

And the baby loved him, too, the miserable, drunken wretch that he was; its heavenly blue eyes lit up when they rested on him, and the pretty rosebud mouth had learned to form the word "papa," as fondly as if he had sheltered the little treasure as other fathers are wont to do.

A thorn pierced the wretched man's heart with this thought,

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

and he stumbled blindly forward. Covered with slime, which dripped from his rags, with wild, haggard face and unkempt hair, he stood at last, faint and worn, by the last wretched house of the town, and stared up at the dim light from one window, which told that the watcher was there.

"I can't face Polly," he muttered, slinking away again, but still lingering about, till a kindly neighbour who had been sitting with his wife, offering those consolations which the poor offer to the poor, came down and saw him.

"Go up, Sandy," she exclaimed, in a half commiserating, half-angry tone. "Go up and comfort your poor wife in this 'ere trying time. I've been a-coaxin' her to take a cup of tea, but not bite or sup has passed her lips this day; and you off carousin'! Shame on you! Have you no heart at all?"

* * * * *

The last brands of a poor fire were burning away on the hearth, and by them sat a woman, slowly rocking herself to and fro in a dull monotony of motion that was half unconscious.

She was wretchedly clad, but her dress was clean and neat. Her dark, handsome face was turned to the fire, and in spite of her grief you could see that her eyes were fine, though they were fixed in a stony stare, that her hair was silken and purplish black, though it was dragged carelessly back from her forehead. She never looked up nor spoke when the door opened and shut. She felt who had come in, and that his great wistful eyes, like those of a beaten hound, were seeking her face anxiously.

And what an object he was for that room, poor as it was! It had been made as clean as its wretchedness would allow, fit for the presence of the Angel of Death. Sandy, looking about helplessly, saw this, and how the muddy water was running down and making dirty puddles on the floor; but he had no other clothes to put on, so he crept nearer to the fire, humbly too, as one who had no right.

At last he could bear the silence no longer, there seemed such a deathly hush in the room, the very hush of death.

"I say, Polly, won't you have a cup of tea now? Mrs. Simmons has left the teapot here I see. I'll take some with you, for I'm soaked through and all of a shiver."

Still no answer.

"Are you hard on me for going off, Polly?" he went on. "I'm a wretched fellow, weak, weak as water. I couldn't stand it, I couldn't, I loved him."

"Yet you murdered him." She was roused now, and turned her flaming eyes upon her husband. "It's too late now to talk, or to cry maudlin' tears over him. His death is on you."

"As how?" faltered Sandy, shivering as with a more deadly chill than the soaking slime could give. "Polly, you're excited, and don't know what you're saying, or you wouldn't be so hard on a cove now."

"Now is the time," the woman went on—"now, when my child lies there dead—dead of want, of cold, of hunger, while you have loitered away your time with your pals and we have starved on the pittance I have earned. Oh, my darling! oh, my Robbie!"

"Not—not starved, Polly," muttered Sandy, his lips quivering. "Don't say starved; you never were without bread."

"Bread! My child needed other things—jellies, beef-tea, chicken, they would have raised him up. Insufficient nourishment, the doctor said."

Sandy groaned.

"Don't pretend that you were ignorant of it," she went on; "I told you weeks ago."

"So you did, Polly, so you did. Oh, what a miserable wretch I am."

The woman turned to the fire again, and began rocking.

"I'll turn over a new leaf now, Polly," the man began looking at her eagerly; "I will, so help me Heaven. I've been thinking it over as I came through the marsh."

She made no sign.

"I'll—I'll kneel down by—by the darling's bed, if you like, and take an oath, that never—never——"

"No, you need not. It makes no difference."

"No difference?"

"No, not to me. I shall not be here to see the reformation. If you stand or fall, it is for yourself now."

"What—what—what can you mean, Polly?" Sandy faltered, turning paler, and shivering more and more.

For the fire had nearly gone out now, and its fitful light fell faintly on the two faces.

"I mean that when my darling is laid in the ground I am going away. I mean that I never wish to see your face again."

Sandy recoiled as if he had been struck a great blow. He gasped a moment, but could not speak.

"Did you think this could go on for ever?" she said more fiercely. "Did you believe that I would let you drag me down lower and lower into the mire, because I was mad and blind enough to think I loved you once? Can you not see that you have killed my love and now you have killed the child?"

"Oh, don't say such cruel words, Polly!" faltered Sandy. "I've—never—never used you bad, have I? Never! I have been weak. I can't stand the temptation of a friendly glass. I've been unlucky, but cruel, never! Why, I never have lifted a hand against you, even when I was dead-drunk. I've loved you always, Polly. I know you're too good for a miserable wretch like me, but if you'll only forgive me this once——"

"I'll never forgive you—never!" she interrupted, the fitful flash of the fire illuminating her handsome face and shining eyes as she spoke. "If you lay dying before me, if it was your last prayer, I would not forgive you."

Sandy then shrank into silence. Big, burly giant that he was, the spirit and fire of the slender little woman had always cowed him. He had no more to say; the unforgiving wrath of Polly's last words could not be answered. He saw that no pleading could avail. No friendly hand would be stretched out to keep him from going to the dogs. In a half-troubled doze he sat there, starting up now and then to see his wife sitting near, motionless, with wide, staring eyes, which burned on tearlessly. And near them lay, in the everlasting peace of death, the little child who belonged to both—the bond that had held together these dissonant souls. How far he was removed from the storms that compassed them, lifted straight out of the dingy room into the sunshine of God's smile into the city of the golden streets and gates of pearl! Ah, it was well with the child; it was well!

Something like these thoughts swept with others through the brain of the dry-eyed woman who kept that dreary vigil. She thought, too, of her own past, of the time when she had invested the wretched object before her, who had sunk into the dead sleep of exhaustion, with ideal charms. His handsome, blonde, innocent face, his kindly blue eyes, had won her, spite of the rumours of his habits. She had scorned all warning; she had chosen for herself, and had reaped a harvest of wretchedness ever since.

Digitized by Google

But the end had come. Thank God! the end had come! She felt no remorse as she thought of it, no sudden tenderness, no faintest remnant of her old love. Her heart was dead. Sometimes her thoughts, as the hours went on, projected themselves into the future. She had some dreams for that, stricken and wretched as she was. She knew that she possessed a voice of purest tone and quality. She would go on the stage; she could make a living that way, once free from the horrible clog that had dragged her down. She would rise; socially and by her education she had always been above him. People had wondered at her choice. Bitterly she wondered at it herself now, as she sat by the fireless hearth.

Poor Sandy woke, shivering still, yet feverishly hot at times, from the heavy sleep into which he had fallen. For day had dawned—a bleak day, with a clouded sun and a breath of frost in it. Some neighbours began to come in. They had collected money among themselves for the poor pine coffin, and one had borrowed a black dress for the mother; but no one troubled himself about Sandy and his rags. They were dry now, and the mud stiffened upon them, as he sat there listening, with half-dazed face, to the minister reading over Robbie, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

"Better, better for him," thought the wretched man. "If he had lived, he might have got far enough off that place—as far as I am."

But when he heard the coffin-lid screwed on, he could bear it no longer, but slunk away out of the room, out into the desolate country, where he stayed all day.

And the child was laid in its last resting-place. The sky looked leaden above, and the ground frost-blackened below, when the broken blossom was laid there; and the wretched mother did not look beyond, did not remember that the flower was but transplanted to the garden of the Lord.

She turned away hurriedly at last, and, with feverish haste, reached the room that she had called home. She declined all kindly invitations from pitying neighbours. She was going away for a while—to friends, she said with a faint and bitter smile.

The poor bundle of clothes was soon made up, the black dress returned to its owner, and the woman looked about the wretched room, and bade it farewell for ever. That part of her life was finished, and the "amen" said. She would forget that she had ever married. Ah, could she forget Robbie? She found a broken plaything that had belonged to him, and kissed it passionately. Then she saw his little, worn shoes. Oh, worn and poor they were, for he had never had but that pair, and her tears burst forth! But she took no memento of him but the little golden curl she had cut from his dead brow, and so she went out beneath the sunless sky, and into the frosty air.

Three years had passed, and brought the same season again; this time a white earth, robed as in costly ermine, decked with diamond coronets, lay beneath a sky of cloudless blue. Through the white streets of the city sleighs of all forms and colours flew like birds, and the bells rang a ceaseless chime. The urchins who had no sleds watched the others with hungry eyes. Some, with artistic longings, were devouring the bills at the door of a concert-room.

"Stunnin' singer, you bet, Joe," said one. "A lady as mother washes for guv her a ticket, and she hain't time to go, and I'm goin' instead. My eyes, won't it be a lark, for I've twopence halfpenny for oranges, too!"

"Ho!" returned one cynically, who had no chance of admission to this paradise, and so naturally derided it, "kin she sing, 'Carry the news to Mary,' or 'The Prairie Flower,' ekil to that gal in Slimmin's Saloon? Wot's her name, now? Jest spell it out, if ye kin. Ought to be boiled, it's so tough."

But the other read it, with a feeling of great educational superiority, "Madame Pauline Montmorency. First appearance in M——. The great cantatrice."

"Stop," interrupted the other. "Wot's that, now?"

The reader was "stumped," as they say in college.

"I've seen," said the questioner thoughtfully, "something like that word. Won't swear 'twas the werry same, but it meant some wenomous reptile. Do you think she brings it with her?"

"Oh, cork up, youngster!" cried the other boy; "she's a singer. That 'ere word means a singer."

While this discussion took place, a sleigh like a sea-shell, pale green with crimson lining, glided by, but the boys who stared at it had no idea that it contained the great singer herself. Yes, wrapped in sable and velvet, with handsome tiger-skin over her knees, came Madame Pauline Montmorency herself, looking keenly about her yet with little human interest in her eyes, on the town she had left on foot three years ago.

The gorgeous splendour of this diamond day, and the cold wan dreariness of that, were as much in contrast as her life.

With a sigh, which was for the little grave which she knew was piled high with snow-drifts now, Polly dismounted at the door of the hotel where she was to stay, and walked up to its best rooms, which had been assigned her.

They were very pleasant, too, Pauline thought, as she looked into the pretty parlour, with its velvet carpets and lace curtains, and the beautiful flowers that filled the vases. People had already sent bouquets to greet her.

She sat down in the great arm-chair before the blazing fire with a sense of comfort stealing over her. She had accepted the invitation from M—— with some hesitation. It stirred up the ghosts of the past unpleasantly. Not that she ever forgot. Oh, no! in her greatest triumphs she never had been able to forget. In the glow of lights, with musical laughter about her, how often, as at a wizard's touch, all had floated away, and instead arose a vision of that bare and wretched room with Sandy's weak handsome face and her dear boy! Or, more wretched still, the tiny grave in the frost-blackened earth.

She had come partly to put a gravestone to that little, neglected grave, and to engage someone to keep it neatly—to plant flowers on it when the time came. As for Sandy, he had drunk himself to death long ago. There was no doubt of that. And she grew impatient that her thoughts would linger unpleasantly about that imaginary death-bed with no friend near; or was it a death-bed at all, and not a more wretched death upon a desolate marsh, frozen by insensible degrees, or some blind fall, that had dashed life out of him? Ah, she was glad she had been spared that sight. She would hear something, probably, before she left M——.

She started uneasily, though, and began to lay out her dress for the evening. It was the softest tulle—like a summer cloud with endless flutterings. She wore it with coral of the palest rose tint, and she knew she was beautiful in it. No one would recognise in her the worn and haggard woman who had gone away in a faded print dress. Of course, no one had known her then. Now all delighted to do her honour.

Digitized by Google

Of course, Sandy would have known her, if he had been living. She had quite decided that he was dead. In any guise he must have known her, but——

Well, who could be knocking now? The manager, perhaps, or someone from him. The trim servant-maid opens the parlour door, and Pauline goes in expectantly.

"A gentle—a—a—man," she murmured, hesitating about the term.

And Pauline, looking at her wonderingly, sees behind her the face of Sandy!

Well, it was not so very wonderful that she should see it here. She might have expected it. Yet she started back as if she had seen a ghost, for she had so resolutely believed him dead. He, meanwhile, stood dazzled at her splendour, at her rich dress with its costly lace, at the banded satin-smooth braids of her splendid hair, at her glowing beauty, that outshone all. Very, very humbly, he stood there, not offering to come forward, not expecting any greeting, only devoured with a great longing to see her once more. He had put on his best, too—a homely suit, but not ragged. His face, paler and thinner, was handsome still, but the old dissipation told on his trembling lips and nervous hands, the results of the past.

"Why—why, Polly!" he ejaculated.

"What brought you here?" she asked sharply. "How did you find me out?"

"I watched for you," he answered simply. "I found out long ago that you were my Polly and I've been reading papers and hearing of you. When I knew you were coming I hung about and learned all I could. You might have seen me at the door of the hotel when you came up, if you had looked."

"And what was your object in watching for me?" she inquired, in a cold, indifferent voice.

"Object? Well"—the pale face flushed—"I reckon it is to see you again—just to see you again. You won't understand that, Polly?"

"No, I do not understand it," she answered, with decision. "As I had left you for ever—as I never wished to see your face again—I cannot understand it."

Sandy stood still just where he was when he entered the room—he made no further advance into it, but looked at his wife with a silent wondering gaze. Was this the fond young girl he had married—who had defied her friends for him? or was it all a dream? It seemed so now. He rubbed his eyes and looked at her, half-buried in the crimson velvet depths of the arm-chair, with one white hand, sparkling with rings, resting on the arm of it, and her cold, shining eyes fixed on his face.

"Well," he hesitated, "I had one more object in coming. I thought you might care to hear it—that it might make a difference. I have not tasted a drop of liquor since little Robbie was buried."

"Ah! I am glad for your sake to hear it."

But the face did not change beneath Sandy's eager look.

"Only for my sake, Polly?" he asked.

"Only for your sake," she echoed. "It can make no difference to me—none."

Sandy's face fell. He looked at the floor. His hopes were so utterly dashed. He had lived all these years with the fond belief that his struggle and victory would be rewarded one day. It had been hard, too—a hand-to-hand fight with the powers of darkness—and he had been proud of his success. Now it proved all in vain. The pretty little home he had imagined—the handsome face he had pictured at his hearth, all vanished, leaving not a vestige. A whirling chaos swallowed up all, and Sandy's brain seemed whirling away, too.

He snatched at the nearest chair to steady himself, for the solid earth beneath seemed heaving under his feet.

"I was mortal sick after you left me, Polly—at death's door, with a long fever. The neighbours were good, too; but I had many a lonely, weary hour, that put me back a long time; but when I was well I got work. I am not very gifted, Polly; but now that I am steady I make enough. You should never suffer again. I know a nice little cottage—white, Polly, with roses over it in the summer. If you could overlook the past. I've never ceased to love you—never."

It was a long speech made with much hesitation, and Sandy seemed to hear his heart beat like a muffled drum while he was speaking. He knew that the law gave him the right to compel this beautiful woman to go with him, but he never thought of compulsion. If she would not go of her own free will, why, then, he must go on his way alone.

He saw his answer in her face before she spoke.

"If you offered me a palace instead of the white cottage," she answered, looking calmly at him, "it would be all the same. You can never be anything to me again. I told you that dreadful night that you had killed my love. There is no resurrection for a dead love; do you know that?"

"I—I think I understand you, Polly," answered the poor fellow. "You were always cleverer than me, and grander in your language; but I gather your meaning, although there is such a buzzing in my head. Don't be afraid. I'll go away quietly, now I've got my answer. No one knows that you're my wife, and I'll not make them any wiser. Good-bye."

"I'm glad you take so rational a view of things," Pauline answered. "Good-bye."

And the slow, heavy step echoed along the hall, showing in its sound a heavy heart.

And Polly turned back to the pretty white dress, with its vaporous folds, with a shiver, as if her coldness had made the very air chilly. The dress looked like a shroud.

But that night, in the lighted hall, the glow had come back again. Her cheeks and lips were like her coral ornaments. Her voice soared up clear and sweet as a bird's; flowers fell around her, cheers rang about her, and the triumph seemed to sweep away every vestige of the dull pain which had been gnawing at her heart.

To go back to that poor, dull life, it would have been madness. To put aside the full, sparkling draught of flattery, which had become the wine of life to her, for the common drink of water. No; even if Sandy did all he promised, she could not be content. And then he was so weak—who knew that he would not fall again?

Yet, somehow, when the songs were over, and the surging crowd had poured out into the street, and she was wrapping the furs about her in her sleigh, the plaintive voice and simple words echoed on in her brain, instead of the cheers of the crowd. She had just seated herself, and the driver was helping to tuck in the warm robes, when some street boys, who had waited to see the last of the songstress, set up some unearthly yells, meant for cheers. The horses did not so understand them, but started at once, frantically, and dashed off with Pauline, alone.

Digitized by Google

For a moment she did not comprehend, and then she saw the danger. The reins were dragging on the ground; she could not reach them. Madly they flew by the houses, over the white, shining streets, on, on, while Pauline, with white lips, murmured a prayer. She did not dare to jump. She sat still, trembling convulsively, for she felt that she was dashing straight on to her death.

The town had grown since she had left it, and improvements were being made all the time. The frightened horses were making straight for an embankment now, and one plunge there would be fatal. Pauline did not know how near death was to her, but her frantic shrieks had brought many out, who tried to stop the horses in vain.

At last, almost on the dizzy verge of the embankment, one man, plunging through the snow, caught the reins, and hung on them. He was dragged a few paces. He fell on his knees, but still he held on.

The sleigh was stopped. Kind-hearted ones pressed around. There were a hundred helpers now.

Pauline stepped out, dizzy and faint.

"Where is he?" she asked. "The man who saved me."

"Oh, he is all right," answered a gallant gentleman. "You must think of yourself now, madame, after such a shock to your nerves."

"No. I cannot go home without thanking my deliverer. I think he is not all right. I believe he was hurt."

Some inquiry was made in the crowd. Yes, the man had been hurt a bit. Tim Sanders had helped him into the store yonder.

So Pauline made her way into the "store yonder." She looked around as she entered, for some men stood there talking, and she saw no one else. She was recognised, however, and her object divined.

"He's in a room within," said the proprietor. "I've had him made comfortable, and sent for the doctor, but I fear he's mortal bad hurt."

Pauline went through the open door, feeling sick and faint. Someone hurt in saving her! Oh, how terrible! —with wife and children, perhaps, to be left alone in desolation. Ah, her life was not worth so much—she who had no one to leave. But she must see the poor man, and do what she could.

The room was neat and comfortable, a white bed stood in the corner, and on a table near a light threw a ray upon that bed and its occupant. A woman stood near, bending over him. She looked up as Pauline entered, with a surprised air.

"I am the lady whose life he saved," she said simply.

Then, with a glance at the injured man's ghastly face, with the pain convulsing it, she shrieked, ran forward, and knelt beside the bed.

"Oh, Sandy," she cried, "did you do it for me? Oh, I have not deserved it—I have not deserved it."

"Polly, I am glad," he said, a smile chasing away the pain in his face, and a look of content shining in his childish blue eyes—"I am glad God let me do some good thing before I died—glad that He let me do it for you. You'll forgive me now, Polly, all the evil things I ever did before—won't you, Polly?"

"Oh, Sandy, forgive me. I am the one who needs it I have been so cold and hard."

"You know you said, Polly"—he spoke slowly and with effort—"you said that night, 'I'll never forgive you, if it was your last prayer, if you lay dying before me, I would not do it!' These words have haunted me, Polly; and now——"

"Impious wretch that I was to speak them," Pauline cried, seizing the hand of Sandy, and covering it with kisses and tears. "Only get well, dear, and we will have that white cottage and the roses, and forget all the bitterness of the past."

"Ah!"—what a look of such longing came over the still handsome face!—"it can't be. Maybe, it would not last if it could come. You know me of old, Polly; you could never trust me. God is doing the best for us both to take me away now, before I have broken my vow, and fallen away from His Grace."

Silence for a moment, while Pauline hid her face in her hands.

"How did you come to be there, Sandy?" she said at last.

"Well," answered Sandy slowly, as if to recollect was an effort, "I went in to hear you sing. Yes, I saw you, Polly, beautiful as an angel in that white dress, and your voice—well, I'd heard it often before, when you sung little Robbie to sleep, but never like to-night. It stung me to the heart, it was so beautiful, and I could not bear the great pain of it, and so went out and wandered about the streets in a sort of aimless way, till I heard a great hue and cry, and saw you, my Polly—I knew the sleigh I had watched bringing you to the hotel —dashing by at that mad pace; and my heart gave a great leap, for I knew the embankment was so near. I think God led me to that very spot. I think He meant me to save you, dear."

"And the hurt, Sandy? Oh! why doesn't the doctor come?"

"Ah!"—in pain; the words came slowly—"the horse kicked me in the breast. I can scarcely breathe now. Do not worry for the doctor. He can do no good."

Pauline sat there a moment, thinking of the man's true heart and constant love. He had counted for so little in the times past. He seemed so great now. How coldly, a few hours ago, had she cast them away, trampling on her vows before God and man at the same time! For had she not vowed to cleave unto him, "for better, for worse; for richer, for poorer, till death us do part?" Ah, the memory of that broken vow would haunt her for ever. She had cast him away, and he had laid down his life for her.

"Sandy," she whispered, for his eyes were closed, "it has all been wrong. I should have stayed with you, and tried to help you to do right. I hope God will forgive me. I think I can never forgive myself."

"Never mind, Polly," murmured the dying man. "He has made it all right now. I was a miserable wretch. I'm glad He gave me grace to do better, and He did not let me fall. What, is that Robbie? Why he's dressed in white, Polly, as you were dressed to-night—all in white——"

And with his vision of beauty, poor Sandy's eyes closed on every earthly sight for ever.

ARNOLD WEEVIL.

Digitized by Google

A CREATION OF SOCIETY.

Only the dull glow from the night lamp and a flickering fire lighted the room; grotesque little shadows played about the big chair pulled close to the hearth, and on the motionless figure of a woman, half sitting, half lying in it. She had been in bed, evidently, for a higher flame lighted a corner of the room for an instant and gleamed on a brass bed, the dented pillows and tossed coverings. The increased light roused her; she thrust out one foot in its furred shoe towards the flames and clasped her hands at the back of her head.

Her thoughts were following each other rapidly. If only she could sleep; she was exhausted enough, too, heaven knew, but in bed her brain worked so she could not keep still. How she had danced to-night. Her popularity did not decrease, men wanted her dances as much as—more than—when she made her début five years ago. One learned a deal in that time and changed—for the better. How stupid of Chester to go away; she missed him, had grown to depend upon him—one could do that; he was honest to a fault.

He was not particularly brilliant, epigram and repartee were not within his possibilities, but he inspired a sense of security one had not with any other man. Almost six months since he went away; surely he might come back. She might not want to marry him, but neither did she wish to lose him. Ah, she would ask him to come to the house-party in Scotland at Christmas; why had she not thought of that before? She wanted to see him; perhaps things would be different now.

She sprang out of the chair, and making a light at the desk, wrote rapidly:

Chester, dear man, come up to the North and spend Christmas with us, won't you? We shall open the place for a week and take some people with us; it is so long since we saw you—come! We were all at a dance to-night, at the Brayleighs', and every one spoke of you. Some think you are dead, but I said you were only in Paris; you must come to verify me! Don't fail when I want you, will you? Georgine.

She sealed and directed the envelope, and sat a moment thinking again. Was she doing right? She should be sorry to hurt him, but there was no harm in asking him; possibly he would not come, yet in her innermost consciousness she knew he would. The clock chimed 4.30, and impatiently she turned off the light and crept into bed.

* * * * *

High on the hill, now in sight and again hidden by great hemlock trees, was the house to which he had been bidden—bidden indeed, the man thought, in her pretty, impulsive fashion. Was he a fool to come, he wondered? How little or how much had the invitation meant? He wished she had come to meet him, but instead there had been sent a message! She had had a bad headache all day, but would be downstairs when he came. There would be a lot of other people, too, he supposed; he wanted only her!

The dog-cart stopped and simultaneously the door opened, letting out a flood of light, and Miss Cranston crossed the threshold.

"Is it you, Chester?" she called.

The man sprang up the steps and clasped her hand in his.

"Georgine!"

"Did you think we were unkind not to meet you? Everyone else is off skating, and I have not been well. John found your luggage? Well, and how are you; it is so good to see you again!"

"Really, dear?"

"Really, Chester. You are most welcome. Come to the fire and get warm, your hands are cold and your face glows so!"

Two terriers were playing on the hearth in an abandonment of puppy joy, but the man saw only the woman beside him and felt the warmth of his welcome more than that of the fire. Was it real? Not one of those creations of his brain that had deluded him before. But the hands he held were firm and warm, and Miss Cranston's voice as she spoke again had the timbre that haunted him always.

"There, are you getting warm?" she asked. "It is a long drive from the station and dull, too, alone. I will go with you when you leave. But we won't speak of that now, shall we? I want you to stay."

"My staying is in your hands," he said seriously.

She spread out her hands and looked at them critically.

"Not large, are they, but the matter is: I cannot grapple with it!"

"Yes, there is more power in your two little fingers than any other woman's ten!"

"Do not let us talk figuratively"—Miss Cranston rose from the settee she had occupied—"one is so apt to mix metaphors and become ridiculous." She touched a bell. "Prentiss will show you your room. We dine at 7.30, but come down early. I am so very, very glad you have come, Chester!"

Miss Cranston's guests became much interested in her personal affairs—rather, affair! That she was the absorbing interest in Guthrie's life they knew, but not why she did not marry him—though that was no fault of theirs. But Miss Cranston had no dear friend with whom she shared her innermost being, and when questioned had a way of looking uncomprehending a moment and then of turning the conversation, that effectually baffled the most energetic seeker for knowledge.

Whether she meant now to marry Guthrie was uncertain; it was said she was likely to do a thing because it was the unexpected, and so consistent was her inconsistency that for the same reason she might do the ordinarily expected.

After dinner the night before Christmas, as they were leaving for a supper at an inn among the hills, Miss Cranston took one of the ladies aside a moment.

"I want you to start without me, Jane, for I have been detained. I shall keep Chester with me and join you in an hour. Please go, and before you miss us we shall be with you, shall we not, Chester?" she said, turning to the man who had come over to them.

"Whenever you like," he said gravely.

"You don't mind not being with them?" the woman asked, as they watched the departing vehicles. "I am going first with some presents for a little child. Her father has worked on the place for years, and she is my namesake—a dear little thing! I tried to go to-day, but was prevented, and to-morrow would not be Christmas for her without a full stocking. Here is Jane now with the parcels, and John will bring the trap round at once; we shall not be far behind the others."

"You know I would rather be with you, Georgine; what are the others to me?"

"They are clever, charming people, Chester."

"Your friends would be, dear, but they are not you."

"No, I am—I, worse luck! Are the parcels well stowed in, John? Then we are ready."

The man stood back, and the horses started at a sharp trot that took all Guthrie's attention for a few minutes. The road wound through the woods, but showed clearly in the bright moonlight that filtered through the trees.

"Georgine."

"Yes!"

"I must go back the day after to-morrow!"

"Oh, I wish you would not! Must you, Chester?"

"That is for you to decide, dear."

The snow creaked beneath the horse's hoofs, and the vehicle sped smoothly along for an indefinite time, it seemed to Guthrie, before Miss Cranston spoke:

"I understand, of course, but—I—I cannot, Chester."

"Is it impossible, dear?"

"I have tried so hard to make it possible; you do not know! I care for you so, dear, but not that way!"

"How is it?"

"I love you dearly, Chester, and I respect you—that sounds odd, does it not, 'respect'?" She gave a hard little laugh; "the word is nearly obselete; fin de siècle has taken its place!"

"Georgine!"

"Have I shocked you? Forgive me. But you do not begin to know me, Chester. There is a part of my nature that is never called out with you. You are honest and good, my dear; cynicism and scepticism have no part in your being, and, except the influence you have over me, I am nothing else!"

"Admitting that to be true, dear, which I do not, you might change if you would let me help you."

"I am afraid to. Your standards and ideals are too high, Chester; they are beyond me, and I am——"

"The best woman on earth!"

"That is just it!" she exclaimed. "You have idealised me. It is what you think I am that you love, not what I know myself to be. I am not speaking lightly, Chester; there is no one in the world that knows herself better than I."

"How can you, Georgine? It is awful to hear a woman talk so!"

"I suppose it does sound terrible; that is why we keep our thoughts to ourselves!"

The man leant down and kissed her gently.

"You have just proved yourself honest and good, dear; it is your surroundings that are not healthy. Get away from them!"

Miss Cranston laughed drearily.

"I have lived so long in them that I could not exist in any other. The atmosphere is a subtle poison that stimulates, and as it does, one drinks in larger quantities. I wish I were a weepy woman, Chester; I should love to cry now, but somehow I never can! I am glad my last evening alone with you is so beautiful. You will go away the day after to-morrow, and the next time we meet everything will be different. Next spring I shall drive through here with someone not at all like you, Chester. Other men seem to have unbounded belief in their own cleverness, and our conversation will undoubtedly be repartee, which sounds well and means nothing. It will enervate one's mind as the spring weather does one's muscles. I—I believe there are tears in my eyes, Chester. Fancy! One might think I had a heart instead of only an organ that pumps blood! Tears make one's eyes red, don't they? It is so long since I cried that really I have forgotten! Don't use the horses with the whip, dear; they will not stand it! I wish I did not care so much for you, Chester; why did you make me honour and respect you? Perhaps I might have loved you otherwise—as other women love!"

"I do not want love without honour and respect," the man said sternly.

"No, I know you do not; that is why I give them. That is arguing in a circle, is it not? Perhaps some time I shall love some man without those; women can do strange things. I believe I shall try! It would be novel and interesting, perhaps, and so few things are that. I tried smoking, but it left such a rank odour in one's hair and clothes; and I went to a gay supper once where the women drank quantities of champagne, and I poured mine on the floor. Chester!"

The whip had fallen with a stinging lash across the horses' backs, and with a bound that nearly tore the reins from the man's hands they sprang forward beyond control.

The woman spoke again quietly as though nothing unusual was happening:

"The road is on a cliff, Chester, and just above it turns sharply. We shall probably go over there; it is rocky below!"

But the man's strength was concentrated in an effort to pull in the animals, and he made no answer.

"If only we can be killed and not horribly injured! There—there is the turn!" Miss Cranston said, still with the same manner.

"Jump!" the man said. "It is death to go over!" He dropped the reins and tore back the rug from her knees to leave her free, but she only looked at him and smiled, though her pallor was ghastly.

"Perhaps not," she whispered. "And what does it matter?"

With a plunge the horses went over, dragging the trap with them.

The searching party found them the next morning. The woman was huddled face down. Her neck was broken, they said afterwards. The man's left arm was about her waist and the other was stretched out as though to ward off a blow. His face was drawn and strained, but hers was perfectly serene.

Death is sometimes easier than life. B. S. R.

Digitized by Google

The Mines of Mars.

LUCIEN was hungry. He looked with sick-hearted envy at the crowd of comfortably dressed people turning the corner of the Strand and Trafalgar Square, and wondered if any individual there had ever known, or would ever sink, to his level of destitution. Two months before he too, well dressed and indifferent to misery as any of them, had turned here nightly on his way home. Two months! It seemed more like two centuries since he had known the taste of food.

He walked on for a short distance in an aimless way, stopping now and then to hug a lamp-post in front of a restaurant and eye, with wolfish desire, the contents of the window, the sight of the viands almost maddening him. He decided that he must beg or die.

Driven by that terrible gnawing pain within him, he made two or three unheeded efforts to induce someone to take pity on him. Then he backed into a narrow doorway, and watched for some face which looked benevolent enough to encourage an application to its owner.

"I shall be found here in the morning, dead," he murmured.

Something over his head creaked as if in answer to his words. Looking up he saw a sign, suspended over the door, bearing two words: "Harold, Clairvoyant."

"Clairvoyant," muttered the beggar. "They make money—they find food and a bed by clairvoyance. I have always had that gift, and have amused many a room-full of people with it. It was not respectable in my eyes to use it for money though," he added bitterly. "I would try it gladly now in exchange for a crust."

A hand fell on his shoulder.

"I have heard what you have spoken," said a voice in English but with a strong foreign accent. "If it is true that you have clairvoyant powers and are starving, it is well for me. I need you."

Lucien's heart gave a bound. Whoever needed him would feed him. He looked eagerly at the speaker.

He was a tall, thin man, dressed in black. He had a pale, severe face, and light, hard eyes. His moustache and hair were black as ink, and his expression was resolute and cold.

"The service must be done fasting," continued the stranger. "But do not look so cast down. It will be brief, and you will feel nothing while you are engaged upon it. Meat, wine, and clothing for an hour's use of your clairvoyant faculty, and beyond that money to start you in a way to live. Come or stay."

The stranger started to go. The desperate man in the doorway made an effort to follow.

"Not so fast!" he cried, and the stranger paused, and gave him his arm.

"You seem to be very weak," remarked the latter, with an appearance of satisfaction.

"Weak! What day is this?" asked Lucien.

"Saturday."

"Well, since Wednesday I have not eaten, and then only——"

"Good! No meat then, I hope?"

"No. Only a roll and some tea."

"Better! When did you last eat meat?"

"I cannot remember."

"Best of all."

In a few minutes the two entered a tram-car. Lucien did not know the locality in which they alighted. The stranger led him a short distance and halted before a dark, tall building at a corner, entered a narrow door by means of a key, and proceeded to ascend the stairs. Lucien followed him, more than once compelled by weakness to sit down for rest, while his companion waited impatiently. The place appeared deserted save for themselves, silent but for the sound of their footsteps, and it was so dark they had to feel their way. They reached the top floor at last, and the stranger led his companion into a room dimly lighted with gas, and shut the door.

The room faced the east and had on that side an unsashed window reaching from the floor to the middle of the ceiling, commanding the heavens from horizon to zenith. In front of this window was mounted a small telescope, which was converted into a peculiar instrument by a globe a foot in diameter attached to its eye-piece. This globe was apparently of copper, covered with glass. An electrical apparatus occupied a shelf on the right of the window, and seven wires extending from this pierced in a semi-circle the upper side of the globe.

The arrangement of the wires in the interior was, of course, invisible, but a thick wire emerged from an aperture in the lower side of the globe, extended a few inches in a straight line, and was then unravelled. Its seven strands were each about six inches in length, and were arranged in a sort of claw-shaped cluster, the tips pointing downwards and each encased in a reddish opaque bulb.

Digitized by Google

The stranger removed the globe, carefully adjusted the telescope to bear upon some celestial object, and set in motion a mechanical contrivance intended to maintain, by a clockwork movement, the focus of the instrument. Then, after replacing the globe, he manipulated for an instant the electrical apparatus, and by a series of springs closed the window aperture with outside shutters of wood that were so constructed as to leave a slit for the path of the telescope. Then he turned out the gas.

For a moment the room was entirely dark. Then about the claw of wire appeared a light, so dim as to be scarcely visible. Slowly, very slowly, this brightened. Seven red points were seen glimmering like stars of the 13th magnitude, gradually expanding till they resembled those of the first. Brighter and brighter became the light. The points glowed like spots of fire.

"That light is the light of Mars," said the stranger. "Now, it is not my intention to enter into long explanations, which circumstances do not require. It will suffice if I say that it is my conviction that light is a fluid which contains the essences of those things that have been steeped in it. Investigation has taught me that just as the primitive rays of light differ in their degrees of luminosity and their temperature, so they do in their power of absorbing the principles of those things which do not absorb them. The red ray possesses this quality in the highest degree. The great preponderance of this ray in the light of Mars directed me to the clairvoyant study of that planet. I have managed to isolate the red ray in his light, and also to concentrate it to such a degree that it is to a clairvoyant of any power an open book.

"Certain things have been revealed to me by the aura of the planet, but it is my wish to verify my observations. In my clairvoyance, the perceptive faculties alone are emancipated from bodily thrall; but I should be a poor psychometrist if I did not recognise in you one whose entire intelligent self can be projected to any distance. Will, reason, conscience, and perception are all exercised. For years I have sought a helper like you—one both highly gifted and desperate. I know you are in acute distress, and will spare you further talk; we shall proceed at once to business. What I wish you to do is to place yourself in this chair, and travel in spirit those light beams—to go to Mars, and to remember what you see there."

"I hunger," murmured Lucien. "Bread!"

"If you were to eat now your usefulness might be destroyed. The animal forces which have to be overcome in an experiment of this kind are in you extremely enfeebled by starvation. Do you not know why the prophets of old time fasted before they attempted to commune with superior powers?"

Lucien yielded. He dragged himself to a chair, so placed that when he was seated in it the circle of lights was before and slightly above his eyes. The light of Mars streamed over the emaciated face of the beggar. The grim stranger stood with his hand stretched out towards Lucien and waited.

As easily as we step from one room to another, swiftly as the soul passes from time to eternity, the intelligent part of Lucien passed over a scarlet path to a new land—a land with vegetation of soft rosy colour, and skies of pale gold and emerald. A land where the pyramid seemed to be nature's ideal of form, all vegetation striving to reach it, from the seeds on the moss-like grass to trees of wondrous stature. The clairvoyant perceived that even roots took this form. He saw no animals. He travelled inconceivable distances in a second of time, and observed, with the perspicuity of the bodiless, many mysterious things. He saw great cities in which there were moving objects that looked like people walking. He found it impossible to approach these places, for some invisible cause prevented, and he could make no more progress against it than an insect can against a gale of wind.

Finally, after many of these failures, he saw in the distance a place where building seemed to be going on and a host of shining creatures moved busily about. Lucien endeavoured to draw near, and succeeded. In fact, the force that had before impeded, now gently impelled him forward.

A cluster of enormous buildings lay in the centre of a plain. The body of each house resembled a great cylinder lying upon the ground. Graceful projections and airy ornaments gave many of them the appearance of stupendously large brilliant insects. Others were of cylinders so combined as to present geometrical figures, the triangle being especially prominent. The buildings were all of a luminous rock, thickly studded with glittering points of light. Lucien was dazzled by their magnificence and their harmonious but mighty proportions. The plain was bordered on two sides by wide streams of opalescent liquid, flowing in straight lines parallel to each other, towards regions unexplored by Lucien.

In one spot many beings were busy with the erection of a building that promised to be grander than any of the others. Lucien was amazed to see that the inhabitants were much like men in form, but finer. The difference consisted in a superior delicacy and symmetry of form, an increase in the size of the head and of the brightness of the eyes. They had no hair, but their heads were enveloped in a soft yellow radiance like the halos of saints. Every form was enrobed in a network of cobweb-like threads of fiery brightness, which proceeded from the radiant head-covering, and was the only raiment. Lucien could not tell whether this was an emanation or an overshadowing light, but it awed him so that he felt great fear when one of the beings, who appeared to be the director of the work at the building, approached him.

"Be not afraid," said this person, in a sweet voice. Lucien felt his fear dispelled, and his amazement was increased.

"Do you speak Earth's language here?" he asked.

"I am of the seventh order," replied the Martian, "and your method of communicating with others must be known to me. Welcome, man! You are the only visitor your planet has sent us in 5,000 of its years. The last from there spake in this tongue."

He repeated some words unintelligible to Lucien, although the latter knew Sanskrit, Hebrew, ancient Greek, and many modern languages.

"I was governor here then, but was only of the sixth order. The visitor, who was of the ninth, left an inscription here which I hope to comprehend after my next promotion. He passed on to one of the outer stars."

The Martian led Lucien to a spot where the wall of one of the buildings was smooth, and showed him two words written there with grey pigment. Lucien could not read the words, but he remembered that he had once seen writing like it on a tablet supposed to be of antediluvian date.

Digitized by Google

His awe returned. "Who could the writer have been?" he said to himself, "and what place is this?"

The last question was instantly answered by his companion. "This is the Hall of Beginning," said he. "Those enrolled here are of the first, or birth, order."

"It seems, then, that there are births here, though not deaths," soliloquised Lucien.

The Martian smiled. For the first time it was borne in upon Lucien's mind that between his conductor and the busy creatures about him was a vast difference. He was grander than they, and the halo about his head burnt with a white lustre.

The Martain did not interrupt these thoughts. Lucien noticed that from time to time his companion turned his face towards some portion of the group of workers, and the radiance over his head deepened, while a sort of flash passed over the delicate covering of his body. This was always followed by the manifestation of new activity by those builders towards whom the attention of the director had been turned. This indicated to Lucien that spoken language was not used for the communication of thought. Other observations convinced him that most of the faculties indispensable to man were superseded by higher powers known to the Martians.

The work in progress was most interesting to Lucien. Some of the workmen were moulding transparent cement into great blocks that looked like concave-convex lenses. Others covered the surface of these blocks with shining dust. Still others dug great gleaming pebbles out of the ground, which were quickly polished and set in the blocks in patterns. The speedy drying of the cement held them firmly in place.

"What are those beautiful bright stones?" asked the visitor.

"In your world they are called diamonds," answered the Martian.

This reply so excited the man, that he lost his self-control. The shining landscape seemed to recede, and he himself to slip down an inclined plane of light to an incredible depth.

"Gently, gently!" said a cold voice in his ear. "Do not struggle so. Now sit up and tell what you have seen."

The clairvoyant stared wildly. With the return of bodily consciousness came pain and weakness like that of the approach of death. The inexorable face of the strange man was close to his own, and its expression destroyed all hope that his misery would be relieved till after the last command was obeyed, and Lucien complied.

"The stones are there, then?" exclaimed the stranger. "It was no mere dream of mine."

He paced the floor with an appearance of great excitement—the first that he had shown. The other man, crouched beside the chair, looked at his employer and trembled. Suppose the man should not keep his word, but should turn him out in the night to die? His head swam and the floor seemed to undulate before his eyes at this thought.

"My friend," said the stranger, stopping suddenly, "your work is but half done. You must return again to Mars."

"Not now," said the other, trembling still more violently. "To-morrow—any time you choose, but not to-night. I could not live to return. If you are a man with a soul, give me food and let me rest."

The voice of the clairvoyant had sunk to a feeble whisper. For a moment the stranger seemed to hesitate, and he regarded Lucien with a gaze in which anxiety mingled with annoyance. But this indecision soon passed.

"There is no time like the present," he said resolutely. "Go again to the master of the Hall of Beginning. Beseech him to enable you, by means of this superhuman power, to bring a handful of those shining stones to the earth for the use of one in need of means for a holy purpose. Go!"

Once more Lucien obeyed. It was harder than before to bring his faculties into obedience, and when started upon that road of light, passage was more difficult. But at last he reached the building beside the diamond mine. The builders were at rest under a pyramidical tree. They looked like green flies upon the red turf. The master stood by the old, old inscription written by the man from the earth, and seemed to study it.

He smiled upon Lucien. "So you have come to put on the vestments cast off by him who has just been promoted. Welcome!"

He pointed to what would be called on earth the corpse of a man. It was lying cold and white upon the ground. Its halo was gone and its golden garment.

Lucien understood. His unhampered intelligence had learned far, far more about that world than has ever been told. The opportunity opened before him, like the door of a refuge from want and care. It offered not death, but life in a land where selfish labour was ignoble, where all toiled for the good of all.

"Gladly, oh, master, will I come!" murmured Lucien.

All the sorrows he had endured were forgotten, the hardness born of his trials passed away, his heart was soft, even towards the unfeeling man who waited for him afar off.

"There is one who sent me here for a purpose," he said to the Martian.

"It is known to me," replied the latter. "His wish is not altogether selfish. Let him have his desire."

* * * * *

The strange, dark man waited impatiently for the return of his messenger. Long, long he waited. Once the emaciated form in the chair stirred slightly, but settled again, immediately, into a stillness like that of death.

"Suppose he should be dead, poor wretch," said the man to himself, his face blanching.

The thought returned again and again. Fear grew upon the man. Hastily disconnecting his apparatus, he opened the window, admitting the light of the rising moon, and the bracing night air, turned the face of the clairvoyant towards it, and put milk mingled with wine to the pallid lips. Lucien moved no more.

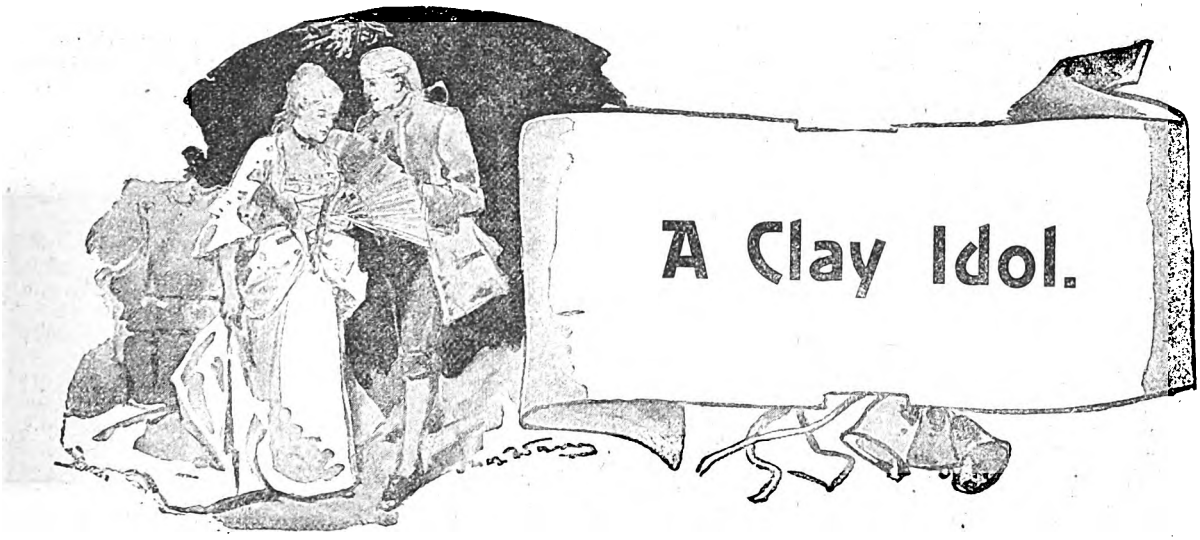
"Heavens!" exclaimed the man. "He is dead!"

It was even so. The body was already growing cold.

For a moment the stranger trembled. Then his habitual nerve seemed to return. He moved the corpse in order to arrange it decently, and as he did this, some objects fell from its hands to the floor. The rays of the moon streaming in fell upon seven great white pebbles, and were reflected with indescribable splendour.

SHENLEY PARR.

Digitized by Google



A Clay Idol.

It was universally conceded that Bill Kingerty was the toughest character in Lone Rock. The stage-driver told me as much before we had gone three miles from the station on our fifty mile drive to camp.

"Tough?" he said. "I should say yes. Always plays in great luck, drinks lots of whisky, spends a bushel of money, and is mighty handy with his gun. Whatever you do, tenderfoot, don't run up against Bill Kingerty."

I told him I didn't intend to run up against anyone, least of all a man who was "handy" with his gun.

We arrived at Lone Rock the next morning, and I must confess the town did not make a very favourable impression on my English sensibilities.

The largest building in town was the Inter-Ocean Saloon, a long low building of rough boards, thrown together in true frontier style. The camp had grown up in a day, as it were, when the placer fields were discovered, a mile or so up the cañon. The floating population of the whole territory had flocked hither, and what a month before was as lonely a gulch as could be found in the Rockies, was now a flourishing "city" of several hundred.

As I wandered into the Inter-Ocean that evening, the stage-driver, who was standing near the door, recognised me, and drawing closer, whispered:

"There's Bill Kingerty over yonder at the farther table. Remember, stranger, and don't run up against him."

I looked in the direction indicated, and saw a large-boned, roughly-dressed man of perhaps fifty, seated at a parlour table, playing cards. His wide slouch hat was pulled down over his eyes, so that only the lower part of his face was visible. His chin was covered with a grizzly growth of reddish-grey hair. There was a goodly stock of gold at his elbow, to which he added now and then as the game went on. It was evident that the stage-driver was right about Bill Kingerty's luck.

The scene before me was new and strange. From a secluded place in a dark corner of the room I watched the motley crowd singing, drinking, and gambling. Now and then some especially lucky player would cash in, and, advancing to the rough board counter answering for a bar, call up the crowd and set up the liquor. I had not been noticed in my dark corner until later in the evening a tall, sinewy cowboy scooped a great pile of gold into his pockets, and advancing to the bar, threw down a handful and called up everybody.

Glancing about the room, with a glass of the reddest of red liquor in his hand, he spied me.

"Hey, there, tenderfoot," he shouted, "what are you skulking in that corner for? Come up here and have something."

I advanced meekly into the light, and hardly knowing what I said or did, replied: "If you will excuse me, I will take a cigar instead."

"Cigar," he roared, and pouring out a brimming glass of whisky, handed it to me with the words, "take that and drink it, quick."

"Really," I said in my fright, "I don't care for this. Pray excuse me and I'll smoke a cigar instead."

"Cigar be hanged," he sneered, "drink that liquor," and, pulling a six-shooter from his belt, he pointed it at my head.

I looked at the gleaming muzzle in terror. The mouth of the barrel looked to my frightened senses as large as a drain-pipe. The drawn, hardened face of the man behind it looked fiendish.

"Really——" I stammered. "Drink," he shouted. I raised the glass to my lips and gulped down a mouthful. The fiery stuff choked me, and, throwing it up, I went into a paroxysm of coughing.

The crowd surged about me, laughing and shrieking, when the cowman waved his weapon over his head, fired a couple of shots through the roof, and, pointing it at me again, shouted: "Drink it down, tenderfoot, drink it down or I'll finish you."

As I raised the glass again, Bill Kingerty stepped forward and walked up to my assailant with the words: "That's enough of that, stranger. Put up that gun, and let the boy alone."

The cow-puncher didn't know Kingerty, and, besides, he was half drunk. Without a reply he turned suddenly, and, pointing his revolver at Kingerty's breast, fired.

I don't know to this day how it was. I was never brave or heroic. In fact, I am a beastly coward, but, nevertheless, as the cowboy fired, I leapt forward, and, striking the gun, threw up the barrel. His bullet sped harmlessly over Kingerty's head.

I didn't realise that there was but one shot; but when the smoke cleared away the cowboy lay dead upon the floor, and the smoke was still floating from Bill Kingerty's gun. The cowboy's partner came forward and took charge of the body, but did not speak to Kingerty.

Digitized by Google

As I started to leave the place, Kingerty laid his hand on my arm, and drew me to the door and down the street to the shanty where he lived. He opened the rickety door, and, entering, lighted a candle, placed it on a box, and, pushing me a stool, bade me be seated.

"Stranger," he began, after clearing his throat, "what are you doing out here? You've no business in this country. Why, sonny, you're the biggest tenderfoot I've ever seen."

I threw off all restraint—for there was a kindly light in his rugged face—and told him my story. How I had just left college, and, lacking the necessary money to pursue the study of medicine as I wished, had come West to make my fortune, hoping to go back in a few years and take up my chosen profession.

Kingerty was silent after I had told my story, and, by the flashing light of the candle, I could see he was in deep meditation.

"So you come from England," he at length began, "and to make your fortune." He turned uneasily in his chair, and, looking me full in the face, continued: "My boy, go home; you're not fitted for this life out here. If you stay here you'll either get tough or get shot, or both. If you're tough you won't save any money. If you're dead the cash won't do you much good. I knew a boy who came West, the same as you, only a few years ago. He came from London, too. This chap had finished school, and, carried away with the stories of the wealth to be gained in the West, packed up his things and came out here.

"He was ambitious to be rich and honoured, and so left his own country with its limited chances and long, uphill pull, to make his fortune in the western goldfields. Neither his aged parents nor his sweetheart were able to dissuade him from this foolhardy step. He told his little flaxen-haired sweetheart that last night at home that he would soon return with wealth and power, and pictured how happy they would be in the home he would be able to furnish for her. And he went away."

As he finished these words his voice was low and husky, and I could see in the dim light that he was looking far beyond me, through the open door and out towards the mountains, towering dim and majestic in the eastern sky, his face was wonderfully softened, and I could hardly realise in the man that now stood before me the murderer of an hour before.

"I knew the boy well," he continued, "perhaps better than his own parents. Well he came West and for a few months kept up and saved money. The frequent letters from home and the little souvenir his sweetheart had given him seemed to keep him from the temptation which surrounded him. Then came the long winter when we were snowed in and for months received no mail. The absence of word from home and loved ones seemed to press heavily upon him. He became sullen and morose—then came cards, and whisky, and perdition. When the snow melted and the delayed stage arrived, he, fallen to a common roustabout at the saloons, read that his sweetheart had died during the long winter—died in his mother's arms, and in the wild delirium of brain fever had begged him not to go—oh, not to go away.

"Thus was broken what seemed the only chain that bound him to decency.

"Then he drifted with the wild, turbulent current of western life through this camp, and that, a drunkard, a murderer, and a gambler."

We sat in silence. Kingerty's sad dreamy eyes were fixed on space, and it seemed I could see a teardrop glistening on his rugged cheek. He turned to me, and laying a hand on my shoulder as a father might, continued: "Boy, go home. Work at anything if needs be to gain your end, only don't sever yourself from good influences, from an early training, from a Christian home."

I rose and grasped his hand, too much overcome by my emotions for words. As I started for the door he said:

"No, my boy, don't go up to the hotel. It might not be safe. Bunk in here with me."

I lay awake far into the night. Suddenly riches seemed to me of little value now, when associated with constant temptation. I had just money enough to get back. I would go on the morrow.

I must have been asleep several hours when I was awakened by a shot. I leapt from my bunk. The sun was just peeping over the mountains. A cowboy stood a few rods from the door, a smoking Winchester in his hands. Bill Kingerty lay across the doorstep, dead.

I laid him out myself for a decent burial. Suspended from his neck by a slight golden chain was a locket. The bullet that had pierced his breast had broke it open. Inside, clotted with Bill Kingerty's lifeblood, was a lock of flaxen hair.

P. McArthur.

Jumbled Story Competition.

No. 15.

On pages 470-71 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 October 12th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the reader living in Ireland, who, in the event of a tie, succeeds in forwarding the correct solution before other competitors posting attempts from Ireland.

Digitized by Google

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY No. 12.

ACCEPTED.

See Page 480.

22 There were many men besides Jack Foster
89 keenly anxious to have their pictures taken that 33 year; maybe there were many better pictures than 81 his, but no one had a more beautiful woman to 3 paint. His bride of less than a year made him the 11 most perfect Hero that ever watched for Leander.
10 With hair half unbound she stood, a dark, proud 44 goddess, watching, with an unfathomable look of 106 longing in her glorious eyes, that try as he would 67 Foster could never quite transfer to canvas.
48 "Sweetheart, you are not so well to-day," he said
84 tenderly, a few days before his picture was finished,
86 as he stopped suddenly in his work. "You must 62 see a doctor."
97 "Not yet, Jack," she pleaded. "It is only a little 73 cold, and if he were to forbid my posing! What 118 should we do then? This picture is to make your 75 name and lead to endless commissions and bring 113 you ever so much money, isn't it?"
101 The man crossed over and kissed her softly, and 42 the girl went on:
114 "When you have sent it in, dear, then I will see a 74 doctor. Go on painting, I am quite rested. Is my 51 hand right? I am afraid I turned my head."
16 The Artist put the girl into position again and 55 for the first time noticed how fragile she had grown,
18 and an almost too ethereal beauty in her eyes.
52 The picture was finished and sent in before she 104 consented to see a doctor. And when he shook his 105 head and talked gravely of Davos Platz she laughed
96 gaily.
70 "This feverishness is only anxiety to know the 61 fate of our picture," she said afterwards, in reply to 40 her husband's anxious look.
112 "Sir James Parker saw it one day and offered
121 me a hundred guineas for it if it is hung."
93 "Then if it's accepted that means it is sold as 108 well. Oh, Jack, if they only take it."
95 "Yes, darling, if they take it it means Davos
98 Platz for you and commissions innumerable for me;
13 for Parker does not do things by halves."
109 The days passed with no news from Burlington
82 House, but Dr. Clayton came again and again, and 30 at each visit was more importunate that his patient
72 should go to a dryer climate. "London was too
31 relaxing—most important if organic mischief were 78 to be prevented. Delay now might result in 6 hæmorrhage and actual disease."
14 So Foster did what he had sworn he would never 85 do; he wrote to Evelyn's father and told him how 83 much depended on money now. The letter came 38 back unopened, and then Foster went to a friend
2 and borrowed. It was only a small sum, for the 71 man was poor—probably if he had been rich he 20 would not have lent him anything. But it saw 120 them safely settled at Davos Platz, and Jack
58 watched the colour come back to Evelyn's cheeks,
46 and her old buoyancy return, and the far away
90 look died out of her eyes. Now if only his picture
53 were taken all might be well, and he watched for 115 the posts eagerly.

He had gone into a shop to buy her some roses, 1 and until a shrill cry made him look round he 49 thought she was by his side. Then he saw a run- 29 away horse dashing madly down the street, and 110 directly in its way a tiny child—dirty and unkempt, 59 but still a child; while half-way across the 32 road, with arms outstretched to save it, was 80
Evelyn. 34
Before he could move the tragedy was over—the 43 child thrown out of harm's way; the fragile rescuer 8 senseless on the ground. [Put as 96 in original story. 69
An hour later the doctors had completed their 63 examination and given their verdict: "No possible 79 chance of life; a week, even longer perhaps—but 4 that is all." 99
Foster took the news as one stunned. The 116 surgeon rubbed his glasses and continued: 47
"I shall be here again later, but I am afraid there 19 is nothing to be done." 123
"Nothing to be done." Jack Foster sat motion- 68 less. 111
He was not allowed to go to his wife yet; 12 while he waited a maid brought in a letter. He 54 opened it mechanically, and read without under- 87 standing it, but the contents grew clear to him as 88
he stared at it: 56
"Accepted!" he cried; then his agony was sharp 35 enough. He realised everything. 21
"To lose her on the point of winning all. Oh, 122
God, it is too hard; I cannot bear it." 24
The days passed slowly and Jack Foster scarcely 57 left his wife's bedside. At the end came the return 17 of consciousness, and she smiled faintly at him as 66
he kissed the death damp from her brow. 15
"Your picture, Jack?" she breathed. 92
"It has been taken, little one." His voice was 77 husky, but well under control. 94
"I am so glad, darling. I did bring you luck 65 after all, you see," she whispered, and the smile on 39 her face deepened into absolute radiant content; 45 and at first Jack Foster did not realise that the 60 lips he pressed so tenderly heeded not his passionate 5 kisses. 76

* * * * * 26

"In this world," muttered Foster to himself the 27 day after the funeral, "things are horribly unequal 117 and unjust. When success means everything she 107 stays away. When I no longer need or welcome 23 her she comes." In the bitterness of his soul he 103 half crushed a letter that he held unopened in his 50 hand. 61
"How she would have rejoiced over my first 7 varnishing ticket; and the irony of it that it 28 should come now." 9
He opened the envelope carelessly and drew 37 out not the ticket but a request that he would 119 send for his picture "as the Committee regret to 102 find they have not space to hang it." 91
"Sometimes Fate's little jokes are not so unkind 41 after all," he murmured. 36

C. M. BRYANT. 124

Digitized by Google

The Last King of Atlantis

OR,

The Romance of a Lost Continent.

By Geo. C. Wallis, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

SUMMARY.

ARNON's memory of his early days begins at a time when he finds himself abandoned on the seashore, whence he discovers the cave of a band of pirates by whom he is captured. Under the care of Didron the Chief he grows up as one of them, and on the death of the former he takes command. Viol is the daughter of Didron and in love with Arnon.

CHAPTER III.

THE SACRED SLEEPER.

IT is said by the wise men of the Temple of Truth, whose voices the people heed less than they heed the careless twittering of the forest birds, that idleness doth ever lead to evil, and that a mind untroubled with labour is ever distraught to seek out new pathways of vice. So it was with many of my men in those months of pleasure, but I was otherwise employed.

I loved, was married, and became a father before the time was gone, therefore my idle hours were few and far between. Moreover, I purposed that my next cruise should make us richer by far than the dreams of the wildest greed, and so was busy with the preparing of weapons and the instruction of our novices in the use of the double-thong sling, then a new implement of war to us, and in making a great quantity of poison wherewith to touch our arrows and swords when we came to close quarters with a foe. This latter was a work of patience and of time, since the fruit of the wild almond tree* (from which we distilled the deadly liquid) must be gathered before the full bloom of ripeness is upon it, so that the fleshy covering of the kernel be hard and juicy, and in that tropic isle, so many trees were blossoming, ripening, and seeding, side by side, that we must wait until enough for our purpose could be gathered as their time fell due.

But 'tis of thyself thou shouldst be telling; so straightway to it, Arnon the Wanderer!

There is a secluded spot on the western shore of our island, away from the din of the settlement and the eyes of the settlers, where it was Viol's wont to wander when the days were bright—which was nearly always—and where, also, I might often be found.

There the waves, that out to sea are glittering hillocks of sapphire, break in high columns of creamy foam on rocky, lovely inlets and promontories, thick grown with tangled bush and palm, growing so near the water that they and the fronds and cocoas are wet with the salt sea-spray as the liquid rollers curl and fall. Out into the water jut crags of limestone, hung over with boughs of light feathery foliage, contrasting sharply with the long thatch branches behind, with which are intermingled, but very sparsely, the green ebony and the wild liquorice, whose scarlet seeds with black tops dance in the gentle breeze with an eerie motion. Behind these, again, as the outposts of the forest, stand groves of palms with their spear-fringed branches, the yellow-blossomed aloes, the clinging convolvuli, the arrow-root, and the almond.

There the mavis sings, and the gaily-feathered tribe dart ever here and there in amazing numbers, and the bright banana-bird sails swiftly over the trees. There the air is ever rich with a thousand perfumes, sweeter by far than the costly essences of the merchants of Ind, and the ear is ever soothed by a thousand pleasant sounds. There it was I made my love to Viol when the two months' mourning

*It is a curious fact that the delicious peach, which grows upon our sunny garden walls, is botanically the same, developed by ages of selection to a harmless fruit.

Digitized by Google

was past, and there she looked her love into my eyes for the last time.

It chanced one day, as we sat hand in hand upon one of the great stones that jut out of the shallow grit where the sand-crabs live, our senses drinking in the beauty and the sweetness of all things that surrounded us, the roar of the surf being stilled to a soothing murmur, that the Spirit of Love came into our hearts.

Before we knew it, without a word having passed between us, we were clasped in each other's arms, and our lips had met in a passionate kiss, and so, silent as we were, we continued for a time, finding no language for our thoughts, nor needing any. Then, putting me gently from her, Viol took my hands in her soft, warm palms, and asked me in tones that told me she knew what the answer would be:

"Shall that be our betrothal kiss, my Arnon?"

"Dear one," I answered, drawing her to me again and once more sealing the compact, "it was, and from now henceforth nothing shall come between us twain save the shadow of death."

"So be it," she answered softly.

It passes my comprehension, even now, how it came about that such a pure and lovely flower as my golden-haired Viol should have been born and grown to womanhood amid that rough and bloody band of pirates, untouched, unsullied by their wickedness, and withal, so innocent of evil word or deed. She seemed like a fair white lily, sprung up in the midst of noxious, miasmatic weeds and tangled thorns. But the ways of the Spirit of Life are past our finding out, and his purposes veiled from our eyes. Sometimes his acts seem evil and his deeds seem dark, but know we not, from the Sacred Book of the Soul, that this evil and this darkness is only the shadow of a greater light? And when his ways seem good to us, shall we not bask in the sunshine of his smile, asking no questions, wasting not our breath in needless amaze?

So I took Viol to be my wife, and three months after we had buried her father, my foster-parent, the old priest whom we had brought to live with us to be of service on such occasions, joined our hands in wedlock, in the name of the Three Spirits, which yet are one Spirit—the Spirits of Life, and Truth, and Love. And after him we repeated the bridal vow that has done duty at the union of man and maid for a thousand years or more. Thus it runs:

> By the loves we love who love us,
> By the Spirits throned above us,
> (By the Gods who never perish)
> By the things our fancies cherish,
> By the hopes our soul-self longs for,
> And the friends we sing our songs for,
> May we ever steadfast be:
> Mated for eternity.

In due time a child was born to us, a son whom we named Didron, after his mother's father, and because his features, even when so young, resembled the old sea-king's wonderfully. Then, having tired of the joys of idleness, I got ready to set forth on my cruise.

This time I was the chief, and the good old Ravager, upon whose deck I trod so proudly, was my own ship, manned and prepared as she had never been before. I had stored sufficient food to last us near a year, and besides our hundred slaves to row the ship, I had fifty as a reserve, and resolved to treat them better than usual, so that I might get more work out of their bones. Also, with the remnant of Sanaboul's crew and our young novices, I had more than two hundred and fifty strong and healthy men on board, sworn to my service through fire or water, even to the end of death itself.

The day of our departure came, and I sought out Viol to bid her good-bye. Finding her not in the house, nor the child either, I searched here, there, everywhere, in all the houses of the settlement, in the forest, and lastly—tardy fool!—bethought me of the trysting-place where we had joined our lips in betrothal. Tearing through copse and bush, o'erleaping many a purling rill, and threading my way between the giant trees, guided by the swiftly-increasing thunder of the surf upon the white rock shore, I hastened to that lovely spot. There she sat, the babe upon her knee, lulling it to sleep with the music of the waves, and the soft sighing of the sultry breeze.

"Shall that be our betrothal kiss?"

"The men are waiting, Viol," I cried somewhat impatiently, for my hands longed to grasp the tiller again, "Knew you not that I was searching you?"

"Hush, husband!" she answered, gently, "or you will wake the child. Yes, I knew you would search me out to say farewell, and wished that we said it here, where our betrothal kiss was given. Mindst thou that day, my husband? nay, stay me not! I have a thought, I know not from which of the spirits, that this will be our last meeting this side of the shades, and I would like it to be here, where we have passed so many happy hours."

"A plague upon such silly, idle fancies!" I exclaimed angrily. "I will not say 'farewell.' It shall but be 'good-bye.'"

"Nay, be not angry, dear one," my wife replied, laying the child, still asleep, upon a mossy bed, and clasping my neck with her white arms, "but think of this if so it happens that you cannot come back to me, as I fear you will not, husband . . . . and so, farewell!"

I kissed her long and tenderly, softened somewhat by her words, then, stooping, touched the lips of the sleeping Didron, and in another moment, with a wave of my hand, I had broken away into the forest and was gone.

Thus in coldness, if not in wrath, I parted from Viol for the last time. From that day to this my eyes have never seen her again, and at times she has been blotted out of my thought, so mindless is the soul of a past or distant love.

We sailed the Ravager far and wide, taking many a heavy-laden ship from the shores of the land of the south, and from the city of Kronos, chasing many a pleasure vessel cruising round the coast, laying tribute heavily upon the sea-shore towns, and ever watchful for sight of a royal ship.

We had been five months out when a barque with wide-spreading sails, labouring deeply in the water because of her heavy cargo, hove in sight, and was running across our bows before her crew discovered the nature of our ship. There was a stiff gale blowing, so I thought to trap her easily, seeing she had few oars, but as well might the sloth seek to overtake the fleet-footed deer or the tortoise to outrun the squirrel, as the Ravager to come up with that flying craft. We chased her for an hour or more, but by then the sky had swallowed her up, and she was gone from our grasp.

Digitized by Google

I fumed as I walked the deck in impotent rage, and resolved to take my revenge on Miropis, a wealthy town on the shore of Atlantis. Thither our prow was turned, the crew in high spirits thereat, smelling spoil and sport ahead.

As we neared the coast a dark bird flying past being the first sign of land, a storm arose, dreadful while it lasted (which, fortunately, was not long), delaying us for a day, and the loud creaking of the ship's timbers in the heavy sea was held by some of the older sailors to be an evil omen. Later, when we passed a great shoal of porpoises, rolling their shining backs in the flood of sunlight, and later still clouds of flying fishes that skim close to the water for full fifty paces, these also were interpreted as evil signs by the croakers. I laughed them to scorn, as I laughed at Viol, and bade them talk of omens when the hour of death was near, but not vex living men with their old wives' tales.

So we came to Miropis and cast anchor in its little bay, where the cowardly sharks that frighten timid swimmers are famous for their number. Right to the water's edge the land was thick with dense belts of logwood and mangrove, alternating with clumps of bamboo, and showing here and there, between the openings of the trees, about and beyond the town, long stretches of the juicy sugar-canes.

My answer was short and sharp.

When our anchor dropped, and the few merchant ships that lay in the port had cut their cables and run out to sea (for the name of our ship was a terror), the shores were black with the people, shouting to ask us what we wished with them who were so poor. My answer was short and sharp to those liars.

"Unless you bring on board before sunset," I said, "all the costly jewels and silks that are in the great merchants' houses, and a thousand pieces of gold of the largest size, your town shall be destroyed, your wives and daughters captured, your wealth taken to the uttermost value, though we cast the excess into the sea, and such of your men as resist shall be slain."

It was not long before they accepted my terms. Before the sunset the vast treasure was safely stowed in the hold, my men being very jubilant, thinking me the best of chiefs. 'Tis true the merchants and all from whom the townsfolk took the spoil were highly incensed and even resisted, but the mad fury of a mob seeking its own safety took little account of their feelings, many of the robbers, I doubt not, robbing a trifle on their own account, for to some of the poorer class the visit of a pirate was a time for rejoicing rather than sorrowing.

Now it being night before the work was done, we rode at anchor in the bay till morning, when I wished to be going. But some of the men pleaded hard for a walk and a drink ashore, and being young and pliable, I foolishly consented, going with them myself and leaving but two score to guard the slaves and the treasure.

My object in landing, however, was not to drink and revel, but to visit the grotto where lay the famous Sleeper, sacred to the Spirit of Truth, whose priests had established a sanctuary on the spot where the wondrous body lay and had lain, some said, for a thousand years.

Taking only Sassani, a youth of near kin to my foster-father, with me, I left Miropis behind and set out for the famous grotto. Through vast fields of cane and past the cane-built houses of the workers on the farms, we tramped on, our ears filled with the songs of the birds and the low humming of a million insects, and our eyes gazing with delight upon the many gorgeous flowers and blossoms that bestrewed our path. Presently we came to the foot of a black conical rock, rising gaunt and grim out of the level plain, and girt around its base with a dense belt of forest, through which we passed. Then, threading our way with care through the sacred, mazy groves of the spiny cactus as through lines of armed sentinels, we came to the entrance of the sanctuary.

It was not large, and only by stooping low could we scramble in, but once within, we could walk upright again. I spoke to Sassani, but so loudly rang the echo of my voice around the dimly-lighted chamber, that he made no reply, and I forebore from further speech, using my eyes and ears only. This was the sight that we saw when we entered the huge grotto.

From right to left, below and above, the walls and roof and floor seemed to fade away, leaving us standing on the threshold of an awful nothingness. Then, as we got our second sight in the gloom, we perceived that the room was, in very truth, the whole of the huge black rock; that the rock, which outside seemed a solid hill, was but an empty shell, like the drinking-cup of a giant thrown down on the earth with the rim to the ground. And just at the top, at the apex of this hollow pyramid of stone, a little circular piercing let in a shaft of light, which now, it being near the hour of noon, poured almost vertically through the eerie darkness. Following its brilliant course, we saw that it stayed not at our level, but kept its way till lost in the gloom far beneath our feet, and that the cave was quite as large below as above.

For awhile we stood amazed, not knowing whether to stay or to scramble back through the narrow opening. I half turned, when a rope at my side rattled heavily on the wall, and the door closed, leaving us in darkness, save for the sunbeam piercing the gulf like a thin rod of iron heated to a glowing whiteness. Then, just as our hearts were turning to water, and our hands sought each other, not knowing what would happen next, these words fell upon our ears, spoken in a voice that seemed far away, mellowed as by coming through a vaulted space, yet with every syllable as clear as though it were uttered at our side:

"Enter and fear not, oh, Arnon! for the place where the Sleeper sleeps is holy ground!"

I started, for how could the speaker know my name? Still I answered, feeling awed by the mystery of the place:

"I would enter, but see no way, Priest of the Spirit of Truth," for I shrewdly guessed it was a priest who had spoken to us; and at that feeling my pirate blood rising again, I clutched my sword-hilt with new courage. The still, small voice again spoke:

"Take three paces to the right, you and your comrade, and the path shall be made plain before your feet."

We did as the voice requested, but now fearing nothing. As my foot touched the rocky platform on which we stood for the third time, a wonderful thing befel. From right and left, above, below, and around, as though a thousand windows had been opened in the stony walls, a thousand lights flashed and shone, revealing to us the secrets of the holy place. Then we perceived the true shape of the grotto, and saw that it was the work of man, of countless generations, each toiling a little in their day, each scooping a little out of the cave until it became as we saw it. It was quite as deep below as it towered above, and we stood at the widest part, on a little ledge of rock from whence a rocky staircase, cut with consummate skill, wound in a spiral curve to the bottom of the abyss. There, at the apex of the vast inverted cone, the ray of sunlight, still visible for all the glowing points of brilliancy around, fell full on a polished brazen shield which lay on the breast of a sleeping man.

Digitized by Google

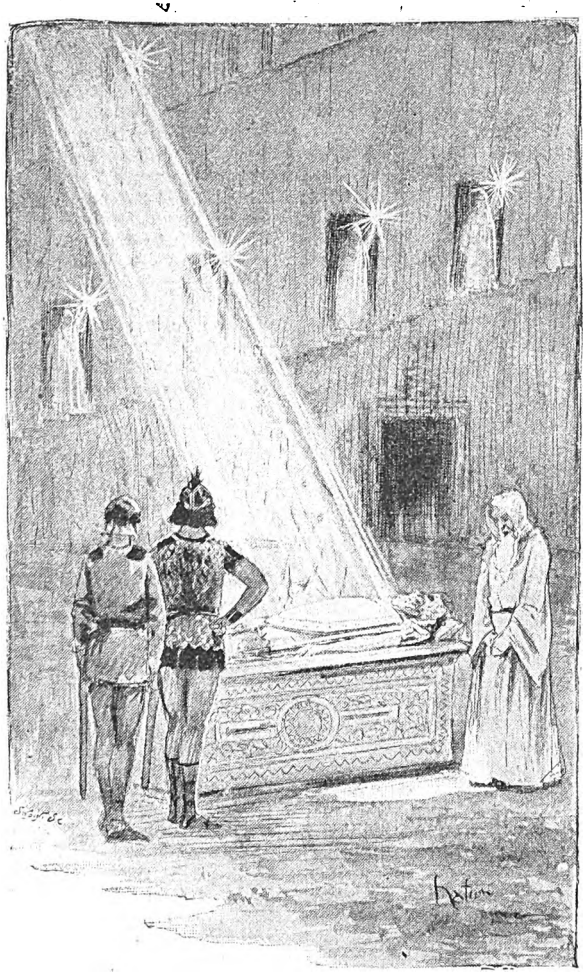
This we saw, then slowly and laboriously climbed the winding stair adown until we stood at the side of the couch on which the figure lay. It was a couch of gold inlaid with ivory and precious gems and filagreed with delicate pearl and silver tracery, more costly, I should think, than all the treasure stored in that secret cave of ours. Yet, as we stood there looking upon it, but more upon the Sleeper and upon the two who stood near him—men clad simply in long, white garments, replenishing at intervals a lamp which flickered feebly at his head—not all that wealth roused once the pirate spirit, so deep was the silence and so great the awe of that Presence.

I asked of the two watchers, with bated breath: "What did they there?"

One answered simply, "Wait!" and the other, pointing upwards, "Look!"

Then there was silence again whilst we strained our eyes, peering into the vast vault above, all studded with its thousand lights, till, as though by one consent, a hundred doors opened in the rocky wall at regular distances on the spiral stair.



From these hundred doors came a hundred priests of Truth.

From these hundred doors came the hundred priests of Truth, each dressed as the two watchers, each carrying a lighted lamp, and all, in solemn file, marching down the steps till they reached us; then forming in a circle round us and the Sacred Sleeper, chanting a soft melodious hymn, which, before it ceased, rose into a mighty roar of rolling, echoing sound, soaring majestically to the pointed roof, falling thence again in rhythmic cadences adown the sloping sides, deflected thence from wall across to wall, and meeting in a clash of awful harmony directly overhead.

Osiris! That Sleeper must have slept sound as the dead amid that thunderous roar, nay, methinks it would have woke the very dead! Yet the figure on the golden couch moved not so much as an eyelid, lying there like a thing of stone. Then, wordless, hasteless, the hundred white-robed priests went back the way they came, the measured tread of their sandalled feet reverberating strangely in the cavernous depths.

Now the elder of the two watchers turned to me and spoke:

"It is well, my son, that thou hast come hither, for the Spirit hath told me much concerning thee, some of which thou must know. Thine is no common destiny, though so thou mayest think, for even now thy pirate life is at an end, and thou standeth on the threshold of a fresh career. Gainsay me not, my son, but listen, and time will tell thee whether a Priest of Truth can speak falsely. This is what I would say to thee, for more I dare not reveal.

"Within a year and a half from now, my son, thou wilt be a captive in a foreign land, and then a server of a foreign god, and when thy feet once more tread the shores of Atlantis, it shall be as a great man. Then shalt thou come here for counsel, my son, and once more after that, and for the last time, shalt thou visit the grotto of the Sleeper; but till thou hast been here a third time, fear not death. These are the words that the Spirit of Truth hath uttered by the mouth of Unim."

"A question I would ask you, Unim," I said. "Pray, how came you to know my name when I entered, and how my pirate life can end, seeing my ship yonder in the bay only waits my return to put forth to sea?"

"Verily, my son," answered the watcher, "thy faith in the Spirit is small and thou art young, else wouldst have seen that when the Spirit could tell thy future, he could tell thy name! Nay, more, I can tell thee thy age, though thou knowest it not thyself. 'Tis just twenty-and-three years this day since thou camest forth from the womb of her who bore thee, whose name thou knowest not."

"But what of my pirate life?" I asked, fearing deeply.

"I am coming to that, my son," said he slowly, tantalisingly; "but first, I must tell thee the tradition that has been handed down to us of the sleeper here: It is foretold that whoso wakes the Sleeper shall bury him, dead truly, in this very spot, and whoso reigneth as King of Atlantis in the day that the Sleeper dies, shall be the last King that shall reign in this land, and the end of the land itself shall not be far away. Already its doom is sealed and its destruction begun. As to thyself, Arnon, the foster son of Didron, thou wilt no more be a pirate from this day, for already the soldiers and the ships of the king are nigh upon thee, and before sunset thy band will be no more."

"Wretched old man!" I cried, in my ungovernable anger

Digitized by Google

at the delay, as the thought of Viol, my wife, and Didron, my little one, whom I might never see again if the Ravager was lost, came into my mind, "why keep us here with thy foolish prophecies whilst time is passing that I might be out of reach of my enemies?"

"It matters not," said he calmly; "and I forgive thee thy blasphemy, knowing thy mind. But go now, and remember the words of Unim, the priest of Truth."

Whilst he was speaking the other priest had seized the rope that dangled on the wall, and re-opened the door above by pulling away the pivoted stone which had closed it. At the same time the thousand lights went out with startling suddenness, leaving only the thin white ray of sunlight piercing the profound gloom. Guided by the gleam from the open door, Sassani and I groped hurriedly up the tedious stair, gained the platform, and shouting back our curses at the watchers, fled out into the open air, glad to leave that awful place, with its ghastly vastness, far behind.

On we sped with flying feet, through the forest and the cane-breaks, startling the rustics, scaring the birds that built their nests in the shadow of the tall cacti, treading heedlessly down many a waterway wherewith the land was irrigated, and stopping not our headlong course until we reached the town, where, for prudence sake, we went gently till we saw how far our fears were just.

CHAPTER IV.

Briseis.

That the priest had spoken truly regarding the matter we soon discovered, for immediately we stepped into the street leading down to the water-side, we saw two warships standing into the mouth of the bay, and a third landing her five hundred fighting men on a spit of land just outside, with intent to cut off the retreat of the Ravager's crew. And also, from the east side of the town, came the shouting of men and the trumpeting of soldiers, and I knew that we were indeed in evil plight. Small mercy is shown to pirates caught in the act, so then and there we resolved to die fighting, rather than fall into the hands of the king's men.

But first we must seek out our men, or such of the besotted wretches as we could, and with the enemy's war-cry ringing in our ears, it was a hurried search. Up and down the streets we ran, in this house and that, hauling the drunken out of the drinking booths—which were many in that bibulous town—out of the acting fairs where painted beauty danced; and ever as we ran we kept up our battle-cry. "The Arnon! The Arnon!" Some of the townsfolk, indeed, tried to stop us at the street corners, but keen swords were ever good passports; and slaying or maiming them as we ran, they troubled us little.

At length, and all too soon, the soldiers were in the town, hard at our heels, and when we must turn at bay we gathered in a large house near the shore, and there prepared to die. After casting out the people of the house, I counted the band, and found that for all our speed and noise, there were only seventy, leaving twice as many more to be hunted out and killed like rats in their holes.

Soon the soldiers clustered round the house, assaulting it on both sides (for it stood midway between two narrow streets), but gained no foothold within for more than an hour, so desperately did we keep the doors. From the roof a dozen of my slingers wrought havoc in the narrow ways, till presently, having brought up the greater part of their force, the soldiers occupied the roofs of the houses around and poured such a storm of leaden bullets on our stronghold as struck down the dozen men and battered in the very roof itself.

The streets were full of the soldiers, they swarmed in thousands, and twice they gained the doors with fearful struggles, and twice, with the energy of demons, we wrested back those vantage-points, hurling out the bodies till round each exit was a writhing rampart of human flesh, all bristling with sharp and broken weapons.

Now the enemy paused in their attack and drew back a space, leaving us time to breathe, and numbering my men again, I found I had not two score wherewith to hold the place against the thousands that would soon be thrown upon it. And looking seaward I saw the Ravager, with the flag of Atlantis streaming in triumph from her mast, moving slowly out of the harbour. The iron went into my soul when I saw that sight.

Now the soldiers were upon us again, but the pirate's blood was roused and we wrought like fiends, cutting, carving, thrusting, slinging, hurling all the missiles we could lay hands on into the surging mass of men in the streets, tearing down even the stone idols and statuettes in our frenzy of rage and despair. And ever and anon, above the din of the conflict, a death-groan pierced the outer air, telling of the finding out of one of our companions in the town. Bah, the drunken wretches! They deserved their fate who were not with us in that final struggle.

At last the enemy fired the houses on either side our own from the landward street, throwing all their force upon us at the other entrance. Against this new foe neither valour nor strength nor skill availed us aught, so, thinned as we were, we gave back before the fierce rush of the grey-clad soldiers, who, pouring in, penned us in a room near the middle of the house only separated from the raging flames by a wooden wall. Already the boards began to bend and crack, the air was thick with smoke and strong with the reek of burning wood and smouldering cloth, so that we could scarce see one another, save as spectred giants battling in a murky cloud that parched our throats, and ringed our eyes with pain. Presently I paused in my smiting from sheer weariness of arm, and lo! I stood alone, facing a crowd of foes, even Sassani lying dead at my feet.

"Why strive further, Arnon?" asked the foremost foe, a tall and sinewy man whom the others obeyed as an officer, one Vichri by name. "All are dead save you, and 'twere a thousand pities that the flames should claim you for a victim, as they will when we have left you to their mercy. Yield, then, and I promise you a fair trial before the King."

"Never!" I cried. "By all the Gods, Arnon the son of Didron shall never yield whilst his hands are free. Take that, mocker!"

And I aimed a terrible blow at him with my hacked and blood-stained blade. He sprang back, and the stroke fell short, but, nevertheless, the point, still sharp for all the work it had done, sheared off his left ear as neatly as a surgeon's knife.

Just then the wooden wall gave way, and a great tongue of fire leapt across the room, shrivelling the hangings like tinder, and driving the grey-coats a dozen paces back. Then Unim's saying: "Fear not death," flashed suddenly into my mind, and, made mad with blood and despair, I sprang into the roaring furnace of flame and ran across the blazing room beyond, seeking in the waves of fire and smoke for the further door. I felt in that moment as though a myriad keen-jawed beasts had fixed their fangs into my already bruised and bleeding flesh, or as though I were bathing in a sea of the sharpest sword points, so fearful were the gusts of flame that swept around me.

Keeping my eyes closed, I know not how, I sought the door with my blade, found it, hurled myself fiercely upon it, and burst through into a room yet untouched by the fire, beyond which was the street from which the soldiers had withdrawn. Within this room, however, still remained four of the grey-coats, who started at my sudden entrance, all blackened and singed, as though they had seen one from the dead. Not a word of explanation did I stay to give them, but running at the nearest, lopped off his head, pierced the second in the side, cut off the sword hilt of the third, and slashing the last with all my force across his face, fled into the street.

Digitized by Google

It was deserted, and running low, like a wolf, I gained the grateful shadow of a mighty clump of cactus plants.

As I threw myself to the ground, I heard a loud crash, saw a volume of flame and sparks shoot up into the bright afternoon sky, and knew that the house had fallen in upon whomsoever was within its walls. I was not pursued, so the four I had so roughly treated must have been buried under the ruins, leaving me safe and free, but spent and weary, and in awful agony from the top of my hairless scalp to the soles of my blistered feet.

Thus, writhing and groaning, yet unmolested, I lay, till night with its cooling breezes soothed my sore and aching limbs; then, dragging myself as well as my weariness would let from shelter to shelter and street to street, stopping at every crossing and for every passer-by for fear of discovery, I cleared that thrice-accursed town and reached the open country, a rivulet, and a welcome draught of Nature's sparkling nectar, fresh from the mountain slopes.

Once on the way, whilst I rested in the deep shadow of a silent house, a man passed me like a flash of light, running for his life, the pursuers, a troop of mounted grey-coats, riding hard behind, their mouths full of bitter jests. Swiftly as he passed, however, I saw his face, and knew him for Phrena, one of my own crew, who was next to me in all our trials of strength and skill. When the mounted troop re-passed on their return journey to quarters, he was strapped by the neck to a soldier's saddle-girth. With a grim smile at my own danger on I crept again.

Hurled myself fiercely upon it.

At dawn I reached the door of the sacred grotto, thinking that there I might find help and safety, but the door was closed fast, and the black, conical hill looked so forbidding in the early light that with an imprecation on it and the priests who dwelt within, I slowly and painfully turned away, seeking the quiet of the great sugar-cane plantations for my resting place till night fell once more. Thus, sleeping and resting by day and travelling by night, eating what scanty food I found by the wayside, I came at last to the outskirts of a great city that I now know was Kronos, the capital of the kingdom, and there, in a fair garden, all blooming with rare and beautiful flowers, and scented with a myriad sweet perfumes, all melodious with the tinkle, tinkle of a dozen rills, and the pattering of the spray-drops from a lovely fountain, I lay down and slept upon a mossy bank, with the fern-fronds hiding me from prying eyes.

All day I slept unseen, and when night came was so loth to leave this fairy spot, that I lingered till the shafts of morning light shot slanting through the aloes and tipped the slender palms with coronals of gold, and the birds and insects woke from their nocturnal rest, filling the air with the twittering and the humming of their busy life, and so I, perforce, stayed there for another day. This mattered little to me then, for after that baptism of blood and fire through which I had passed, a dull leaden apathy had seized upon me, and I was conscious only of a gnawing sense of loneliness and loss, wherefore or of what I seemed to have forgotten.

All I knew was that I wandered an outlaw, with a soul sore with sorrow, a heart filled with bitterness, and a body racked with cuts and burns, thinking little of the past, caring little for the present, and still less for the future, saving only to hide me from the gaze of men, and to sleep as often as I might in safety.

And as I slept in that fair garden under the cool shadow of the ferns and the aloes, I dreamed that I was back once more on our lovely isle in the sunny sea, and that in our well-known trysting place Viol and I sat hand in hand, content with each other's love, whilst little Didron—grown since I had seen him last—gambolled carelessly among the mimic breakers that rolled on the narrow strip of shore. Then I thought that a great pain seized me, and I rolled on the sand in mortal agony, whilst Viol bent tenderly over me soothing my distress.

I looked again at my darling, as, sweetly solicitous, she tended my misery, and when I looked I saw that her hair was no longer the rich gold crown that I so loved, but a head-cover of deep and glossy black, falling on her shoulders in ample, darkling folds. I looked again, and the face changed; it was no longer Viol's face, but another, prouder and more passionate—the face of a veritable goddess of love.

I started, awoke, and rose, and there, in very truth, was a superb beauty bending over me, regarding me with manifest surprise and unhidden interest, which expression turned to one of suddenly assumed anger and mortification at being thus discovered by me whom she had thought fast asleep. For my part I neither moved nor spoke for some moments, being absorbed in unrestrained admiration at this glorious vision of womanhood, straightway forgetting my dream as though it had never been.

And small need is there for wonder that I should be so lost in contemplation of this goddess, who stood returning my gaze with furtive glance, half-defiant, half-coy, the raven darkness of whose luxurious hair rivalled the blackness of my own (before this last was frizzled up by the fire), whose eyes shone brighter in their deep, dark lustre than any of the brilliant stars that twinkle in the splendour of the tropic night, whose olive cheeks, with just the faintest tinge upon them, were shaped and shaded more tastefully in their unaided beauty than the most elaborate charms of art can simulate; whose figure, in its tall and lissom contour, suggested grace and ease, yet lacked not sign of strength and suppleness in every outline curve and every intertwining symmetry of form, whose dainty, sandalled feet, all heedlessly wetted by the early dewdrops from the grass on which she had ventured to gain a glimpse of me, peeped out shyly, like twin sisters, from beneath her snow-white robe, embroidered with richest purple, and whose very presence diffused a charm, a something indefinable, yet real, which stole on all my senses, reaching to my inmost heart through all the avenues of life, irresistible, unresisted, holding me in spiritual bondage to her from whom it emanated from that moment till now, even to my life's end, when Briseis herself is no more with me.

Now as I stood, gazing in rapt admiration at this lovely figure of Briseis as she looked when but a year over a score, I suddenly remembered what a sorry sight I must present to her, all blackened and blistered from head to foot, all scarred with grievous cuts and slashes, clothed only in the scantiest remnant of a scorched and shrivelled garment, with hair burnt off or curled and whitened out of all semblance to its former darkness, and thought it best to speak, lest this vision of beauty should take fright and be gone.

"Lady," I said, "do not leave me—yet; for I am in sore need of help and in fear of my life."

She became at once all interest and gentleness and sympathy.

"I know not who you are," she said, in a voice so soft and tender that it seemed as though a ministering servant of the Spirit of Love spoke, "but your voice rings true, and you seem to be in sore distress. Seemst as though you have passed through fighting and through fire, both cruel and severe. Pray tell your name, stranger?"

I thought awhile, pondering whether to give my rightful name or no, but feeling certain that Vichri, the conqueror of Miropis, would believe me dead, and feeling, moreover, a strange confidence in my new-found friend, I answered:

"My name is Arnon, lady; the foster-son of one Didron. And how are you named, who are so gentle to a scarecrow like I?"

I neither moved nor spoke for some moments.

"My people call me Briseis," she replied, "but pray, are you not a pirate, one of those whom Vichri my cousin surprised and killed at Miropis but four days agone? The name sounds familiar in my ears, as though I had heard it before."

"I was the leader of that pirate band, the captain of that pirate ship, who am now left without a ship or crew," I answered boldly, "but oh, Briseis, if your charity be equal to your loveliness and grace, you will not breathe my secret to any—least of all to your cousin Vichri, whom I saw in the fight."

A radiant blush overspread her cheeks and mantled her lofty brow with deepest crimson, as she said, stepping nearer to me and taking one of my grimed and aching hands between her own, warm and soft:

"I will keep your secret, Arnon, for I feel that I am guarding the life of a true and brave man, but"—and here her regal head was tossed haughtily upwards—"indulge thee not in such flattery of me, who am but a general's cousin, with a strain of royal blood in my veins!"

Now I saw that I was treading on uncertain ground and had need be careful if my benefactress was of royal kinship, and so at once assumed a tone of submission, which I must say, sat ill upon me, who was used to rule and to command.

"Lady," I said, "you may do with me as you will if you but first hear my story. Suffer me to tell you that and I shall no longer fear your displeasure for aught I may be."

"I am all impatient to hear it," said she, her woman's curiosity aroused, "but it can wait till you are cleansed and rendered fitter for a lady's dwelling. Follow me and fear not, for here my word and wish are law."

"I would follow you to the ends of the earth and till death itself, if so you wished me," I replied, forgetting her caution.

This she pretended not to hear, but as I limped painfully along after her, my lady, carrying herself with a queenly grace, led the way into the stately mansion she occupied and owned, and where she reigned sole sovereign of her little world of slaves.

Some of these latter, being summoned, ran hither and thither with alacrity to do their mistress's bidding, and very soon I lay in a downy bed, well washed from top to toe, and anointed lavishly with all manner of soothing and healing ointments, scented with fragrant aromas of Ind. I grew well and strong again with marvellous haste, since, added to these new and strange attentions, my Lady Briseis came ministering daily to my wants and whims—for I was at times exacting and troublesome—but I was fain to eke out my spell of weakness as far as it would go, that I might live all the longer in my lady's smile.

At last, when I could no longer find excuse or feign sickness or weariness, I must needs be up and about, attired in the garments of a great lord, which Briseis had bought for me without so much as a word.

Then, sitting on the pillared terrace of her house, I told my lady the story of my life as I have told it to you, hiding nothing nor sparing myself for all the cruel deeds we pirates did upon the sea. Whilst I talked, sitting on that terrace so full of the great climbing plants and so rich with the sense-lulling sounds and perfumes borne in upon us and swept around us by the evening zephyrs so refreshing after the heat of the day, she sat near me, holding one of my hands in hers and watching my face with wondrous interest, that turned to admiration, and deepened into awe, and when I reached the end of my story, seemed changed to worship, almost love, I thought. For awhile after she was silent, looking dreamily over that fair garden; then, as the spirit of meditation was beginning to cast its subtle spell over my soul, the sweet cadence of her gentle voice broke in upon me.

"'Tis a true story, Arnon, that you have told, and right glad am I to have sheltered you and made you my friend. I, too, can tell you something that has happened since the day, now three weeks ago, when my cousin Vichri burst upon you and captured your ship. It is ill news, I fear."

"Pray tell me, even though it break my heart," I cried, my thoughts flying back to Viol and her babe.

"'Twill do that, I am afraid," said she, but smiling as she spoke, "unless there be an antidote at hand wherewith to blunt the edge of its pain. My cousin's soldiers captured one of your men alive, and when he refused to tell anything of your hiding-places they put him to the torture. When near bereft of his reason by the racking pains they administer to such stubborn dogs, he told them where your little island lies and how to steer to reach it. Something more was on his tongue, 'tis said, but before they could gather its import the poor wretch died, exhausted by the torment. So a fleet has been sent out to lay waste the island and kill all its inhabitants, old and young, men, women, and children, that none of the breed may be left alive."

I bowed my head in silence, as for the blow to pass over me, but honestly, it hurt me less than it had done a three-week before, for I had grown to expect it.

"The will of the Gods be done," was all I said.

"The Gods have been very merciful to you, Arnon," answered Briseis, "since they have saved you alive, when all else have perished, and have guided your footsteps to one who will befriend you as long as she lives. And I think, son of Didron, that the priest Unim spoke truly concerning you, for even now the first part of his saying has come about."

This I began to think myself, and therewith my old self-assurance came back with double force, and I resolved to make the most of my lot, wherever it might be cast.

So I sat at the right hand of Briseis at her feasts, clothed in the finest, and eating of the best that the land could lavish on its nobles, having a social standing, as the privileged friend of the lady Briseis, second to none in that magnificent city, well named Kronos the Stately.

Also I gained renown and the admiring gaze of damsels' eyes for my skill and strength in the trials of arms that were held continually in the town, until none dared to stand up before me at sword-play or spear-practice or in the use of the sling or bow, or even at trials of speed or horsemanship or wrestling, and above all, none came against me who had an iron grip like mine.

For this latter notoriety I was named Phrena the Iron-Fingered by the soldiers and men-at-arms who thronged the vicinity of the Court of King Dulo the Tenth—for I deemed it not wise to tempt the fates by still retaining my real cognomen. To Briseis only I was Arnon, the son of Didron. Also I came to the notice of royalty and was crowned with decorations of merit by the shaky hands of the wine-and-women-loving king, who, I verily believe, beneath his smug and smooth exterior and quavering, mirthless laugh, was monstrously jealous of my unimpaired physique.

All this was well, and so well that I had been content to live there in the sunshine of Briseis' smile and the favourite of a war-loving populace, till courtier life had sapped my manhood, and I had gone down with grey hairs to a tame and peaceful grave, had it not been that I was in constant fear of recognition as my true self should I come face to face with one-eared Vichri, who, though away on distant service, was expected to return at any time; and that I was on precarious footing in the house of my protectress, whom I had grown to love with an ardour I never felt for little Viol, but who seemed to treat me merely as a plaything to be proud of, a privileged retainer, or at most a faithful friend, though I flattered myself that her heart told another tale.

So I resolved that I must become rich, and purchase lands, and count amongst the wealthy nobles of the city, before I put my love to the trial, and what better way of getting rich than to take ship and secure for myself the treasure of that cave wherein I had found refuge some fifteen years ago, and of which I alone knew the secret? But first I must have a ship, and from whence could I get that? In my perplexity I saw no way but to consult my fair friend.

(To be continued.)

POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 15.

THE titles of two of the stories in this number have been interchanged. A guinea will be sent to the first person living within 100 miles of London who sends the title of each story and the page on which it should appear. Another guinea will go to the reader living more than 100 miles from London under the same conditions. Post-cards only, please.

"What's the matter with your brother lately?"

"Oh, he's been like that ever since he won a prize in Pearson's Weekly Straight Line Competition."

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY NO. 15.

MAKE DISABLE OUT.

SEE PAGE 460.

THE MURDER ON THE GREAT BRITISH RAILWAY.

I gave a slight shudder as I finished reading that a jeweller was killed and robbed yesterday in the proximity of Shrewsbury clock was nothing to the ladies. Mr. Fossdyke, I found, had left the railway carriage with the murderer of Mr Symons. He was not in the slightest degree dismayed by his heavy blows. After that he made no effort to travel together. He's a gentlemanly man; you'd crowded round and clamoured for an explanation.

What was to be done?

Archy was a lord and it was the ambition of Archy's future father in law, Mr. Samuel Fossdyke, that the position I was in placed me entirely at his rug, and the "click" was caused by his turn-in, I felt an uncontrollable desire to slumber.

We had a long run before us so taking a pull at Samuel Fossdyke, the celebrated pork dealer of Bond Street, deposited the jewels with the jeweller, partially opened one eye.

Gracious heaven! The description of the Miss Jeromette Fossdyke to marry a lord. Archy was not to be cooled even by what I had gone and involuntarily clutched my bag.

"Now, Tom," said Archy. "I want you to take me over the top of his paper, still taking into the flask, I filled my pipe and opened the paper.

I cheerfully promised.

"You'll have to be careful, old fellow," he must introduce you to Fossdyke before you start. Later in the day he drew me aside and said:

"Say, officers, I guess you've got the wrong victim, the assassin opened the carriage door, and following poor Fossdyke who was being dragged to give time for refreshment. I was in the act of well-bred appearance, slightly above the middle platform. I hadn't the remotest idea where my man was found in the footway, death having choose a moment when he would be able to take Chicago, and his family.

So I agreed to go.

Oh! if I could only get a good look at his face. A thick moustache nearly hides his mouth, which pushed the body out, and then waiting quietly till I sat up and found myself within three feet of him.

"Wal, Mr. Rothsay, I didn't expect to meet you under the same delusion. We had each taken the the wealthy pig dealer of Chicago, for the murderer of the robbery.

"It's a fact Tom. You have heard me speak of justice to be had in this played-out country, I'll have the daily paper.

"Thank heaven," I murmured.

So I leaned across the carriage, and said:

"'It's very nice! but don't you think the setting has a most determined expression. Eyes dark, active, and considerably above the average in Edinburgh.

I was musing over the absurdity of this destinctness. Click! There it was again.

When the train drew up at the terminus in Thompson's, Bond Street, and have them reset. On the death of his father, finding the estates dressed. What was I to do? If I allowed the man. That man," he added, pointing to me, "is handed over to the police.

He had recovered from the blow I had dealt Mr. Symons, a traveller in the jewellery trade. and hiring a yacht went for a cruise in Eastern London the prisoner was securely handcuffed and touched my foot. In an instant I was awake. I conceived a great liking for the girl and in due horror I found that, despite the mortal peril I was the murderer of Mr. Symons."

"The body has been identified as that of a man and from the carriage window in graphic course they became engaged.

The train stopped a few minutes at Peterborough but the "click" had sounded with ominous discription which might serve for thousands of fools in Europe, but for downright cussedness, it's rather irritating to have to listen night quietly disappeared."

Yes, Archy was right; here were the particulars I showed it to her. She handled it in a most softly opening it took something out, and then closed, and his shirt literally torn from his back.

But Fossdyke, I noticed, kept his one eye—the unusually large, and very sinister. He dresses with such intentness during the service that I can without losing consciousness, for I found it for this night's work, I will as sure as my name is supposed that, after rifling the pockets of his man."

"Could you oblige me with a light?" My companion dropped his paper.

He had succeeded to the title two years before.

Surely I could reach him before the revolver and fired. The next instant I flung myself on him, again. The shaving alters you, but I should know one occupant beside myself and he was reading.

The English weakness for making speeches began to melt as I realised the truth. I had taken him with the revolver but he presented a sorry affair next morning. "Desperate struggle in a night's work."

I am no coward, but I as nearly fainted as a man for that I recked nothing.

"Promise never to reveal your share in that position.

Lunch was then announced and I was introduced to Fossdyke in a railway carriage. A. G.

"What have you done with your moustache darn me, if you don't beat creation. If there's any talker the world has ever seen, I cleared my throat dreadfully encumbered, he shut up Castle Ferrers, and I was to be Archy's best man.

Fossdyke has made a good story out of our Three feet!

The passengers getting scent of the affair between Peterborough and London. I'll pack them to understand that the English were the biggest sex I say nothing.

I kept away from Castle Ferrers till the wedding I to wait for the end without making one single overlook what has taken place on one condition."

It was a first-class carriage and there was only me, I waited for his next move. Presently to my disparaging manner, and said:

Digitized by Google

"Wal," he continued, "I've always been given his mercy. After regarding me for a moment with male countenance to deceive me; as to the other rather formidable weapon—and I was vigorous, through. Imitating the example of the greatest shouldered middle-aged gentlemanly-looking man but I had a large clasp knife in my pocket—a head, the thick moustache, hiding the cruel mouth, shaved. Archy stared at me in astonishment.

I was surprised, for Archy was such a good-physiognomist. I do not think it possible for any consideration the enormous value of the stones I went on, "for I see by this morning's paper the train reached Riley—where tickets are taken—the 'Light of Asia,' and what a magnificent strength.

I looked cautiously round. The crowd was at his moustache and frowned heavily.

The marriage was to take place in a fortnight and whiskers," he whispered, "I shouldn't have you among a thousand. Wal, sir, I am willing to renew the combat but lay on the seat regarding no one will suspect the nature of its contents. I attempts to level the pistol at me, but I held his footboard. Directly these were observed, an engine at a terrific speed and the vibration was very great. which reposed in the netting over my head and no one I dare trust them with but you."

Why should I not lie back? In that position I could be withdrawn from beneath the rug, aimed, language described to the awe stricken crowd not have slumbered many minutes when something felt sure I was recognised. I was not mistaken. cartridges. A numbness began to steal through the eyes large and sinister. The man, too, was well and a deadly struggle ensued. Backwards and for-sounded, so I set the cup down and rushed on the murderer! There was the low retreating fore-wards we swayed our breath coming in short, quick struggle. The curtains were torn, one of the windows after the well known manner of the aged states-pockets rifled and my dead body flung out. Was I aways had a great belief in my skill as a spectacle. His mouth was cut, one of his eyes placed the bag at my side, lit a cigar, and opened me with a ferocity impossible to describe. But I was unarmed as far as firearms were concerned, surrendering to the influence I fell asleep. I could and telegraphed to Archy as if nothing had hap-been caused by a revolver. No money or valuables in this black bag. It's a shabby old thing, and that was all I cared for. When the train stopped what had taken place.

"Name it," I cried.

I leaned against a pillar for support.

"About ten miles from London the body of a carriage that had been the scene of a most deadly vengeance leaped into life. Wresting the revolver crept back to his seat. I breathed freely again.

Quietly opening the large knife I had with further examination revealed blood stains on the gasps. The murderer made the most desperate effort to save myself? No, a thousand times no. He's going to London on business and you can clear that the object of the attack was robbery. It became aware that my fellow passenger was re-garding me attentively over the top of his paper.

The scoundrel was standing over me.

It was not likely that I was going to feel to the station. So I sneaked—sneaked is the fellow to fancy that I suspected him, he would mingled in the throng on the platform, and promised to wire the moment I had placed the other was behind a green shade—fixed on me height, forehead rather low and slightly retreating. his attack.

The lights faded and the faces around me directed to an empty compartment of a first-class eyelids lowered watch him from beneath the lashes. known you."

Escape of the murderer. Arrest of an innocent word—out of the station and drove straight to a look of deadly intentness, he took down a bag of Mr. Symons. In fact, we had both laboured last evening the attention of the officials was at Riley I summoned the guard and transferred from his now weakened grasp I struck him several double mistake. It's a good story, I admit, but these confounded jewels to London at once, to waters. In Japan he made the acquaintance of The man the police are looking for is a broad-ments, then he might not be so careful in making her speak so." And my old friend tugged irritably on the seat. Then the smouldering embers of morning and then appeared at the altar clean and as the train steamed out of the station, is dreadfully old fashioned?' It riled me to hear the murderer to his charge.

But supposing I could contrive to lull his sus-ment I came to, managing to secure an evening resigned myself to a journey alone and having pened. This is how the papers chronicled the other for the assassin.

ANOTHER GREAT ROBBERY ON THE GREAT BRITISH RAILWAY.

Presently I stretched my antagonist full length after night to his shameless mendacity. Falstaff could simulate slumber and by keeping my picions and yet keep a sharp watch on his move-ing the chamber piece round as he inserted the paper as the train glided out of the station.

Click! What was that? The train was going alarmed because a fellow passenger chose to peep at me at a disadvantage.

This statement was received with a laugh.

I had captured the murderer of Mr. Symons, and missing, is estimated to be worth nearly £10,000. tempered fellow as a rule.

For some time I resisted the inclination but the jewels in Thompson's hands, I said good-bye. The jewellery he had with him, and which is smashed, and the floor stained with blood. A never think that he'd been a pig sticker."

As I shouldn't know him if I saw him, I was signalled for to search the line.

Why, the man had a revolver concealed beneath my limbs. In a few seconds I should be shot, my stone it is. Well, what do you think she did when drowsiness grew on me more and more till at length people, including even myself, when I suddenly plainly, and generally carries a small black bag."

"On the arrival in London of the great 9.15 train of vigorously blowing a cup of coffee when the bell carriage was, so I bundled into the first compart-of any kind were found on the body, so it seems Castle an hour before but would join the train at had with me it behoved me to proceed with caution. wrist in an iron clutch.

They are heirlooms and worth £20,000, and there's is Samuel Fossdyke."

Digitized by Google

"How long have I been on a case?" repeated Inspector Belville musingly, "well, I should say that Blackingly business took as long as any to unearth, and that was the best part of three years. Not that I haven't been longer, off and on, at other bits of business; for the matter of that, I am still looking out for a man who killed his sweetheart fifteen years ago; but for steady, downright, day after day investigation, the Blackingly affair is certainly my record.

"I dare say you think that as soon as the newspapers have dropped commenting on any particular crime, whose perpetration has not been immediately traced, we police shelve the investigation and turn our attention to something fresh. Quite a mistake; our chance comes when the papers give us a little peace.

"Thanks to their gratuitous suggestions, supposed clues, and up-to-date information, our wide-awake William Sykeses are too often enabled to evade our vigilance. If it is a serious matter, a special man is put on the job, and he has to stick to it, night and day, till he succeeds, or the heads arrive at the conclusion that nothing will ever come of it. I thought at one time, in connection with the case I am going to tell you about, that it would have to be included in the "Undiscovered Ledger" at the Yard. However, by a stroke of luck, nothing else mind you, I managed to clear things up.

"I dare say you will remember reading about the conviction of the Blackingly gang some few years back, but I don't suppose you ever heard exactly what brought about their downfall. They were a dangerous and mysterious lot, and the extraordinary part of it was, they confined their operations to one county, Surrey. We never heard of them in town; they stuck to lonely country houses, and you can take it from me there are a good many such, in what most people reckon our fairest county.

"One night it would be a gentleman's seat near Redhill, next week the owner of a place at Epsom would be found half killed and his silver cleaned out, and never a trace left behind. They were wonderfully clever at their little games, and not without a sense of humour, too, it would seem.

"They locked up an eminent J. P., a staunch teetotaller, who had been roused by the marauders and had come upon the scene in his night-shirt, in the bath-room, and blocking the overflow pipe, turned the tap on (cold water only). That gentleman gave us no peace at the Yard until the offenders were caught, and he was really the cause of my being put on their track.

"From a close study of their mode of operations, it seemed to me that they must have their centre in the country. They could never hope to get back to town after every foray by train, or on foot, and driving the orthodox dog-cart was too risky. To find out this centre was my first endeavour. I had a choice of some twenty villages, and it took me twelve months to make up my mind that Blackingly must be the rendezvous. This was a little village on the Brighton line some twenty miles from London. The villagers were mostly agricultural labourers, or lime-burners; a more unlikely lot among which to find a gang of burglars one could hardly wish to see, and yet I was convinced that under their apparent simplicity and guileless ways I should find my men.

"I arrived on the scene as a jobbing gardener, but ready and willing to turn my hand to anything from ditching to lime-burning; in the latter capacity I soon discovered I was not wanted. The ranks were always full. Nine men and a foreman constituted the staff of the day and night shifts, and to all appearance the men were typical of their class, with nothing extraordinary in their appearance or behaviour. They lived in a row of wooden huts in the village, just off the main road, and not very far from the kilns. Some were married, and had families, the unmarried males seemed to share a couple of huts between them, and depended on their mates' wives to 'do' for them.

"I was always fond of a bit of gardening, so the odd jobs I picked up at the various gentlemen's houses round suited my taste and left me free to prowl about unsuspected. At the same time I could never make much headway with the lime-burners. I would drop in of an evening at the 'Bay Leaf' and make myself as sociable as possible with the labourers, but I never seemed able to win the confidence of the men of lime. Whether they distrusted all outsiders, or suspected me in particular, it was hard to say, but never by any chance did they let fall in my hearing any hint that would identify them with the daring gang which still continued their depredations.

"On various pretexts would I drop in to one or other of the huts while the men were at work, leaving, perhaps, a few vegetables for the lady of the house or some flowers for the children, but nothing in the shape of stolen property met my gaze, and you may be sure I had a very complete, not to mention lengthy, list of missing articles. Often, too, have I shadowed the huts at all times between midnight and dawn, on the chance of tracking an inmate either outward or homeward bound, but never a man to be seen. They seemed to keep most exemplary hours. Again, at a safe distance I would spy upon the night shift at their steamy work in the 'wee sma' 'oors.' Not a member missing.

Digitized by Google

"I was sorely puzzled because, from the very fact of their reticence and their hanging so together, I felt convinced that they were somehow concerned in the mysterious burglings, but without a scrap of evidence to go upon it would have been folly to have made a search.

"As a matter of precaution I had provided myself with a search-warrant, and was in constant communication with the nearest station, which had instructions to supply as many men as I required.

"Nearly two years had passed and I had acquired quite a reputation in the neighbourhood as a jobber. All the same it was monotonous work, and not by any means so easy as the good folks of Blackingly imagined.

"My lodging was within sight of the end wooden hut, and many an hour have I, in a darkened room, sat and watched for the developments that never came. Hardly ever, save on Saturday, did a light show in any of the wooden tenements after ten o'clock at night. This I tested by many out-door vigils, varied by an occasional peep at the lime-kilns, some hundred and fifty yards away.

"It was getting near Christmas, and my duties as gardener were perceptibly lighter; but increased leisure to track the enemy seemed to bring me no nearer, yet I hung on dog-like, my tenacity rather increased than lessened by the not too polite requests from the Yard for information.

"I was sitting one evening at the 'Bay Leaf,' partly concealed by the open tap-room door, conning quietly a list of articles stolen the previous night from a private residence not five miles away. I could almost have sworn none of my lambs were in it, because I had watched the greater part of the early morning, both near the huts and at the kilns, without a suspicion of an absentee from either home or work, and yet all the indications of their handiwork were there. All manner of things they had pilfered, from a Victoria Cross, much prized by the owner of the house, down to a large plum-pudding, destined to adorn the Christmas board. I was just smiling to myself over this last item, when one of the wives of the party tripped in, and, seeing one of the gay bachelors of her set apparently lounging alone at the bar, cried out heartily:

"'Well, Joe, wen are yer a-goin' to look in for your share o' the puddin'?'

"A sharp but stealthy 'hush' from Joe was all the reply she got as he, by an almost imperceptible nod, indicated my presence. I, of course, remained absorbed in my literature, but, though not an excitable man generally, I distinctly heard my heart beating away a hundred to the minute. The couple conversed for a moment in an undertone and left together. I could see from the woman's gestures that she did not consider I ought to be taken into account (I had made myself rather a favourite with the ladies), but the man seemed suspicious. Was it a mere coincidence, or could there be any possible connection between the Bourne House plum-pudding and the toothsome fare referred to by the 'lady-limer.' It was worth risking; I sent a wire to the police station at C——, using a special indicator to avert suspicion in case the telegraph people might talk, to send on the 'half-dozen bulbs' by next train. The 'bulbs,' in the shape of six stalwart plain-clothes men, arrived in due time. At ten o'clock I had the hut where the talkative female resided surrounded and timidly knocked at the door. The woman's voice asked:

"'Who's there?'

"'Only George, the gardener, mistress,' I answered as she proceeded to unbolt the door.

"'And what may George the gardener want this time o' night?' queried the good lady suspiciously.

"I temporised by getting my foot well inside the door, and then boldly said: 'I've come for my share of the pudding.'

"The look of surprise and horror in the woman's face was almost laughable, but leaving me master of the doorway, she made a dash for the back room, and following close upon her heels I found her in the act of raising a large black substance to throw it out of the window. I let her alone, and the article in question (the Bourne House pudding) was neatly 'held' by one of the 'bulbs' stationed just outside—shock number two for Mrs. Jargins. I asked her where her husband was.

"'Ain't come 'ome yet from the pub,' was the prompt reply.

"'Won't do,' says I, 'saw him come in an hour ago and I'll swear he hasn't left the house since.'

"'Find him, then,' she returned, with just a ring of triumph in her voice. Alas! the exultation was short-lived—shock number three was upon her. I had just turned to leave the kitchen when, to my astonishment, I saw the hearth-stone cautiously raised and a man's head and shoulders appeared in the opening. He commenced:

"'I say, Polly, I've come back for the sack, I——.' He got no further; he caught sight of me just as I made a dash for his throat. I got hold before the stone dropped, and with assistance soon had my gentleman outside of his burrow. Then it all flashed upon me. I hastily dispatched four of the men to the brink of the lime-kilns to be within call, and again raised the hearth-stone, and secured the dark lantern with which my underground friend was provided.

"'Now,' I said, producing a revolver and motioning one of my men to follow me, the other being left in charge of Polly and the house, 'down you go again and take me to the other end of that tunnel; at the first sound or struggle this pistol will go off, accidentally, of course, but your head will be just in front of the muzzle, so you know what to expect.'

"The lime-kilner seemed to grasp the situation, and led the way down a few steps cut out of the chalk to the entrance to a passage about four feet high, leading, as I suspected, in the direction of the lime-kilns. The tunnel was beautifully dry and had been hewn with comparative ease out of the solid chalk.

"At length we heard the murmur of voices. With just a touch of the revolver against the back of our leader's head by way of a reminder we pressed on. Suddenly we came upon a small chamber with an exit on the other side. Lying about round a blazing fire were three men in working garb; shown up by the blaze, and piled around on shelves, cut out of the chalk, were the spoils of many a raid. We had come upon their store-house. At our approach one of the men, not noticing the increased numbers, growled out:

Digitized by Google

"'Nice time you've been after that there sack, I'm blowed if——'

"Then he stopped in amazement. Still holding Joe by the collar and allowing my assistant to take up a position by my side with his six-shooter prominently displayed, I said, recognising the young man of the 'Bay Leaf':

"'I called for a slice of that pudding and Joe kindly brought me on here to have a look at the other things.

"'That's no use,' I continued sharply, as the others made a move for their hip-pockets, 'we've got you covered and there's half-a-dozen more outside, so just take it calmly.'

"Releasing Joe for a moment I blew my whistle and heard a faint reply in the distance. An exchange of signals resulted in the appearance of my other men with the horny-handed ones fresh from their toil in tow. They had seized the men at work and discovered the not too well concealed entrance to the cave. So we were quite a merry party.

"Well, we got them away safely and you know the result—fifteen years. You see they did the thing well. The men who were off duty at night snatched a few hours' sleep, then sneaked out by their tunnel when I supposed them safe in bed, walked across country by different routes to the appointed house to be plundered, did their work and returned the same way to their cave and homes. The night men, of course, remained at their posts and kept an eye on things in general; all the huts were connected with the tunnel.

"Polly's outspokenness, combined with Joe's fatal lapse of memory, had been their undoing, and I never see a plum-pudding now without thinking of the Blackingly gang."

R. J. Turner.

A Lock of Flaxen Hair.

MR. EBENEZER FRESHFIELD looked the personification of self-satisfaction, as he lolled back in an easy-chair after his sumptuous dinner. In his hand was the morning's Telegraph in which with a self-approving smile he surveyed, under the head of "The Kamschatkans' Relief Fund," "Ebenezer Freshfield, Esq., £1,000." Then, turning to the editorial comments on the progress of the fund, he read: "Another addition has to be made to the countless instances of the generosity and public spirit of Mr. Ebenezer Freshfield, who has made the munificent contribution of £1,000 to our steadily-growing fund."

Yes, there is no doubt that Mr. Ebenezer Freshfield, public philanthropist, churchwarden, and proprietor of the famous drapery emporium bearing his name, was exceedingly pleased with himself. To invariably have the adjective "respected" attached to his name in public references was grateful to the soul of Mr. Freshfield. It had been whispered, however, that it was a case with that gentleman of no publicity, no philanthropy, and suggested that no advertisement was so efficacious as the philanthropic one. But when did success ever escape the tribute which envy pays to it? Certainly, Mr. Freshfield's private beneficences were unknown, but, as the preservation of the left hand in a state of ignorance as to the procedure of the right is expressly enjoined, that, surely, should be reckoned to his credit!

Mr. Freshfield's contemplation of the evidences of his munificence was interrupted by the announcement that his brother, Mr. Samuel Freshfield, wished to see him.

Mr. Ebenezer condescendingly extended the tips of two fingers to his brother, as the latter entered the room.

"How d'ye do, Samuel?" he inquired, in a patronising tone of voice.

"I am fairly well, thank you, Ebenezer," answered the other, meekly. "And you?—you look well."

"I am well—exceedingly well!" said the elder brother smugly.

The brothers were a strange contrast as they sat there. Ebenezer thrown back arrogantly in his chair, with an air of pompous prosperity, and the other fidgeting nervously on the edge of his seat, as though he recognised his own presumption in being there at all.

"Well," continued Ebenezer, after a pause, placing his thumbs in his waistcoat pockets and spreading his hands out over a comfortable rotundity, "still painting masterpieces, Samuel, eh?"

There was a suggestion of contempt in the manner in which the question was asked which asserted itself through its veneer of affected jocularity.

"I am working at a picture which I hope may be considered to show some improvement," answered Samuel modestly.

"Does your work bring you any more money?" asked Ebenezer drily.

"There is a delight in one's work which is not necessarily to be measured by money," replied Samuel, with a faint assertion of dignity.

"Ah!" said Ebenezer superciliously, "you fellows of the 'artistic temperament,' or whatever you call it in your own jargon, all affect to despise money, but it's a useful standard—a useful standard to enable one to judge where one stands."

Samuel did not reply, and there was silence for a moment. Then Ebenezer spoke again.

"It has always seemed a great pity to me, Samuel, that you had never put your money into some respectable business. Look at the difference between us. We both come into a thousand pounds. You go off wandering about Europe, picking up an art education I think you called it, and I dare say have a very small fragment of your capital left, while I, like a sensible man, if you will pardon my saying so, go into business and prosper. Freshfield's Drapery Emporium is a household name, and I am—well, not, perhaps, a millionaire, but warm, Samuel, decidedly warm! And then look at the good that money enables you to do to your less fortunate fellow men—that's a blessed thought, indeed, Samuel!"

Digitized by Google

Samuel plucked up heart at that. "That sentiment does you credit, Ebenezer," he said admiringly, "and at the same time makes it easy for me to tell you what I came here to see you about. The fact is, Ebenezer, I am engaged upon a painting of great scope and ambition, which I am certain (I say it in all modesty) will bring me both fame and money in abundance. My devoting myself exclusively to this work has led to the neglect of other and more saleable works which would have provided for my living requirements. I have come to you, therefore, Samuel, to ask whether you would temporarily assist me with a small loan. My picture will soon be finished—there is no question as to its sale, and I shall then be in a position to repay you."

Ebenezer did not answer for a few minutes. It may have been that he was not so sanguine as his brother regarding the disposal of his picture, and thought the prospect of seeing his money back not particularly hopeful. Then he rose from his chair, drew himself up to his full height, and said pompously:

"Samuel, I am grieved that you should have asked me that, deeply grieved; for it compels me, quite in your interest, let me assure you, to decline your request. It has ever been a principle of mine," he continued, in the manner of one addressing a public meeting, "to decline to use my money as a pauperising agent to lower the self-respect of any man. If you were disabled, Samuel, my purse would gladly be placed at your disposal; but you are not. You are well able to pursue your calling, and when, by your own unaided efforts you have extricated yourself from this temporary embarrassment you will bless me for my attitude, and cherish with pardonable pride the thought that you are beholden to no man for the proud position in which you then stand!"

Ebenezer beamed round the room as though in imagination he heard the rapturous plaudits of a multitude approving his sentiments.

Samuel arose, and with a gesture of pathetic dignity said:

"I am sorry I asked you, Ebenezer—good-night!"

"Do, pray, believe, Samuel," said Ebenezer, "that it is only in your interest, and for your good. You will thank me some day, I am certain!" and he waved his brother from the room.

There was no resentment in Samuel's heart against his brother as he walked slowly home to his lodgings. After all, he argued ingenuously, he had spent his inheritance. Was it fair that he should seek a portion of his brother's? Perhaps his dreams about this great picture might be only dreams. But he was sorry, and not altogether for himself. He had counted upon being able to relieve the more pressing necessity of a stricken brother artist—that saddened him far more than his own need of a good meal.

Then a thought struck him which caused him to quicken his pace till he came to a dingy-looking shop in a side street, which he entered. When he emerged therefrom he was minus an overcoat but plus a small square of cardboard and half a sovereign.

He hurried on and came to his friend's house. He shot past the landlady who opened the door and ran up the stairs to the small back room in which his friend was lying.

"It's all right, my boy!" he said cheerily. "I've seen my brother and here's half a sovereign for the present. We'll see about some more when that's gone. He says you can repay him when you get to work again. Now, don't disturb yourself—that's all right! I'll send Mrs. Brown up to get what you want. Good-night, good-night! my boy. I'll come in again the first thing in the morning," and before the patient could get in a word of thanks, Samuel had dashed out.

He only lived a few doors off, and when he reached his den he ransacked his cupboard but only found a small piece of butter, a crust of bread and sufficient tea to make one not over-strong cup. However, with these ingredients he was able to prepare a royal feast, to which, no doubt, the thought that his friend was provided for added an agreeable sauce.

Day by day Samuel worked at his picture, limiting his appetite by the efficacious expedient of circumscribing his corporeal circumference, until one blessed day the work was finished.

Samuel surveyed his handiwork with the proud satisfaction of one who feels that the result of his labours has, approximately, at least, realised his lofty intentions. And a well-known connoisseur, Lord Everard, who had been introduced to Samuel by a friendly dealer, thought so, too, for he gave Samuel an exceedingly handsome cheque for the work and a flattering commission for another.

At last the tide in the affairs of Samuel Freshfield had turned, but by the irony of fate it had turned just a few weeks too late. The privation and self-denial he had undergone had strained his constitution to breaking point. Two days after the favour of his patron had so altered his fortunes he was found dead upon the floor of his room.

Mr. Ebenezer Freshfield was much affected by his brother's death. Seeing that, as next-of-kin, he succeeded to Samuel's works, of which there were some specimens, it was said, a little brutally, that he was very favourably affected. The interest of Lord Everard had been so beneficial to the commercial value of the late Samuel Freshfield's pictures that they fetched extraordinary prices, which materially benefited the balance of Mr. Ebenezer's account at his bankers.

And paragraphs appeared in the newspapers to the effect that Mr. Ebenezer Freshfield, the well-known and respected philanthropist, whose talented brother had so recently met with an untimely death, was quite prostrated by the sad event. The paragraph went on to state that when the many evidences of Mr. Ebenezer Freshfield's munificent benevolence were remembered, it would occasion no surprise to the world to know that he had made his brother's welfare his especial and loving care for years, and had, by his generosity, enabled his brother to pursue that artistic career which had been crowned with such splendid success, but which had come to such a tragic and premature end, to the poignant sorrow of the artistic world and general public, who would extend their heartfelt sympathy to Mr. Ebenezer Freshfield in his sudden bereavement!

HENRY GORDON.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

NURSE JENNETT—HAS MORE IDEAS.

ALLAN MURRAY felt day by day during Braetoun's long illness that he was passing through one of the most crucial tests that ever fell to the lot of man. The surgeon's share in the case soon came to an end. "I can do no more," he said; "it is the business of the physician to see if he can build up the old waste and keep the flame of life burning. It is a marvel to me that the man is alive, and I frankly own that I could not have saved him."

The long fight continued. Everyone was utterly exhausted with watching, and one night Olive and her father, who never left the little house, had been forced to go and lie down. The nurse, who had been indefatigable, had come on duty, and Murray, whose brain felt to be numb, was seated there by his patient.

The nurse had been busy preparing such things as would be wanted for the night, and had just arranged a table and placed the shaded lamp in its place, according to the regular custom, and then gone through the folding doors to the back room, leaving one fold half closed so that she could hear the slightest movement and come back at once if required.

Then the watch began, Murray being about to stay till one o'clock, when Olive would come and take his place, and the nurse lie down, Emsworth always coming in about six to relieve his daughter.

Murray's spirits were very low that night, and the temptation to give up was terribly strong. Something whispered to him that it was madness to go on. He rose to his feet, walked to the folding door and looked through the narrow slit to see that the nurse had sunk back in her chair and was sleeping heavily with her lips apart.

Murray frowned, and then his face grew smooth again.

"Poor creature," he said to himself; "she can do no more."

He returned to his seat intending to let her sleep till it was time for him to leave, and he had just taken his place again when the door opening upon the landing was softly opened, and the blood flushed to his temples, and a strange fit of trembling came over him as he turned to meet her who, he felt, was about to enter.

But it was Emsworth who came in very softly, nodded, and bent over the bed, to stand gazing down at the insensible man for a time.

"Why have you come?" said Murray at last.

"Can't sleep," was the reply. "Too much worn out. She has gone off very fast to-night, thank goodness."

No more was said for a few minutes.

Emsworth had turned and sunk into a chair opposite to the doctor, and kept on looking at him uneasily; but as soon as in the dim light he saw that Murray's eyes were directed inquiringly at him, he looked down nervously.

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

This took place several times, and at last his lips moved as if he were speaking, but no words came.

"You are utterly worn out," said Murray. "Go and lie down; perhaps you could sleep now."

"Well, so are you worn out," said Emsworth, in an irritable whisper. "It's killing her, too; even the nurse is asleep. Look here, Murray; I'm not a brute. I want to do what's just and right, but there are bounds to everything. Why are we doing all this?"

Murray was silent. He dared not trust himself to speak, for these seemed to be the echo of his own thoughts.

"I say why are we doing all this? He can't recover. It is only keeping him in misery. Nature seems to say that he must die, and all this prolonged struggle is killing her. Come, speak out like a man; you feel, don't you, that you can't save him after all?"

"No," said Murray, after an effort. "I will not give up."

Emsworth was silent for a few minutes.

"It's like fighting against fate," he said at last. "That surgeon told me it was quite hopeless, and that he should have given it up from the first."

"How am I to look in Lady Braetoun's face if I have not struggled to the last?" said Murray coldly.

"Ah! and what for?" said Emsworth, after another pause; "for him to go on breaking her heart?"

"Or repent, and make her happy after all."

"Never," said Emsworth, in a passionate whisper. "I can bear it no longer. It is maddening, all this. It's killing her, poor child. I wish to God he was dead; she would suffer, and then be at rest."

"You must not talk like that," said Murray. "Go and lie down again."

"I cannot."

"You must. Go and try to sleep."

The stern masterful man rose with a sigh, and in obedience to the stronger will went slowly out, closed the door, and descended on tip-toe to the little back room, where a couch had been made up for him.

Murray listened till the last creak of a stair told that Emsworth had quite gone, and then he let his face fall into his hands, and groaned softly as he pressed his teeth upon his lower lip to keep it from quivering, for the temptation was stronger than ever.

At that moment there was a light, sharp tap on the window-pane, as if something had struck it, and looking out he let fall the blind again, glanced at his patient, and then stepped to the folding doors.

Nurse Jennett seemed to be sleeping soundly, and he passed out and descended the stairs, to softly open the front door and admit the cool night air.

As he stepped out, a closely veiled figure came quickly across from where the street lamp cast its light.

Digitized by Google

"You again!" he said, in a low, reproachful voice. "And after what you promised me!"

"Don't, don't speak to me like that," she said faintly. "I'm weak and ill, Doctor."

"Then go home, and let your friends call in medical help."

"No, no," sobbed the girl, and she reeled and caught at his arm. "You don't understand. I—I can hardly speak."

"I did not mean to be so rough with you," he said more gently, and as she clutched at him her head fell back.

"No trick," he muttered. "Poor little lass! She is a true woman in spite of all."

In a minute or so she came to herself. Her eyes opened, and she stared about wildly.

"Where am I?" she panted. Then, with a faint cry of alarm, she tried to start from his arms.

"Wait a few minutes," he said kindly, "or the faintness will come back."

She looked at him suspiciously.

"Where am I? Who are you? Ah! I remember now, the doctor."

"Yes, the doctor. You should not have come again."

"I was obliged—I couldn't ask there. Oh, pray, pray tell me! I've been watching for hours. How is he now?"

"You promised me——"

"Yes," she said hysterically, "but don't torture me like this; tell me how he is now. They said he was dying. I saw you go in, and I've been here by the railings ever since. Is it—oh, please, please, speak!"

She caught his hand in hers, and made as if to sink upon her knees, but he prevented that act.

"Lord Braetoun has got over the worst, I think."

"Got over the worst, and he'll get well?"

"That depends on himself."

"Ah! this is a bad, miserable world; but what would it be without doctors? Thank you. I'll go home now. I'm so tired and so ill. But he will get well?"

"I have told you all I can."

"Thank you. I am so glad. Please," she added simply, "may I go now, and——"

"If you feel well enough. Shall I get you a glass of wine?"

"No. I only want to get home now. I feel as if I could go to sleep. Please, forgive me for calling you out. I saw your shadow on the window. I was nearly desperate, and felt as if I must go off the bridge."

"But now you'll go quietly home."

"Yes, I'll go back to Aunt's and wait; but I must come and ask how he is. I have been so patient, you know. I don't think I should have been able to live if I didn't come here and watch, and ask the girl for news. Thank you so much for speaking to me, for I don't think I want to die yet. I don't know, though. Everything is so hard. Life isn't such a great catch, after all."

She looked up at him piteously.

"Got over the worst, though," she said softly. "God bless you for what you've done. I'll go now."

She nodded at him quickly, drew her veil closely over her face, and glided along the pavement, while a minute later Murray heard the rattle of a cab.

"Gone," he said softly. "Ah, there are others suffer as much as I."

He entered and closed the door and stole up the stairs into the little drawing-room, to find Olive standing there in the shadow, ready to look at him indignantly.

"That woman sleeping, too," she cried reproachfully, "and my husband left quite alone. Oh, Doctor, it is too cruel. You insisted upon my lying down."

"I have not left him more than five minutes," he said deprecatingly.

"Five minutes! And he might have died. It is horrible—so cruel. Is there no one I can trust?"

Murray said no word in his defence, but went softly to the table, took a glass, and poured in a portion from a bottle. Then he turned to go and summon the nurse, but Olive checked him.

"No," she said, "let her sleep. I will help."

Then she went to Braetoun's left, to pass her hand softly beneath his shoulders and back, as Murray did the same from the right, and together they raised him, arm resting against arm, while the glass was held to the insensible man's lips, and he drank the contents of the glass. Then, as they lowered him down, and were withdrawing, hand touched hand, and as if an electric current had flashed through Murray, his fingers closed round the soft warm palm and held it in a spasmodic grip, which was softly returned, and Olive's eyes met those of Murray as they bent together over Braetoun, neither stirring for some moments.

Olive broke the silence, and her voice, mere whisper as it was, sounded humble and appealing, but there was no trace of passion or tremor in its tones as she said softly, returning the pressure the while:

"Forgive me. I was wrong. I know how cruel and unjust my words must have sounded to you who have been so unsparing of yourself;" and she began to smooth the pillow.

"I beg pardon, my lady; shall I do that?" said a voice. "I would have come directly if I had known."

"There is no need now," said Olive gently. Then to Murray, in the calmest, most unruffled way: "I'll go again now."

She bent down to gaze intently in Braetoun's face, and placing a hand on either side upon the pillow, kissed his forehead, while Murray felt the blood surging through his veins, as his temples throbbed, and a sensation as of fire scorching his brain assailed him, unconscious the while that the nurse was going to and fro, furtively watching first one and then the other from the darkened portion of the room, and with a tread as silent as that of some feline beast of prey.

Olive stole softly to the door, and then turned to whisper: "Mind that Dr. Murray has a little coffee soon."

"Yes, my lady, I shall not forget," said the woman, and the next moment doctor and nurse were alone.

The woman glanced at him from time to time, but he made no sign, spoke no word to her, merely sank in his chair by the head of the bed, as if to continue his watch, his nerves thrilling, and the blood still throbbing through his veins with the recollection of the soft, warm pressure of that hand, which seemed still to be lying clasped in his own.

And the nurse stole softly into the back room, to stand there motionless as soon as she was out of sight, thinking of what she should do. The light was very much lower, but it was far from being as dark as in the sick chamber. Her eyes shone out clearly, and a peculiar smile widened her mouth, as she made a suggestive gesture by pressing her mouth down upon the palm of her hand.

"And she's breaking her heart about him all the time," she said to herself, with the smile now displaying her white teeth; "but I don't think he'll get better—now."

CHAPTER XXIX.

In Lucy's Window-Box.

Two months crept by.

"Now you look here, miss," said Aunt Duncan sternly, as she sat at an open window facing the sea, and nodding her head slowly like a Chinese figure. "I know I'm a very weak old woman, and that the stouter I get the more stupid I seem, but I'm not quite so stupid, or such a blind old mole as you think."

"I don't know what you mean, Auntie," said Lucy, who in a very pretty seaside toilette, was also seated in the window, armed with an opera-glass, watching the passers-by, and scanning the seats and carriages along the sea front.

"Very well, then, I'll tell you, my dear, though you know all the time what I mean. My arm's getting as strong and well as can be, for I tried a bit of cutting out with the scissors and a noosepaper yesterday morning, and it's all nonsense for me to be stopping down at the sea-side, pretending it's doing me good."

Digitized by Google

"It is doing you a great deal of good, Auntie," said Lucy with a sigh of satisfaction, as her glass rested at last upon a group, about three hundred yards away, of an invalid carriage, beside which stood a thick-set gentleman, and a tall, graceful-looking lady.

"'Tisn't, and I'm beginning to fret again. I want to get home."

"You shall go home again soon."

"I shall, my dear, and very soon. Seaside's very nice to come to if you want to spend an 'appy day; but 'appy days kill one another, and it gets 'orrid sitting here so long doing o' nothing."

"You think so, Auntie, because you're not quite well and strong yet."

"No, I don't, miss; so don't you be a little 'umbug."

"Auntie!"

"Oh, I mean it; I always speak my mind. Seaside, indeed, where you can't get a bit o' real fresh fish! Don't tell me! It all comes down from London. It's second-hand—that's what it is. What they couldn't get rid of at Billingsgate they send down here, chuck it into the sea for about an hour, and pull it out again to 'umbug visitors with."

"What nonsense, Auntie!" cried Lucy, who sat there now with her elbows resting on the window-sill, so as to steady the glass, which was kept in one position.

"No, it ain't, miss. Think I don't know? Ketch me believing we get fish caught here! Why, them oysters I had yesterday were shameful. Of course, I didn't see 'em in both shells—fishmonger took good care of that—but I knowed they were all yawning, with their mouths wide open, because they were so tired of waiting to be sold."

"A'l a sign that your mouth's out of taste, Auntie."

"It ain't, miss, and don't you be so aggravating, or I shall 'it you. Look at the lobsters, too. Think I don't know the difference between a fresh boiled lobster and one put in the pot again? None for me, unless they're bought alive, and I have 'em boiled at 'ome. Then there was them s'rimps, why their skins was downright soft. We'll have a carriage and drive out this afternoon."

"Yes, Auntie, you shall," said Lucy eagerly.

"And go right away, ever so far, Shoreham way, where there's a real fisherman, and buy a lobster and some s'rimps, and bring 'em 'ome alive."

"No, no, Auntie; you can't ask the people here to boil them."

"Can't ask the people here to boil them? Oh, can't I? If they give me any of their nonsense, I'll go down in the kitchen and boil 'em myself. Pay 'em dear enough for what we do get done, anyhow."

"But there are plenty of fishermen along the beach here, Auntie, if we drive up and down."

"I dessay. Then I ain't going to drive up and down, miss. I don't want to show people my face and my noo dress. I want something decent to eat. Fishermen on the beach here? Tchah! I know. Half of 'em roughs from London in disguise, come down to see what they can get out of the visitors. You can't deceive me. There's that man with the flannel trousers up to his arm-pits, as is always worritin' me to go out in his boat, and as impudent as can be. Fishermen, indeed! Why, if he didn't once drive a Paddington 'bus, I don't know nothing. He's got a reg'lar Royal Oak look about him. Why I heard him say to the man as helps him push the boat off into the water. ''Old 'ard' as natural as life, and if that warn't enough, he sings 'Wo!' directly after. If ever I do come to the seaside again, I'll come to some place where it's real sea and real sand and real fishermen."

"Well, so it is here, Auntie," said Lucy, laughing merrily but without moving her eyes from the glass.

"No, it ain't, miss; it's all London stuck down by the sea-side, just like a noo piece at Doory Lane. Nothing don't seem real. It's all acting; even you're as bad."

"Why, Auntie!" cried the girl; "what amI doing?"

"Sticking there at the window just as if the manager had give us a box; and there you are with your opera glass, watching the show."

"Well, it's nice to watch the people," said Lucy, reddening a little.

"There, what did I say? Now, don't you call that acting? It's making life a reg'lar play, as it all has been lately. Fancy you trying to deceive me!"

"Oh, Auntie, I don't; I never would."

"And thinking me such a stupid old woman. I ain't blind. I saw my lord go by in his chair, with a man pushing him, and my lady and her father alongside, and ever since there you've been sitting with your silly eyes glued to that glass. Just as if I didn't know."

Lucy turned sharply round, and laid the glass on the sill, her cheeks flaming now, but gradually turning pale as she gazed with a wistful look in the old woman's eyes.

"Ah—ah—ah! Lucy, Lucy, if you dare to cry! There, look at you, with the hot water coming running out of your eyes. You'll spoil your frock. Oh, my own precious, don't cry, don't cry."

"I can't help it, Auntie. You are so cruel to me."

"I ain't, dear, only you do make me mad to see you go on as you do. Why couldn't you say downright why you wanted to come to Brighton, instead of pretending I wanted sea air? It was so mean."

"Yes, Auntie, it was, but I was so miserable when I found they'd left Brompton to come down here."

"Well, of course, I had my love affairs when I was young, but nobody can't throw in my teeth that I ever made such a fool of myself about a man as you do."

"Perhaps not, Auntie," said the niece. "I suppose I am very weak."

"Weak? It's shocking. Where is your pride?"

"Don't, don't talk about it, please, Auntie," said the girl humbly.

"I must, Lucy, for your good. Now do try and be reasonable. You know how nice that Mr. Emsworth spoke. Why, he was like a father to you, and really, old as I am, I took to him so that really I do believe if he'd have asked me I could have thought about getting married again."

"Oh, Auntie!"

"Well, my dear, human natur' is human natur', but it wouldn't have made no difference to you, for my will's made, and it can't be unmade. I call him a man, that's what I call him. None of your stuck-up arrystockricy sort of people, but a real honest gentleman. I saw how he took to you, and when you'd gone upstairs, crying, he sits down on one of the chairs, never noticing as there was a lot of gauze and spangles in it, and talks to me like a man should. Why, what did he say?"

"I don't know," said Lucy wearily.

"Don't tell stories, miss! You do know. I've told you times enough. Why, we were the best of friends directly. Just as if we'd known one another for years. It was just because he opened his 'art to me, just as men should, and because we was both in love."

"Auntie!"

"No, no, no, stupid girl, not that sort o' love, but proper sort o' love. I let out to him how fond I was of you, and he lets out how fond he was of his dear gal. And there we was at once. That settled it. I told him how I'd brought you up, and he told me how things had gone with him ever since his poor dear lady was took. Ah! how we did talk. Why, if there they ain't a-coming back! Lucy, my dear, I've a good mind to go and call on him at the 'otel."

"Auntie, no!" cried the girl, springing back from the window.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, I don't see why not. I believe he'd be glad to see me. No, he wouldn't. You've spoiled that. Makes it look as if you'd followed them down; and so you did, and cheated me."

"I couldn't help it, Auntie," sighed the girl. "I felt obliged," and she stood away from the window and watched the little party go by.

"But you should have had more pride, my dear. Nobody couldn't have spoke more fair than he did, my dear. He says bygones must be bygones, which is quite right. He says he was very sorry for you, for you seemed to be as nice and sweet as any gal he'd ever set eyes on, but he couldn't help loving his child, and if you'd do the right thing he was prepared to do the same.

"'That must be all over now,' he says, 'for both their sakes. My poor gal has forgiven him, and I can't have her heart broke again by his coming to see your daughter.'

"'Which she's only a niece,' I says.

"'Well,' he says in his arbitry way, 'it's all the same. She's a woman, and a very beautiful one too, and if she'll do the right thing and promise never to see him again, I'm a rich man, Mrs. Duncan,' he says, 'and whatever you think would be a fair thing for her to have every year, she shall have it, for I'll buy her a nooity.'

"I told him he was a gentleman, and it was very han'some of him, but there wasn't no need, for I'd got plenty for both of us; but I promised him that if ever you wanted money I'd ast him, and then he said he'd see as you should keep the little house and everything, and, as you know, I promised him as everything should be all over, and then you cheated me into comin' down here, and you—— Well, of all—— You reaching your head outer winder with the glass to stare after 'em, and I don't believe you've hardly heard a word I said."

Lucy turned to gaze in a bewildered way at her aunt.

"I'm ashamed of you, Lucy, that I am, and we'll go back to London at once."

"Go back?" faltered the girl.

"Yes; it's shocking. You know he's made it up with his lady, and he's getting well again and you going on like that."

"I did not promise anything, dear," said the girl stoutly, as her eyes wandered towards the window again.

"Look this way, miss," cried Aunt Duncan. "I ain't got so much breath that I can waste what I have got by shouting at you and you not listening. I promised her father for you, and I told him I'd see as you behaved right, and you shall. I haven't had a happy moment since I found out how you cheated me. It's too bad, Lucy, too bad for anything. I did think you'd have behaved better than this."

"Did you, Auntie?" said the girl wearily. "You can't understand—you can't understand."

"Oh, yes, I can. I haven't seen all the best plays for nothing, my dear. You're trying to be the leading lady, and the heroine, but it won't do. That old gentleman was as handsome over it as ever he could be, and I've undertook for you to meet him half way, and, if you don't do as I want you, it's going to be bad times for both of us. Now, then, Baby, I've had quite enough of the seaside and so have you. You say I'm better, and it's done me a lot o' good, and I say you're worse, and it's done you a lot of harm, besides making you cheat your poor old aunt in that 'orrid way. I wouldn't ha' thought it of you."

Lucy sank back in a chair, and covered her face with her hands.

"I couldn't help it, dear, I couldn't help it. I only wanted to be where I could see him and know that he was getting better. He doesn't know I'm here. That wasn't much."

"Yes, it was. It keeps you always thinking about him, my dear, and making yourself mis'rable, instead of forgetting him. That's what you've got to do, and as soon as possible. There, I must speak. There's times when we can't do what we like, and this is one of them. Now, I'm going to tell these people we're going back to London to-morrow, and that means paying 'em up to Saturday and another week."

"No, no, Aunt, dear, I can't bear it," cried Lucy. "Stop till Saturday week, and by that time I can bear it better."

"Not you, Baby. If you've got to take a nasty dose of physic, it's best took at once. You can't take it none the better for thinking about it for more'n a week, so just you be a good girl, and don't go making two married people's lives unhappy, after one of 'em's been just on the edge of the grave, and the other ready to go after him. You've got to come away, my dear, so don't you make no more bones about it. That affair's all over and done with."

Lucy said nothing, but sat back with her face still buried in her hands, while Aunt Duncan wrinkled up hers a little more, and then rose and rang the bell.

CHAPTER XXX.

On the Brighton Line.

A careworn-looking, hard-worked girl answered the summons, and Aunt Duncan sent word by her that she wished to see the mistress, who came in then and stared hard on hearing her lodger's first words, while Lucy turned ghastly.

"I want my bill, please," said the old lady. "We're going back to town this evening."

"Going, ma'am?"

"Yes, going. Didn't I speak plain? Brighton don't suit me, nor my niece neither."

"Why, really, ma'am, I was thinking how much better you both looked."

"Oh, were you? Just look at her face; she's as white as white."

Lucy darted an indignant glance at her aunt, but said nothing.

"Let me have my bill up to Saturday night," continued Aunt Duncan.

"Oh, certainly, ma'am, if you wish it, but——"

"You want a week's notice, well, charge it in the bill, and the sooner the better. Come, Lucy, my dear; you and me had better see about our packing, and what time there's a train. I'll go by one of them fast ones as don't stop nowhere, and get it done."

There was a flash of resentment now in Lucy's eyes, and the old lady tightened her lips, and made ready for a scene, but, to her surprise, her niece hung her head directly after, and followed her docilely enough up to their bedroom, where, as soon as the door was closed, she gave her a warm hug.

"Now, that's just what I like, my dear, for it shows you felt you were wrong, and want to do what's right. I dare say the people what's had to do with the stage may be very wicked in some folks' eyes, but we've got our 'arts in the right place, and when we've got to do the proper thing we know how to do it. You're going to do it, and so let's pack up, and first thing you look at the time-table, and tell me what time there's a train."

Lucy obeyed without a word of opposition, and in a few minutes announced that there was one at five o'clock.

"Does it stop anywhere?"

"At two or three stations, Aunt, dear," said Lucy, who looked now as if she had been stunned.

"Then that won't do. I want a fast train. I want to get home without dilly-dallying about, my dear. What other is there?"

"One at a quarter to six, Aunt."

"Say Auntie, my dear, Don't be cross with me when I'm working for your good. Now, then, how many times does that stop?"

"Only once, Aunt, for tickets."

"Then we'll go by that, and have some dinner as soon as we get up, and go to the theayter after. This place is too dull, and we want a change. Now, then, pack up, my dear, as soon as you can; then we'll have a cup of tea, and it will be time to go. I've had enough Brighton to last me all my life. Two months have we been here, and I'm hungry to get to dear old London again."

Digitized by Google

Lucy made no reply, but busied herself over the packing in the same crushed, dreary way, unconscious of the fact that her aunt was watching her furtively all the time, till the task was at an end. Then only did she look up.

"She's a-scheming out something or she wouldn't be so quiet," thought the old lady, but she said nothing then.

"Shall I ring and tell them to have a fly here in time, Aunt?"

"Auntie."

"Yes, Auntie," said the girl sadly.

"Yes, ring, my dear, and let's get it over," whispered the old lady, drawing the girl to her breast. "There, don't fret, my precious; it's quite right, and you must never, never see him again."

"Aunt!"

"Auntie."

"Well, Auntie, dear, you're killing me."

"Then it shall be with love, my precious, and nothing else. But I did promise that old gentleman as I'd do what was quite square, and you will, my own. There, ring."

Lucy obeyed, and dressed for their departure, still as if she were in a dream, and stepped at last into the luggage-laden fly, which was there in ample time for their departure.

Few people were returning, and, after enlisting the assistance of a porter, who promised effusively that the luggage should all be seen in the van, and selected an empty coupé for them, long experience having taught him the value of well-rendered services to stout, elderly lady invalids, Aunt Duncan and her niece sat in the comfortable carriage alone.

"Ah!" exclaimed the old lady, with a sigh of content. "This is nice. Isn't it time we started? Oh, my precious, don't, don't cry."

"Auntie, you're breaking my heart," cried the girl, breaking into a passionate burst of sobbing.

"No, no, no, my darling," cried the old lady, petting and caressing her; "indeed, indeed, it's what we ought to do; and it'll save you a lot o' pain by-and-bye. You mustn't cry now and make a scene. We don't want all the world and his wife to know our troubles, and oh, dear, oh, I do wish they'd start and let us get away. Lucy, Lucy!"

But the girl cried more bitterly, turning her face away to let it sink in the corner of the cushioned carriage, her breast heaving and the sobs tearing their way from her breast.

"Don't, don't, my dear, pray," wailed the old lady, "or I shall break down, too. I never saw you cry like that before, and you mustn't, dear. Oh, why don't they go on? Where's the porter? Where's the guard? Don't, don't be ill, my own dear. There—there, I can't bear it, I give in. Never mind the price of the tickets. I give in, and you must be wicked, I suppose. We'll go back to the rooms, and you shall sit and watch him as if it was a play. Life is all a play. Shakespeare said so, and he knew; and you make me cry as bitterly as I ever did at the best piece I saw. There, wipe your eyes, my precious. I'm a stupid old fool, I suppose, but I aways did give up to and indulge you in everything, and I must now. Be quick, or they'll take us. Here, guard, guard!"

"Quick, please, if you're going on," cried a voice from the platform, and they had a glimpse through their tears of the stalwart guard in uniform, as he stood looking towards the rear of the train, with his whistle to his lips.

The next minute a gentleman appeared with a lady, and the guard opened the door.

"Quick! in with you, my dear!" and the words froze upon the lips of Lucy and her aunt, as they half rose to leave the carriage.

It was nearly instantaneous. As the lady stepped in an invalid chair was run up to the door, and two porters lifted a gentleman into the carriage, jumped out, and another gentleman stepped in, and the door was banged.

"Nurse in the next carriage, sir," said the guard, whose whistle immediately sounded loudly, and the train began to glide from the platform, as Lucy sank back in the corner, feeling her dress brushed by the invalid's elbow as he sank back, while the lady was opposite to him, side by side with Aunt Duncan.

"That's about as close as ever I was to being left behind, eh, Doctor?" said one of the gentlemen by the door.

"Yes, we drove it too long. Don't feel any worse, I hope, Braetoun?"

"I? Oh, no. Legs a bit shaky, that's all. Don't put on a white face like that, Olive."

"But are you sure you don't feel faint?"

Braetoun did not answer, for a low gasping sigh on his left had taken his attention, and he turned to the right, where Lucy sat shrinking back in the corner, not seeing him, but with her eyes fixed on Olive's.

The fascination of her long look was mutual, and neither could for the time withdraw her gaze, while the train was fast gathering speed for its hour and a quarter's run, and no stoppage until London was pretty close at hand.

For this is a little world, and fate plays strange pranks in bringing together those who do and those who do not wish to meet.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

NO. 13.

The first correct London post-card received was that sent by Mr. F. Cameron, 3, Harford Place, Drury Lane, W.C.; from the provinces by Mr. Edgar E. Williams, 55, Grant Street, Birmingham. The correct total was 1,051.

RESULT OF Jumbled Story Competition.

No. 12.

Fourteen competitors succeeded in correctly solving Jumbled Story No. 12, and, in accordance with the conditions, the first arrivals have received the prizes.

Mrs. Nayler, 74, Lyndhurst Road, Peckham, S.E., has been sent £5; and £1 each to the following readers: Miss R. Cahuac, 27, Commercial Road, E.; Mr. Henry W. Searle, 25, Beauclerc Road, Hammersmith, W.; Mrs. C. Milton, 2, Horton Street, Newcastle, Staffs; Miss Lylian Ralph, St. Hilaire, Canford Cliffs, Bournemouth; Miss Blythman, Skenington Rectory, Banbury.

To each of the remaining eight correct competitors, whose names appear below, a penknife has been forwarded as a consolation prize:

T. E. Murray, H.M. Customs, Custom House, Liverpool; W. Cheetham, 1, Belmont Villa, Victoria Road, Romford; E. M. Tilsley, Perry Barr, Birmingham; B. C. Smythe, St. Anne's House, Lewes; S. L. Pratt, Rothsay House, Longley Road, Tooting, Graveney, S.W.; Miss K. H. Whiteford, 29, Fairholme Road, W. Kensington; Wm. Boyle, Harbour Office, Swansea; Wm. Lester, 6, Ranelagh Road, Wood Green, N.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

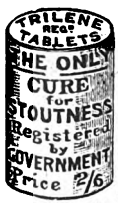
LONGEVITY AND CORPULENCY.

We have received a copy of the just issued 18th edition of Mr. F. Cecil Russell's "Corpulency, and the Cure" (Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.). This issue is in itself indicative of the widespread influence which the author now exercises as a successful expert in the treatment of obesity, while the additions to the evidence which, as a statistician, he is in the habit of collecting on the subject are suggestive of some curious reflections. It is evident that Mr. Russell is annually treating thousands of cases of excessive fat with a success which, in the rapidity and the permanence of its manifestation is truly marvellous. That the enormous popularity of his system is likely to increase in the future is most probable, because it is free from all the drawbacks which have rendered the Banting and other methods of reducing corpulence unacceptable to the majority of the sufferers, who have regarded these cures as rather worse than the complaint. By attacking the causes rather than the symptoms of obesity, he strengthens the digestive organs, thus actually increasing, instead of decreasing, the appetite, while the surplus weight is being reduced at a wonderfully rapid rate, amounting to pounds per week, and often stones per month. Add to this that there is no mystery about the nature of the absolutely innocuous preparation, the recipe for which Mr. Russell supplies in his capital little volume (256 pages), which may be obtained post free by sending two penny stamps to the author's offices, at the address given above. It seems certain, therefore, that, as a result of the happy revolution which the patient researches of this specialist, with the aid of a distinguished physician as a collaborateur, has effected, the average of longevity will, before long, be appreciably raised. Obesity is, indeed, one of the few antagonistic influences remaining which, especially among the more prosperous classes, prevent the great majority of people of both sexes becoming centenarians. With advanced ideas in regard to wholesome food, clothing, and sanitary arrangements, it only remains to get rid of clogging fat to live an ideally hygienic, and, therefore, a very prolonged life.—Belfast Evening Telegraph.

GOOD NEWS FOR STOUT PERSONS.

It is a matter for congratulation that obesity is taking its proper place as a disease, and is receiving that scientific attention which it has long lacked. It does not follow that a person need to be the size of Sir John Falstaff to show that he is unhealthily fat. According to a person's height, so should his weight correspond, and this standard has been prepared by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., so that anyone can see at a glance whether or no he is too stout. People in the past have been wont to regard fatness as constitutional, and something to be laughed at rather than to be prescribed for seriously; but this is evidently an error, as persons whose mode of life has caused a certain excess of flesh require treating for the cause of that excess, not by merely stopping further increase, but by removing the cause itself. It is astonishing how long we go on perpetuating error, and how difficult it is to make people disbelieve anything, no matter how palpably false the principle, if it has become at all firmly fixed in the public mind. These facts with regard to obesity, however, are so obvious, that there ought to be no difficulty about the acceptance when once they become known; and as a matter of fact, the immense number of persons who have already acknowledged their truth by recording the benefits received from Mr. Russell's treatment is simply wonderful. It is marvellous how this "Pasteur" and "Koch" of English discoverers can actually reduce so much as fourteen pounds in seven days with a simple herbal remedy. His book only costs twopence, and he is quite willing to afford all information to those sending as above. It is really worth reading.—Southport Visitor.

Digitized by Google



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

187, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

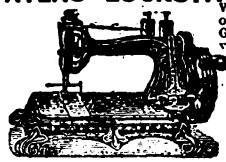
TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

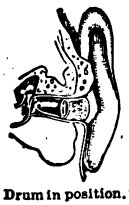
PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.



DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON,

Drum in position. 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full natural perfect Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment, approved and recommended by the medical profession. Success guaranteed. For particulars free, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 97, Strand, London.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO.,

HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 407. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 17TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

Worth a Guinea a Box

has passed into a proverb
expressive of universal approval
concerning a medicine of rare value.

This Notable Verdict,

justified by a sale of 6,000,000 boxes yearly,
must secure the confidence of sufferers
in all climes and countries,
and ever-widening fame
of

BEECHAM'S PILLS

of ever-widening fame
and in all climes and countries
must secure the confidence of sufferers,
justified by a sale of 6,000,000 boxes yearly.

This Notable Verdict

concerning a medicine of rare value,
expressive of universal approval,
has passed into a proverb—

Worth a Guinea a Box.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.

Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

ADVERTISERS should write for particulars of Special Positions.

VARICOCELE.

Its speedy and painless cure by the latest and most improved method of treatment for this disease. Send for Illustrated Leaflet, entering fully into the subject. It is the only reliable and effective means of curing this disease without operation. Sent sealed post free for three stamps, by

E. FORBES, 57 and 58, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

Dr. Mackenzie's ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

S.S. S.S. PEARSON'S £100 COUPON. No. 42 Oct. 17, 1896. S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

BLUSHING

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £3, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain. Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid. VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SHORT STORIES

No. 407.] For the Week ending Oct. 17th, 1896. [1d.

EDITED BY C. Arthur Pearson

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

RELEASED!

In the cosy isolation of a first-class carriage, speeding its way westward from London, sat a lady and gentleman whose travelling-bags, dressing-cases, rugs, and other paraphernalia of modern travellers were all so new as to suggest the thought that they were bride and bridegroom. This was indeed the case, their marriage having taken place at noon of that same day.

It had been a very quiet, modest wedding, with no music, no bells, and no bridesmaids. The spectators had consisted of an aunt of the bride—who had given her away with an air of great relief—her maid, the pew-opener, and Mr. Trevor's valet.

The minister, who had a bad cold, and felt chilled and out of humour, had hurried through the ceremony without any show of interest or pleasure, and then, after signing their names in the register, the "happy pair" had driven off. An hour had been spent at the hotel, where the bride exchanged her wedding-dress for one suitable for a journey, but there had been no wedding breakfast, no gathering of merry friends to offer best wishes and congratulations.

Arriving at Waterloo in time to catch the down express, the bridegroom had secured a private carriage, had seen that his companion was comfortable, had provided her with a magazine and an illustrated paper, and had then settled himself in the corner opposite her, and fallen at once into deep, impenetrable thought.

The bride, though a little wounded by his indifference, made no attempt to break the silence. Occasionally she looked at him with wistful curiosity, wondering what were the thoughts which so completely absorbed him. Were they of her? It scarcely seemed possible.

Handsome as his face was, it had the worn and haggard look of one who had passed through much mental suffering, and the dark lustre of his eyes was shaded by an ineffable sadness. How had he suffered? What unhappy secrets did his past hold?

As she asked herself these questions the bride's heart sank. She was forced to acknowledge to herself that, dearly as she loved him, she knew little of him. She had met him—just six weeks before—at a small watering-place where she was staying with her aunt. From the first day of their acquaintance, which was due to an accident, he had paid her marked attention; and she, grateful to him because he had drawn her away from her dreary past, and stirred into colour the pale and even tenor of her life, had turned towards him as a sunflower towards her god, and wondered at the great good fortune which had come to her.

Her aunt, and only near relative, had been delighted to rid herself of the responsibility and expense of a penniless charge, and had willingly agreed to Mr. Trevor's wish for an immediate marriage, assuring the girl that she had received the most satisfactory replies to the inquiries she had made in regard to Mr. Trevor's standing and character.

Laura, with the enthusiasm of a young and inexperienced girl, believed a new and perfect life stretched gloriously before her, and even her husband's strange silence did not altogether quench her delight in the thought that henceforth she was to have a home. They were on their way now to it, and there need be no more weary wandering from one little town to another, no annoying struggles with poverty, no dread of the unknown future.

The journey lasted all night, and Laura slept through most of it; but whenever she opened her eyes for a moment it was to see her husband still staring from the window with that fixed, impenetrable gaze.

It was six o'clock in the morning when the train reached the little station of Dunstan. George Trevor helped his bride out, found a comfortable seat for her in the little waiting-room, and then went to secure a carriage and cart to take them and their servants and luggage to Wincot House.

"I won't be gone a moment longer than I can help, Laura," he said, as he walked away.

As he spoke, an old woman, who had come in just before them, and taken a seat in a corner, started up with an exclamation of surprise, and threw back the thick veil of her old-fashioned bonnet. Taking a few steps forward, she seemed about to address Mr. Trevor, but as he walked away without apparently perceiving her, she sank back into her seat again with a deep sigh.

Laura, generous and impulsive, rose and approached her.

"Did you wish to speak to Mr. Trevor?" she asked. "He will be back in a few moments."

The old woman, who looked as though she had known better times, shook her head.

"It doesn't matter," she said. "He mightn't care to speak to me." Then she looked searchingly into Laura's face. "Are you any relation of his?" she asked.

"I am his wife," answered Laura, blushing rosily.

"What! He has married!" cried the old woman in a shocked and horrified voice. "It—it can't be," and her hand, in its cheap, cotton glove, closed like a vice on the bride's arm.

Laura drew back, a little offended, wondering if this oddly-acting old woman could be in her right mind. It was a relief to her to see her husband enter. She turned to meet him and was about to speak when she saw his eyes travel to the old woman behind her. His face was overspread instantly by a ghastly pallor, his eyes dilated with a strange mixture of pain and vacancy in their look, his arms fell to his sides, and a shiver ran through him from head to foot.

"I see you haven't forgot me, Doctor George," said the old woman, curtsying respectfully. "I hope you're well, sir. I've got a place to nurse a sick lady near here, Mrs. Maxwell of Cedar Lodge, and I'm waiting for the fly now. You're married, I hear, sir."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, I am married," rejoined Mr. Trevor mechanically. Then, with an evident effort, he turned to his wife. "Come, Laura," he said, and led the way to the carriage that waited for them.

Laura hardly waited to be seated before asking the question that fairly burnt on her tongue.

"Who was that strange old woman, George? You seemed so surprised to see her."

"She is a Mrs. Henland, and she nursed me once during a long illness," he answered. Then after a pause, he added: "I would rather not talk of her, my dear; she is connected with a very painful incident in my life."

"But why did she call you doctor?"

"I practised medicine once—many years ago," he replied in a stifled voice; and then he bade her look out and admire the little village through which they were passing.

But Laura could not feign an interest she did not feel. She obediently gave one glance from the carriage window, then clasped both hands round her husband's arm and nestled close to his shoulder.

"How little I really know about you, George, after all," she whispered. "You are almost a stranger to me. Some day you must tell me all about your past life, dear."

His only answer was a deep sigh.

Wincot House was about two miles from the village, and was surrounded by an old-fashioned brick wall, with a solid, projecting coping thickly covered with ivy. The wall inclosed grounds so thickly wooded that no glimpse of a house could be obtained from the road. But after passing a lodge, which was shut up and in a ruinous condition, the carriage entered a pretty winding drive under the trees to a large, rambling, old-fashioned house of red brick, with a red-tiled roof, gable windows, and a thick growth of ivy and wisteria over the rear portion of it.

"Oh, what a charming place!" cried Laura, as her husband assisted her to alight. "I know I will be perfectly happy here, George."

"Heaven grant it!" he said, in a hoarse, low voice, and led the way into the house.

As soon as her toilet had been made and breakfast disposed of, Laura made an inspection of her new home under the guidance of her husband. She was delighted with everything.

"All it needs to make it perfect is an air of being occupied," she said.

"No one except the caretaker has lived here since my mother died, eight years ago," said Trevor. "I came down once for a day or two, but found it too lonely."

"It shan't be lonely now. Everything will be entirely different," whispered Laura tenderly.

He looked down at her with a wan smile.

"Heaven grant it!" he said again.

The tour of the house finished, they went back to the morning room. Laura noticed as they entered that her husband glanced at the clock on the mantel. The hands pointed to twenty minutes of eleven.

"How time has flown!" she said. "I think I will leave you now to look over your papers, George, while I go upstairs and see to the unpacking of my boxes."

To her surprise, he seized her by the hand, an expression of fear and anxiety overspreading his face.

"No, no," he said in a voice which vibrated with a strange alarm; "remain with me half-an-hour longer, Laura. I will not ask you to stay—after that." His voice sank to a husky whisper over the last words, and she felt his hands tremble.

The bride made no attempt to break the silence.

A little puzzled by his manner, yet pleased by his reluctance to let her leave him, she laughingly seated herself beside him on the lounge, and began to talk animatedly about the little changes she intended to make in the arrangements of the rooms; but she could not but observe that her husband paid little attention to her; that he seemed nervous and excited, and that his eyes wandered again and again to the clock.

"My time is so nearly up," she said at length, as the clock chimed the hour of eleven, "that I think I must ask you——"

She stopped, startled and alarmed at the extraordinary change which had suddenly come over him. His eyes had fixed themselves intensely, almost fiercely, on the perfectly vacant wall to the right of the mantel; a livid paleness had overspread his face, his features altered, he sat still before her looking like a man in a death trance.

"George," she cried, "what is the matter? Let me ring; let me get you something."

Digitized by Google

She started up to rush from the room, but his voice, faint and hollow, detained her.

"Don't call anyone," he said slowly, speaking not to her, but in the direction in which his eyes were still fixed. "You can't help me; I—I hoped——"

He stopped; his face whitened horribly, and the perspiration broke out all over it. He tried to continue, said a word or two, then stopped again. Seriously alarmed, Laura again made a motion to leave the room, and again his voice detained her.

"It is I who must go," he said, staggering to his feet.

She started up to rush from the room.

"Laura forgive me! Heaven knows how I believed——" He stopped, threw up his hands with a gesture of pain, flung open the door, and rushed out like a madman.

The horrible suspicion that he might indeed be insane made Laura tremble from head to foot. Too weak to stand, she sank upon the lounge and buried her face in the cushions.

She had lain there for perhaps half-an-hour when she heard the sound of wheels on the road outside. Springing up, she rushed to the window in time to see a dogcart dash furiously from the door. The occupant was her husband.

Stupefied with surprise, she did not hear the door open, and started as the voice of her new maid broke the silence.

"Mr. Trevor bade me give you this note, madam," said the girl.

A note! That would explain all! Laura caught it from the tray with trembling fingers, and tore it open the moment she was again alone.

"My darling Laura," she read, "in marrying you I did you a great wrong. It was not intentional, for I had a wild hope that I might make you happy and that my own life might be blessed. I see now that this cannot be. The greatest kindness I can show you, I show you by leaving you for ever. You will believe this when you learn the history of my past life. The woman we met at the station this morning can tell you all you need to know. Farewell."

In half-an-hour Laura, on foot, was on her way to Cedar Lodge.

Following the directions given her by a labourer she met on the road she found it without difficulty, and was readily admitted into the presence of the woman she wished to see, who happened to be at luncheon.

Laura broke down when she told her errand, and perhaps it was the best thing she could have done, for it enlisted Mrs. Henland's sympathies at once, and removed all objections she might otherwise have made to telling the story the strangely deserted bride was so anxious to hear.

"When I first met your husband, nine years ago," began the nurse, "I was taking care of his cousin, young Philip Trevor, who had been thrown from a horse and injured about the head. He was soon out of danger, but it was discovered that his memory was strangely affected. He could not recollect any incident half-an-hour after its occurrence. There was a consultation of doctors, of course, and they decided that a piece of skull was pressing on the brain, and that the boy's case was hopeless unless this pressure could be removed. In fact, there was every reason to suppose that his mind would give way entirely. But the operation necessary would be attended with such danger that not one of the doctors cared to undertake it.

"After an interview with old Squire Trevor, who fairly idolised his son and heir, all three positively declined to have anything to do with it." The nurse paused a moment, and looked at Laura as if expecting her to speak. But as the girl remained silent, the old woman sighed and resumed her story.

"Doctor George Trevor had been practising about two years at that time, and, of course, took great interest in his cousin's case. He didn't agree with the three doctors. He insisted that though the operation would be a very delicate one it could be performed with entire safety. Every day he and his aunt—who was beside herself over her boy's condition—talked the matter over. She urged her husband to let their nephew perform the operation; but the old squire steadily declined. He had confidence in the doctors, and would run no risks.

"One day, however, he left home early in the morning to attend to some business in the country that would keep him all day. But he happened to meet at the station the very man he desired to see, and so gave up his trip and returned home. It was ten minutes after eleven when he reached his house in Berkeley Square. The man who opened the door for him blurted out at once the most terrible news. Philip was dead—had died ten minutes before under an operating knife. The man who had held the knife was his cousin, Doctor George, now heir to everything his uncle possessed.

"The first person the Squire saw after he heard the awful news was his wife. She told him that his nephew had taken advantage of my absence and his to perform the operation; that he had done so secretly, and without consulting or informing anyone; that his zeal in his profession and desire to win renown had led him——"

The nurse stopped. Laura has risen, and was regarding her with indignant eyes.

"I don't believe it," the girl said vehemently. "She said what was false. She was either a weak or a very wicked woman."

"My dear," said the nurse, "if it was a falsehood it was never contradicted. But, of course, the old Squire believed his wife. He rushed straight to the room where his dead son lay, and there branded his nephew as a murderer. He raged and stormed like a madman, accused Doctor George of scheming to enrich himself through the death of his cousin, and swore a terrible oath that he would suffer for what he had done. He had hardly uttered it when he fell to the floor like a stone. He had been seized with apoplexy, and the words of that oath were the last that ever left his lips. Before night he was a corpse."

Digitized by Google

A long, shuddering sigh escaped Laura's lips. "And —and George?" her pale lips whispered.

"Ah, my dear, the worst isn't told yet. Poor Doctor George in less than a week was down with brain fever. I nursed him, and he got well again—as well as he ever will be in this world, I suppose. There's no man so poor, so wretched, that he would want to exchange places with Doctor George. Do you understand? Can you put what I have told you with what happened this morning at eleven o'clock and know what it is that is killing him?"

"You mean——"

"I mean that every morning at eleven o'clock he sees the spirit of his uncle, or thinks he sees it. He gave up practising medicine, he has never touched the Trevor estate, but nothing appeases the spirit. Regularly every day, at the hour of the poor boy's death nine years ago, that phantom has appeared to the man you have married. There are people who say your husband's mind is affected. Perhaps, it is. He has tried travel, change of every sort, but it hasn't rid him of the phantom. The grief and pain of it all broke his mother's heart. She died eight years ago."

On her way to Cedar Lodge.

"And Philip's mother? What of her?"

"She's living twelve miles from here at Trevor House. I was told to-day that she's in the last stage of consumption."

"Thank God, she still lives. I shall lose no time in seeing her. I must hear what she has to say about my husband."

"She can't keep the spirit from appearing to Doctor George, my dear."

"Perhaps not; but she can do my husband justice before she dies. If what she told the old Squire that awful day was untrue, let her say so now before her lips are stiff in death."

"I fear you won't gain anything from her, my dear. She was a hard one always."

"Time may have softened her. But whether to lose or gain, by ten o'clock to-morrow morning I shall be at Trevor House."

And she was. But at the door an unexpected obstacle met her. The girl who answered her ring told her that no visitors were ever admitted, and that the house was kept as quiet as possible, for Mrs. Trevor was not expected to live the week out.

"All the more reason why I should see her at once," said Laura. "It is a matter of life and death."

The girl shook her head. "I'm sorry, but I can't admit you, miss. I would lose my place if I did."

Tears of desperation stood in Laura's eyes. She tried a last resort. She caught the girl's hand and pressed a sovereign into it.

"You need only tell me in which room I can find her —then go downstairs," she whispered. "And should you lose this place you can find another as good at Wincot House."

The girl hesitated, then said in a low voice: "She has the first room to the left at the head of the stairs," and walked quickly away without glancing behind her.

The next moment Laura was hurrying up the staircase, and with a wildly-beating heart she knocked at the door of the first room to the left.

"Come in," said a low, weary voice from within.

"Pray heaven she is alone," thought Laura, and opened the door.

The room was darkened by heavy brown shades at the windows; but the leaping firelight showed Laura a couch drawn up at the foot of the bed. Upon it lay a woman of, perhaps, forty-five years of age. The look of unutterable sadness about her mouth, the weary hopelessness marked on every feature, moved Laura strangely. A second glance showed more than weariness on her face—Death itself was there. The heavy grey hair rippled back in damp masses over her forehead of marble pallor; the large blue eyes glittered with feverish brilliancy, and on either cheek the scarlet flush glowed like a flame. She raised herself on one elbow as Laura drew near.

"Who are you?" she asked in a faint voice.

"I am George Trevor's wife," answered Laura, "and I have come to ask you to do him justice before you die."

A startling change came over the worn, white face. Laura shrank from the fixed stare of agony in the great glittering eyes.

"To do him justice! After all these years!" The words were almost a cry.

Hardly conscious in her excitement what she was doing, and fearing every instant that she would be interrupted by the entrance of some servant, Laura dropped on her knees by the couch and poured forth her pitiful story.

Digitized by Google

"Help him," she pleaded in conclusion. "Oh, if you only knew what he has suffered."

"Suffered!" repeated Mrs. Trevor, in a bitter tone. "His suffering has been nothing compared to mine. My sin has cost me dear."

She closed her eyes and lay back upon her pillows as if exhausted; but presently she moved, sighed faintly, and extended to Laura one frail, white hand.

"Find your husband," she said in a low, broken voice, "and tell him that in a little while the world shall know the truth. In a few hours my spirit will be able to commune with that of the one who haunts him now. Living, I cannot help him; dead, I can give him his release."

Her eyes closed. The hard despair settled again, wan and white, on her face. Without a word Laura bent low, gently kissed the pallid cheek, and then noiselessly left the room.

* * * *

In the little parlour of the solitary inn that Chad's End could boast sat a gentleman and lady, who had evidently just finished breakfast. The lady, who had arrived in the early morning train, and had not yet removed her hat, was speaking.

"And so, George," she said in a clear, flute-like voice, "I hunted up your lawyer in London, found out where you had hidden yourself, and—here I am. And here I intend to stay until I can take you back with me to Wincot House."

As she uttered the last words she folded her hands around his arm, and looked up at him with tender, humid eyes.

Her husband's arm went around her waist at once.

"My brave Laura," he said, as he tenderly kissed her brow, "you little know what you have undertaken. But you shall stay. As you have surmised, it was at my aunt's earnest request, and upon her assurance that my uncle had given his consent to the operation, and had left home in order to be out of the way during the ordeal, that I undertook it. Fury at me for my failure, grief for the loss of her only child, and dread of her husband's anger, led her to deny all knowledge of my intention to perform it. And afterwards, when she might have repented her falsehood and exonerated me from blame, it was too late. My uncle was dead; and he had died with that promise on his lips——"

"My release has come, thank God!"

He stopped and shuddered. She waited in silence until he had controlled himself.

"I never asked her to make a confession," he continued. "What good would it have done to me—I was a haunted man."

A knock at the door, and the landlord entered with a telegram. It was from Trevor's lawyer, and contained startling news: Mrs. Trevor had died that morning at three o'clock.

The telegram fell from George Trevor's hand; he seemed almost overcome with a strange excitement; his breath came in laboured gasps; his straining eyes riveted themselves on the face of the mantel clock, the hands of which pointed to five minutes to eleven.

Breathlessly Laura waited. Her eyes, too, were fastened on the clock. One minute, two, three, four—eleven strokes rang out in silvery music on the silent room.

A moment passed—a moment during which Laura's heart seemed to stop beating. Then her husband turned and looked at her, his heart in his eyes.

"My release has come, thank God!" he cried, and clasped her in his arms.

Percy Rowen.

Digitized by Google

LADY SHULDAM'S MEMOIRS.

When Henry Mainwaring arrived in England from South Africa and ascertained that his betrothed, Kate Tomley, had gone to Switzerland with her aunt, Lady Shuldam, for a month, before joining her sister, Lady Nugent, at Staples, he stayed in town just long enough to make arrangements for the investment of the pile he had made at Johannesburg, and then started for the Continent.

Three years before Lady Shuldam had come upon the young people in the conservatory and there had been a scene.

It all came back to Mainwaring now as the train tore on to Folkestone.

"Do you dare tell me, niece, that you have been mad enough to love a poor man? In these days a wife cannot have a husband too rich."

"However poor Harry is," was the simple reply, "I know I shall be happy!"

Her ladyship glared. The romantic fool must have been born on purpose to disgrace her.

"But have you realised what it is to be the wife of a poor man?" she cried. "To wear your dresses till they are threadbare and do all the washing at home. As Mr. Mainwaring tells me that he has no clients at present and that his available means consist of eight hundred pounds, you would, if you married him, have to do without a nursemaid"—there was not much delicacy about Lady Shuldam—"and wheel the shabby, pale-faced babies about in the rickety perambulator yourself till they got old enough to go to a Board School in patched clothes and worn-out boots. In three years," went on her ladyship with great unction, "you would be an old woman, for care is the great destroyer of beauty, not time, and good looks soon disappear with hard work and poor food"—her ladyship had never done a day's work in her life; still she was not considered, strictly speaking, beautiful—"and once they are gone, Mr. Mainwaring, judging by what I know of men, would seek attractions and pleasures anywhere but at home."

But this temperate and considerate speech had no effect on Kate; she simply replied: "I have promised to be his wife, Aunt, and I shall keep my word."

Then Lady Shuldam lost her temper, and, as her ladyship in her tantrums had always been remarkable for the tropical fervour of her language, the strife waxed warm.

At length peace was declared on the following terms: Henry was to go abroad to seek his fortune, to acquire which three years was allowed. During this time he was not to write to the young lady, but he might if he chose communicate with her ladyship at intervals, informing her how he was getting on. If at the end of three years he was not the owner of twenty thousand pounds, or thereabouts, Kate, to use her aunt's words, was at liberty to marry the first rich man who proposed, and as she would then be twenty-one she should advise her to take the first.

So the lovers, after an affecting farewell, parted, and next day Mainwaring started for South Africa with his friend Thorpe, who was as eager to find a short cut to wealth as himself.

Lady Shuldam was the widow of a city knight. As we have indicated, she was a shrewd, hard woman of the world, but she had a weakness, a weakness which, in her old age, developed into a positive craze. In early life her friends were principally to be found among the city magnates residing about Clapham, but when the title came the Shuldams immediately migrated to Kensington.

Her ladyship did not, however, entirely desert her old friends. The Dobsons, for instance, who occupied a large house facing the common, had no cause to complain of her ladyship's treatment. True, she did not much care about the Dobsons at Kensington, but, on the other hand, she was affability itself to the Dobsons at Clapham. On these occasions her conversation mostly bore on the social successes she had achieved with other titled people at the West-end.

According to Lady Shuldam, the élite of society, and even Royalty itself, was not averse to spending an hour or two in the Shuldam mansion.

The Dobsons listened to the recital of these triumphs with hearts bursting with mingled malice and disbelief.

Carried away by her theme, Lady Shuldam would sometimes relate the same story twice over, and, if the two versions differed, which was frequently the case, the Dobsons would, in a pleasantly facetious manner, point out the discrepancies and look at one another. Lady Shuldam was, however, equal to the occasion. If her memory was defective, her craft was great.

On the next visit to the Dobsons she produced a diary which was found to contain a vast amount of most amusing and instructive information concerning the sayings and doings of eminent people known to her ladyship.

Digitized by Google

The Dobsons learnt on the unimpeachable authority of the diary that:

"The Duchess of Teck had informed Lady Shuldam on Wednesday, the 16th of July, that her mother during her lifetime had always been extremely partial to liver and bacon.

"That the Queen made a point of never discarding her boots till they had been soled and heeled twice.

"That Mr. Gladstone was rather fond of custard puddings, and that Lord Salisbury drank eight quarts of hot water a day to keep down his growing stoutness, and that when Lady Shuldam recommended to his lordship that the hot water should be flavoured with the juice of lemon, to take off the flatness, his lordship had instantly adopted her advice and called specially to thank her for the suggestion."

Now, the compilation of imaginary conversations with eminent people is very much like building castles in the air, the result depends, wholly and solely, on the vividness of the imagination. Lady Shuldam's imagination was a fine one, and as the years rolled on the diaries multiplied apace, and nothing gave her greater pleasure than in looking over these records of her industry and inventiveness.

True, the lapse of time rendered it a little difficult for her to know what was true and what was not, but matters were greatly simplified when her ladyship pronounced them to be all true.

One day an idea flashed into her mind. Why should they not be published? Other people who had moved in society had published their memoirs with the most gratifying results. They had dealt principally with people who were dead and gone, and who consequently were not in a position to contradict anything they might not have liked.

Her ladyship's memoirs should be on the same lines, as most certainly they would not be dull. Why should they not create a furore?

No great amount of literary ability was required.

An inquisitive world simply wanted to know whether the late Duke of Wellington really did say at Waterloo, "Up Guards and at them," or if it was true that Bismarck drank three quarts of lager beer a day, and that Lord Palmerston was never allowed a latch-key, and Lady Shuldam was quite prepared to gratify these wishes.

The memoirs should be in three volumes and should be entitled, "Lady Shuldam's Memoirs." The work had been commenced some months when she met Henry Mainwaring at the house of her eldest niece, Lady Nugent.

Mainwaring was, as we have said, poor, and poverty tames one mightily. So when her ladyship, who found the labour of filling three volumes trying—being at that time nearly sixty years of age—discovered that the young man understood shorthand, she proposed that he should help her, Mainwaring made a very wry face, but consented.

He didn't like the work. He never dreamt that a knowledge of shorthand could be put to such base uses, but he was deeply in love with Kate and ready to swallow anything—even the memoirs—to secure her aunt's favour.

That, as we have seen, was given conditional on his returning with twenty thousand pounds, or thereabouts.

His friend Thorpe, who had been through the School of Mines in South Kensington, was confident they would find gold in South Africa, and thither they went. Thorpe was right, and as they were the first in the field the money poured in fast. Mainwaring, as arranged, wrote at intervals to Lady Shuldam in most hopeful terms, and although he didn't return in three years—it being nearly four—he offered—if her ladyship liked—to remit to England at once seventeen thousand pounds of the stipulated sum.

As no reply was made to this offer, he concluded that no objection would be made to his staying a little longer, which was necessary, in order that his interests in several mines should not be disposed of at a loss. Lady Shuldam and her niece did not to travel to Switzerland alone. They were accompanied by Viscount Pilkington, who had met Kate at her sister's, and fallen desperately in love.

His lordship knew something about her having been engaged to Henry Mainwaring—Kate had frankly told him that she had given her heart to a gentleman from whom she had not heard for over three years—and his lordship had gone to her aunt for particulars.

Her ladyship assumed her blandest manner: "A foolish, wayward creature, my lord. She was a mere child when she engaged herself to a man, well born I will admit, but of whose character and prospects we knew next to nothing. The man went to South Africa, and, of course, forgot all about her."

But his lordship did not look pleased. Her second lover. It sounded like a warmed-up dinner. Lady Shuldam began to feel alarmed.

She was exceedingly anxious that Kate should make a rich marriage. Her losses on the Stock Exchange had of late been exceedingly heavy, and she had serious thoughts of relinquishing her house.

"Your niece tells me that she was deeply attached to Mr. Mainwaring," said the Viscount moodily.

"I believe she wrote several poems having reference to despair, and became familiar with the idea of suicide, and then like a sensible girl forgot all about him. A brief infatuation which wore itself out like all other infatuations."

But his lordship was not convinced.

"She refused me yesterday," he said.

"Of course," replied Lady Shuldam with great animation. "Why, you foolish man, how little you know our sex. Now, if you'll promise to be good, I'll tell you a secret. A woman always refuses a man when he first proposes, that is if she is sure he will propose again."

"Why?" asked the astonished nobleman.

"Because they think it enhances their value. Now I've told you everything. Speak to the sweet girl again, and I'll be bound you will have nothing to complain of."

But her ladyship had not told him everything. She had said nothing about her objection in the first instance to the engagement with Mainwaring.

Lady Shuldam had a rooted disbelief in South Africa; in fact, she had no idea where the place was. If a man could not make a fortune in his own country, which she had always understood to be the richest in the world, she did not believe he could make it out.

Even the hopeful strain in which the absent one's letters were written did not convince her. So she thought the best thing to do would be to burn them, and then declare he had not written at all.

She will fret a little at first, her ladyship had mused, but with plenty of society and pleasure she will soon forget him.

Twenty thousand in three years, why, poor dear Shuldam, who always insured his unseaworthy vessels for three times the value of the cargo, couldn't make that, and as for his having already made seventeen thousand pounds, rubbish! Directly the Viscount had promised to propose again Lady Shuldam hurried to her niece to plead the Viscount's cause. It was not an easy task.

Digitized by Google

His lordship was not clever. But then, lords, in her opinion, were not expected to be clever. Neither was he entertaining, except when the conversation turned upon dogs. But if she could not find much to say of the man, she found ample scope in his belongings. She dwelt rapturously on his stables, recently built with all the most modern improvements. His three country seats, his yacht, and his town house. His large circle of acquaintance, composed of the most exclusive people, and his snug income of thirty thousand a year, drawn principally from ground rents, not land. A girl, went on her ladyship, who would refuse a man whose income of thirty thousand a year was derived from ground rents, and not land, would hesitate at no crime, however terrible.

She gave the girl no peace. She intreated, she implored, till poor Kate, thoroughly wearied out, gave in.

Then his lordship proposed, and was accepted. So great was the joy of her ladyship, that she promised the Viscount to devote a whole page to him in her memoirs, which were now approaching completion.

When Mainwaring arrived at the hotel where they were staying, great was his consternation when he found how matters stood.

He instantly sought Lady Shuldam, who solemnly declared she had never received a single letter, and called Kate to witness that she had never once spoken about breaking the engagement till the three years had expired. When he was told that Lord Pilkington had gone to Rome, where his mother was staying, to ascertain if she would like Kate to visit her, he was in despair.

Kate was equally despondent. She had found that her love after all was not dead. She had thought that the flame which once burnt so brightly was now ashes, but she discovered, to her horror, that it was still smouldering.

She frantically tried to pump cold water on it from a moral fire engine, but the embers obstinately refused to be extinguished.

She shut herself up in the sitting-room at the hotel, but Harry was always coming in on some pretext or other to see her aunt. She tried to keep him at bay by talking enthusiastically of his lordship, but found the task too trying, as she also did when she sought refuge in a freezingly cold and distant demeanour.

"If some good fairy," she thought, "would only change the two men and turn his lordship into Harry, how happy I should be."

On the evening the Viscount was expected to return, they met in a secluded walk a mile from the hotel quite by accident. Kate cried very much, but otherwise behaved exceedingly well. "Good-bye," she said, "I am going to be a rich lord's wife, Mr. Mainwaring—silver and gold, houses and lands; there are better things than these, but they were not for us—good-bye," and then she threw herself into his arms and cried: "Save me, dear, save me; think—think—there must be some way," and Harry had walked back to the hotel and straight into Lady Shuldam's room to see if nothing could be done.

Her ladyship had dined and was now having a nap on the sofa. So the young man seated himself, determined to wait till the lady awoke.

Not knowing how to pass the time, he opened the memoirs, which happened to be at his elbow, and turned over the pages. He was smiling to himself and thinking what a sensation they would make when published, when he came to an entry which caused his heart to stand still.

"21ST.—Received another letter from that infatuated young man in South Africa.

"22ND.—Kate asked me after breakfast if her lover had written. I have my faults, which of us have not, but my regard for the truth has always been more than a superstition, it has been my religion. Should I say: 'Yes, Kate, I have received a letter,' and thereby shatter the sweet girl's future? Summoning all my courage, I looked up from the book I was reading and said: 'No, I have had no letter.'

"23RD.—The recollection of the falsehood I told Kate yesterday still weighs heavily on me. I had little or no sleep during the night. I have burnt Mr. Mainwaring's letter."

Henry drew a deep breath and swore, but Lady Shuldam still slumbered.

The champion liar had eaten heavily at dinner. She always did when the tariff of the hotel she was stopping at was more than a pound a day.

At the hotel Verma it was thirty shillings, and her ladyship had partaken of every course.

"Virtue is not its own reward," murmured Harry, "but impudence is. Every man has a hand in the shaping of his destiny, and I mean to have a finger in moulding mine." He then placed the memoirs in his pocket, and stole softly from the room. On the staircase he met the Viscount, to whom he introduced himself and demanded an explanation.

Before the Viscount knew what he was doing Harry had him in the hotel grounds and was endeavouring to show him that his engagement with Miss Tounley was the result of a misunderstanding But the Viscount, like most dull men, was exceedingly obstinate. He had made up his mind to marry Kate, and he should keep his word.

"But if I can prove that an alliance with her family would bring your name into discredit."

His lordship got anxious, seeing which Harry immediately produced the memoirs.

"I have here, my lord," he said, "a manuscript work of great interest. I have read the work. Lady Shuldam's intimacy with the illustrious dead fills me with envy and wonder. Listen, my lord, to this:

"'My stay at the Court of Napoleon was a short one. The Empress, not without cause, was madly jealous.'"

The Viscount looked puzzled.

"'The late Lord Palmerston was the romantic fancy of my girlhood. I rejected him because he would insist on eating tripe and onions before he went to bed.'"

"Deuced funny!" murmured the Viscount.

"'The late Lord Beaconsfield was very lucky at double dummy. He won ten thousand of me before I discovered that he cheated.'"

"She'll never publish that," cried his lordship, his face betraying alarming signs of agitation.

"She will," replied Harry. "How do you like this?"

"'During a long reign of fifty years the Queen has always had rump steak and kidney pie for dinner on Tuesdays

Digitized by Google

"'The liquid from which Mr. Gladstone derives such sustenance during his speeches is prepared from a receipt I presented him with.

"'I was always a great judge of character. Many years ago I was in Wales with my late husband. One day I saw a poor butcher boy in the street of a town, the name of which I forget, crying. I stopped the carriage and spoke to the lad. He told me his name was John Rowlands. I was much struck with his appearance, and remarked to my husband that evening: "Mark my words, that boy will be one day a great man; he has patience, courage and resource. He will develop into a great traveller and explorer." That boy, John Rowlands, is now known as Henry Stanley.'"

At this moment Mainwaring saw her ladyship approaching. She had missed the memoirs. Thrusting them into the Viscount's hands he retreated behind some fuschia bushes and waited.

"I have been reading your memoirs, Lady Shuldam," stammered the gentleman, "they are most extraordinary."

"Oh, my lord," replied her ladyship, much relieved, "a compliment from you is something to treasure."

"I don't mean that," blurted the Viscount getting very red in the face. "A lot of untruths—untruths. Do you mean to say you intend to publish this—this stuff?"

"Most certainly."

"Then I must ask you to release me from my engagement. I should be the laughing-stock of the country."

Her ladyship was now crimson with indignation.

"We release you most willingly; my memoirs are paramount to every consideration."

She then recovered possession of her MS., and sailed grandly away.

"How did he get hold of the memoirs?" she thought.

She was not destined to learn this, neither was she fortunate enough to discover the thief who robbed her of them.

The day before Mainwaring's marriage Kate had her suspicions, and one day was heard to say to her husband: "Now, Henry, dear, tell me the truth; wasn't it you who stole auntie's memoirs?" and Harry had whispered something in the soft ripples of his wife's hair which caused her to exclaim:

"You don't mean to say the memoirs were in that bag which fell overboard while we were crossing the channel. Oh! Harry, whoever would have thought you were so artful. Everybody thought it an accident. You looked so unconcerned."

"Of course, I did," replied her husband, "your aunt was present."

Kate thought it very deceitful, but she never told Lady Shuldam, who still laments their loss.

ARTHUR GOODRICH.

FANCHETTE.

A SLIP of a girl with slim shoulders, childish form, and shy, rosy face, half avoiding, half inviting the gaze—this was Fanchette.

Fanchette Hugot they called her in the village, where old Mother Hugot was well known. But Fanchette shook her head. She was no kith and kin of Madame Hugot, that she knew, and Jacques knew it also, Jacques with his bonny brown head, and bright, bold face, and gay attire, which marked him of the better class. Jacques who loved her better than she loved the turkeys which she tended, and swore that every dark hair of her head under her red turban was precious to him.

Jacques' father called her the little turkey tender, and threw her a coin from his carriage as he passed. But Fanchette treasured the coins, and made herself more beautiful in her lover's eyes with her finery; ribbons that matched the blue of her eyes, and roses that rivalled the carmine of her dewy lips.

When Jacques took her in his arms and told her that he loved her, and let the light of his beautiful eyes shine into hers, she forgot the whole world just for that one moment. She forgot to wonder that God should let his creatures suffer so, that He should distribute blessings so unequally; she forgot that old Mother Hugot was a hard mistress, and forgave her the bruises on her poor body, and the unkind words she used towards her. She mounted into heaven when Jacques put his arms about her, and she could lean her head for a moment on his broad shoulders.

But these opportunities were seldom granted her for sinking her soul in Lethe; there were the cows to milk, and the pigs to feed, and the turkeys to tend, and when she could finally slip away to her lover whistling impatiently round the corner of the lane, she had but a few moments to spare to him from her mistress, who was impatient the instant the girl was out of her sight.

They used to watch the moon come up sometimes, round and fiery and glowing, in the soft, warm sky; and Jacques would claim a kiss for every star that appeared in the heavens as they watched. Ah, Fanchette loved the stars! One shone into her little casement at night, and she always thought of Jacques when she saw it, and his kisses seemed to her again laid on her lips as she fell asleep with her eyes fixed on the distant light.

Fanchette was very faithful to Mother Hugot, who grumbled at having to keep her, and called her shiftless and a good-for-nothing. But Fanchette knew from the tiny gold locket round her neck and from the embroidery on a bit of a gown Mother Hugot had shown her, that she was Jacques' equal, at least; and she always looked for a deliverer to come to her in some guise or other. Every morning when she arose she would say: "Perhaps, to-day my deliverer will come," and every night when she went to bed she prayed: "God, I thank thee that I am yet alive, for I know Thou wilt send me a great blessing to-morrow."

So when the fairy god-mother finally did arrive, Fanchette was the least surprised of any of the village.

When Jacques met her that evening in the lane, he laid his head down against her to hide his face, out of which the gay light had faded.

"You are going away," he cried, "to be a great lady. You have a title; you will live in a palace. I, poor Jacques, what shall I do? I think death would not be difficult."

"I shall come back, Jacques, in a year—they have promised me that—and then we can be married if you are waiting for me still. Parting is but a test for true love. Don't give your kisses or your love-words to other girls to make the time speed faster, my own Jacques. If I feel that you are all my own, in deed as in thought, there will be no sting in the sadness of our parting."

Digitized by Google

Jacques lifted up his head. The moon came up lightly over the lime trees, and shone upon his boyish face.

"I promise," he said, solemnly lifting his hand on high; and then he drew her dark head against his shoulder, and pressed her lips with his own.

"In a year from to-night I will meet you here. Oh, Fanchette, my love, my own, you will not fail me?"

"Never, Jacques, if I come in rags, I will keep my word. If I come a beggar, still I will meet you here."

"Remember our star, Fanchette. Every night I will look for it, and when you see its rays you will know your Jacques is dreaming of you and praying for your return."

When the sun chased the shadows from the earth the next morning, Fanchette was many miles away.

She went to a palatial home. She gowned herself in satins, and saw herself bedecked with jewels; she grew more fair than a poet's dream, and she danced with nobles, and was attended by aristocratic dames.

She was still Fanchette, and at night she looked at the stars she loved, and murmured the prayer of her childhood's days. Every heart-beat was for Jacques, every tear for Jacques, every smile for Jacques. She knew not if he were dead or living. When she was of age, at the end of the year, then she would know.

Her beauty expanded. Her eyes were deeper, her form rounder, her skin firmer, with a glow like polished marble. She carried her head with a saucy tilt, her lips melted into smiles, her cheeks dimpled. They called her Fanchette the lovable.

When eleven months had passed she put her arms about her newly-found father. She told him of her promise. She murmured Jacques' name with an intonation like a ring-dove in her voice: and a frown corrugated the old man's handsome brow. He flung her aside.

"Ingrate!" he cried stormily.

Fanchette kissed him sadly and crept away. Just at that moment she longed for the star-lighted lane, the coins that Father Badeau threw to the poor turkey driver, and the scoldings of Mother Hugot, with a heart-sickness that terrified her.

She never mentioned Jacques' name again. She stole from her room one night at the hour of twelve. She paused beyond in the corridor, and gave one glance behind her at the luxury-wrapped nest she had quitted. She saw gilded panels, shining mirrors reflecting, painted ceilings hung in roses, with a frieze of Cupid's soft, rich carpets, and lace-hung bed, where dreams of Jacques had circled round her drowsy head.

She saw her tiny satin shoes, subtly suggestive of indolence, and with a touch of her personality seeming to cling about them still as they lay discarded on the white fur rug before the fire. Her glance wandered to an open chest of antique wood close at hand, heaped up with the choicest treasures of the milliner's art. Here a fan coquetted with an opera-cloak, there a dainty ball-gown spread its filmsy flounces over a Parisian bonnet laden with purple violets.

She dropped a tear, she burst into a sob. Her woman's heart cried out after all this luxury. Her better nature whispered Jacques' name into her ear. The tear became as a rainbow, touched by her smile. She turned, and fled, crying:

"The world is well lost for love, my Jacques! I come, I come!"

In the old familiar trysting place at last, waiting for her lover, she echoed those words. She crouched down and kissed the turf, and the star-eyed marguerites, and laughed to herself softly and gleefully.

She heard his step at last. She rose with a new shyness born of her fresh beauty and her solemn joy.

"Jacques!"

"What, Fanchette! You! What! Fanchette in the rags of the turkey girl?" he stammerd.

"Oh, yes, Jacques, yes! The turkey girl, Fanchette, whom you love. Not the lady Fanchette ever again! I am yours, Jacques, yours!"

He dropped his hat from his hands; his rugged face paled, and his lips quivered.

She thought his joy unmanned him. He put both hands over his face and stood so, abashed before her dewy eyes. She brushed his hands with her red lips, and whispered to him:

"Look up, my Jacques. Surely you will speak to your own Fanchette? Oh, fie, friend Jacques, tears for joy, forsooth! Methinks that is worthy a woman. What? Will you not look at me? They say that I am greatly changed—a beauty, Jacques, your little Fanchette! Are you not glad?"

She was sobbing and laughing and clinging to him; the moon showed her dimples and her soft, quivering lips, and her new great beauty to him in a maddening way. Her hair fell around him, her warm arms were laid upon his shoulders, she was leaning against him, delicious in her womanly gladness. But he did not touch her after the first involuntary caress. He dropped upon one knee at her feet, and laid his face against her hand.

Their star on high looked down upon them benignly.

"Look, Jacques, look—our star! Do not kneel to me, my own Jacques, do not, I pray! See, it is smiling at us, it is happy, too. The year is past, is past, Jacques, let us thank the good God together. But first will you not kiss me? Am I to sue for it then? Dear friend, do not give way thus. I am here close beside you, Jacques; I will never leave you now, love, unless you bid me go."

"I bid you go."

The voice was hoarse, agonised with deathly anguish in its modulations.

"Jacques!"

"I am married."

He caught her, held her to him as her eyes closed, and cursed himself.

"Fanchette, Fanchette, look up and listen! Oh, heavens, I hate myself! I married Rosamond Cartier six months ago. I—I thought you would not come back. Father influenced me——"

"Don't!" Fanchette said.

She seemed more beautiful than ever when she stood up again. But Jacques could not bear to look at her.

She slipped away from him over the grass towards Mother Hugot's house.

"Come to our house, Fanchette," he pleaded.

But she shook her head, lifted the latch and went in.

She is the turkey tender once again. She sees Jacques' wife roll by in her carriage. She is humble and patient; but she prays the old prayer no more.

All that remains of the past are the stars, and on calm nights, when she looks out of her window, she still fancies, as she weeps herself into troubled dreamland, that Jacques is once again claiming a kiss for every star in the crowded heavens.

P. Gowler.

Digitized by Google

The Last King of Atlantis

OR,

The Romance of a Lost Continent.

By Geo. C. Wallis, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

SUMMARY.

Arnon's memory of his early days begins at a time when he finds himself abandoned on the seashore, whence he discovers the cave of a band of pirates, by whom he is captured. Under the care of Didron the Chief he grows up as one of them, and on the death of the former he takes command. Viol is the daughter of Didron and marries Arnon, who, on one of his voyages, lands at Miropis and consults the Priest of the Spirit of Truth, from whom he learns that within a year and a half he will be a captive in a foreign land, and that he need not fear death until he has visited the Grotto of the Sleeper three times. On returning, he finds his ship burnt and men killed. After fighting he escapes, and meets and falls in love with Briseis, daughter of King Dulo X. of Atlantis, and to her he reveals his identity. Vichri, Briseis' cousin, believes Arnon to be dead.

CHAPTER V.

BETRAYAL.

Five months thus gaily passed in the whirl of court life before I mustered courage to make an end of it. But the pirate spirit was still strong in me, and I began to long for the swell of the boundless sea.

So one balmy night when the evening breezes seemed to whisper rest and sweet content, I led Briseis to a deep, umbrageous grove, where the silver shafts of moonlight found few weaknesses in the armour of the trees through which to glint, unwelcomed, on a lovers' meeting. It had been a great feast day, and the house and gardens had been thronged with guests of their fair owner, many of whom—rich, young nobles, moneyless adventurers, and even miserly old men, dissolute all—were suitors, eager, pressing for the favour of her hand. These I had scowled upon right scornfully, provoking many a taunt at my sour visage from the polished wits, whose shafts, however, I had learned to answer with consummate cunning; but now all were gone, and alone we strolled to the leafy retreat, and alone sat there together, each waiting for the other to break the mystic spell of its dim and silent solitude.

"Know you why I brought you here, Briseis?" I ventured at length, when in the darkness her arm clung nervously around my own, which burned beneath the touch.

"Nay, I know not, my Arnon," said she, "but whatsoever it may be, I am here to listen."

"I came to tell you that I purpose bidding you adieu for a time whilst I go to seek for the treasure stored in the pirates' cave."

Briseis started and gave a little cry, a strange thing for her to do, who, for all her youth and beauty, was so very grave and dignified in all her acts, and then asked, in tones wherein anxiety and curiosity were quaintly intermixed:

"Have you not all you want, my Iron-fingers? And am I a cruel mistress, that you would leave my service so scurvily?"

Now my heart sank again, for I thought she surely liked me only as a trusty servant, whose prowess only reflected the greater glory on herself as the fortunate possessor of such a serf, and I answered somewhat bitterly:

"I have all I want, my mistress, but my liberty, and even your gentleness cannot replace me that. Give me liberty, let me find the wealth, and then I stand your equal."

Her arm here disengaged itself from mine, and she drew herself a little way from me on the rustic seat to where a stray moonbeam fell upon her marble brow and the clustering curls of her jet-black hair.

"Ungrateful!" she cried reproachfully. "When I have healed your wounds, screened you from certain death, given you the best that my wealth can procure—even pardoned you the cutting off my cousin's ear, though he is my nearest of kin; when I have done all this you ask for liberty; you want to shake me off as one who has been of use, but is no longer desired! Men call you iron-fingered; methinks you must be iron-hearted, too. I thought you were a true man, but you have broken that trust, and I am minded to betray you to the king for your cruel, careless callousness. But, no! I have befriended you and been deceived, but you can go secure and free, only see to it that you cross not my threshold any more." And the speaker rose to her feet, holding out her arm in picturesque command, her eyes blazing with passion.

Digitized by Google

I was not the least dumfoundered or dismayed by this fiery outburst, but pleased, for I thought that no mistress would be so distressed for the loss of a mere bond-slave, and, therefore, seizing her dainty hand again and holding it fast, in spite of her little struggles, I asked:

"Would you call me ungrateful, Briseis, if I told you wherefore I wanted my liberty?"

I felt that dear hand tremble for a moment like a frightened bird fluttering in the fowler's net before she answered, speaking softly now:

"I do not know, my Arnon; tell me, I pray."

"Because," I said, my boldness coming back with the confidence her words inspired, "because, Briseis, I would be free that I might be rich; rich, that I might be your equal; your equal, that I might become your life-long slave, bound fast by the flawless fetters of love. Nay, I am bound by them already; but I would fain they were the only ties, for I think they will bear the strain."

"Ungrateful!" she cried reproachfully.

Then, it seemed almost instantly, I felt a pair of soft, warm arms wound lovingly about my neck, a throbbing frame clung closely to my side, a velvet cheek was pressed upon my rough, scarred face, a fringe of softest hair brushed across my forehead with magnetic thrill, and twin sweet lips touched mine in a soul-given kiss that made the nerves to tingle with delirious delight, and the flood of life to course through every vein and every artery like molten fire. I clasped my Briseis in my strong, bare arms then and held her fast.

"My love," she murmured, after a sweet silence, "didst not see that I loved thee before—loved thee from that day when first I saw thee, all blackened by the cruel fire, sleeping soundly in my garden?"

"Nay, dear one," I replied contritely, "I saw it not, deeming that you valued me only as a bond-servant."

"Then, sir, you were blind indeed, for all your cleverness! But now I see why you want your freedom. Well, shalt have it, for I may not marry you unless you be my equal, being of Royal blood. Go, then, and bring your treasure, and Briseis will await you as a bride."

I said, and truly, how vastly I should grudge the time of absence, and asked from whence I should obtain a vessel and a crew to aid me in my search. These Briseis promised me with pleasure, and presently, the night having sped apace, we rose and went back to the house, the frogs that harbour in the grass croaking dismally as we walked, though for all else the night had that oppressive stillness which at any other time had made me sad and restless, but which now, as through the paths we knew so well, my love and I went side by side with new found joy in every thought, was full of soothing symphonies.

So I sought me out a crew as soon as I could tear myself from the house of Briseis, and my sweetheart bought me a trusty ship and gave me sufficiency of coin to pay my men and stock the vessel, and got me a signetted safeguard against his warships from old Dulo himself.

Soon it was noised abroad that I went to seek for secret treasure, and when the object of my quest was known, Phrena, the Iron-fingered, had little trouble to get him a band of sturdy, reckless fellows, ready to face anything or journey anywhere they might be led. In about a month I had all ready, and after bidding good-bye to Briseis, I set sail with a favouring breeze and a light heart, confident of the future, and well pleased that once more I could put hand to the helm.

That parting in the grove, where her arms had encircled my neck, was in strange contrast to that last parting from little Viol, whom the king's soldiers had slain along with her babe and all friends; for then my love had never thought to see my face again, and I had laughed at her fears only to find them true, but this time nor Briseis nor I feared or thought aught different than that we separated for a little time that we might unite in closer ties thereafter.

Digitized by Google

"May the gods speed you, and the wind blow steady till you return," said the maid, a tear trembling on her eyelid's verge for all her smiles.

"Trust them," I said, "for I fear not death, if the priest spoke truly. Keep heart, sweet one, and I shall be back in a very short season."

Ah! little thought I then what Fate had in store for me; little did we dream how long that short season of absence would be! How long you shall know if you read on.

A storm fell upon us.

Out into the ocean we sailed for many days, but either the treasure cave was further off than I had deemed, or my memory played me false, for sail and search as we would, day by day and night by night, I never caught glimpse of that strip of sand backed by its frowning cliffs and bounded by its sullen, rugged headlands. The sky kept clear, and the sun bright, and the sea calm, as is its wont to be under a trade-wind blowing without a storm, but, voyage as we might, I never had view of that precious shore.

I grew moody and irritable, finding fault with the men when there was no need, clapping on sail when the gale blew strongest, running before the wind with recklessness many a time and oft—which same folly, I verily believe, lost me the right direction—making the slaves row when the sails would have sufficed, and being as miserable a man as hopeless love could make me, disliked and feared by the crew, and hated by the wretched rowers as only those chained-down beings can hate.

Once I got on the right track, as I thought, and for two days ran with all press of sail and every oar going to a measured stroke, and my heart grew light again, and I laughed and joked and sang with the merry crew as though I had ever been a prince of good fellows, and the men, themselves all feverish for sight of the promised gold in which all were to have a goodly share, drank my health in boisterous jollity, some even asking me if I would lead them a-pirating in the ship when the hoard was found.

I tore the scented missive into a hundred tattered shreds.

But on the second day, like a thunder-blast, a storm fell upon us such as I had never seen before, and drove our craft through the flying clouds of spray like a cockleshell.

Five days we laboured in the stress of the tempest, now nearing the breakers on a rock-bound coast, and sheering off again by the merest touch, now battling with the giant waves which rolled in countless numbers over our drenched and beaten vessel, and anon just escaping the destruction lurking in a sunken reef; and through it all, with every mast overboard and leaking at a dozen places, the ship lived on, keeping straight before the wind, not losing a man of all her crew. And when that cursed storm went down, the first clear view of land that we obtained was of the verdant shores of Atlantis, not a dozen leagues from the town of Miropis!

Half beside myself with rage, all the more acute after the hope raised, I was minded to put back to sea all dilapidated as we were, but on second thoughts deemed it wiser to run into the harbour of the town and there repair our damages. Thither, then, seizing the helm, I pointed our prow, and soon came in sight of the low, wooded shore and the white roofs of the town, plainly outlined underneath the rays of the late afternoon sun.

As our vessel sailed slowly in, two warships lying at anchor slipped cables and stood out to meet us, for what reason I could not guess, but to which, feeling secure with the king's safe conduct in my keeping, I paid no heed till they drew alongside and hailed us. A man on the quarter-deck, armed from top to toe and backed by a large number of soldiers, was the first to speak as our disabled and rakish-looking craft rubbed sides with his own.

I began to fear, then, that something strange was in the wind, especially when I saw the man in command, for I knew him as one of the cleverest swordsmen in the capital, whom I had defeated in a trial of skill with his favourite weapon, so hailed back:

"What mean'st this, Sothi, son of Ombos?"

"A message from the King," he answered, waiting till the other vessel hove alongside before he added, "and one that I must deliver to you in person on the deck of your own vessel, Arnou, the son of Didron, known to most as Phrena, the Iron-fingered!"

And Sothi laughed softly to himself as one who sees his enemy in a trap.

"Call me what you will," I retorted hotly, "but out with your fool's message and be about your business, so that I may not be troubled further."

Then, the sailors having laid the gangway plank across from ship to ship, Sothi and a score of his soldiers came on board, and he put into my hand, with a mocking smile, the King's message. I took it with an ill grace, and this is what I read:

Digitized by Google

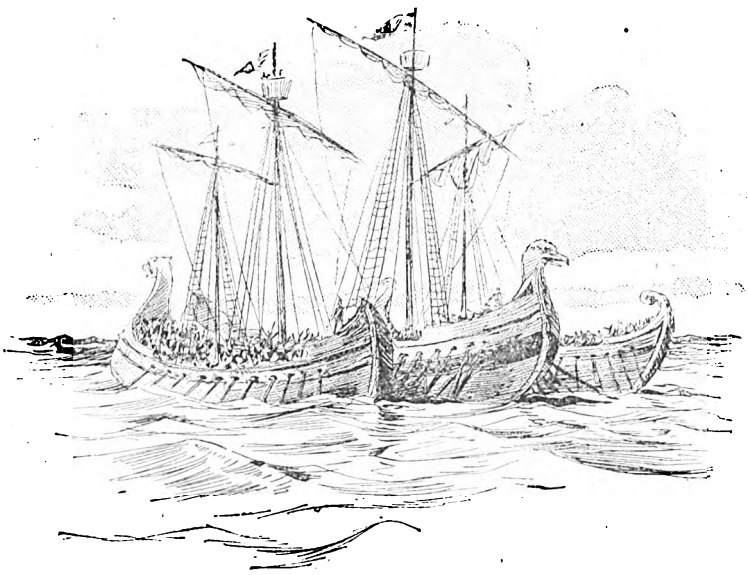
"To Sothi, son of Ombos, the Captain of our Guard, is given the duty of obeying these our commands: That when Arnon, the son of Didron the Pirate, who hath named himself as Phrena, and been named by men the Iron-fingered, shall return to Atlantis with his treasure, it shall be given up by him to the Royal Treasury without complaint, and that he, Arnon, shall be stripped of all his favours and dealt with as my servant Sothi shall think well, except that he may not slay him.

"Given with our Royal Signet, in the Temple of Life and in the presence of the Priest of Life,

"DULO X."

Once, twice, I read this piece of royal bluster, then tore the scented missive into a hundred tattered shreds and threw them overboard.

"That is my answer to the King's decree," I said to Sothi, who stared with surprise. "Go, tell those who sent you not to send you again without the King himself and his army at his back. But first tell me how you came to know my name?"



An evil smile, so evil that my heart felt cold as I saw it, came over Sothi's face as he answered—that accursed answer which filled my sober, thoughtful hours with bitterness for near a score of years from thence:

"There is one only in Kronos who knows you rightly, save I and the King, and she thought she loved you. Her thoughts have changed. Need I speak thee further?"

In that awful moment I first knew the dreadful pang of jealousy, and it seemed to rend my very soul into a thousand aching, quivering threads of agony. Briseis, whom I had loved so dearly and parted from so hardly; Briseis, who alone had healed the wound of my grief for the loss of Viol; Briseis, who was the only star that beamed in my cloudy sky; Briseis to have betrayed me thus!

I thought my blood had turned to fire and that my reason tottered to its fall, but with a great effort, gathering my swimming senses, it came over me that if love was gone and false love was arrayed against me, vengeance and a warlike death remained. So, with sword flashing, I leapt on Sothi and his men, and called to my crew to follow me and clear the vessel of the King's dogs.

Some followed, and fought hard, and died well, but most hung back—the craven hearts! And soon I stood alone, at bay in the stem of the ship, and a host of foes in front, striving to bring me down without killing me, Sothi himself, remembering my prowess, keeping judiciously in the rear.

Long I stood there with madness in my face, and fierce despair gnawing at my heart, and superhuman strength nerving my arm to its work. So terribly I struck and pierced, so sure was death to follow the light of my shining steel, so many blades there seemed to hover in the air when there was only one, that, when two score of them lay piled in a writhing heap before me, the soldiers gave back a moment.

But on they came again, and though the sword ravened in my hand as it had never done before, and though I fought more wildly, more desperately, as my strength waned, yet at last I must be beaten, and when three stalwart fellows rushed upon me at once, pinning my sword-arm to the bulwark with their long spears, I was easily secured, and strongly bound with twisted thongs of hide.

They left me where I had fought whilst they went to seek the treasure, not heeding the protestations of my remaining crew, and how I laughed, when crestfallen, one by one, the searchers came on deck again. Certes! their faces were a sight to make the dead laugh! Sothi asked me roughly how was it that we had not the riches on board, averring that we had hidden them before we had touched Miropis. To his questions I answered, surlily enough, that if he could find the wealth he was welcome to it, but that torture would not wring it from me and could not from the crew.

He replied that he would see for himself the truth of that, and forthwith gave orders to screw the facts out of all who belonged to my vessel. Some of the victims fainted, one died, but none could tell more than that I alone knew where the treasure was hidden and had failed to find it.

Thereupon I swore that sooner than lead anyone to it, if I could find the way, I would die of torment, and Sothi, being greedy for a share of the wealth, said he would put to the test likewise. But the soldiers cried shame on him for it, admiring me for the courage with which I had held them at bay, so in the end I escaped that misery. After debating for a long time what he should do with me, Sothi at length decided, condemning me to life-servitude as a rower in a slave-galley just then ready to set sail for the eastern slave country. For this I reviled the wretch as long and bitterly as my sharpened tongue would allow, for of all fates that is the worst.

At dawn the ship would sail, and at eve, therefore, was I sent on board, one boon only being granted me—to keep my long, trusty blade with bloodstains burnt into it by fire. To keep it, I say, but that was all, for having sheathed it, Sothi commanded that it should be bound tightly to my back, so that I could not by any means move it, and one word only being spoken to the captain of the vessel to hold his peace, for I was a troublesome captive.

Now in my misery and madness I grew crafty, and when the three ships had drawn off, leaving me on board the slaver, I asked the captain to let me tell him my story. He was a little, voluptuous man, who liked to idle whilst his men were working, but had, withal, a kindly, generous heart, so he sat down upon a coil of rope and bade me tell it him if I pleased, adding, however, as roughly as he could, that I needn't hope he would let me set foot on shore again now they had shown him the signet of the King.

To which I said that my desire was not that, but only to avoid, if it might be, the horrors of the rowing pit beneath the deck. So I told as much as I thought needful to move his heartstrings in my favour, in which I succeeded beyond my highest hopes, and before the sailing of the vessel my fetters were undone, and I was once more a free man whilst I chose to keep my feet off Atlantian soil.

Digitized by Google

A good soul was that captain, for all his love of ease, and firm friends grew we as I, little by little, displayed my knowledge of sea craft, and showed him how I could manage his ship for him during many a spell of sleep and many a drunken bout in his cabin.

He even cracked a skin of fine mountain nectar from his own store with me—for the slavers are rich folk—as we talked together on the clean washed deck, and when I ventured to tell him how I had nearly captured his vessel—for, strange is the irony of Fate, I recognised in this vessel which was to bear me away to a foreign land, that flying barque which the Ravager failed to seize upon now nearly a year agone—when I ventured to tell him this, I thought he would split his sides with mirth, so mightily was he amused, and so well pleased that his vessel was swifter than the most notorious pirate ship that ever skimmed the tropic sea.

Just as the full round orb of day leapt into the waiting sky, we drew our anchors and stood forth down the wide waterway, and as we slowly passed from view of that accursed, bibulous town, with its gaudy oil lamps still burning on into the rosy dawn, I shook my clenched hands at it, in spite of the pain my wounds gave me, and swore a mighty oath by the Three Eternal Spirits, that if ever I set foot within its tawdry streets again, it should be as a conqueror and avenger, and in that guise only.

Cool blew the freshening breeze as we neared the sea, and my wrath went down and my misery abated at the sight of my native element opening out before me in all its grandeur, and once more as we left that hateful town behind and swept through the narrowing channel of the bay, the pirate blood ran eddying in my veins with quickened speed and new-born joy.

None so love the surging, restless sea as I; none so love to watch the great rollers breaking into foam on rocky coasts, the quiet tide bubbling harmlessly in little creeks and on shady forest shores, the birds that skim its broad expanse, the petrel that rides on the wings of the gale and lives in the spray, the glory of the noonday sun upon it, or the pillars of silver moonlight shimmering adown its liquid glades; none so love the sea in every mood so well as I, and yet when our barque ploughed the trackless waste of ocean, and the land was gone from sight, my old pain-sorrow came back with tenfold force.

The captain would have cheered me, but 'twas vain; silent and moody I went about my work, and silent and moody I sat in my leisure time thinking of the evil crowded into my last year of life.

Long and moodily I brooded till I almost doubted if the spirits lived, and had well-nigh cursed them if I thought they did, and ever that which caused my greatest grief was not the death of golden-haired Viol, or my son Didron, but the treachery, the sudden falseness of my love, my Briseis; she who had seemed as different to guile as blackest midnight is to most unclouded sun.

Long I pondered on it, but found no answer to the riddle from all my mind's troubling, so at last, perforce, must cease to wear myself with it, coming at length, I said to myself, to hate her whom I had loved, yet knowing through it all that I loved her still, whom I should have hated. Thus in time a calmness grew upon me and my sailor spirits returned, so that I became a favourite on board the flying slaver-barque with wide-spread sails.

CHAPTER VI.

The Nubian Revolt.

Day after day we journeyed to the east, where I had never ventured in the Ravager, and day after day fresh sights burst on my bewildered eyes. There were many islands, now, alas! buried under the pitiless waters, and some of them were scenes of beauty unsurpassed, inhabited by a blue-eyed, fair-skinned, sweetly-spoken race, all sailors, well equipped with great canoes.

Fain would I have made my dwelling there, amongst those lovely islands with their tapered mountain tops, their steep and rocky shores, their darkly-shadowed woods, their restless breakers on the harbour-bars, their peaceful, mellow eves, their calm and starry-brightened nights, and their nearly perfect people, whose innocence made the house ever welcome to the stranger, and ever set his life to sweet enjoyment; but my captain would not hear of it. I was one of his crew, he said, if I was not a slave as I should have been, and he allowed no deserters.

So I had to sigh and look content, and amuse myself with watching as the swift vessel sped on.

One day, as I was thus employed, the wind having gone down and the oars beating the water with measured strokes, whilst the captain lay asleep under the shade of the bulwarks, I saw a ship, urged forward by her banks of oars, coming rapidly up with us from the west. I woke the captain, called the crew together, and pointed it out.

"'Tis a pirate ship," I said, "and if you do not keep your distance from her, we shall be the slaves, instead of making any."

So he clapped on sail, but the wind, though it gave signs of rising, was not enough for present hope, and though the sailors went down into the rowing pit, and flogged the miserable wretches there till the blood must needs be bailed out into the sea, on came that pirate ship, taking us up, hand over hand. We were in despair (for it never came into my mind to desert my protector in his time of need), till the ship came close enough for me to see her name. Then I knew her, and knew her owner for a friend of Didron, whose hunting ground was in the eastern seas, and was no longer afraid.

"Stand back!" I said to the crew, getting into the prow with sword in hand, for my arm was healed, "and leave this matter to me."

Soon she came to hailing distance and her captain cried:

"Heave to, ye fat, old merchants! In the name of Tirhak the Pirate, ship your oars!"

Loud and clear across the water my answer rang:

"Arnon the son of Didron ships not his oars for a thousand threats. Go your way; I go mine."

"So 'tis the son of Didron," he answered, seeing me as the vessels drew closer, "but even so, tell me wherefore you go a-pirating in a trade ship like that, and wherefore you are in my waters? For this last I could sink you, as I could sink Didron himself."

"If you could!" I said. "But I am not pirating, Tirhak. 'Tis a slave cargo I seek, and for that reason you will not molest me. But try my teeth and you will find that the young cub can bite as well as bark!"

"Talk not so braggartly!" roared back old Tirhak, the vessels now drawing apart again, "lest I even now stop to give you a lesson."

"Farewell!" I cried, as a parting shot. "Braggarts are not always young!"

"I waste no time on thankless tasks," I heard him say, and then no more, as the gale, now freshening from the west-nor'-west, caught us and bore us away, and the pirate craft sank back into the haziness of cloud-hung sky and mist-covered sea to windward. Thus I repaid my debt of gratitude to the slaver captain, and thenceforth was a traveller on board, his friend, and no longer a sailor by name, though I must keep my hands employed whenever the good soul sat nodding in his cabin over that hillside wine!

At length we made the coast of Nubia, as they called that fierce, tropic land, and one day, just as even fell, we steered in and let anchor down at the mouth of a small river, the last Atlantian slave-ship whose keel has grated on the slaveland shore.

Digitized by Google

A little higher up the river was the town, to be secure from sea attacks, and thither we purposed going in our boats at dawn, not caring to face the unknown terrors of those tangled, overhanging forests in the misty night. Indeed, I had misgivings of the wisdom of setting foot anywhere on that vast land, whose coasts are thick with miasmatic mists and unseen, poisonous exhalations, and whose inland woods are peopled with a thousand savage tribes, both dwarf and giant, of whose cruelty and cunning the slaves tell such sickening tales. Verily a Land of Dread, which only greed could make men penetrate.

Moreover, I had heard vague, dark rumours when at court that the coast of Nubia which our colonists held—though but a tithe of what had once been ours in the years of Atlantis' greatness—was held by a very slender thread, and it needed only for the Nubians to feel their strength to shake off our yoke utterly and be free as their neighbours, saving when the soldiers of that mysterious northern land of Khem should swarm down and tread them under foot.

She began to fill instantly.

Therefore, having all these forebodings in my mind, notwithstanding that my captain laughed at them for a homester's fears, 'twas with a testing of my sling and a sharpening of my sword that I prepared to take seat in the boat at morn.

Past curving narrows in the river, under vast o'erarching trees, leafy and bird-thronged, near perilous mudbanks where black-snouted alligators treacherously dozed, over floating lumps of weed and through thick beds of waving rushes, we made our way up stream, and as noon with its scorching heat fell upon us, burning and blistering everywhere, we pulled up at the town, now silently sleeping its midday rest. An old man, clad scantily in panther skin, greeted us as our stern swung round on the stone quayside.

"May the spirits guard you, Captain; hast left your ship in safety?"

"As of yore, Teli," said the Captain, in a careless way, for he had known the old water-side man many years, "as of yore, moored at the river's mouth; will there be many slaves to be bought in the market next settling, think you?"

The old waterman heeded not this query, but cried agitatedly, referring to our vessel.

"And hast left her there, and thy crew are not watchful, the rebels will have gained her by this, for they watch the coast well."

"What mean'st thou?" cried my Captain, seizing old Teli and shaking him like a rat, "out with it man, and let us be knowing what has happened since I left."

"The Nubians have risen," answered he of the panther skin, shaking off the rough grasp, "and their canoes lie hidden all along the shore, ready to seize any vessel left as thine is. Moreover, saving this town and three other walled places, the whole country is in their hands."

"Back all! and pull for your lives!" roared the Captain, "jump in, you, and shove off, and down to the ship before these accursed rebels seize her!"

So down the stream we went, leaving Teli staring after us and shaking his head in misgiving, and pulling with a will, till the perspiration streamed from us under that broiling sun, and the oars slipped through our hands with the moisture, we came in sight of the ship again. In sight, but no nearer.

All round her, like birds of prey round a carcase, the sea was black with long narrow canoes, most of which were filled by the strong, lithe Nubians, thick-lipped and woolly-headed, all signing and vociferating one to another with evident delight, for the ship was theirs already, we could see, and those rebels on board were arming the released rowers as well, and as quickly as they were able.

"A plague on the black-skinned fiends!" cried the Captain, seeing himself ruined. "May the Powers of the Darker Shadows take them for their own for ever!"

Digitized by Google

"Rather curse our own countrymen," I said, "for putting no signal to warn all incoming ships."

By this time they had seen us, and before the Captain could make reply, were upon us with shoutings and yellings and a rain of arrows. One or two fell out of our boat, then, with a will but also with muscles already tired with rowing, we put about, and strove hard up the stream, the rabble after us, jostling their canoes one against another, overturning not a few, and keeping up a clumsy, harmless discharge of arrows and javelins.

But our arms were weary, having done the distance twice already that sultry day, and soon the foremost canoe, containing close on fifty of the rebels, was so near, that with their throwing-darts they effectually prevented us from steering and keeping our way. This could not last, so I ordered the men to rest on their oars and keep steady whilst I gave the foe a greeting.

They obeyed, and standing up in the stern, defying the Nubian missiles, I swung the sling round fiercely, waiting till the free end of the rude canoe was within a fathom of our helm, and then, with a mighty, hissing whirl, sent the leaden bullet crashing through the curving side of the canoe, just below the waterline.

She began to fill instantly, and her crew, thrown into sudden confusion, fell in a heap in the middle of her, assisted in their activity by a shower of arrows from our men. Some of the terrified rebels leaped into the river, thinking to escape that way, but from the right bank three long, scaly bodies slid into the water and glided across, followed by a couple more, and then a pair from the left bank, and soon nothing but a spreading circle of blood-stained, rippling water told where the swimmers had been.

Then, we pulled on with might and main, reaching the town before the brief twilight, angry, weary, ruined, but at least alive. Thus, I thought, was broken the last link that bound me to Atlantis, heeding not the priest's prophecy, although so far it was well fulfilled.

We silently marched out upon the beaten track.

The town, now the evening coolness had fallen, was all astir with an anxious, fearsome populace, amazed at our safe return, wondering how long the King would be before he sent to rescue them, and dreading the moment when the Nubians would feel confidence enough to attack the place.

Bit by bit I learnt the history of the outbreak. How in a single night the rebels had risen, massacred their masters by scores and hundreds, seizing their women as prisoners, burning unfortified villages and towns, laying waste all cultivated areas, and destroying cattle; how they had swarmed forth suddenly on all the lakes and rivers, and on the coast in fleets of rough canoes, of whose existence the settlers had never dreamed, and in which they surrounded and captured every ship then in their ports, and all that had since arrived; how sortie after sortie of our soldiers into the forest-depths in pursuit of bands of the desperate enemy had gone but never returned; and how at length all the Atlantians left alive in the great territory were cooped up in four towns, well garrisoned and fortified, but scantily prepared with food and water, the most eastward being on the far coast.

I heard the story, thought it over long and gloatingly, exulting in my mind that this evil had fallen on Atlantis, where I had met with naught but misery and treachery, and having roundly upbraided the townsfolk for their fears and their carelessness, telling them that they would certainly be buried under the ruin of their own houses before help from the mother country could reach them if they did not acquit themselves more like men instead of acting like a herd of stricken deer, I retired to an upper room and there sat brooding, thinking—not of my present dangers, but of the unaccountable falseness of my beloved Briseis.

'Twas such a monstrous perfidy that one who had tended my wounds, screened my identity, and sworn a deathless love so passionately, should so soon turn round and speak the words that had sent me away an exile.

Time after time I cried aloud in my anguish and perplexity that it could not be; my sweet, dark beauty could not be so heartlessly untrue, so vindictively false, and yet it must have been, for how else could Sothi have learned my real name, how else have revoked the King's safe conduct that I held, when one and one only knew my secret, and that one—Briseis?

True, Vichri, her cousin, with one ear missing, might have returned and shrewdly suspected the true character of Phrena, and demanded my punishment, but if so he would surely have sought me out in person, and surely in such case, Briseis would have interceded for me, both with him and with her royal kinsman, and I had not been dealt with thus.

Far into the night, almost till the dawn sprang into being with the fulness of its busy life, I sat torturing my mind with vain interpretations of the mystery, always ending as before with the hopeless thought that Briseis, whom I had deemed pure as a country amaryllis, must indeed be false, and wishing I could hate her for it, yet knowing through all the clouds of doubt and shadow that I loved her fondly, madly still!

In weariness I made essay to sleep, and when the hour of the first meal came was ill-fitted to face the present dilemma.

But as I looked on war as a man's highest calling then, the prospect of strife ahead served to somewhat calm my restlessness and infuse some small zest into the affairs of life; some interest in the morrow.

Many weeks we stayed in that town, sorely beleaguered by the Nubian hosts, which latter were led and reinforced by many deserters from the Atlantian garrisons and villages. These deserters were called Ethiopians, after the chief renegade, one Ethiop, who had been high in the colony, but who had devoted his wealth and talents to freeing the native people.

Multitudinous and bitter were the imprecations called down upon his head by the townsmen, for if the land were lost to Atlantis for ever, as seemed then likely, and is now too true, there would be an end of all the luxurious merchandise from far-off Ind, that mystic country in the vast and wealthy East, where, so report and hearsay has it, the rivers roll down jewels plentifully as our streams rub rounded pebbles in their scooped-out beds; where gold lies in masses so huge and widespread that cities are built, from paving and foundation blocks to towering turrets and tapering spires, of naught but the yellow gleaming metal, and where a million fruits and a myriad flowers, such as those only who have seen them can imagine, grow, blossom, ripen, and seed in such prodigal profusion that nothing noxious can there live. Thus rumour whispers. I have found that these golden dreams of enchanted lands vanish into the thinness of a morning mist when the eyes of the flesh once glance upon the vision.

Digitized by Google

Distracted, dejected, and hungry, weary with waiting and watching for the help that never came, tired of the ceaseless vigil that must needs be kept against the wiles of Ethiop and his savage hordes, and strung to the highest tension with suspense, because no news came from the other three towns, we determined to abandon the place, and marching to the others in turn, unite our forces, hoping as a forlorn hope to thus defy the Nubians, and, perhaps, carry the war into their own camp.

So one morning we started—not thinking it wise to brave the night terrors of that forest, with its weird, whistling trees, at first—with sad and doubting hearts, the women leaving their houses untidy, the table left from the scanty, hasty meal, the fire yet burning that had cooked it, and the doors and casements open for the first intruder to enter unforbidden; the men leaving their tasks unfinished—the fisher taking away his nets, the dealer leaving his useless goods heaped up in bulky bales, the woodman his piles of rough-hewn timber, the worker in bricks and pottery his stores of baked and modelled clay, and the maker of coloured glass his costly array of exquisite and brittle ware.

All were left disorderly, and we marched out upon the beaten track with heavy hearts, a silent, melancholy band forsaking a town more silently melancholy still, abandoned to spoliation and decay. With anxious, earnest eyes we kept a constant watch for sign or sound of the enemy, whom we knew to be lurking somewhere in the dense, shaded woods, since they had apparently withdrawn from round the town, but, strangely enough, were unmolested, and reached the nearest friendly post unharmed.

If we expected help and welcome there, we were sorely disappointed. Nothing but a silent ruin, mournful as the place we had deserted, met our tired eyes. We ran through all the streets, into all the houses, penetrated into every nook and crevice, trod every patch of ground in that still, dead city, made the air quiver with our shouts and calls, heedless of the possible proximity of the foe, but not a living being did we find save sundry fierce, gaunt cats, who disputed with us the passage of the narrowest streets.

With many maledictions from the men and bitter bewailings and tears from the women, we set out once more, this time with our faces to the south-east, hoping against hope that our next stopping-place would find us friends and shelter. Again we were allowed safe travelling by Ethiop and his army, whose visible presence was withheld from us, though indications of his passing were strong and numerous.

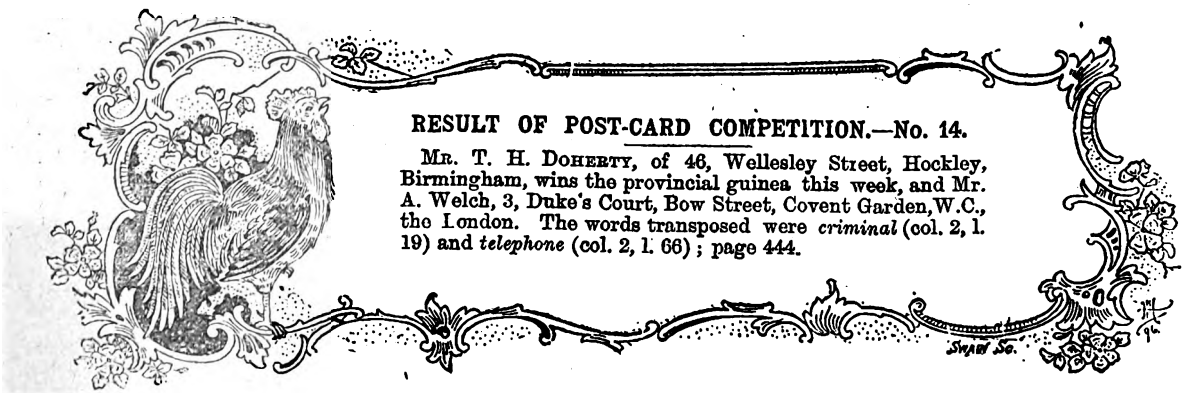
Everywhere villages and unprotected towns lay ruined and forsaken, save where, here and there, a timid child remained, or a woman rocking herself in agony over the dead whom she had loved, or a man wandered aimlessly among the fallen buildings, gone mad with grief and rage and solitude and despair. Everywhere that Ethiop had been a trail of blood and fire marked his passing, like the scorching, blackening march of a host of demons from the densest shade of the land of shadows.

Sick at heart and weary, we pressed on and came to our second halt, only to find that there fire and sword had done their work with terrible completeness. The town, left as a heap of crumbling, smoke-grimed, flame-darkened ruins, held not a living thing of any kind within its boundaries, only the dead, those slain in the sack as well as the victims of the fire, lay scattered in the streets in indiscriminate confusion, and so short a time had passed since the work was done, that the birds and beasts of prey had not begun to settle on the scene of carnage.

In mute despair we journeyed on again, this time to the east, directing our course to Eklohn, our last and only hope. If that were in the hands of the rebels, or destroyed, we were indeed in pitiable plight. It gave us courage, however, to find that the Nubians had been here so short a time ago. It argued that they had not yet, in their devastating march, reached Eklohn. This belief was greatly strengthened, too, when instead of being undisturbed as before, those black, savage hordes showed themselves, harassing our daily journeys, upsetting our nightly encampments, making dashes across our slowly-moving van, hanging about our rear, slaying all stragglers, and guarded by the thick, dank, undergrowth, picking off men from our flanks, thus exhausting our patience, wearing out our strength, diminishing our number.

In the rear, where I was placed, however, the enemy grew cautious and practised more discretion than otherwhere, for they learnt to fear the leaden bullets that flew, death-laden, from my ever-ready sling. Day after day I increased in skill in the use of it, sharpened into quickness by constant direful need; and a foeman had only to show himself amid the foliage of the forest for an unerring missile to find its mark in him.

(To be continued.)



RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.—No. 14.

Mr. T. H. Doherty, of 46, Wellesley Street, Hockley, Birmingham, wins the provincial guinea this week, and Mr. A. Welch, 3, Duke's Court, Bow Street, Covent Garden, W.C., the London. The words transposed were criminal (col. 2, l. 19) and telephone (col. 2, l. 66); page 444.

Digitized by Google

After Many Days.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

It was the day on which the final selections were to be made for the last few rôles still vacant in the caste of the new piece shortly to be produced at the Academy Theatre.

Perhaps, there were few busier men in London than Bateman Wallis, the manager. This, his third production in the Metropolis, was to transcend anything yet attempted. His long experience in America, both as actor and manager, had stood him in good stead, and he rather opened the eyes of some old-fashioned people with his go-ahead, transatlantic notions.

Long, thin, and wiry of body, lean and almost haggard of countenance, he had two eyes, peering out from beneath penthouse brows with a look of almost defiant energy.

But this afternoon he was tired. The constant examination of applicants for even the one or two unimportant vacancies had bored him even more than usual. Only theatrical managers can know to the full what a repugnance the second-rate actor or actress has to telling the truth about his or her capabilities without sundries of ornament and embellishment difficult to detach from the slight foundation.

But now there was a lull. The stream of budding aspirants and battered old pros. had ceased, and resting his head on his hand, he stared vacantly at the opposite wall. How dreary it all was! What a grotesque mockery of life it seemed to him whenever he had time to think! The lines about his firm, rather scornful mouth deepened as he reflected, then suddenly resumed their usually immobile, impassive appearance as he called "Come in!" to someone who had knocked hesitatingly at the door.

A lady about forty-five, desperately attempting to look younger, dressed in a pitifully cheap imitation of the newest fashion, with a slight simper—half nervous, half impudent—entered and advanced towards the table.

The manager indicated by a slight wave of his hand a chair, which was so placed that the light from the window behind him should fall upon the face of whoever sat upon it. The lady after seating herself, began:

"Mr. Wallis, you may have heard of me; my name is De Burgh—Miss Marie De Burgh. I play either juvenile or heavy lead, but having been some time out of an engagement, and having heard from my agent that you were in want of someone to play a character old woman, I thought I would go out of my line for once in a way. I hope you have not settled."

The manager, who had given a slight start when the lady entered, having recovered his self-possession, said in cold, business tones:

"No; I have not settled."

"Oh, I am so glad," the voluble lady resumed. "I can give you the best of references. I have played in all the principal theatres, and have been leading lady to——"

Here she rattled off a list of her experiences, engagements, and accomplishments, much as an auctioneer would expatiate on the points of some animal that he had a special interest in getting a good price for.

The manager listened with the same bored air until she had at last run herself out of breath. Then, without lifting his head, he said slowly and distinctly, as if he wished each word to have due emphasis and effect:

"I don't think you will do."

The lady started as if petrified with astonishment, and waited in silence, as if to give Mr. Wallis time to explain this extraordinary announcement. Upon his not taking advantage of this opportunity, she began again:

"I will come to you for a very small salary, and"—here her voice, which before had been pitched in a high, strident key, slightly trembled—"I do need the engagement, as I am on the brink of starvation."

"Madam," Mr. Wallis said, as coldly as before, "I run my show on strictly business principles. The homely pathetic element is only of use on the stage when the curtain is up. I have the honour to wish you good-evening."

Something in the tones of his voice seemed to awaken some old memory in the mind of Miss De Burgh. She leant forward, and gazed upon his countenance intently for a moment or two, then ejaculated, with a short, quick gasp of astonishment:

Digitized by Google

"Horace Freeman."

"Well, what then?"

"You are so changed, Horace."

"Am I?" Then, wearily: "I suppose I am."

"Oh, Horace, surely for the sake of the old days you will give me something to do? I may not have used you well then, but for the love you once had for me forget and forgive the past."

"The love I once had for you! Do you imagine I like to think about that? Have you no shame left in you that you appeal to me on that score? Have you forgotten what you once did to me? Looking at you now where you sit, with all the traces of the horrible life you have led marked on your face—your selfish, cruel, ay, dissolute face—I can almost be thankful that you allowed me to see as soon as you did the kind of creature I had loved. But incidentally you killed all my faith in womanhood, and have made me what I am—a prosperous theatrical manager. I hope you don't expect me to feel grateful to you for that."

The hard, dry tones of weary cynicism with which the last words were uttered sounded in her ears like the knell of her newly awakened hopes. She rose as if to go, then, turning to him with a gesture of despair, she wailed:

"Horace, you are rich, they say. I am, God knows, how poor! If you can't engage me, give me a little money to buy some food. I am literally starving."

"Food?" he sarcastically queried, "I should think by the aroma which has pervaded this room since you did me the honour to enter it, that you can hardly be in need of the necessaries of life. You seem to be able at least to purchase such luxuries as patchouli and whisky."

"Mr. Freeman!"

"Wallis, if you please. Horace Freeman is dead to you—and to me."

"Well, Mr. Wallis, if you cannot assist me, you might at least refrain from insulting me."

Mr. Wallis rose from his seat, and, quietly walking to the door, closed it gently. Then, turning to the now angry woman, he seized her wrists, and forced her to her chair. Then, gazing on her, not sternly, but gravely and sadly, he began, in a voice monotonous and hollow, to speak to her.

"Years ago, madam, in the city of Glasgow, there was a young journalist—not brilliant, perhaps, nor particularly promising, but a hard worker, and one who loved his work, and found his pleasure in it. He was slowly rising in his profession, and was sure at least of a comfortable living for himself and his aged mother. One of his duties was to attend the theatres and report on the performances. This work he did carefully, criticising fairly and dispassionately each performance and the impersonation of each performer.

"One night, in the course of his ordinary duty, he went to one of the theatres—no matter which. He watched the play, and calmly took his notes until the end of the third act. With the beginning of the fourth act a strange thing happened. One came on the stage, singing as she came—a young girl she was, with large blue eyes and smiling lips. How like an angel she seemed! Oh, heavens, how like an angel!

"Well, contentment knew that young man no more. He loved her at first sight, and for the first time he ever had loved woman. He got introduced to her after the performance, saw her to her home, and thus began an intimacy which resulted in his marriage with her some weeks later in another town.

"As the husband of an actress who refused to leave the stage, he threw up his position on the paper he was working for, and became, like her, a strolling player.

"His mother having old-fashioned ideas, it broke her heart. He heard of his poor mother's death when he and the company were in the South of England. Being poor and struggling, he could not even attend the funeral. She was buried by strangers at the cost of strangers. Her son's wife having extravagant notions, it was left to others to defray the funeral expenses.

"Sit still, and hear me out, woman! There's worse to come, though, God knows, that was hard to bear.

"All else had gone well, so far. That young man had worked, studied hard, was always perfect in his parts and, loving his gay, frivolous wife, denied himself even the properties necessary to his profession, in order that she might be better dressed than the other ladies of the company. What did he care for a bit of self-sacrifice so long as she loved him? All was heaven to him if she smiled, hell if she frowned on him. For her sake he would have undergone any privations, suffered any pain.

"But her vanity was boundless. He began to notice rings upon her fingers more costly than he could have bought, diamonds in her ears worth more than their joint salaries for six months. He asked for explanations, and received such as he was glad to make himself try to believe.

"One night she left the theatre before his part was finished, and when he went home to their lodgings she was not there. He waited, thinking she had gone to spend some time in their rooms. He waited wearily alone. He was oppressed with the memory of his dead mother and the jealous misery of his own too loving heart. She never returned.

"In the morning he was told that he had been deceived all along and that people thought he knew. That man was Horace Freeman, that woman was you!

"I will not tell you of my sufferings—of my madness, of my subsequent wanderings to and fro in a vain effort to forget the past. You, shallow-hearted as you are, could not understand. Now, go!"

The woman, who had been forced to listen to all he had to say, every word cutting her like the lash of a whip, every tone and inflection of his well-remembered voice searing her very soul, sobbing and weeping, holding her hands over her head, as if to ward off a blow—desolate, stricken with the hopeless misery of those who feel outcast and lost for ever, rose to her feet and crept towards the door.

Once there, she turned to him with a world of dumb supplication in her eyes. Silently they gazed on one another's faces—he, the hard, cynical man of the world; she, the poor, battered remains of a once beautiful woman. Again she turned towards the door.

"Stop," he said; "give me your address."

She gave it tremblingly, yet with a thrill of hope in her voice; then, slowly, in obedience to a wave of his hand, she opened the door, and went with tottering footsteps out into the world.

The manager sighed—one heavy, deep-drawn sigh—walked to his desk, and sitting down, he wrote an order on his bankers for a certain sum to be sent to that address each week.

A. S. Walters.

Digitized by Google

Brandon Cloud, author, sat on the edge of his bed and gazed in dismal despair at the upturned sole of his boot.

On the table lay an almost completed novel, whose progress had received a dual check. Firstly, the supply of paper had become exhausted, which, secondly, allowed the author time to think of the woman he loved; and this always made him feel so utterly miserable that he could not bring his thoughts to bear upon anything but the apparent hopelessness of the state of man.

"Well, Brandon, my boy," he mused bitterly, "you've reached the end at last. Assets, fivepence; liabilities, an empty stomach and a landlady's bill for £10."

He had thought of suicide before, but he was young and clung to life, bad as it was, living more in hope than substance.

The only other alternative was starvation, and this he considered worse still. He could not have laboured manually if he had got work to do, for having been born in the purple he had always counted poverty out of his life, so had learned no trade. He dropped into his chair again and picked up the manuscript of his novel. How beautifully smooth it read; what a grand plot it was, and what a character was the poor, struggling, ambition-loving journalist—"A Fin-de-Siècle Fool." Ah! If he could but finish it. No more starvation, no more lying to widow landladies, no more dreaming of the woman he loved but would not marry.

While he sat thinking of what might be there came a knock at the door, so timid that he did not notice it until it was repeated thrice.

"The landlady," he thought, without rising.

However, it was not the portly form of the widow that met Brandon's gaze when the door opened, but a sweet little vision of a girl enwrapped in sables. He started to his feet with an exclamation as she came into the room, the smile on her face lighting up the apartment like a ray of summer sunshine.

"My dear Minnie," he cried, as he offered her a chair and relieved her of her muff and boa, "what in the world induced you to come here?"

"Curiosity and—and love; but——"

"Curiosity! Seven-eighths of a woman's nature! It has ruined many a woman and——"

"Now it's going to save a man," she interposed with a smile, which died from her eyes as she glanced round the room. "You don't appear to be very comfortable; and no fire. You said in your letter you were making your fortune. That is not true."

Brandon was seated on the edge of the table looking at nothing in particular.

"Perfectly," he answered, shifting uneasily. "Only, you know, it's slow work; there are so many at the game, and I never was clever."

"You have grown pessimistic. Poor Brandon!" and she caught his hands. "How cold you are! Why don't you have a fire?"

The author did not answer.

"Oh, I understand," she said in a sympathetic voice. "No wood, no coals, no money, eh?" and she caressed his hand fondly. "You have not made much progress on the royal road?"

"Don't you understand, Minnie, I have endeavoured to earn my own living honestly, endeavoured to be independent of any man, and I want to continue so? There are enough parasites in the world. It has been a bit of a struggle, I'll admit, but I have grown accustomed to it."

"Brandon," was Minnie's solemn response, "I want to show you the folly of your independence. Did you think I could not read between the lines of your letter to me? A man who is making his fortune, or is earning a living and has hopes for the future, does not implore the woman he loves to forget him and marry some other man. Brandon, you do love me?" She placed her hands upon his shoulders and looked up into his face.

He shut his eyes for a moment, his lips quivered, and he did not speak, but he smoothed her fair hair softly.

"Then you will come away with me?" she pleaded. "You will sink your foolish spirit of pride and independence and make me a happy woman?" and she nestled her head on his arm. "Not long ago, when you were rich, you loved me and we were to be married; but when you lost your all in those wretched companies you would not be my husband, though my fortune is ample for both."

Digitized by Google

"I wish I could swallow my wretched pride, but I cannot. I could not live on your money, in your house. My inmost feelings would cry shame on me; my position would be unbearable."

Minnie shivered.

"You are cold?" he asked.

She nodded.

"Well, you had better be going," and he handed her her furs. "It is so kind and good of you, Minnie, but—but I'll try a little longer for that fortune," and the ghost of a smile lingered on his face for an instant.

"I suppose I could not help you in any way, Brandon? May I leave my cheque-book?"

The question was put very hesitatingly, and while the inner man cried, "Yes," in piteous accents, the outer gentleman declined the kind offer with a courteous firmness.

"I have read several of your short stories," Minnie said, as she pulled on her gloves, "and I think they are really clever. But you ought to try something big—a three-volume novel."

"They are going out of fashion, and, besides, they take such a time. One can scribble off short stories like nursery rhymes, and the return is quick."

He referred to the return of manuscripts; she thought he meant payment.

"But here," he went on rapidly, going to the table and taking up his unfinished book, "here is a novel I have almost completed. None of your ordinary drivel, but realism, and that is the demand of the hour. It will not be more than 40,000 words, and I am confident of its success."

"When you finish your book, Brandon," she advised, "send it to Irvine and Irvine. They will publish it in their 'Nom-de-plume' series. You will have an eccentric, idiotic poster all to yourself in the new art style and the puzzle of the hour will be: 'What is the writer's name? Is it a he or a she?' Then, when the papers have criticised your book, praised it, slashed it and discussed it for all it is worth, your real name will be discovered; interviewers will regard you as a special prize, and you will be famous."

Her throat burnt as she spoke, her voice was very dry, and her bonhomie artificial.

"Good-bye, good-bye!"

"Kiss me, Brandon; a last kiss."

He bent and pressed his lips to hers, then turned quickly away as she hurried downstairs and home, and sat in his chair far into the evening, the most miserable man on earth.

It was about a week later, and Brandon was still in his lodgings. His landlady had informed him after Minnie's visit that someone had settled a long-standing debt, so he need not worry over his little account. He blessed her; she passed the blessing on to Minnie Horton.

He sat at the table endeavouring to think out his novel, but he could not compose a single sentence, for on the newspaper spread out before him there danced in the blackest of type a paragraph which had paralysed all the energy in him. Minnie was to be married! She had taken him at his word, and would marry Percy Olcott in three months' time.

Well, that ended it. The one ray of hope that had made his existence bearable had been flashed from his life, and death was the only panacea. Poisoning, hanging, drowning or a bullet—anything to get out of the world quickly. And he had loved her so much! Of course, it was his own choice; if he could only have conventionally murdered his pride and laughed in the world's face he might have been happy with the woman he loved, but he could not, and now he could not live.

Thus ran his reflections, when the landlady brought him a letter, written on perfumed yellow paper. He recognised the handwriting at once. It was from Minnie, and confirmed the newspaper item. She retained his ring as a keepsake.

"Do not give way to ridiculous passion," she advised him, and his face hardened as he read the words again. Not he! Why should he? Must his life be suddenly extinguished, his hopes dispelled, because he had lost the love of one woman? There were scores of others—all beautiful, all loving, all good—no, some good; and when he was famous! He had struck the right chord, and his whole being sprang into a furious blaze of ambition—a desire to cheat the woman who he thought had jilted him, and laugh at her in mockery and triumph.

He walked his room feverishly, his hands clenched and his lips set tight, while the fire of ambition forged his determination and withered his love. By heavens, he would be famous! Night after night he would toil at that book until it was finished, and then—then his triumph?

Yes, that was it; work, and forget her; and he pitched the dainty note into the fire and commenced. He unfroze; all his energies returned, all his thoughts rushed back upon him and fell over each other as his pen raced across the paper. In a few days his book was ready for the publishers.

Brandon received a reply from Irvine and Irvine within two days. This was a revelation that astounded him. But what surprised him still more was the fact that the publishers wanted to see him.

"It was a pity Minnie had been so hasty," Brandon thought, as he consumed Irvine's note, time after time. Fortune and fame were written all over him; and if he only had her!

At least, he ought to write and congratulate her on her engagement. He wondered with a mean exultation what she would feel like; if she would turn white when she read of his success. So he sat down to write, but, remembering that all eggs did not turn out chicks, he deferred it until he had seen the publishers.

After the interview he was mad with himself because he had not written, for Irvine and Irvine paid him £250 down for the rights of his book. How he walked home from the office he never knew, and he wondered why he had not cabbed it. He remembered changing the cheque at the bank, buying a cigar, which he enjoyed with great gusto, and visiting his tailor's, where he purchased a ready-made suit and was measured for various others. Of course he would have to change his lodgings, now. He would not entertain interviewers in his present garret.

Arrived home, he desired to wipe off his debts with the landlady at once, showering carelessly upon the table in her best parlour a handful of gold, which took all the breath from the old lady's body. She was in no hurry, however. There was a visitor upstairs waiting for him.

"A man!" gasped Brandon, with a sinking heart as his mind flew to interviewers. But it was a lady, as he quickly discovered, and that lady, Minnie. His heart beat rapidly, his breath came quickly, his eyes gleamed brightly, and he was about to catch her in his arms when he remembered that she belonged to another, and the memory crushed him.

Digitized by Google

He attempted to speak, but a sudden attack of nervousness stilled his tongue, and he sank into a chair and covered his face with his hands, while the lump that had risen in his throat almost choked him.

"Aren't you well, Brandon?" Minnie inquired, alarmed at his appearance. She placed her small hand lovingly upon his burning forehead, but he winced at the touch as though it was something that hurt him. "Are you ill, dear?" and she sank on her knees and strove to pull his hands from his face.

"It was only a joke, darling, only a joke," she cried piteously, her eyes wet with tears. "I am not going to marry Olcott."

Brandon sat upright suddenly, his face very white.

"You are not?" as he caught her wrists in a frantic grasp.

"No, no! Forgive me, dearest. I thought if I told you that, you would fancy I was happy, and so be able to work. You said so."

Brandon sighed deeply, bent and kissed her.

"I might have killed myself," he remarked presently.

"You had too much pride." She was smiling now.

"But why have you come here again?"

"You never wrote to me, Brandon, and I thought I——"

"You feared I should do what you knew I would not. That's like a woman!" and he laughed lightly. "But it's all over now, Minnie. I have completed my book and sold it to the Irvines for £250. The announcement of your engagement kicked my pride so hard that I had to do something desperate."

Minnie was a splendid actress.

"What?" craning forward, with one hand on her lover's shoulder: "£250! You darling!" and she kissed him eagerly.

"Yes, and there's more to follow. They are certain it will be a success, and they claim the refusal of all my other works. God bless you, Minnie. But for you—you've got to share this with me!"

He threw the gold and notes upon the table, but the girl shrank back.

"No, no, Brandon, your brains earned it; it is all yours. Yes! We will share it, and all that is to come. No refusal; you proposed it."

They were married within a month, but "A Fin-de-Siècle Fool" was not a success. Indeed, it was an utter failure; and one paper remarked that Messrs. Irvine and Irvine had better close up if that was the best rubbish they could secure.

How Minnie laughed at the great unknown scribe who penned these lines! Like Brandon, he never knew that Minnie Horton was the real publisher of the volume; that she paid Brandon the £250, and that she published all his following effusions.

Brandon works merrily on; writes four hours each day, and sells each book as soon as it is finished. Strange to relate, many of his works are out of print. Though paid for, they have never been published. Occasionally he determines to trot round to Irvine's and inquire what they mean by such scandalous conduct; but when this fit seizes him, Minnie always has something for him to do, and he always does it.

AGNES JEWLY.

The Family Honour.

At seven o'clock on a September morning, dressed in white, with a broad-brimmed Panama hat, and wearing slippers, M. Roumegas went down into his garden to water his jacinths. He evidently considered it a great operation, and gave to it the earnest attention of a man who has little else to do, and of an old man who has done a great deal. He had retired from business with a large fortune made by his activity, his intelligence, and especially his probity. Probity! Behold the great strength of Roumegas, the cause of his success. What a fine reputation was this. Pure as crystal, and brilliant as the sun. In the street, hats were lifted like the wings of swallows. One felt near him an atmosphere of calm and well-earned repose. It was an honest, a great man, who passed, when M. Roumegas walked by. Such a life merits a recompense, but heaven had been unjust towards the just, and had not spared trouble. His wife was dead. His only child, Antoine, was thirty years old—dissipated and completely worthless. In the town he was named only with a smile and a shrug. When the tall, blonde, handsome fellow, elegantly dressed, but dull-eyed and stupid, was met in the street, people hesitated about speaking to him, but they thought of his father and bowed. The poor old father suffered deeply. All his ambitious dreams of his son had proved vain. "What was the good of working? The governor was rich, and was not eternal. Let us amuse ourselves," said the young man. Neither reasoning nor threats availed. Wounded in his hope, his pride, his love, how quickly poor Roumegas aged.

A hesitating step on the gravel path made M. Roumegas turn. Antoine was before him—very pale, with soiled linen, disordered hair, and red eyes.

M. Roumegas put down the watering pot, adjusted his glasses, and in a tone half-vexed and half-indulgent asked:

"What is it?"

Antoine appeared to try to gather courage and stammered in a low voice. "Last night at play——"

"You lost—lost again! Ah, misery of my life. He will kill me, that boy! You had sworn to me. By heavens, there is only one thing to do. Pay, pay again and always to the last coin! There is the Roumegas honour! Come, how much?"

Antoine remained silent.

"It is not that."

"What is it, then? A quarrel? You have been insulted? You fought? Ah, those gambling-rooms? What was done? They drank, they fought, they disputed, they played, they——"

Digitized by Google

A terrible thought crossed the old man's mind. He anxiously reached both hands towards his son in a beseeching gesture.

"Oh, not that—it is not that!"—Antoine hung his head—Great heaven, it was true? His son—his son a cheat, a thief! The poor man tottered as if about to fall.

"Father!" said Antoine, advancing to support him.

"Don't touch me. Don't touch me!" cried the old man, recovering himself with wonderful energy. Pointing towards the house he said: "Go to your room."

"Father," cried the young man. "Let me explain. I am not so bad as you think. I have been led away."

"Go to your room," repeated the inflexible Roumegas.

Hanging his head, and drooping like a criminal, the son entered the house and went up the stairs. Behind, head erect, eyes brilliant, with jerky gait, the father followed. They reached the chamber, with two windows on the street, disordered, odd books thrown here and there, guns, swords and pistols on the walls, and pipes, pots of tobacco and cigarettes everywhere.

The young man sat down heavily on his untouched bed, and with downcast eyes crumpled with feverish fingers a hanging corner of the curtain, as he answered in a broken voice:

"The last time, when I asked you for money, I promised you I would not play any more. I did not have the strength, I began again. I lost again. I did not dare to come to you a second time. I kept losing all the time—lost everything. Then someone proposed to me that I should associate with him to play together. We lost again—always. This person advised me. I was weak. A madness, father, a madness! Pardon me!" He half rose and extended his arms towards his father.

"Go on," said Roumegas, erect before him with folded arms.

Antoine continued: "Last night they suspected—and we were arrested—excepting me! I have not been taken yet; they don't know about me, you understand? And if Baptistin does not tell——"

"Baptistin! that Jewish boy—your accomplice—a servant! Great God! but you have fallen!"

"They don't know anything yet, I tell you. Many gamblers of the party are suspected with me. Baptistin is the only one arrested—if he keeps still!"

"And you will let them suspect innocent men! To preserve the little honour that remains to you, you would brand the honour of others! Do you know that is infamous, simply infamous?"

"Father, pardon! pardon! I promise you—I swear to you that in future——"

"In future! Is there any future for you?"

There was the sound of steps along the quiet street; they stopped at the door of the house; the bell rang. Antoine sprang up and listened breathlessly.

The young man rushed to the window.

"Baptistin has told!" he said faintly, turning frightfully pale.

M. Roumegas looked out. The police were at the door. He let the curtain fall, walked the length of the large room, took a revolver from the wall, assured himself that it was loaded, and held it out towards his son, who watched him as if stupefied.

"Come!" said he.

Antoine did not take the pistol. He fixed upon his father wide-open eyes, with no comprehension in them. Below the street door had been opened. The servants and the police were talking. The sound of their voices came up to the room.

"You have lost your honour; at least save ours!" said M. Roumegas. "Come, come!"

The talking below had ceased. Steps resounded on the old stone stairs, large and sonorous like a chapel. They reached the chamber.

"Coward!" murmured Roumegas; "coward to the very end."

He quickly turned the pistol, aimed at his son, and fired.

Antoine fell across his bed with the top of his head blown off.

There was a knocking at the door. M. Roumegas put the still smoking pistol in his son's right hand, opened the door, and pointing to the bleeding corpse, said:

"Too late, gentlemen! He has taken the law into his own hands."

LE VIER.

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION.

No. 13.

THE prize of £5 goes this week to Mr. M. Campbell, 43, Brook Street Kennington, S.E.; and to the remaining £5 we have added 10s., and divided the total among the eleven competitors mentioned below, whose attempts contained only one mistake: J. N. Cowle, 43, Portland Road, Devonport; Miss D. Warton, 19, Agamemnon Road, West Hampstead; Miss Butt, 32, Kensington Court Mansions, W.; A. Richards, 66, Dalston Lane, Kingsland, N.E.; F. Martyn, "Roseville," Polsham Road, Paignton, South Devon; Miss R. E. Smith, 67, Brockley Road, London, S.E.; J. Richardson, 40, Palm Street, Longsight, Manchester; Miss K. Edmonds, 32, Manor Place, Hackney, N.E.; C. T. Christopherson, 38, Wakehurst Road, Wandsworth Common; J. T. Hutchinson, 14, Longley Road, Tooting Graveney; Mrs. A. Jones, 67, Lewes Road, Brighton.

Jumbled Story Competition.

No. 16.

ON pages 506-7 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 October 19th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
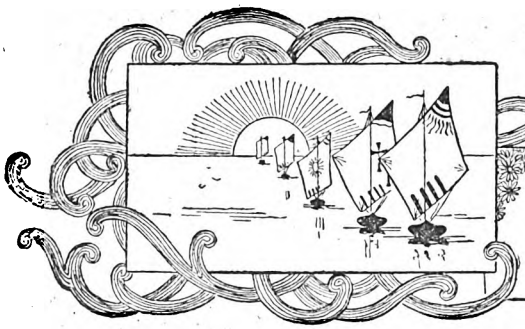
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the first of the readers living in Ireland who succeeds in forwarding the correct, or most nearly correct, solution.

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY No. 16.



DUHTEEL.

F. Almbert the French of Belpitre

"One morning I left the barracks in company with the conscripts, who came to us in batches to together, and my old comrade promised to look me to fight him.'

"He did not speak for a few moments, and I rose with an officer of another regiment, a friend of mine. I had no doubt that I should be able to carry out the artist, you know. And you?' I asked in my college of St. Cyr.

My companion was now Captain Hammer, and when a couple of soldiers, who had seen his sudden serious breach of honour by insulting a woman, during the chief's absence on leave. We were busy of it because, thanks to the Minister of War, the conversation be forgotten, please. But these things last.

The way in which he replied to my greeting was no difference at all. For the present he is simply a private soldier?

"In a second I realised how shameful my words turned into the buffet at the station.

"'It was stupid of you,' I said with a smile; 'she unhappily she preferred someone else.'

"We selected a table and sat down; behind us pass the army is coming to, mon Dieu! when a opening I saw several soldiers and conscripts.

We sat down side by side, and told one another commanding the district, and I told him every plan.

He looked much older than when I had last seen him and turned to leave the room.

I turned and walked with him, but I soon gave up the point.

We found an empty seat somewhat removed from someone hummed the refrain of a popular song, as Mme. de Férisset; she was accompanied by a young boy!"

He flicked the ash from his cigar and continued:

I said nothing; words are useless sometimes.

"Since I last saw you, that evening at Besançon I feel like a murderer.

"The words had hardly left my lips when a slight young soldier standing in the doorway; he was very suspicions. I was also firmly resolved that on no other day that I imagined myself in love with her. We were going to Lille for the day, and as we had our experiences during the years that had passed expostulated with him.

"Of course, I know that the poor boy really broke ground for a couple of paces and I followed him, his face was pale and drawn, and grey hairs upon my shoulder, and I turned and saw that it was well worth a declaration, and her husband, they can see you now with your pale face and great eyes sometimes end in courts-martial, and I warn you that you are in love?"

"I burst out laughing. 'To think that she has a friendship the very day you first came to school. I gave a large dinner party and reception. I was chosen, and I had decided that I would allow my turn.

"'Have you anyone among your conscripts whose field-officer talks of giving a common soldier to know, he is Georges de Férisset.'

"Yes," he said wearily.

"My regiment is quartered at Manbenge, and last arranged that the meeting should take place at Saint-Barbe. You recollect we struck up a breach of discipline.'

"I cannot get rid of the thought that I have committed suicide. I could not possibly have saved her "Mother."

"'I really cannot say,' I answered; 'the only newspapers have not been allowed to mention it."

"You do not recognise me?" he said, smiling.

He hesitated, and I did not press my question.

I was silent, and horror-struck at the sudden and preoccupied, evidently suffering mentally.

"You are worried by something?" I asked at morning dress.

"'I raised my hand to strike you,' he said, 'and, so unlike his old, cheery manner that I glanced at him, his action was so unexpected. And I know I have taken part in a tragedy. You have not heard my plan without arousing M. de Férisset's Minister?'

Several months passed, and I had heard nothing that I should have allowed myself to take away all idea of making conversation, for he was distrait my friend continued:

"Let us sit down and I will tell you what is private and nothing else.'

"Money or business, I suppose, or is it possible claims of honour, and, knowing my skill with foils, therefore dangerous, and I saw that it would not last.

"Before I could guess what was about to happen he was lucky in attaining such high rank so early that you will not find me a lenient judge if I have names, at least, coupled with hers.'

"'I, too, have only one whose name you are likely troubling me. Perhaps you will be able to advise June I was the senior officer and was in command unexpectedly.

Digitized by Google

"We reached the place fixed upon at the same movement and had followed him, seized him by the head.

"He made no resistance, but his eyes fixed on my shoulders.

Last year I went down to Besançon to attend the Mad! How can you fight such a fellow? A pretty fellow I know anything of is young Myrian, son of soldier was in uniform, and one of my seconds name I know, I wonder?' my friend asked.

"'Son of the "beautiful Mme. de Férisset"?'

"No, I cannot say that I do, although you remind and I cannot refuse reparation to her son.'

We continued our walk, and at last he said:

"'She is a charming woman,' my companion and begged for an interview with the general to take official cognisance of your acts.'

"We must have presented a curious sight as we duel on Belgian soil,' I said. 'I have committed a months' time, and I congratulated him warmly, for he had received his promotion, when one evening, that nothing would have induced me to wound, him with anxiety.

"One short convulsion and all was over. He said; 'I never have been able to decide why I did committed a dreadful crime; that I am morally quietly, and I signed to my companion not to press to take my leave.

"'It would be worse than useless.'

"'Yes; the same.'

"How could I so far forget my rank as to allow close to me, raising his hand as though to strike me, I wondered, I wonder still, whether her son sacrificed obvious reasons chosen civilians for the post—the crowd of passers-by.

"I am Gustave Hammer, your old schoolfellow at Férisset, holding his weapon in his left hand, made him, our blades still crossing, the points level with me a military salute.

"My seconds and I arrived at F—— at the left. I have insulted this man, and I shall have his life because he knew the truth at last; because permission,' I asked, 'will you telegraph to the man whose vices and follies had lately became a say, is very complaisant. I have heard a dozen confidently expected to obtain his majority in a few curious look come into his eyes. Suddenly he fell.

A carriage passed—I do not think that Gustave passing us on their homeward way; here and there gloomy and cold, with a light rain steadily bowing, turned to the young man.

"'It was in uniform that I was insulted,' he said since my friend had left school to enter the military noise made me turn round. I saw the figure of a son in the army already. Why, it seems only the refreshment-room; it was ajar, and through the appointed time. It was a miserable morning—as I was walking in the Champs-Elysées, I met him responsible for this young life. Poor boy! poor satisfaction!'

"'If you will not give me the necessary lecture.

"I bowed, and one of my seconds called: 'En garde!'

"He saluted and left the buffet without a word.

"'And what do you propose to do?' he asked at face as he said: 'She is my mother.'

"The ground was slippery with mud, and full of astonishment at your new surroundings."

"That evening our seconds—each of us had for undergo their month's training.

"Our blades crossed. I did not move, keeping my pale and was trembling violently. He came quite down.

"Our seconds placed us face to face, and M. de F——, a little village just across the frontier, a marriage of a friend. The ceremony was a brilliant denoûement of my friend's story. It was growing this woman's reputation in a public place?

"'There is no express prohibition——'

"'Well, well,' he said, holding out his hand, 'you belonged to a cavalry officer.

"'Yes, General, if you put it in that light.'

"'Don't interrupt me, sir!' he shouted; 'I don't account would I hurt so much is a hair of his falling.

"'I will not forget, sir,' I replied, as I saluted her.'

"'You would, then, desert?'

"'Of course not; such a possibility was never showed just above his temples.

"'You must be mad to dream of such a thing. Oh! it was a serious business, I assure you, but looking for my seat at table when a hand was laid as a soldier, it is my duty to apologise for such a adversary to touch me with the point of his weapon. I have no knowledge of this affair; let our couple of days later; swords were the weapons not declare my passion, for I, too, was in love with some time to spare before the train started, we saw it—and in one of the occupants I recognised was dead!"

"'It seems to me, sir, there is only one course penetrated his breast. I shall never, if I live to faced one another. A young man in the uniform was the door leading into the second-class dreamt of.'

"'Then we must cross the frontier and fight our much less to kill, him willingly, but, nevertheless, byword. They were laughing and talking gaily. Only a scratch, of course, but it would satisfy the care what the man's position is in society, it makes time as my adversary and his friends. The young he preferred death to the living shame of calling me."

"I did not reply to this, and presently he cooled the throat.

"'Let him go,' I said to the soldiers; and then, in his career. We spent most of the evening of a private of chasseurs and a man in ordinary eyes fixed on the young man's face, and I noticed a thing.

"'I am at your disposal; you know where I am up when he next came to Paris.

"When we arrived at Lille I went to headquarters myself to be mixed up in such an affair with a me of someone, I cannot tell whom."

"He was very angry, and gave me a severe of him save that I saw in the Journal Officiel that he had leapt upon the point of my rapier, which must go your own way. Remember, however, that were. What could have possessed me that morning one, and on the evening of the wedding-day my host be a hundred, forget the smile upon his face as he late; the audiences of the cafés-concerts were be so easy as I had anticipated to carry out my to be found.'

G. W. Household.

Digitized by Google

THE ACCIDENT ON THE GRINDEWALD.

Key to Jumbled Story No 13.

56 Monsieur Salvator Martigny, painter, sculptor,
108 artist, sat alone in his salon.
5 He was waiting for his wife.
3 On his face was the pleased expression of one 57 who has done something magnanimous. He seemed 2 happy, but somewhat anxious.
43 Occasionally he put out his hand, and opened a
64 casket containing a superb tiara of diamonds.
59 "I trust," he would say, "that madame will find 119 my peace offering acceptable."
100 It was, indeed, to be hoped that madame would 63 do so. She had left his house in the morning in a 10 storm, a whirlwind of words.
65 Now, he was waiting for her return.
61 "She will not be long," he said continually to 69 himself "Ten. Eleven. Twelve. Half-past——"
11 The door opened, and his man came in, bearing a 15 tray in his hand, with a note upon it.
120 It was written in his wife's hand-writing.
90 Monsieur Martigny received it eagerly, and 32 opened it with trembling fingers. There was no
101 date or address.
121 "I left your house this morning for ever. If you
62 hate me, I can find lovers. In future, you may 48 make your own arrangements."
124 Monsieur Martigny read the words many times.
20 His face was very white. He gazed round the room
34 with a despairing look, noting every detail. Each 67 object reminded him of some happy moment he had 50 spent with his wife. Finally, his eyes rested on the 12 casket of jewels that he had prepared as a surprise
75 and a peace-offering.
54 With a groan he slowly crossed the room, and 17 drew a revolver from a cabinet. He placed it
99 against his head.
26 Then he drew the trigger.
27 His hand trembled, and the bullet did not reach
84 his brain.
66 His man, who had but a moment before left the 30 room, after bringing the note, hearing the report of 103 the revolver, rushed in again.
95 He found his master lying unconscious on the 81 floor, while the blood streamed from a horrible
44 wound in the lower part of his face.
49 When, three weeks later, Monsieur Martigny
92 recovered consciousness he renounced his art, his 33 life, everyone that he had ever known, and set out
42 to wander over the face of the earth.
38 Three years later he found himself in Switzerland.
70 One morning he was wandering in the Grindewald,
13 when he encountered a group of peasants who were 47 anxious to enlist as guides. Without pausing to 60 reason, he stepped forward and joined their number.
45 He loved the free life of the mountaineers, the 72 air suited him; above all, it would be something to 122 do. It was an experience, which, he found, he could 68 almost enjoy. He saw many people whom he had 52 known in his old life. No one recognised him; who 91 could have done so in the broken-hearted, grief-
7 laden man, whose mouth, and jaws, and nose
24 were so horribly mutilated?
1 On a bright morning, early in autumn, he was standing on one of the Grindewald roads, waiting 35 for tourists, when a calèche, drawn by superb horses, 105 turned at a trot from over the bridge, and came 8 towards him. 18
He recognised immediately one of the occupants 16
as M. Dupois. 106
And madame his wife, at his side? 79
The driver of the calèche had slackened his pace 98 to mount the ascent. The guide approached his 14 side, and addressed himself to the gentleman. 96
"Would monsieur like to make an excursion 104 which few tourists know?" 4
"What? An excursion which few tourists know? 74
What say you, little one, shall we trust ourselves to 77
this fellow?" 73
Madame smiled and nodded. 25
Shortly afterwards the three set out together. 76
They climbed the steep mountain sides, the strange 86 guide in front, with bent shoulders, and his head 88 on his breast. Occasionally, he raised his hand to 9 his eyes. 28
A fierce struggle was raging within him. This 6 man and woman, who had robbed him of everything 51
that he loved in life, were in his power. 89
"Mother of God," he cried, "surely you have 41 delivered them into my hands?" 53
They climbed the rocky slopes to the foot of the 80 glacier. On the edge they paused for a moment to 112 rest. 40
"It would be wise, monsieur," said the guide, "if 107
we were now to attach ourselves." 112
He placed his pick against a rock, and taking his 113 rope from his shoulders, he approached Monsieur 46 Dupois, and fastened it securely round him. Then 31 he came to madame, and for a moment, during the 21 operation, his arms encirled her body. 36
He could detect the faint scent that came from 83 her hair. It seemed to stifle him. Ah, how well he 23 knew it. 114
Finally, he fastened the rope round his own 115
waist. 123
"Forward!" he cried, and his voice was firm and 118
steady. 58
Slowly, and carefully, each step planned before- 85 hand, they ascended the glacier. They encountered 93 many dangers; madame's head grew dizzy; and 22
finally she fell almost senseless into the guide's arms. 55
For a moment he gazed silently down on the 110 woman in his arms. Then he shook her roughly. 82
"Wake up," he cried. "The time has come. 109
Listen. I am Salvator Martigny. Do you know 116 me now? I am your husband." 78
His wild laugh echoed down the mountain side. 19
He stopped in the middle, and turned on the 39 frightened man. 117
"You scoundrel," he cried. 97
Then suddenly, drawing the rope in close, and 102 holding his wife to his breast, he sprang into the air. 76
* * * * * 37
Afterwards, three mutilated bodies in a confused 29 mass, tied together by a rope, were found by the 87 peasants at the foot of the abyss. 94

Digitized by Google

By George Manville Fenn.

CHAPTER XXXI.

In the Railway Accident.

Two ghastly white faces, but Lucy's was the whiter, and her eyes were the first to sink before the firm, cold gaze which looked unshrinkingly at hers. The look was clear and crystalline, while that which was directed back flowed with jealous hatred and dislike.

As Lucy's lids fell, and she turned her head slightly to where her aunt sat watching her, waiting for the dénouement of this unfortunate meeting, Olive turned her eyes upon her husband, and saw that a couple of red, consumptive-looking spots had appeared in his pale cheeks; and when at last she caught his shrinking gaze she could plainly read how nervous and agitated he seemed. Twice over he shrank from her calm, limpid eyes, misreading the look she directed at him; while, frowning and angry, Emsworth sat back in his corner, glancing from time to time at Murray, trying to silently question him, the first inquiry being, "Whatever shall we do?" the next, "Hadn't we better make them change places with us?" while those which followed succeeded one another so fast that they became confused, and the brain which engendered them was in a whirl.

But the Doctor, after the first quick shock of the encounter, in which was a pang of pity for Olive that she should be called upon to occupy so terribly painful a position, sat calm and unmoved. It was his professional training that had taught him to master every emotion, and, in failing, to mask them, as he did here. His face looked a little hard, but his voice sounded cool and measured as usual when he broke silence:

"Would you like to glance at Punch, Lady Braetoun?" he said quietly; and as he leant forward to hand the paper, which was gladly taken, and held as if being skimmed over, he turned to Braetoun to engage him in conversation about the country through which they passed.

"If you care to read," he said, after a time, "I have two of the reviews, with good-sized print."

"Got something here," said Braetoun, in a harsh, petulant way, for he had somewhat recovered his composure after going through a long series of mental calculations regarding the rencontre, the result being that he concluded that Lucy had contrived the meeting by bribing the guard.

"Why, she must have followed us down, and been in Brighton, perhaps, ever so long," he argued; "and I've been pushed about in that cursed chair all the time and never known. Poor little lassie! it was very good of her."

He took out the "something" he had mentioned, and began to open and turn the paper.

"Shall I do it, dear?" said Olive quickly; and letting her own paper fall on her lap, she took and opened the sporting journal her husband was battling with rather feebly, and offered it to him with a gentle, appealing smile.

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

"Oh, I could have done it," he said petulantly. "I'm not such an invalid as that."

He sank back, holding the paper before him, and Olive resumed her own, while her father shut himself in his corner of the carriage behind the Times, Murray calmly leaning back and cutting the leaves of a review.

Aunt Duncan, whose florid face behind her veil was covered with a thick dew, took refuge in a mock sleep, crushing the flowers of her bonnet a good deal as she leant back in her corner, but from time to time she raised one lid as slightly as she could to watch her niece, who sat quivering with her emotion—a mingling of fear, despair, and delight—gazing through the window at the landscape which seemed to sweep round as they dashed on. All the misery and regret at being torn away from Brighton had passed away, and by degrees she yielded more and more to the ever mastering feeling that she was once more side by side with the man she loved, whose garments touched hers from time to time, and the wild, angry glare in her beautiful eyes gradually gave place to a look of swimming tenderness. Olive was almost facing her, fighting hard to ignore her presence; but there was no longer any struggle going on in Lucy's breast. It was no ignoring of the wife's presence, for ten miles of the journey had not been hurried through before Olive did not seem to exist. Roderick Braetoun was with her once more, the only man for whom her heart had ever truly beat, and the feeling was upon her, "Oh, that the journey might be prolonged for hours upon hours, instead of the pace increasing as it did."

Poor Rod! he loved her still, though he had been torn from her, and all present had combined to thrust her away; he must love her, and the pale, handsome woman before her could be nothing to him, or he would not have spoken to her so harshly as he did. He was hers—hers alone, and she sat back waiting, feeling assured that the moment the train dashed into a tunnel and darkness enshrouded them, his hand would seek hers, to hold it with a long, loving pressure, to assure her that he was not changed by his long weary illness. But a minute later she could hardly repress a sigh, for she felt, more than saw, that the carriage was well lighted, and the hope slowly died away.

So quick: hurrying on at such a terrible rate. Only one hour and a quarter, and they would be in town. A sigh rose to Lucy's lips, and she longed intensely to turn and look only once at the pale face so close to hers, but she dared not stir, only sit gazing fixedly out of the window, knowing as she did that at the slightest movement every pair of eyes would be turned upon her.

So swift to her, so slow and agonising to Olive, who sat there glancing from time to time at her husband, as if to assure herself that he was still present, and not slowly gliding away from her once more.

He was reading, or assuming to read, his paper, and she could not see his eyes, only his white forehead, already so full of lines. And in those brief glances her heart sank, for it gradually came home to her that in spite of all—her tender affection, her ceaseless efforts to save him from death—now that health and strength were once more well in view, he was stealing away from her into that which was worse to her than death, and her misery seemed greater than she could bear.

Digitized by Google

There were moments when she was ready to cry mentally: "Why did he not die? It would have been better so." Why had she prayed to Murray to keep on in that nearly ceaseless battle with the grim shadow which hovered over him so long? And the answer came: "Because I was his wife—the one who had vowed to love him, and who would have given her life that he might live."

There was no sign, no look from one to the other, of those who sat facing her, but she knew how beautiful the little figure in the corner was, and how weak her husband. There was no sign, but Olive felt it in her misery-stricken breast, and she sat there gradually growing colder and more rigid, still wearing that stony mask, and holding before her dim eyes the leaves of the comic journal, with its pages dotted with humorous pictures of life.

There were moments—long-drawn, anguished moments—when she felt that she must shriek aloud, or burst into a passionate fit of sobbing; and just as she was suffering most keenly, she gave a violent start, and a painful smile dawned upon her quivering lips, for Braetoun suddenly exclaimed in a petulant way:

"They print these things so atrociously badly. Here, Olive, read this column about the Earlswood Meeting."

Even that was a relief.

"Yes, dear," she said, in what she meant to be a cheerful tone; and she took the paper, as a deep growl came from the corner of the carriage on her right.

"Did you speak, sir?" said Braetoun sharply; and Olive laid her hand upon his knee.

"Eh? speak?" said Emsworth, lowering the paper, of which he had not been able to read a word. "No, I didn't speak," and the broad sheet was raised again.

"Oh: thought you did," said Braetoun contemptuously; and he sank back, while Olive began to read hastily the long—to her—maddening account of the series of races, while, for her part, she did not grasp the import of a sentence.

"Louder, please," said Braetoun sharply; and his wife read on, the tones of her voice, whose tremulous manner sent a thrill of pity and despair through Murray as she struggled on, ever ready to break down and sob, but fighting her brave fight against despair to the very end.

She read on. It was the account now of a hardly-contested race, and her voice grew tinged with the excitement she felt, as it gradually dawned upon her that one of the horses competing was her husband's mare, Bella Donna. But she hardly dared glance at him for fear she should miss a line. She was conscious, though, that he was listening eagerly, with his pale face flushing, and that the subject she was reading had suddenly taken the attention of her father and of Murray, who, though keeping their eyes upon their papers, were listening attentively. Worse still, the occupant of the opposite corner had suddenly changed her position, and, though keeping her face averted, was evidently devouring every word.

Still Olive read on, trembling and eager now herself, lest the news that had so interested her husband should be that of misfortune and disaster. For another horse was the favourite, and Bella Donna was described as being at first far behind.

Had she dared she would have cast down the paper, but as she read Braetoun leant more and more forward, eager for every word. Then a change came over the account, one by one those in front began to drop to the rear, and Olive grew confused by the sporting reporter's technical account till near the end of the race, when the language grew unmistakable, for she read that amidst a tremendous burst of cheering, Bella Donna had won by a head, and the bookmakers were heavily hit.

"Hah!" ejaculated Braetoun, sinking back in his seat and closing his eyes, when Murray dropped his book and leant towards him, while Lucy lost her power over self for a moment and turned, too, with a frightened look in her eyes.

"All right, Doctor, nothing wrong," said Braetoun, a little hoarsely; "man doesn't die of good news."

A quick exchange of glances passed between Olive and Lucy, and then the latter returned to her old position, and sat gazing out with a feeling of elation that made her pulses beat heavily.

"Then you've been running your mare in another race," said Emsworth sharply.

"Well, suppose I have?" said Braetoun resentfully.

"And you've won?"

"Didn't you hear? Aren't you glad?"

"No, I'm not glad," said Emsworth coldly. "I should have thought you had been too ill to think of such things."

"So I have," replied Braetoun, "but I happened to have a good mare, and a good servant who looks after my interests. There," he continued, "we needn't quarrel about a confounded good piece of luck. It will put a couple of thou. in my pocket, and I want it badly enough."

"But can you trust a man to look after such business as that?"

"Seems like it."

"But suppose your horse had lost?"

"So much the worse for me, old man. But I haven't lost. Come, don't make such a fuss about it. My trainer wrote to me and asked if he might enter the mare, for she would have a good chance, and she was only eating her head off in the stable; so I got Olive here to write back, and you see she brought me luck. Hallo! Stopping?"

It was only at the one station—Clapham Junction, and a faint sigh came from the right-hand corner, almost inaudible, but it reached Olive's ears and made them tingle.

Then on once again, another pause, and they were directly after, as it seemed to Lucy, at Victoria.

Emsworth had let down the window, and was looking along the platform for his servant, and the Doctor was gathering together his books; while Olive sat watching her husband, and thrilling with trembling expectancy of she knew not what.

Aunt Duncan seemed to wake up, but she did not speak to her niece, who sat there, upright now, waiting, too, and with her heart beginning to sink with a feeling of misery which she could not control.

"Carriage is close at hand," said Emsworth, as the train stopped. "I'll get a couple of porters to carry you, Braetoun."

"Don't," he said; "that news has roused me. If you and the Doctor each give me an arm, I dare say I can walk."

"But——" began Emsworth.

"Let him try," said Murray, who had stepped out after Emsworth, and stood with him at the carriage door.

Olive held out her hand to her husband, but he did not take it.

"Get out first," he said; "their help will be better;" and he leant forward a little, with his hands resting on the padded arms of the carriage.

There was nothing for Olive to do but obey; and as her back was turned, she screened effectually from the Doctor's jealously watching eyes, as he handed her out, that which took place within. For in an instant Braetoun's hand had grasped and warmly pressed Lucy's little trembling fingers, holding them tightly as the pressure was spasmodically returned.

The next moment the convalescent was raising himself to his feet, and then grasped the Doctor's and Emsworth's hands as they helped him out, and then supported him across the platform to the carriage where Nurse Jennett stood waiting with her bag.

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Baby—Baby!" whispered Aunt Duncan, "what have you done?"

"Don't—don't speak to me, Auntie, pray—pray, or I shall make a scene," she panted. "You don't know—you don't know what you've done. I was so wretched I thought I should die, while now—oh, Auntie—Auntie, once more—once more! He's mine—he's mine!"

"Yes," said Aunt Duncan bitterly, "Bella Donna has won."

CHAPTER XXXII.

Home, Sweet Home.

Chester Square was entered by Emsworth's high-stepping horses before the cab had deposited Aunt Duncan and her niece in Great Russell Street, and Braetoun bore the moving easily. Murray accompanied his patient, and saw that all went well.

"Back home, dearest," said Olive, as soon as her husband was resting back in an easy chair.

"Yes, back home," he said. "You'll stop to dinner, Mr. Emsworth?"

"No, thank you; I only wanted to see you safe.—He ought to go to bed soon, oughtn't he, Doctor?"

"There is no hurry," said Murray quietly. "He will act according to how he feels. We ought to congratulate him upon bearing the journey so well."

"And on my turf success," said Braetoun laughingly. "Oh, I could bear it. I'd have borne anything to get away from the sad sea waves."

"Humph!" ejaculated Emsworth, and then to himself: "A planned business, curse him! but they bungled it a bit. What's to be the next move, I wonder?—There, I'm off now. Will you come down to the door with me, my dear?"

"Yes, father," said Olive, "but——"

"Oh, go down and see the old man off," said Braetoun banteringly; "he wants to give you a bit of advice, I dare say."

Olive gave him a reproachful look, and followed her father down.

"Ah!" said Murray, "I wanted to be alone with you for a few minutes before I went, Braetoun."

"Eh? Want to put something on my mare for the next race?"

"No, but I want to see you run the rest of your earthly race like a man—like the lad promised who was my old form companion."

"Look here, I'm not in a humour to listen to preaching," said Braetoun sourly.

"Very well, then, I will appeal to you through your body if I cannot through your brain."

"There, there; that will do," cried Braetoun peevishly. "I'm tired out, and there's nothing the matter now. I only want some food and a good sleep."

"Yes, and you will have both soon."

"All right; now leave me alone. I know what you're thinking."

"I suppose so. But look here, Braetoun, it is my duty to tell you once for all that any undue excitement may prove serious. You must now lead a quiet, domestic life. You know well enough what you must do."

"I know what you have told me," said Braetoun contemptuously.

"Yes," said Murray sternly, "and you know it is the honest truth. Now be advised. I do not wish to boast, but I have saved your life, one which I pray Heaven may now, for your wife's sake, become happy and peaceful."

"All right, pray away, but don't pray before me, nor preach either, and please leave my wife out of it. She has nothing to do with your medicine. I dare say I can take care of myself, but if I fall ill, you can come and doctor me, and set me right again."

"If I can," said Murray meaningly.

"Oh, you can; and you'd better look in from time to time, and see how I am. You'll like that."

The last words were uttered so meaningly that Murray stood looking at him sternly.

"Yes," he said at last, "I should like to do all I could for the man I have striven for again and again. But you must be careful, Braetoun, for your wife's sake."

There was a quick gesture, and an ugly sneer in the tones of Braetoun's voice as he said:

"Oh, all right, I'll take care; but that accident did me good, and I'm going to be stronger than ever. Antagonism of disease, don't you fellows call it? One has killed the other. There, come in often."

Murray took his leave calmly enough directly after, when Olive re-entered the room, for the sad, limpid, and weary look in the young wife's eyes seemed to chase away all that was base in his nature. There was a manly, chivalrous pressure in his hand, a look of reverence in his eyes, and a feeling of tender pity in his breast.

"Good-bye," he said cheerfully. "Don't be alarmed, Lady Braetoun; he has borne the journey well."

"You think so?" she said piteously.

"Think? I am sure. He will soon be himself again." And what a struggle it was to say those words!

"But you will come in and see him again soon?"

"Oh, yes," said Braetoun, "he shall come in and see me again soon. I say, Murray, what a bill you will have!"

"Yes, a heavier one than you can grasp," said Murray cheerfully, "and I'll drop in and see you to-morrow some time."

He took his leave while Braetoun sat watching his wife, ready to attack her first and disarm her, should she utter a reproach, and he did attack, though there was no need, for she would not have spoken.

"Oh, yes, he shall come and watch over me; don't be afraid. Capital company, the Doctor."

Then to himself:

"I'm not blind. Enough to make any man go wrong. Illness is bad enough. But never mind; Bella Donna has won. Well done, old Vinniss! What a comfort it is to feel independent once again!"

He was sitting back in an easy chair, and Olive stood by the window as if looking out, but really seeing the scene in the railway carriage once more. She was longing to speak, but could not trust herself for fear she should break down. The tension of that afternoon had been more than she could bear.

She had been hoping it had all been a sudden surprise, an accident, she believed; but all the same a terrible fear had come upon her of what the future was to be. As to Braetoun's strange words, they made no impression. He was irritable and weary, and she had often listened to petty, childish remarks from him during his illness, words which had sent her from the room in tears; but of late they had not made any impression to signify, and she had on this occasion hardly heeded them, for her brain was filled with the events of that day.

And now, like a sudden flash of light, came a thought which swept away the idea of the meeting being accidental. Had it been planned?

She shuddered, and dismissed the idea at once. She was wrong, she told herself, and she was frightening herself with fancies that had no basis. The past was dead, and he had at times been loving, gentle, and reconnaissant to her. All she had to do was to show him that, spite of all, her love was unchanged.

Feeling relieved now, she turned to where he was seated, reproaching herself for her silence, and, laying her hand upon his shoulder, she bent down, and found that he was sleeping heavily.

"Poor fellow! What he has suffered!" she said, with the tears rising to her eyes, and brimming over; "but he is better, and we are going to be happy once more. Tired out, Frederick?" she whispered; and she pressed her lips to his forehead.

Digitized by Google

The next moment her heart began to beat fast, and a sigh of content escaped her lips, for he passed his arms about her, and muttered softly:

"Ah, Baby! You once more!"

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Nurse Jennett Plays Her Game.

Murray kept his word, and came next day to see how the journey had been borne, renewing the previous conversation.

"Well, I really am what they call repentant now, old man. This last illness is a sickener—no joke meant. I'm going to settle down now to being quite the country gentleman."

"For how long? Till the next fit comes on?"

"No; I am going to have no more fits. I'm going to be as steady as a judge. That's not saying much, though."

"Well, I've warned you till I'm tired of speaking. You know as well as I do that your constitution will not stand the strain. You must give up all excitement—especially racing."

"Oh, hang it, no! Well, there, if I must, I must. But I shall keep on the little mare—I can't sell her—and just enter her for some little plate now and then."

Murray looked at him with a bitter contempt in his eyes.

"I have warned you once more, and I have done with you. If you like to be careful you may live for years in peace and happiness. If you persist in being the fast man about town you will die."

"But I shall have seen life," said Braetoun, with a peculiar, mocking look.

"And have the misery of the knowledge that you have broken a true woman's heart."

"Don't preach, man; and suppose we leave morals out of the question. I dare say I understand my wife now, and she understands me."

Murray shrugged his shoulders.

"There, I don't want to boast," he said, "but I have saved your life again."

"Splendidly."

"But this is the last time I will attend you. Your troubles are wilfully brought on, and so you must suffer for them."

"Bah! If I'm unlucky enough to be taken bad again you'll come, as you always have."

"You are mistaken, Braetoun, I shall not."

"Oh, yes, you will. The wife will come and beg of you, and you can't refuse her anything."

Murray looked at him searchingly, and there was a mocking look in his patient's eyes which startled him; but the idea which flashed into his brain passed away directly, for, in spite of his words, Braetoun's manner contradicted the possibility of his meaning anything serious.

"You really have pulled me round again wonderfully, old fellow," continued Braetoun lightly, "and I'm precious glad to get back home. I say, it was precious rough on poor Olive for her to have to come and nurse me there, but she has been a perfect angel over it all. Never once referred to it, and no wife could have behaved better."

"No wife could have behaved better," said Murray, repeating his words. "Try and recollect that."

"Of course, I will. Don't I tell you I'm going to be a model husband now? I was sick of lying shut up in that miserable little hole. It was so awkward, too, for Olive."

"Very," said Murray, looking at him intently.

"What are you thinking about?"

"I was only wondering what kind of brain yours must be to take all these things so lightly."

"Yes; that's what I often wonder, myself. 'Tis my nature to, as old Dr. Watts would have said. I say, old fellow, we can't all be such good men as you, eh?"

There was a sneer again in this, but Murray did not wince. He passed it over, and rose to go.

"Off?"

"Yes, I am going."

"Won't you stop and see the wife first? She has gone on to see the mater and tell her I'm comfortably settled down, and she may come and see me as often as she likes without the doctor ordering her off."

"No; I told Lady Braetoun yesterday I should not call again, and bade her good-bye."

"Nonsense! You'll come again soon, I know," said Braetoun, half mockingly. "But, I say, how long am I to keep that old cat here? Surely I don't want a nurse, now?"

"I advise you to keep her here for nearly another month. She will be very useful, and you are not so strong as you think."

"Oh, I say, don't begin croaking again."

"Your strength is only on the surface, as you would soon find if you exerted yourself in the slightest degree."

There was a tap at the door just then, and Braetoun cried, "Come in," the nurse herself entering directly.

"What do you want?" said Braetoun roughly.

"Only to ask Doctor Murray if he has any orders to give me, my lord."

"What, about boiled soles, and chicken broth, rice pudding, and that sort of thing?"

The nurse shrugged her shoulders and wrinkled her forehead.

"Hang it all! Don't do that," cried Braetoun, with a sudden burst of petulancy. "You're not a Frenchwoman."

"No," said Murray quietly, "I have no further instructions to give you. You know the dieting that should be followed better than I can tell you. I leave Lord Braetoun in your hands now, and I strongly advise that you stay with him for at least a month."

"His lordship will, I hope, bear that in mind," said the nurse quietly, "if I seem too exacting, knowing as he will that I have Doctor Murray's authority for all I do."

"Oh, yes, I shall bear it all in mind, and be as patient as a lamb, so long as I feel certain that it's all right."

"It will be quite right," said Murray gravely. "I fully trust Nurse Jennett's judgment in such a case as yours. There, I am glad you are so far recovered, so now good-day. Thank you, nurse, for your kind attention and the carefully exact way in which you have seconded my efforts. I hope to have you often to help me in the future. Good-bye for the present. Send me a line when you are free again."

"Yes, sir, certainly I will," she said quietly; but there was a strange lurid look in her eyes as she fixed them upon him sharply, and she shivered slightly as he left the room.

"What the dickens does he mean by that?" said Braetoun, angrily. "He surely has not gone. Here, nurse, go to the window and look out. He can't go away like this. No; go to the door and call him back."

But at that moment the front door was heard to close.

"Here, quick, the window. Why, that's the wheels of his brougham."

The nurse ran to the window and looked out.

"No, my lord," she said, "it is another carriage drawing up, with a lady inside."

"My mother?"

"No, my lord," said the woman, looking at him with a peculiarly malicious gleam in her half-closed eyes; "her ladyship has returned, and Doctor Murray has gone to the carriage door, raised his hat, and taken her hand."

Braetoun started as if a sharp weapon had been thrust into his breast, and he turned upon the woman fiercely.

(To be continued.)

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

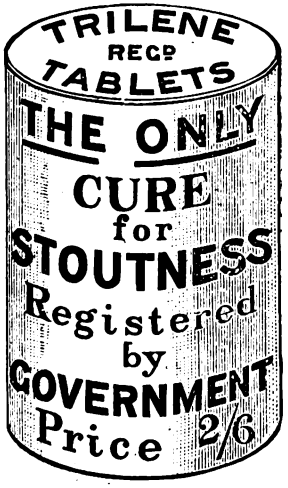
Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

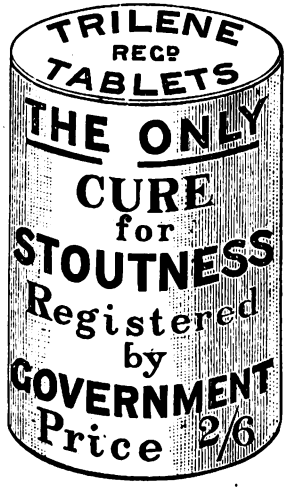
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, Finsbury Pavement, London.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich.

"GENTLEMEN,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Illustrated Family Novelist, November 30th, 1895, says: "A great many women who are plump by nature worry about their stoutness. However, there are some perfectly safe remedies for embonpoint, among them being the Trilene Tablets, which are not only safe, but absolutely beneficial to the general health, and speedily produce the desired effect."

MR. TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2 stone since taking your Tablets."

"6, Brighton Terrace, Hull.

"MRS. JOHNSON has much pleasure in saying she has derived great benefit from your Tablets."

"3, Castle Road, Deal.

"MRS. J. PEARSON is glad to say she is much thinner."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

"Bretton West, near Wakefield.

"MISS L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of Tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced a stone."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, and breathing greatly improved."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2 stone, and am much better in health."

Extract from Bury and Suffolk Times, June 15th, 1894: "Miss Atherton sings and dances as piquantly as ever, and is a marvel of agility, considering how much flesh she has put on of late. Her friends should induce her to take a course of Trilene Tablets, about which I hear wonderful things. One portly acquaintance of my own by merely a few weeks' use of these little Tablets, has reduced his bulk perceptibly I am assured the Tablets are harmless and tasteless, and that the Trilene Company in Finsbury Pavement, London, are doing an enormous and ever-increasing trade."

MR. GILLESPIE, 50, Chancer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3 stone."

2, Chariot Street, Hull.

MR. JUBB, Chemist, says: "My customers speak highly of your Tablets."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½ stone, and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17 stone, was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15 stone."

Aspern, 29, King's Hall Road, Beckenham.

MISS S. WOODHOUSE writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that your Tablets are really a safe cure for stoutness; they have cured me, and I am a perfect figure now."

MRS. GIBBON, of Radford Cottage, Bitterne, says: "I have derived great benefit from your Tablets, especially abdominal."

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.

MRS. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in four weeks."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

CAMDEN HIGHEST GRADE & AJAX CYCLES FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN

ARE RICH VALUE. 25 to 30 per cent. saved and carriage paid.
IMMENSE STOCK, NEW AND SECOND HAND.
Easy Terms from 10s. per Month. Lists free.
Now Open.—LARGE CYCLING SCHOOLS.
BRITISH CYCLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 42, High Street, Camden Town, London, N.W.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S NERVINE
Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.
Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

THIN BUSTS
Quickly transformed and a good figure permanently obtained by using the Elixir of the East; the only known means for securing a Full Natural Bust. This treatment (as adopted by Ladies in the East) is successful even in cases of extreme attenuation, it is pronounced by analysts to be perfectly harmless, and has the recommendation of the Medical Profession. Agreeable to take, inexpensive. For testimonials, price, etc., send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "A.J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.
"ALUZZA,"

HAIR DESTROYED.
A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(REALLY GENUINE.)
In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d.; including tin and postage.

MRS. CONYERS,
KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

TOO STOUT
If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

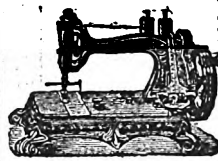
ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-
THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

70 NEW SONGS (words and music) Piano Pieces. Dances, etc., with packet of Freeman's exquisite Scent and Booklet of racy reading, 12 Stamps.—Turner's Piano and Music Depot, London Rd., Preston

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.
£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (59 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 185, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

RED NOSES
Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. R. H. Holt, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY,
BRONCHONIA.
A Marvellous Remedy for Coughs, whether arising from Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma. Its efficacy is testified to by Eminent Physicians. Of all Chemists, 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle. Post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.—J. HOWARD & Co., 20 and 21, Queenhithe, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will prove its Efficacy.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?
If not, please obtain one, and send it to
THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,
with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the
PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 408. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 24TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

KIRBY BEARD & Co LIMITED

KIRBY BEARD & Co TRADE MARK

SPECIALITIES PINS, NEEDLES Hair Pins.

WORKS: BRADFORD ST BIRMINGHAM AND WESLEY ST REDDITCH ENGLAND

WAREHOUSES: 7 WATLING ST LONDON ENGLAND E.C. 75 RUE DE SEBASTOPOL PARIS, FRANCE. 364 & 366 BROADWAY NEW YORK, U.S.A.

BIRMINGHAM WORKS

REDDITCH WORKS

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

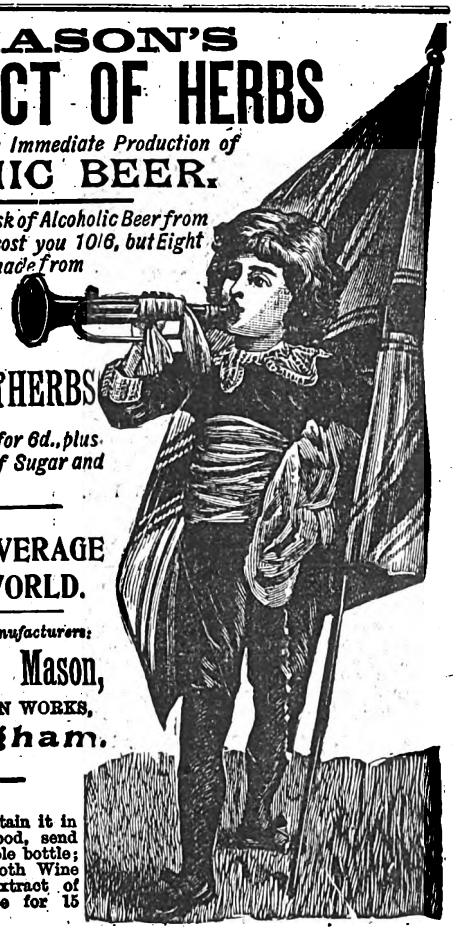
For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.



THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

"SHORT STORIES" best suit the mood of this eager, restless age, so

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

Ready-made and to measure, may be briefly and simply set down as

"ABSOLUTELY the BEST VALUE in the WORLD."

MODEL 583. is one of the latest up-to-date designs, made in that ideal fabric, The John Noble Cheviot Serge. It has a smart well-cut Bodice, with the back shaped to the figure and the front pleated at the waist.

10/6 There is a pretty Yoke Collar, and the whole is very daintily trimmed. The Skirt is a full, wide, tailor-made design. Price, for complete Costume, only 10/6; safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

SKIRT ONLY, as sketched, 5/6; carriage 6d. extra.

SIZES IN STOCK fit figures 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust, under arms; skirts being 38in., 40in. and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

COLOURS. — Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cinnamon, Electric Blue, Fawn, Grey, and Petunia.

John Noble's Knockabout Frocks, With long full sleeves, saddle top, and pocket. Sizes 21 24 27 30 33 36 39 42 45in. Prices 1/6 2/- 2/6 3/- 3/6 4/- 4/6 5/- 5/6. Sent Carriage Paid 4½d. extra.

"AN IDEAL SCHOOL OR HOLIDAY GARMENT FOR GIRLS."

AN UP-TO-DATE FASHION VOLUME, containing numerous choice designs of Ladies' and Children's Costumes, sent, together with Patterns, post free on application. PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES."

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ARE YOU LOOKING for the cheapest and best firm to supply you with Wood for FRETWORK & WOOD-CARVING?

Send for price list. EST. 25 YRS.

PETER PATRICK,

Wharfedale Saw Mills, OTLEY.

VARICOCELE.

Its speedy and painless cure by the latest and most improved method of treatment for this disease. Send for Illustrated Leaflet, entering fully into the subject. It is the only reliable and effective means of curing this disease without operation. Sent sealed post free for three stamps, by

E. FORBES, 57 and 58, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

CORPULENCY CURED By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

S.S. S.S.

PEARSON'S

£100

COUPON.

No. 43

Oct. 24, 1896.

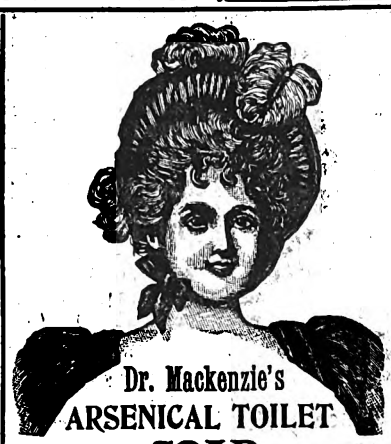
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

BLUSHING

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. J. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.



Dr. Mackenzie's ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Wanted, a Wife to dress her husband's collars, &c., with St. Bernard's Enamel. Mrs. Donald writes: "I never saw anything give so much satisfaction; it makes shirts and collars beautiful." Sample packet 3d. stamps, 12 packets post free 2/-. Address St. Bernard's Enamel Works, Edinburgh.

All-Wool Under-clothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.

Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M F. THOMPSON, Homœpathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. "PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

Short Stories

EDITED BY ARTHUR PEARSON

No. 408.] For the Week ending October 24th, 1896. [1d.

The White Stone.

BETWEEN Odense and Middelfrat the Danish highway used to pass, years ago, through a wild but fertile region. In the parish of Vissenbjerg it entered an old forest of beech and oak, where the branches so roofed over the road that even in the brightest daylight the traveller found himself in the densest gloom. Deer would spring out through the ferns and raspberry vines, and blackbirds dart back and forth among the thick foliage.

For a few minutes at midday a single ray of sunlight found its way through the leaves, and cast a trembling glimmer upon the green moss which lined the wayside, but it would soon pass, and the road be as dark and gloomy as before.

The whole region, and especially this forest, stood in bad repute. No one cared to journey over the Vissenbjerg road at night. Travellers waited until morning, and then hurried through the forest in as large companies as possible.

Many were the stories of murder and assault and robbery which had taken place in there. Were these stories true or exaggerated? Who could say? But at any rate they were told, and the people believed them.

At one place the road wound round between two banks. In one of these banks it was said that the highwaymen had dug a cave where they lay in wait for victims. That no one might escape them a cord was stretched across the way, which sounded a bell in the cave when anyone passed.

Towards the village of Skalbjerg the forest became thinner; trees gave place to undergrowth; the landscape showed open fields and ploughed land, and was dotted here and there with cottages and farmhouses.

Of these latter, the largest and finest was that of Terkel Dam. He owned a large part of the Vissenbjerg forest, and had many cattle pasturing on its outskirts, tended by a young girl whose name was Karen.

All rights reserved.]

She was a little, insignificant person, was Karen, thin and ill-featured, and she was lame. When the other girls had driven home their cattle in the evening and had come together to sing their gay songs, Karen kept at a distance. She seldom spoke, and seemed to care little for the people around her. And they paid little attention to her.

Sometimes of a pleasant summer evening, when they heard a soft, mournful song sung out in the forest, the other girls stopped for a moment and listened. "It's the lame Karen singing," said one.

Then they went on again. She felt herself in some way inferior to other people, but her desires were few; she was contented, yet she always seemed sad; no one had ever seen her laugh.

"It all comes from the day when she fell from the rock and hurt her foot," said the grandmother. "God must have taken away all gladness from her then."

But Karen shook her head. Silence and timidity were her nature, and so she liked best to be by herself.

And yet Karen loved her master's son. She, the lowliest of all the servants, a poor lame creature, had dared to love a fine young fellow like Ebbe; Ebbe, who might have any girl he pleased. What presumption! what simple mindedness! In spring she brought him the first flowers that came forth after the snow had gone, in strawberry time a dish of the finest berries always stood by his plate. Ebbe ate them, the others laughed, and Karen said nothing.

One day, as she placed a dish of the fruit before him on the table and then went away, Terkel smiled and rubbed his hands, and looking over his shoulder, said:

"You two might make a couple. What think you, my son?"

Ebbe laughed.

"She's faithful and industrious, the little wench, but she limps so," and there the matter dropped.

That year there were rough times out in the forest. Several travellers were robbed, and there was much talk of a horse dealer, who had on his person a large sum of money, and who had not been seen from the time that he started off down the Vissenbjerg road. His friends had searched everywhere, and had sent men out into the forest, but in vain; they got no trace of the horse dealer.

Digitized by Google

One day a solitary rider approached the passage-way between the banks. Karen lay resting in the bushes not far away. She heard a bell tinkle and then saw three men with heavy cudgels in their hands rush out and cast the rider from his horse. In her excitement she ran hurriedly to the village and told all that she had seen.

An alarm was given. The sheriff's deputy gathered together all the strong men of the parish and hastened down the road. They succeeded in capturing two men who had just finished burying the murdered horseman among the bushes. They were two soldiers, recruiters, who for some time had been making trouble and disturbances wherever they had showed themselves in the country round about. The third robber had escaped.

The deputy took Karen to his office. She stood trembling and clutching the folds of her dress as he closely questioned her, having first commanded her, in the name of God, to tell the whole truth as to what she had witnessed. But she knew nothing more than she had told at first.

"You are sure that there were three men?" Yes, she was sure.

"And you were with your cattle out there by the clearing?"

"I had been there since early in the morning."

"Now tell me the names of all those whom you had seen go by."

She did so. Among them was an old man who had been collecting brushwood by the road. He, too, was summoned and made to name those whom he had seen go by. They were all brought to the deputy, who went from one to the other, with the girl and old man. He remained standing for a moment before each, and asked:

"Was this the other robber?"

Karen shook her head each time he questioned. At length they stood before her own master, the rich Terkel Dam; he was among those whom the brush gatherer had seen pass, and he had been summoned with the rest. Terkel stood and rattled the cover of his pipe. "Look sharp now and see if you can recognise me," he said with a laugh. But again Karen shook her head, and there was nothing more that the deputy could do.

The two soldiers were afterwards tried and sentenced. They were to be taken out to the hill behind the church and there executed.

The morning that they were carried through the village Karen stood among the others to watch the executioner's waggon pass. On the way, one of the robbers reached down and picked up a great white stone. This he cast in the direction of Terkel Dam's farm gate, calling out so loudly that all could hear:

"By this remember that when my white stone becomes black he shall get his due, who sits there grinning at us."

Soon after, when they had come to the hill and he lay with his bare neck upon the block, he laughed and called to the executioner:

"Slash carefully with your sword, you wretch, so that you get no nick in it! You'll certainly want to use it again for the murder on the Vissenbjerg road."

"When will that be?" questioned the judge.

"When the little wench there is no longer afraid to tell what she knows," he answered.

The sentence was carried out and the people talked about the affair for many a day; but no one could imagine what the poor rascal had in mind when he cast the white stone towards Terkel's farm.

At Michaelmas Karen was dismissed from service. There was so much talk about her, and the people of the parish charged her with trying to deceive and vex them by claiming that there were three robbers, when in reality there could only have been two.

The afternoon that she should go away she stood crying, in front of the house, a little bundle of clothes under her arm. Ebbe carried out to her a roll of frieze.

"You shall have this for your faithful service," he said.

"May I kiss your hand for thanks?" she begged.

"Where do you think of going?"

"That I don't know, and I don't care much if only I may find another herd of cattle to watch and another forest to hide myself in."

"Why do you care so much about staying here?"

"Because here I can see you," she answered without lifting her eyes.

"You have brought it all upon yourself," he said, "by speaking falsely in regard to the robbers; you said that there were three when there were only two."

Karen stood silent awhile; then, "I will tell you how it was; I couldn't name the third because it was—your own father."

The farmer's son turned pale.

"Let's go into the house," he said, taking Karen by the hand.

It was a little while before supper time; the men had not yet come in from their work. Terkel sat alone in the room. He stared at his son and asked why they came together.

"We have news for you," said Ebbe. "Karen and I are betrothed."

"In that case there will be two to go away," said Terkel; "you'll not live here with me, understand."

"Now wait, will you, and let me tell you how you owe it to her that you are sitting here in this room at the present moment."

"What do you mean?"

"She did see who the third robber was, down in the Vissenbjerg road, but she wouldn't tell his name."

Terkel shrunk back; he fell heavily against the wall, but after a few minutes he lifted himself up and said in a broken voice:

"Let everything be as you wish, and now you will take the farm and manage it and the household."

From that evening Terkel left everything to the young couple. He would feed and watch the fowls out in the barnyard, but this was about all he did, and he said little.

Every day he went and looked at the white stone by the farm gate, and he would never let it be removed.

"I think that it's becoming black, oh, so black!" said he, looking round to see if anyone was watching. Then he would wash the dust and mud from the stone, making it white again. And every evening, just before bedtime, Karen would take down the hymn-book and read from it to the old man.

The next summer, when the committee went round from farm to farm, begging pieces of brass and copper for the new church bell, they came in turn to Terkel. He stood and bethought himself.

"Why should you go begging at every house?" said he. "I will give it all."

He went into his bed-room and brought out a great

Digitized by Google

bag of money which should be used in purchasing the new bell. The men broke out into exclamations of gratitude and praise for Terkel, but he had turned to see if Karen had witnessed what he did.

Accompanying the committee were the choir boys from the charity school, in white gowns, who stood before each house and sang a verse of some hymn. Before Terkel's they sang a whole hymn. He was deeply moved at his own generosity, but still he noticed that they sang the hymn all through.

"They only gave my neighbour one verse. I got four. However, that was a lot of money that I gave for the bell."

Karen stood with her hand in his. She kissed his hand and said:

"Father! Father! I believe that God has heard the prayer that I've been praying so long. Now you're certainly upon the right way."

"I must hasten to go that way," said he, "and you have helped me, oh, so much!"

That evening she filled the whole house with song, and after the lights had been put out and they were gone to bed Ebbe took her hand in his and said:

"I don't understand. What a great change has taken place in you! And you are more beautiful than I have ever seen you before."

"But yet I limp," she answered.

So time passed on. There came good and bad years. Karen did her duty and was a blessing to everyone. She was a good, pious, sensible woman, who helped her neighbours, shared what she had with the poor, and went every Sunday, no matter what the weather was, up to the Vissenbjerg church.

"That's a household pleasing to the Lord," declared the pastor, and so thought everyone. Terkel continued to pay his visits to the white stone; and when he thought that no one was looking he would clean it with great care.

But he was growing old; once a corpulent man, he had now become thin; he was bowed over; and it was with great difficulty that he could climb up the stairs to his chamber.

One evening he came in looking very happy.

"To-day they have finished hanging the new bell up in the church. Every time that it swings now it will ring out to God for me."

From the beginning of early spring he had to keep to his bed. When the leaves began to turn yellow and fall he whispered to himself:

"I've lain here and watched the swallows out of my window a whole summer through; a last summer, I think."

Karen nursed him and scarcely left his bedside.

One summer day as she came in with a bowl of gruel he lay gasping for breath and could scarcely speak so that one could understand him.

"The white stone out there will soon become black," he was mumbling. Karen bent down over him; she spoke gently, but no one could have heard what she said. At first the old man shook his head; then he shut his eyes and could not answer. She made him fold his hands while she sang softly a hymn of which he was very fond. Then suddenly she burst into tears, lifting his arms around her neck, and whispered:

"May I? Say yes, oh! say yes!"

He shook his head; but she begged again, more earnestly than before, and knelt down by the bed, no letting go his hand.

"You shall not speak about it again," he gasped. "I said no, and it must be as I said."

She sat there discouraged, with bowed head. Out of doors the wind was blowing the leaves from the trees and whirling them about in great flocks. Terkel looked up. Karen sat at the foot of the bed, her hands folded over the hymnbook.

"Talk to me a little," he whispered; "you sit there so silent and never say a word."

"You won't listen to what I say."

"Yes, I will, but you want what can't be. How does it concern the people what took place down there on the Vissenbjerg road? I must confess my sins before the Lord will forgive me, you say, but I'll lose the respect and esteem of the whole parish. What will people say when I come out among them again? for I can live a little while longer, I should think."

She did not answer; the tears were trickling down her cheeks.

"Are you angry?" he asked after a few moments. "Talk to me; I can't bear that you should sit there and not speak,"—but she interrupted him. "Must it be so? In God's name do what is right, what is best!"

A long time passed before he laid his fumbling hand on her head and said: "It shall be as you wish; it shall be so." She gave a cry of joy, ran out of the room and directed that a messenger be sent at once to the village for the pastor; she herself would follow with the waggon to fetch him.

It became evening, and it was late and dark before they returned. In the chamber there three great candles had been lit before Terkel's bed. He lay, twisting his thumbs and talking to himself, without regarding what went on about him. Once he opened his eyes, looked round and whispered:

"Let someone be sent to the church—I want the new bell rung—my bell. Listen! now it's ringing to God for me—He can hear it, can God—it's for me—for me alone—for I bought it! Will she come soon with the man?"

It was just about bedtime when the dogs began to bark and the waggon rolled into the farmyard. Karen followed the pastor up into Terkel's chamber. Ebbe would have accompanied them, but she pushed him gently back.

What took place there in the sick man's room no human being besides those three ever knew. The people outside heard a voice which was slow and solemn, and one which was soft and pleading, and then they could distinguish whimpering and sobbing sounds. Afterwards it became still, and it seemed as though there was no life in there—and, indeed, death was present.

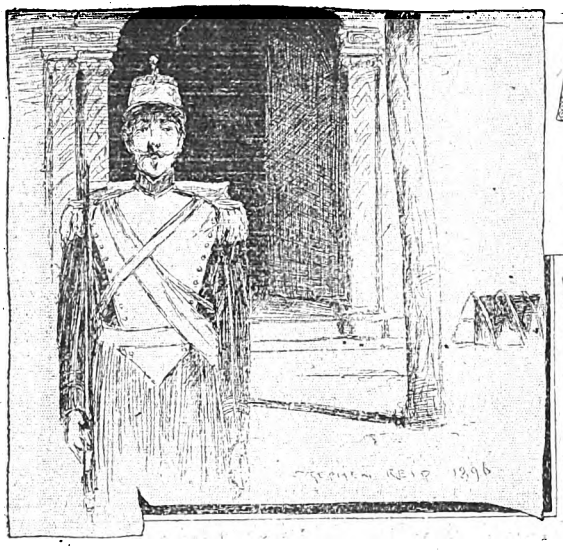
"How is he now?" questioned Ebbe, as Karen at length opened the door to let the parson out.

"He's better now than he's been for a long time," answered the pastor, "for now he's dead, gone to sleep in God's name. A great sinner lies in there; but the one who has wished him well and watched and prayed and delivered a soul from the error of its ways, that one is Karen, your good wife; blessed shall she be therefore in the sight of God and men!"

The stone out by the farm gate lay there for many a year. Every spring, at Whitsuntide, they gave it a coat of white wash and took good care that it was always white and free from spots.

R. T. Mumby.

Digitized by Google



A COURT-MARTIAL

A HUGE grey building in a straight street on the other side of the Garonne. Wondering urchins stop before the high door, surmounted by a flag, which is guarded day and night by a melancholy sentinel. It is always a curious spectacle—soldiers coming, or going, or drilling. The wide court, planted with sickly trees, suggests more the thought of a prison than of a barrack.

On this June afternoon, especially, a great sadness seemed to rest on the sun-baked walls. The soldiers wandered back and forth in silent groups, and from time to time cast glances up at the grated first floor window, behind which the court-martial was assembled.

Ten minutes before, the Colonel, president of the council, had appeared in the high stone casement, and a shudder still ran through all these men at the thought of the apparition; not one of them but had trembled before this human image of military justice.

But the accused, who was about to be judged up there, was not so very great a criminal after all. His crime was a week's desertion in time of peace. They all knew he would get off with half-a-year's imprisonment, but still they were sorry, as every man in his company liked Joseph Brinquant, a gay, good-humoured, witty Montaubian.

The council-hall opened into the court on one side, and on the other into an immense garden. Formerly, the enormous building was the convent of the Abbés of Montauriol; there was still something monastical about the high walls, and the great Christ carved in yellow wood took on, in the semi-darkness, the aspect of an implacable judge.

The members of the council were seated round an oblong, green-covered table. In the centre was Colonel Vigier, between two commanders-in-chief; then came a captain, a lieutenant and a non-commissioned officer. On the side for the defence was a lawyer from the Toulouse bar, and for this occasion Captain Mainjean was fulfilling the duties of prosecutor.

As for the accused himself, he was scarcely visible. Poor Joseph Brinquant was huddled together on his seat, as though to hide from the others' gaze; and short, nervous spasms contracted his pale face, while his eyes wandered from Captain Mainjean to Colonel Vigier with an expression of poignant anguish.

Very dissimilar were the three actors in this drama of military life. The Colonel was a red-haired Colossus, in epaulettes. His face, tanned and hardened by the campaigns of twenty-five years and a life in the open air, would have been forbidding but for the kind, gentle, peaceful look in the blue eyes. Captain Mainjean, on the contrary, was quite the type of the modern officer. His delicately-shaped head, grey eyes, and yellow hair gave him a somewhat effeminate appearance, but his sensitive nostrils and nervous mouth denoted ambition and a strong will. With folded arms he waited, and Joseph Brinquant, a dark, spare, wiry southerner, found the suspense that weighed upon him almost unendurable.

At last the Colonel said:

"It is for Captain Mainjean to speak."

Captain Mainjean rose and commenced:

"Gentlemen, I will briefly state the facts which bring before this tribunal Joseph Brinquant, born at Montauban, the 8th October, 1869; at present a private soldier.

"The accused has been in the service sixteen months; his record is excellent. All that I find against him is twenty-four hours in guard-house for a slight offence. His chiefs and comrades all declare that up to last month Brinquant was always exact in his duties, and of a merry and sociable mood. His father, a well-to-do farmer in Capeville, makes him a liberal allowance, and Brinquant has always shown himself generous to a fault; so he could honourably and happily have served out his term if he had not allowed himself to be overcome by the most unfortunate of passions.

"It was recently noticed that Brinquant, usually so laughing and communicative, was becoming gloomy and morose. He avoided mingling with his comrades. They thought he must be ill, but to all their friendly inquiries he gave evasive replies. At last, one evening, he asked for and obtained leave of absence for the night, and the next morning he was marked absent at roll-call.

"Brinquant had disappeared.

"Chance soon put the captain commanding the first company on the deserter's track. An old clothes dealer in Toulouse, one Emile Badin, of Sainte Sever Street, declared that the previous evening a private of the regiment had presented himself at his shop. It was Brinquant, who came to exchange his uniform for citizen's clothes. Badin had no idea he was lending himself to anything more serious than a love-adventure. Brinquant, he argued, was free for the day and would be sure to return for his military effects at night. But seeing that his customer did not reappear, the man became frightened, and dreading inculpation in some unpleasant affair, he went at once to the captain of the first company and made a deposition of the facts.

Digitized by Google

"After that it was easy to trace the fugitive. A railway official recognised Brinquant from the description he had received of him. In the night, a traveller, accompanied by a woman, had purchased two first-class tickets to Narbonne. The employé noticed this man particularly, on account of the strangeness of his demeanour; his sharp speech and brusque movements betrayed some inward, nervous fear. One of the station officials exclaimed, as he saw the woman:

"'Why, look! It is Concepcion running off with a lover.'"

Captain Mainjean paused here for a moment. The accused drew a long, heavy sigh.

"At Narbonne," continued the Captain, "it was learned that the fugitives had gone in the direction of Port-Bon, but at the Spanish frontier all traces of them were lost. In the extradition treaty which exists between France and Spain the case of desertion from the army is not provided for, so that at this point military authority was disarmed.

"None thought ever to see Joseph Brinquant again, when, one morning, he came to this place and constituted himself prisoner. He frankly avowed his misdeed: for love of a music-hall singer he had not hesitated to dishonour himself by flight to a foreign land. Hardly was he out of France, though, when remorse took possession of this man who had, for a moment, been blinded by passion. He could realise what it would be to be condemned to exile—the most cruel of all exiles. For many long years, until lapse of time should bring impunity, he could not return to his native land. For long years he must shun his compatriots, must blush before them and hang his head in shame when they talked of France. Better submit at once to whatever punishment he had incurred; that is why Joseph Brinquant came of his own free will to await this court-martial before which he appears to-day.

"Perhaps, you will think, gentlemen, that a repentance so prompt deserves indulgence. I beg of you to resist this movement, and hope that you will not be tempted to mitigate the punishment that is due to this man. I urge the full enforcement of the law against him as a deserter. Especially at this present time should the military code be inflexible. When the army is on the eve of the most redoubtable events, it should be maintained, from high to low, in absolute fidelity to the flag. Every man to-day is a soldier and every soldier a citizen. He must acquire in the service a habit of discipline, of obedience, of devotion. It is too easy, in truth, to excuse a fault by attributing it to blind passion. Altogether too prevalent is the habit of making light of this sort of crime.

"Now, in this case, I ask you to make an example without allowing yourselves to be influenced by the excellence of the prisoner's antecedents. He followed the woman he loved, you will urge. But what a woman she was; the police-records before you are enough to enlighten you on that point. He returned and constituted himself prisoner of his own accord? Can you be sure of what motives he obeyed in doing so? The woman drove him from her, or, perhaps, Brinquant's family, in shame at his conduct, refused any longer to meet his needs. You must not overlook the fact that there are times when pity would be culpable; to excuse is to encourage it. Now that all are constrained to military service it would be strange, indeed, if this deserter were to escape full punishment under the pretext that he yielded to his passion for a creature unworthy of his love!"

Captain Mainjean continued.

The members of the council had listened to Captain Mainjean in the most profound silence. Some among them were astonished at the implacable severity of his words. He was known in the regiment for an excellent officer, conscientious, industrious and prompt in his duty, but all thought him kind and compassionate to human failings.

Why, then, should he suddenly show himself so pitiless towards this poor private? Certainly this peasant's son, mad with love for a music-hall singer, did not seem so utterly unworthy of pardon.

The prisoner's counsel was about to begin to speak, when Captain Mainjean raised his hand, and in a voice somewhat altered by emotion, said:

"I beg the council to accord me a few minutes' more attention."

The Colonel inclined his head in assent, and Captain Mainjean continued

"Gentlemen, it is by a very fortuitous circumstance that I am performing the functions of public prosecutor to-day; our respected comrade, M. de Beaupré, being, unfortunately, indisposed, it has fallen to me to replace him.

"I have given you my opinion as to the merits of this case. I now request your permission to relate to you an analogous one; when you have heard, your conscience will decide."

Digitized by Google

There was a slight murmur here. The Captain had apparently finished his speech; what more could he have to add? And it was strange, but Captain Mainjean was no longer the same man; he had turned very pale, and he spoke as though he were labouring under repressed emotion.

The accused alone appeared entirely unmoved by external things, and was as though crushed by the prosecutor's words. His head buried in his hands, he was motionless, except for an occasional shiver that ran through his frame.

"Ten years ago," went on Captain Mainjean, "the sixty-fifth was garrisoned at Bayonne. One fine day, the annual graduation of officers at Saint-Cyr brought to the garrison a gay young second-lieutenant—altogether too gay, he was, and fond of life—who lost no time in making himself the talk of the town by his escapades.

"One evening, a little more harebrained than usual, the lieutenant induced several of his comrades to accompany him to a music-hall in Thiers Street. A little singer was appearing there who was all the rage at that time—one of those Moorish types so common on the Spanish frontier. The lieutenant and his friends applauded wildly, and threw the girl flowers and bonbons, to the intense disapproval of the peaceable citizens who filled the hall. So that there was nothing at all surprising to the officers in the lieutenant leaving them at the end of the performance with the words:

"'I am going to make her acquaintance, gentlemen.'

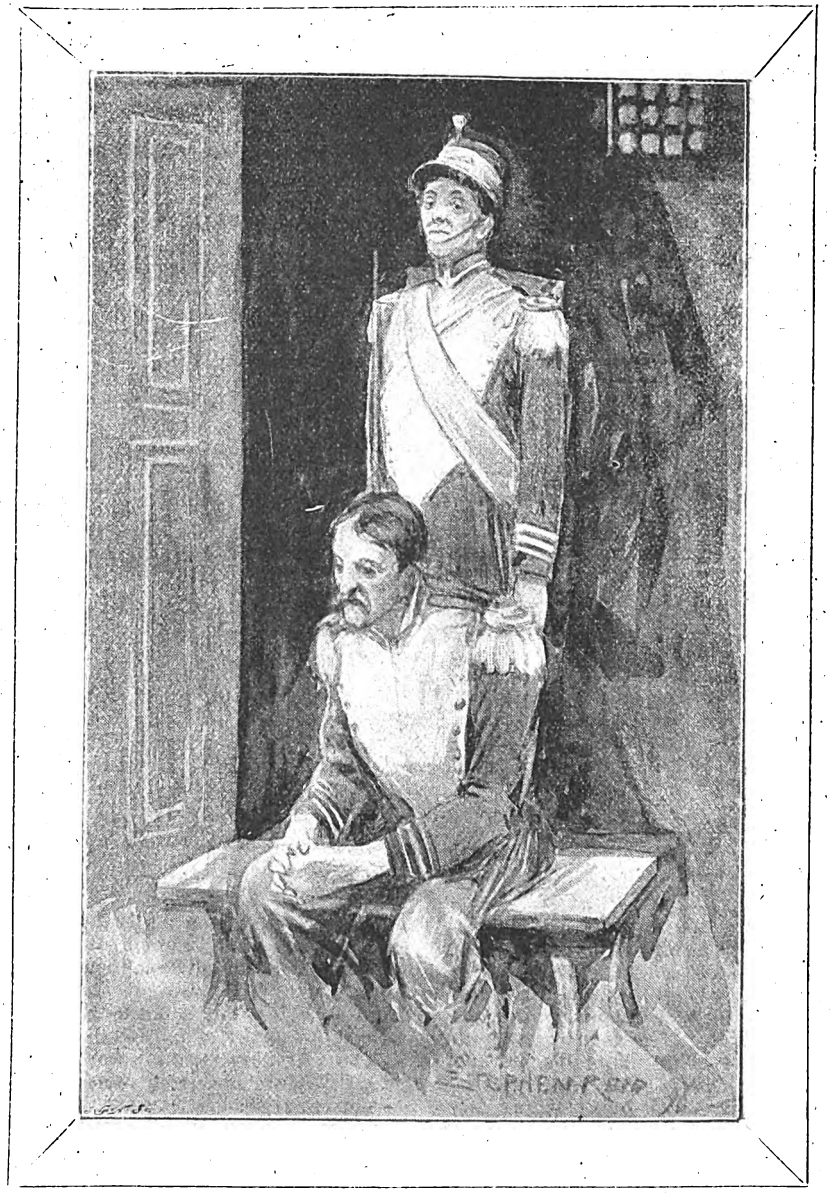
"But more than surprise, actual dismay was felt, when this caprice of a night turned out to be a serious affair. The lieutenant was now never absent from the singer's side; together they were everywhere to be seen—at the theatre, the races, in the street, at Biarritz. Things went so far that the captain of the company summoned the young man to him and paternally remonstrated with him.

"You must know, gentlemen, that this reckless young fellow belonged to a family of soldiers. His father, a former cavalry colonel, possessed nothing in the world but his pension and the thousand francs his Commander's Cross brought him: his brother was sailing the China seas as lieutenant in the navy, while he——"

Here came a short pause. Captain Mainjean spoke now with the greatest difficulty.

"The captain said all he could; it was in vain. But yet, with it all, the young lieutenant was not at heart a bad fellow. He was simply blinded by love for this woman, as Joseph Brinquant, the deserter, was for another. He believed implicitly in this Navarrese girl as Joseph Brinquant believed in Concepcion.

"I will be brief; it is terribly painful for me to recall these memories. What was to be expected happened.



The accused alone appeared entirely unmoved by external things.

Digitized by Google

The lieutenant, fresh from Saint-Cyr though he was, deserted shamefully, just as private Brinquant did. He crossed the frontier and followed the girl to Vittoria. You know what would have to follow; at the end of a week to be marked absent without leave, then written down a deserter, then the court-martial, condemnation, and the rest.

"Ah! what a noble man that captain was! He had guessed it all. Without a word to anyone he got on the train for Spain. And when he found the runaway, there were no long speeches, or recriminations; he just spoke tenderly to the young man of his father who would die of shame, of the brother who would be forced to tear the nobly-earned stripes from his arms, of his whole honourable family given over to a future of disgrace. As he listened to his chief the lieutenant bowed his head lower and lower—at last he burst into tears, and with those tears went forth from him all his guilty thoughts, his unhallowed infatuation; with those tears was extinguished all his wretched love. He came back humbly, docilely, ready to do anything to make amends for his fault.

"Ah! I assure you, his heart has ever since cherished a sincere worship for the simple, brave man who drew him back from that abyss! Gentlemen, you all know the captain I have been speaking of; he is a colonel now, and sits opposite me to-day as president of this court-martial!"

Loud murmurs burst forth. Colonel Vigier's face was ashy pale, and he pulled continually at his long moustache, stammering huskily:

"Captain! Captain!"

But soon silence was restored. A deep emotion fell over these men, all familiar with danger, and hardened by war and life's trials as they were.

Captain Mainjean then proudly raised his head, and warmly, energetically, continued:

"Gentlemen, I have invoked the full severity of the law against the deserter, Joseph Brinquant; that was my duty.

"I now make an appeal for your clemency in his case; that is my right. I, myself, am the lieutenant of Bayonne. Like the prisoner I passed the frontier; only which of us two is the guiltier, if you please? I, son and brother of soldiers, fresh from the military training of Saint-Cyr, never having had examples of aught but patriotism and loyalty before me in my life; or this simple child of the soil, a farmer's son, scarcely able to read or write, whose idea of country is narrowed down to that corner of earth on which the village church steeple rears itself? Judge with your conscience, but decide with your heart, for if the accused be guilty, what then am I?"

After a few seconds' deliberation the council rendered a verdict of acquittal.

ALBERT DELPIT.

 HAVE YOU **

FORGOTTEN ANYTHING?

Memory is a treacherous thing, and it is safer to make a note of those little trifles which go towards making life pleasant.

Jot this down in your Diary:

MONDAY..... To call at 17 and 18, Henrietta Street for the patterns I promised to purchase for the wife.

TUESDAY..... To look in at the newsagent's for the current "HOME NOTES" and "HOME COOKERY" published to-day. Must set aside a 1d. for each of them. "S.S." for myself.

WEDNESDAY. Have promised to get home in time for dinner; the wife having promised to try a few new dishes from the cookery paper bought yesterday.

THURSDAY.... Intend to dine at the club. The wife's busy making the children new frocks from "FASHIONS FOR CHILDREN." By-the-bye, to-day's the 15th of the month, must put 1½d. in my waistcoat pocket to remind me to buy the new Number for her.

FRIDAY..... Will be able to buy "P.W." on my way home to-night. Another 1d.

SATURDAY..... Am paid to-day. Have promised to take home "MELODY" and "PEARSON'S MAGAZINE." I make it a rule to spend 1s. on my wife in some little present every Saturday. What better than these?

SUNDAY..... A quiet smoke and a chance of reading "P.W." and "SHORT STORIES" in peace.

AND

HERE AM I,

A WELL READ MAN, WITH A GOOD WIFE, A WELL-MANAGED HOUSEHOLD AND PRETTILY DRESSED CHILDREN. ALL FOR 1s. 7d.

Jumbled Story Competition.

No. 17.

ON pages 527 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 October 26th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
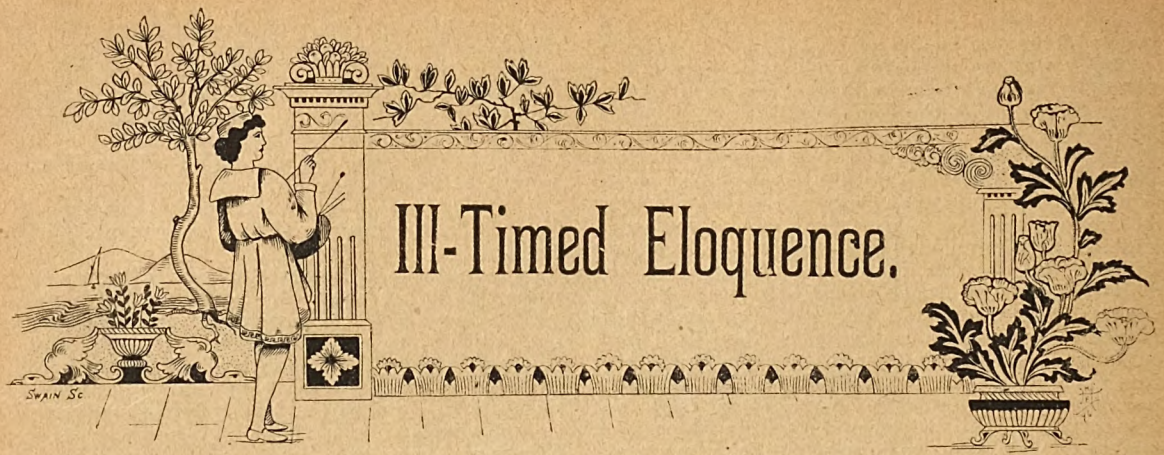
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the first of the readers living in Ireland who succeeds in forwarding the correct, or most nearly correct, solution.

Digitized by Google



Ill-Timed Eloquence.

Place aux dames, so let me introduce Miss Delia O'Donnell to you first.

She was distinctly Irish, as brogue, cognomen and her abundant "gift of the gab" all combined to testify. Needless to say she was pretty, with cheeks like damask roses, dark brown hair and sparkling eyes. She was very small in face, form, and feature, and had a piping, though shrill, little voice, like a bird's.

He, Cyril Crowther, was distinctly English, with fair hair and blue eyes, and the somewhat vacant expression that is occasionally to be seen on the face of the gilded youth of the nation that considers itself the savouring of the earth.

They met in London at a crowded dance. They had neither of them been having a very good time; she was a stranger and knew few people, and he always looked upon parties as martyrdom, for he was afflicted with a painful stammer.

He had tried to make conversation with girl after girl and the only result had been signal failure. He had given it up as a bad job and had determined upon an early departure when he found himself near Miss Delia O'Donnell and could not resist asking to be introduced to her.

"M—m—m—may——" he began in trepidation.

"The pleasure of the next dance?" she briskly interrupted him. "Oh, certainly, I shall be delighted. Is not the floor splendid? Felt bound, you see, to plunge upon the well worn topic! Not as well worn in this case, though, as might be, far too covered with non-dancing dowagers who most decidedly have worn very badly, and who, 'pon me honour, admit of no room for plunging. Do you know the hostess? I have never set eyes on her. When I arrived, the daughter was the only one available to shake hands with. Quaint affairs, these large London dances! Either the hosts seem too good for their guests, or the company seem above their entertainers. Ah! ye don't know what hospitality is over here, like we do in Paddy-land. Sure, I never told you I come from Ireland. Fenian troubles over there? Ah! now, what do you take us for? We are not always in danger of our skins! What an amusing idea! Just like you English people!"

Mr. Cyril Crowther was delighted. He whirled her off amongst the dancers, never having needed to say a single word, and yet possessed of the pleasing sensation that he had been conversing volubly.

Dance after dance found the two partners, and Cyril Crowther never enjoyed himself better. He only needed to gulp forth a disjointed word and Miss O'Donnell would seize upon it, regard it as a brilliant thought and dilate on it for minutes without ceasing.

"She need never discover the fact of my stammering," thought Crowther, with enchantment.

There was only one thing which would have been counted a drawback by most people, the idea hit upon by Miss O'Donnell was invariably quite opposed in meaning to the remark he had struggled to bring forth.

"Never mind," Crowther took comfort, "she gives me credit for much sharper sayings than I should ever manage to give utterance to."

When the dance all too soon was over, he found himself to be of the very decided opinion that he had never met so charming a young woman as Miss O'Donnell before.

With a contented sigh he reflected that she had spoken of going to Lady Crushaway's reception the following afternoon. He would be able to see her there. But the day after, alas! she had told him she was returning to Ireland, so when could he hope to meet her again, especially as his leave was at an end and his passage booked by the next P. and O. steamer for India.

"Gather the roses while ye may!" Old Time was literally flying, but Mr. Crowther had to content himself by merely gazing at those that bloomed on Delia's cheek the next afternoon at the reception. He was as taken with her as ever. She talked on as rapidly as possible, and her listener did not even trouble to intersperse her conversation with his solitary stuttering words.

One idea took possession of him—this gay, vivacious little creature would surely prove to a stammering man a paragon of a wife. But though his thoughts were filled with this subject it was not till some hours after the reception that he managed to make up his mind. Yes, he had no doubt of it, he loved her distractedly and life would be unbearable unless she consented to become his wife. But how to put the question to her—that was the first and most important problem to be solved. He did not know where she was staying, so could not venture to call on her next day, and she left by the night mail for Ireland. There was nothing for it but to put in an appearance at Euston in the evening and lay open his heart to her there.

Cyril Crowther spent an almost sleepless night. Would Miss O'Donnell be alone at the station or would some tiresome individual come to see her off? And what should he say to her? She had a habit of guessing at his words, but then as she usually hit upon a totally wrong meaning, this time it would be necessary for him to speak fully and to speak out. Stammering would surely desert him at that last momentous moment. love would give wings to his halting words, and in fervid eloquence all his hopes and longings would be breathed forth! He tossed about in bed rehearsing his proposal. "Delia, I love you ardently, will you be mine? You are an angel and I dare not aspire to your affection, I only trust that in your gentle pity you will bend graciously to me and install yourself my sovereign, Delia, my Queen!"

Digitized by Google

His fervour almost brought the moisture to his eyes, and soon after he fell into a short, troubled sleep.

Two hours before the train left he might have been seen wandering round Euston, while the time crept wearily by. But at last, after interminable waiting, he found it was going only too fast. Twenty minutes was all that remained of it, and Miss O'Donnell was not there yet. A quarter of an hour and still she did not come. Ten minutes he paced frantically up and down. Nine, eight, seven — A hansom drove up and a lady sprang out.

"You here, Mr. Crowther? This is most charming. Going on by a later train? Porter, porter, here; these two boxes. Engaged, you say? Sure, you look as though ye should have been married as well years and years ago. Ah! now, Mr. Crowther, don't trouble about my things, ah, now, don't. Kingston boat? Yes, of course, that is the one I am crossing by. Oh! you did not mean that, ye meant——"

Cyril looked at the clock in desperation. Less than five minutes now, and no chance of a word till boxes were labelled, ticket and seat taken. He tried to transact the business with haste, but nothing could prevent Miss O'Donnell from lavishing words upon everyone. She was at last safe in the carriage, but seemed as though she were going to continue into eternity a one-sided conversation with the porter. Despair lent the anguished lover boldness. He swept the unoffending official aside, at the same time thrusting a florin into his hand. Now or never was the moment. "I love you," were to be his first words.

"Er—er—I——"

"Oh! do you really often travel down this line? I know nothing of it, nothing in fact of England. It is a more wooded country than Ireland, but I would not exchange my Emerald Island for any other land in the world for all that."

As she rippled on in her light, chirping tones it occurred to Crowther that he was really wasting time. It would be quite sufficient in the stress of the moment to say, "Will you be my wife?"

"W—w—ill——"

"Really, now! I am distressed to hear it. 'Pon me word! the first thing that struck me this evening was how seedy you were looking. I shall sympathise with you still more deeply in a few hours when I shall be bitterly paying the price of gallivanting. I need hardly, I suppose, enter into further explanation; but I'm blessed if England ever sees me over again. I don't know which are worse, the odorous steamers or the screeching trains, in which I am always in terror of my life of being crushed to smithereens!"

In her volley, Cyril Crowther's "you" and "be" were quite unheard. Miss O'Donnell only paused in time for him to give proud utterance to "my wife."

"Your wife? Ah! now ye don't mean to tell me that you're married, and you looking such a boy! But you naughty London men are all alike. Sure, and it's my heart ye might have broken, sinner. What right had you, a married man, to have danced with me all one night?"

Beads of perspiration broke forth on Cyril's brow. The guard was taking a final promenade up the platform, the carriage doors were all securely shut, in another instant the whistle would be sounding and the train be off. That she could at that last moment so cruelly misjudge him seemed all too hard. The whistle rang out.

"D—D—Delia!" he cried.

"An' it's Delia you'd be calling me!" for once having heard what he really meant. "No, sir, I am not accustomed to such liberties from married men."

He must write and explain; it was his only chance. But he did not know her address, and what means were there for him to find it out.

"Ad—dress," he shouted, pursuing at full speed the retreating train.

"Your wife's address? No, thank you, I don't want it. Good-bye."

The train was gone! With it went his hopes of the morning. "Love's sweet young dream," that was to have illumined his life.

"Chap looks a bit green, poor fellow!" was the porter's comment as he staggered slowly off.

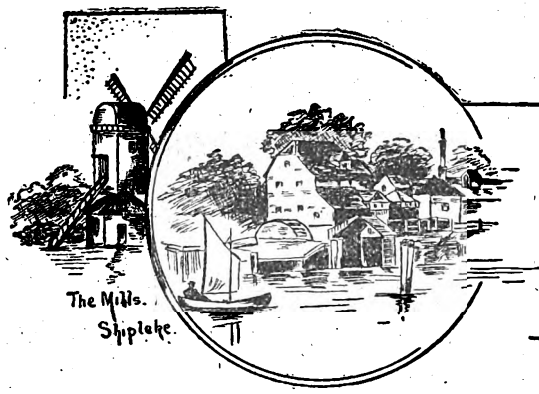
* * * * *

He is toiling beneath the suns of India now, I have no doubt, and from all accounts Delia O'Donnell has missed a chance, for she has never married and does not seem likely to, though whether this fact lies in a scarcity of male population in the vicinity of her Irish home, or is caused by her masculine compatriots desiring wives who would allow them a word in edgeways, I have never been able to find out. One picture alone rises before me—their meeting once again when world-worn and grey headed. She, as talkative as ever, having kept in practice by conversing to the pigs and cows. He, quite cured of stammering, with his old timidity replaced by the determination that is said to be an attribute of the British race. A buxom matron is at his side followed by a bevy of bashful youths and blushing maidens. He steps aside, and leaving them grasps Delia by the hand.

"Thirty years ago I was not married, Miss O'Donnell, and I tried to make you a proposal, but you never gave me time!"

SEREN DIVA.

Digitized by Google



THE TWO FINGERS.

At the extremity of a little country town at no great distance from Tours, on the high coach-road from Paris to Bordeaux, there stood, about thirty years ago, a pretty wayside inn, with white walls and a swinging sign bearing the effigy of Le Grand Roi, otherwise Henry IV.

It was during a November evening, in the year 1818, when the wind was sighing and surging without, and the rain splashing down with uncompromising resolution, that the worthy landlord of Le Grand Roi, the honest, but somewhat imperious M. Ebrard, his three children, and one of his neighbours, who had taken shelter from the inclemency of the weather at his comfortable hearth, were seated round an enormous fire of pine logs, talking over the local gossip, and enjoying themselves as those only can do who feel a sensation of security from the inflictions of such a storm.

"Just hear the rain!" exclaimed M. Ebrard, after an instant, during which all the party had been silenced by a louder and wilder blast than any by which it had been preceded. "This is the third day that it has been pouring down, without a prospect of any change for the better."

Suddenly as he was talking two distinct blows were heard on the house door, given apparently with the handle of a riding-whip. The men removed their pipes from their mouths and listened.

"Who on earth can this be?" exclaimed the landlord, "it can't be a traveller, unless the diligence is behind its time; and besides——"

Again two loud knocks echoed through the kitchen; and M. Ebrard, somewhat reluctantly, took up the lamp, and then, without attempting to open it, he demanded, in a harsh impatient voice, who was there?

"A traveller," was the reply; "are you going to keep me in the rain for another hour?"

"What do you want?" was the next interrogation.

"What do I want? Why, some supper and a bed, of course, if I am not quite drowned before you let me in."

"There, there, don't be angry, monsieur, whoever you are," grumbled the host. As he spoke he drew back the ponderous bolt and raised his lamp to a level with the stranger's face. The investigation apparently terminated satisfactorily, for his manner changed at once; he bowed respectfully, shouldered a trunk which stood upon the threshold, reclosed the door, and preceded the new-comer into the kitchen.

A fine-looking young man threw off his large wrapping cloak, which was dripping with mud or rain, made one bound towards the blazing fire, and seated himself upon the bench, saying in a clear, joyous voice as he did so: "This is charming, this is delicious, mine host! Had you expected me I could not have wished a pleasanter welcome. And now I must ask you to hasten my supper, for I want to get off by the patache to Monsett to-morrow at daybreak; I should like to go to bed as early as I can."

"All will be ready in ten minutes," said Ebrard. "But you will excuse me if I venture to remind you that you might have gone on there by the diligence, as it passes through the town, instead of stopping here only to start again at dawn."

"Ha, ha!" laughed the stranger; "you are either very curious or very timid, monsieur mon hôte, for you have not as yet got rid of your distrust. In order to tranquillise you, therefore, I will explain this much. My family reside in a country house at a short distance from the town, and by continuing my journey in the diligence I should have arrived in the middle of the night—an arrangement I was particularly anxious to avoid; whereas, by taking the boat at six o'clock to-morrow morning, I shall reach home by dinner-time. Have I now succeeded in satisfying you as to my honesty of purpose?"

"Oh, monsieur!" was the somewhat embarrassed reply of the landlord as he met the sly smile of the young man; "you have quite misunderstood me. One look into your frank and handsome face was enough."

The supper was soon served, and in less than twenty minutes had disappeared; and then the worthy landlord lit a candle and conducted his guest to his chamber.

M. le Sous-Lieutenant Adolphe de Rosval hastily divested himself of his clothes, and, without extinguishing his light, threw himself on his bed.

In the meanwhile, a second traveller had taken up his rest at Le Grand Roi. He was a man of between forty and fifty years of age, tall and powerful, with broad shoulders and ample chest; his grizzled hair was brushed low upon his forehead, and there was a sinister expression in his eyes; but his features were well formed, and his manner self-possessed and easy.

"I imagine," he said, when the greetings with his host were over, "that I must be your only pratique to-night, for the weather will have kept all comfort-loving people under their own roofs."

"Pardon me, monsieur," was the reply; "the room next to your own is already occupied by a young man who arrived little more than an hour ago; but there is no fear that he will disturb you, for he appears to be a perfect gentleman, and is moreover so tired, and so anxious to get on, that he leaves us at daybreak to-morrow."

The brow of the stranger darkened, and he made no reply.

"Be careful," he said, a few minutes afterwards,

Digitized by Google

"to call me in the morning at seven o'clock, for I must be at Tours by midday. Ah! by-the-bye, I shall require a saddle horse—let one be ready for me, as my time is precious."

Saying which the new comer ascended the stairs to his room.

Adolphe was, as we have stated, already in bed, with the candle still burning upon his table. He had, as yet, been unable to sleep; his brain was too busy. His newly-acquired rank and the anticipated meeting with his parents and his sisters had made him wakeful; so that when he heard the heavy tread of a man's foot traversing the passage, and passing the door of his room, he was conscious of every sound. Suddenly a thought struck him; and springing to the floor, he took a key from his waistcoat pocket, opened his trunk, and seizing his uniform sword, which lay upon the top, placed it under his pillow.

Midnight struck from the old clock in the kitchen, and all was profoundly silent in the house, but still Adolphe remained sleepless; when suddenly he was startled by a sound, which appeared to him like that of a key slowly turned in the lock. He listened attentively; but as it was not repeated, he concluded that he had been the sport of his own over-excited nerves, and drawing the bedclothes closer about him, he determined to profit by the few hours which were left, and endeavour to obtain some rest.

He had scarcely begun to sleep, however, when he was a second time disturbed, and on this occasion, he was at once convinced that he had made no mistake. Someone was endeavouring to enter his room. The candle had burnt out; but grasping his sword, he noiselessly groped his way to the door, and stood motionless beside it. About five minutes afterwards, the noise ceased, and he began to hope that the would-be intruder had abandoned all hope of invading his privacy, whatever might have been his motive for seeking to do so. He had carefully locked the door of his room, and had little fear that the fastening could be forced; but accidentally casting his eyes on the floor, he saw by the light of the moon which gleamed full upon the windows of his room, and which, rendered more vivid by its contrast from the subsided storm, was pouring out its chastened radiance from a now cloudless sky, that a hand has been introduced between the boards of his chamber and the bottom of the door, and was seeking to lift it from its hinges.

This was too much; and steadily raising his sword above his head, he struck downwards with all his force upon the hand thus traitorously employed. A smothered groan fell upon his ear, and a sound of stealthy steps retreating along the passage, and ere long all was still—but two bleeding figures remained on the floor!

Adolphe rushed to the fire-place; a few warm fragments of wood enabled him to light a second candle which stood upon the chimney-piece, and he then proceeded to examine the hideous trophy of his victory. For a moment he shrank from touching the first "fleshing" of his maiden-sword, but he rapidly overcame the weakness, and picking up the severed fingers, he carefully washed away the blood, and folded them up in his handkerchief.

"On the honour of a sous-lieutenant," he murmured to himself, "that was a lucky stroke, and really for a robber, the fingers are passably slender, and the nails tolerably clean. Well, I suppose that all is over for to-night; so, as I am shivering with cold, I had better go to my bed again."

Adolphe was young and fearless; and in a quarter of an hour he was sound asleep.

Day was breaking when the landlord awoke our hero, who accepted with considerable satisfaction a cup of excellent coffee. As he did so he instinctively glanced at the hands of M. Ebrard, and had no sooner ascertained that they were intact than he began to relate to him his nocturnal adventure, and to point to the blood upon the floor of the chamber and to the ghastly parcel on the chair.

The honest landlord turned ashy white as he listened, and clung to the arm of Adolphe for support; but he had no sooner rallied than he rushed towards the room of his elder guest. The door was open, he drew back the curtains of the bed and found it empty; traces of blood were distinguishable in the direction of the window, which was also open; he looked out; the heavy impress of a man's foot was visible on the soft soil of the garden which abutted on the high road; and thus M. Ebrard, excited as he was, soon convinced himself that the mutilated robber could be no other than the stately traveller who had honoured his poor house on the preceding night.

His indignation and horror were extreme; and he had no sooner seen Adolphe depart than he hurried off to acquaint the police with what had occurred; not forgetting to relieve his mind by the way by communicating to every acquaintance whom he met the particulars of the tragedy which had desecrated the hitherto respectable auberge of Le Grand Roi.

Adolphe de Rosval reached his home about midday; as he was not expected, and accompanied his first greetings with the welcome intelligence of his new honours, his appearance was hailed with the most vehement joy. His fond mother wept as she held him to her heart, and his sisters clung to him with mingled tenderness and pride.

"Only think, mamma, he is an officer already! Is it not charming? What will papa say?"

"But where is my father?" asked the young man—"his welcome is still wanting."

"You know he is often from home," said Madame de Rosval; "and we are as little as ever in his confidence. He left us three days ago, but we expect him home to-day."

"And is he still as low-spirited and silent as when I saw him last?" inquired Adolphe.

"Unfortunately, yes," replied the gentle matron. "I fear that he has involved himself in speculation beyond our means; and that the idea of having compromised the future welfare of his children presses heavily upon him; but your unlooked-for return, Adolphe, and your happy tidings will, I trust, restore him to cheerfulness."

As soon as the family circle had become somewhat composed, and that one person was at length permitted to speak at a time, Adolphe was overwhelmed with questions, every member of the party being anxious to learn all that he had done since their last parting.

"It is at all events, a blessing," said his mother, as she fondly passed her hand over his hair, "that you have performed your journey without any accident, my son, however monotonous you may have found it."

"Nay, ma bonne mère," smiled Adolphe, "it was not altogether so monotonous as you may imagine; for I at least met with one adventure strange enough to bear telling."

"An adventure, and a strange one?" exclaimed his sisters simultaneously; "oh, Adolphe, let us hear it."

Digitized by Google

He complied with their request, and no cheek around him grew paler than his own as he recalled the extraordinary event of the previous night.

"And, by the way," he added, when he had brought his narrative to a close, "I must not forget to tell you that I carried away with me the undeniable proofs of my victory—here they are," and as he spoke he drew a handkerchief from his pocket in which something was evidently folded.

At that very instant the door of the room opened, and a man entered, large in stature, but pale and weak, and with his clothes saturated with rain. He could scarcely stagger to a chair before he sank down like one whose vital powers were utterly exhausted; and in a moment the whole family were crowded about him.

"My father! my dear father!" exclaimed Adolphe; "weary as you evidently are, how thankful I am that you have returned. I have news for you that will, I know, be welcome."

As he spoke the young man extended his hand, but the action met with no response; and as he glanced towards that which was so strangely withheld, he remarked that it was enveloped in a bloodstained linen.

"What!" he asked anxiously, "are you suffering from more than fatigue? Have you been wounded?"

"Yes," was the faint reply; "as I was coming through the forest, four leagues from this, I was attacked by brigands. I had heard that they were in the neighbourhood, but I believed it to be an idle rumour. I endeavoured to defend myself; and in the fray one of the ruffians struck off two of my fingers. I am faint from loss of blood; give me wine, and I shall soon be better."

Madame de Rosval hurried to the sideboard, and with a trembling hand and swimming eyes brought the required refreshment, while the two elder girls wound their arms about their father's neck, and wept piteously. Adolphe stood motionless, like one in a frightful dream; but little Rosalie, the pet and plaything of the family, too young to comprehend the sorrow on which she looked, and full of curiosity to see what her soldier brother had really brought home, busied herself in unfolding the handkerchief which had fallen from his hand on the entrance of his father, and she had no sooner succeeded than, clapping her chubby hands in childish delight, she called out, almost breathlessly:

"Mamma! Mamma! Adolphe has got the two fingers he cut off at the inn; give them to poor papa, and then he will be quite well again."

* * * * *

In another hour M. de Rosval was in the hands of justice. The landlord of Le Grand Roi had been so active in his exertions to redeem the honour of his house, that the gendarmes had tracked the culprit by the traces of his blood; and in the extremity of their anguish his family had forgotten to urge upon him a second flight.

On the 20th of December, the assize court of Tours was filled to overflowing. The event was one productive of unusual excitement; the idle and unfeeling were on the tip-toe of expectation; a drama of real life, and involving real suffering, was to be conducted before their very eyes. A father was about to be tried for the attempted murder of his son; and, moreover, the prisoner was no common criminal, but a man of old and honoured family. No wonder that the whole city was convulsed with curiosity and animation!

The court had assembled; the prisoner was ushered to his seat; the jury was duly sworn, and the proceedings commenced.

Pale, agitated, and painfully excited, Adolphe de Rosval replied to the summons of the greffier, and prepared to give his evidence. He was closely wrapped in a large military cloak, but raised his right hand steadily, and repeated the oath in a clear and audible voice.

"What is your name?" demanded the President.

"Adolphe Ernest Leon de Rosval."

"Your profession?"

"Pupil of St. Cyr; sub-lieutenant of the — regiment of the line."

"Your age?"

"Nineteen."

Then followed the whole detail of the nocturnal attempt upon his life; or, as he persisted in believing it to be, upon his property; but he was, as a necessary consequence of his position throughout the adventure, unable to establish the identity of the culprit. Not once had he ventured to turn his eyes towards the banc d'infamie on which his wretched father was seated between two gendarmes; and the President, touched by the painfulness of his position, gave him permission to withdraw.

Jean Antoine Ebrard, the landlord of Le Grand Roi, was the next witness to be called. He had died suddenly of heart disease three weeks before.

The circumstantial evidence against M. de Rosval was overwhelming, but still failed to establish the identity of the culprit. The evidence of the landlord or his stepdaughter must have condemned him; but the one was dead, and the other had positively sworn that she had never seen him before.

After the counsel for the prosecution (procureur du roi) had addressed the court, the counsel for the prisoner made an able speech, in which he strenuously endeavoured to prove an alibi. He stated that it was impossible to prove that the prisoner at the bar had slept at the auberge of Le Grand Roi on the night of the mysterious event which had led to the present trial "No, gentlemen of the jury," he concluded, "the accused has been a victim, not an assassin. That he has been mutilated by violence is certain; but he has explained, in the clearest manner, the cause of this unfortunate coincidence; and the sword of the son is unstained by the father's blood."

"To prove which fact," exclaimed a hollow and almost inarticulate voice from amidst the crowd in the body of the court, "there are the fingers which I cut off under the door of my room." And as Adolphe ceased speaking, an officer of the court laid them upon the desk of the President.

Having silently examined them, an expression of astonishment was visible upon the countenance of the learned judge, who handed them to the procureur by whom they were in turn transferred to the jury-box. It was at once perceived that the severed fingers thus produced in evidence had belonged to the left hand, while M. de Rosval was mutilated in the right!

Three days subsequently Adolphe had ceased to live. Mortification had supervened upon the frightful wound which he had inflicted upon himself in order to save the life of his father, and to preserve the honour of his family.

The young soldier's career was over; his dream of fame had gone down with him to the grave.

Maggie Pardoe.

Digitized by Google

In a Spirit of Fun.

"WHY do you always write love stories?" said the man irritably, fidgeting in his swivel chair.

"Because," said the girl with a sigh, "there's nothing else in the world to write about, and I have had some experience."

"Stuff and nonsense! The peop'e who principally read such things are raw girls and boys, and sentimental spinsters. Look here, Miss Saville, I'd like to help you. You've got the right stuff in you, and you look as if you didn't mind hard work. What you write is readable, and moreover, full of promise; but there it stops. You spoil yourself with mawkish sentiment. You do, indeed."

"Then you have read some of the work I sent you?" she replied demurely, looking at him from under her long lashes.

"Oh, yes; though I never clearly understood why you came to send to such a paper as ours. That first story you sent me—er—'The Protoplasmic Atom'—took my fancy immensely. The idea was novel; the science from a problematical point of view was really soundly suggestive, and opened up quite a field of speculative thought. The first two chapters were most interesting, but the rest! You gave a whole page up to the psychological study of a kiss. After that, I turned to the end, and found it matrimonial, not scientific, so I returned your MS. immediately with a very fair offer, which you chose to disregard."

"Because it wasn't possible for me to accept. You told me if I left out the loving-making and re-wrote all the latter part up to the standard of the first, you'd take it. But, as I explained, this was impossible. The scientific part was only the atmosphere, the love-making was the real creative germ."

"You'll be wiser when you're older, Miss Saville. But at present I plainly see, like the rest of your sex, 'tis of no earthly use trying to convince you against your will. I thought that by making an appointment to see you, and giving you my personal advice, I might be putting you in the right way and doing you a good turn. Very sorry to find that you won't listen to me now that you've come. And please, may I ask you, as a favour, not to send any more stories of this type into our office; it's only wasting your time, not to speak of mine. The Modern Argus is a scientific and political paper for men and women of the world, not a young ladies' weekly, full of sentiment and complexion recipes. I'm rather surprised, Miss Saville, that you don't suggest writing us a fashion column!"

"Your circulation would be immensely improved if I did," she laughed, seemingly in no way offended by his brusqueness.

He looked at her keenly from under his spectacles, and she as keenly looked back at him.

His face was rather handsome in a thoughtful, intellectual way—not young, perhaps, and yet not old.

She was very pale, and her great grey eyes had a heavy, tired look. Under the edge of her broad brimmed hat shone a tangle of untidy, copper-coloured hair. When her expression was reposeful she looked sad, weary, and worn; when she smiled, a transformation took place. She might have been any age between twenty and thirty.

"I am wondering how old you are?" he said, inwardly wondering a great many other things as well.

"To a man of science a woman's age should be immaterial," said Miss Saville decidedly. "Ah, Mr. Signett, I've an odd feeling that you'll ask me to contribute to the Modern Argus some day. I feel like the boy in the gallery who vowed to play Hamlet. But—honestly, now—are you sure that you can't help me, with all my faults? I am almost discouraged for want of success."

"Positively sure. And—honestly, now—on my part, Miss Saville, do you suppose that professional, scientific or political men really care to read love stories?"

The colour came into her face, and she rose from her chair with a jerk.

"Do I suppose that the world is round, Mr. Signett? Why, the key of every life is to be found in that incessant, craving appetite, to be fed on love; which, after all, is only another name for Nature, and another name for heaven or hell! And of this one universal impulse every man gives different expressions. You love your work, you think, and devote yourself wholly to it, because that work is the present expression love wears for you. It may some day change to a child's voice, or even a woman's face; but as long as you're on this plane you must give love to something: and you must needs go on putting out all that is in your endeavour to receive it.

"You profess yourself a devotee of science! Well, science and its many laws change, slowly but surely, from century to century; what is accepted as true in one era is discarded in another. But the motive that propels it remains—and the motive of all real science is the love of one's kind. For, believe me, there never yet was a love story acted or written but what left its mark upon the world, and it is as real to us to-day as it was in the farthest yesterday."

She stopped abruptly, as if ashamed of having been betrayed into saying so much. Her eyes were no longer languid, but full of wrath and feeling.

The sneer had gradually died away from Mr. Signett's firm lips, for she seemed to have flashed into beauty all at once in her excitement. Nonsense she might be talking, but nonsense from a pretty woman's mouth is often wondrous persuasive.

"Are you making a study of the affections?" he asked awkwardly, feeling somewhat like a moth in front of a chloroform bottle.

"I'm not a love-sick school-girl, if that's what you mean," she answered, reddening visibly, as if she wished to imply that she was not in love with him. "I'm just a poor scribbler, trying to earn my own bread-and-butter in the teeth of adversity. Good-morning, Mr. Signett—and thank you for—your kind advice."

Digitized by Google

Gathering up her drabbled skirts in her left hand, she bowed herself out of the office, and for at least ten minutes the editor of the Modern Argus sat glued to his chair in a brown study.

Although he personally objected to her stories he did not forget to look out for her name, and found much of her work in some of the smaller and worst paying journals. She was as prolific as she was clever, and her pen not quite so outrageous as her tongue. So though he often skimmed through her tales with irritation, it was never without interest; an interest that deepened as the days went on.

Gradually, as her name became better known, people began to talk about her. She was a prominent member of one of the "New Women" Clubs, and her little oddities and eccentricities were much commented on.

Often sharp sayings of hers about men were quoted, and it was astonishing how her views of his sex hurt him. Oftener sharp and hard things were said of her, and, oddly enough, this hurt him still more.

He even went out of his way to take up the cudgels in her defence.

"Why do you trouble?" she asked him point blank in the street one day, tales of his chivalry on her behalf having come to her ears.

"I care more than you may think," he said shamefacedly. "Have you no father or brother, or anyone to stick up for you? You're too young and pretty to face the world alone."

She was, as usual, untidily dressed; but her grey eyes were wonderful; her careless, vivid hair shone like a glory round her head; and her pale, tired face had an immensity of charm, born of the knowledge of the hearts of men.

"Won't you let me be your friend? I'm an awkward old bachelor; but——"

"There's nothing in common between us, Mr. Signett—no sympathy, I mean."

"Perhaps there might be more than you imagine."

"Well—perhaps. But you musn't give me any more good advice. I don't want it, and"—foolishly—"I don't care what people say."

Miss Saville might be called a truly unlucky woman. More than once or twice she had been on the point of making a brilliant marriage, but the men had died or disappeared, and her career was a series of unfinished romances. If she had made friends, the same fate pursued her till she lost them. In her literary work people were always expecting her to do something great, but it never came to pass. Her life—so full of promises—had no fulfilment. She was sadly unsuccessful, therefore scandal was rife about her. In the East they would have said she had the evil eye.

Sometimes she looked very pretty, and sometimes utterly plain; but her charm never failed her.

"To have hair that colour, not dyed, was unnatural," said the blonde women.

Mr. Signett often wondered what made her so attractive, but he never came to any definite conclusions.

About this time, after steadily overworking himself for some months, he fell a victim to influenza, and had it in its most virulent form.

He was naturally a very robust kind of creature, and the confinement to the house, the inertia, and the depression of spirits, usually so attendant on this malady, made a different man of him.

As soon as ever he began to mend, he wrote to Miss Saville, saying:

"Will you come and see me? I have found out that you can do me more good than all my physic. I've had so many lonely nights and days of self-contemplation lately—more than I ever had time for in my busy life before—and I am beginning to know myself, and to understand this new-old science of human love, which, according to your philosophy (and mine now), is the all of everything; the only thing worth living well for. I may seem foolish and sentimental, but this is my first love story. Will you let me dedicate it myself to you? I cannot say how anxiously I shall await your answer."

She both laughed and cried when the letter came. It seemed too good to be true. He was very dear to her, and it was heavenly to know that at last, in spite of himself, he loved her, since she had cared for him afar off, for so long. Perhaps if she hadn't cared at all, except from the cat-like point of view of maintenance and home, she would have written him a polite acceptance on the spot.

But, then, she did care intensely—more, even, than she would own to herself. And so, alas! she temporised.

With a happy laugh, she kissed and re-folded his letter, and having wrapped it in a sheet of paper, wrote: "Unsuitable. Declined with thanks." And sent it back to him.

"It's a just revenge," she told herself, with a tender smile that made her sweet face glorious. "He'll get this by the first post in the morning, just as I used to do his horrid refusals. In the afternoon I'll go myself and say that I've reconsidered my rejection, and will accept his love-story, if he'll only promise that the last chapter shall be as loving as the first."

She did this out of fun and sheer lightheartedness, not knowing how ill he was or how she might be likely (in his weak condition) to hurt and distress him by so doing.

That night she was too happy to sleep. It seemed as if the morning would never come.

"I love him—I love him," she murmured, over and over again.

"I wonder if he will guess that I kissed his letter? Will he be angry? I wonder what he'll say to me? When he knows how much I care, he will surely forget to scold me."

It was very early in the afternoon when she started, it having taken her nearly all the morning to dress.

Her wonderful hair had been brushed and smoothed till its coils shone like the curves of a copper medallion. The ink stains had been scrubbed out of her fingers and her gloves darned.

Hat and dress had been brushed and coaxed into an artistic impression of smartness.

But the happiness in her deep, dark-coloured eyes, and the smile on her soft, curved mouth, were things to make one forget fashion and its follies.

Coming in sight of the handsome house where he lived, she grew very nervous, and looked down shamefacedly at the pavement; walking along more slowly with her courage at vanishing point.

Going up the steps with a fast beating heart, she ventured to look up as she rang the bell, and then it struck her as being strange that every blind should be drawn down, as if its owner were away.

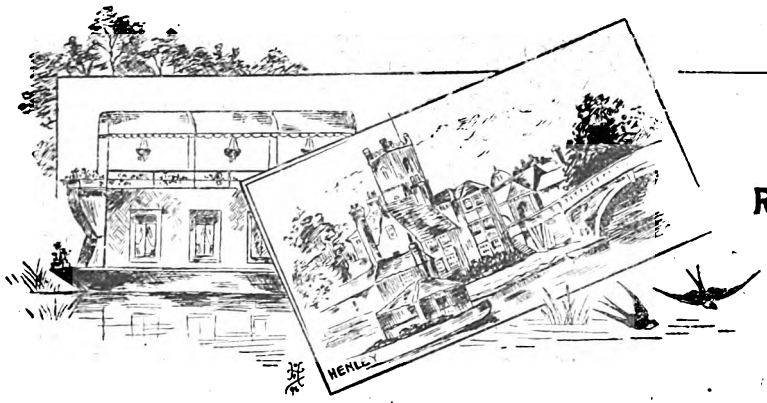
After a little delay the door was opened by a mournful-looking man-servant.

"I wish to see Mr. Signett at once on very important business," she said demurely.

"I am very sorry, madam," the man replied; "er—but Mr. Signett is dead. He died quite suddenly this morning when reading his letters."

Jessie Carvell.

Digitized by Google



Jumbled Story No. 17.

REDEN'S HUGE CART.

(See page 519.)

I shall remember all my life, whenever I eat a brambles with their sweet, wild fruit, and eglantines, separated from the neighbouring road by the hedge so loving.

In the Curé's garden there are birds. In spring the peonies are red, like great gossips, and the neglected alleys where the grass grows wild, where the needs of life, human suffering, political affairs, submits.

* * * * *

I know a country Curé who has a little garden.

In the Curé's garden is an arbour, and under the trees and two apricot trees; there is—there is peonies and pansies. The strawberries are perfumed, my friend. Whatever they do, God permits it."

There are pear trees, muscadine grapes and dwarf like vagabonds—as they are!—where one meets apple trees.

* * * * *

Everyone may visit the garden, the like of which are joyous.

In the Curé's garden there are gravel paths. For me I have loved only Thee, Creator!"

Love is a conqueror—it should be proclaimed!

I take Thérèse's hand and kiss it. Thérèse drops a coin in the little box.

In the Curé's garden there is a niche painted blue with mossy roses and red fruit, from which one however, one takes a fruit, plucks a flower, and I drop a penny in the alms box for the poor.

* * * * *

In the Curé's garden one cannot hide; it touches the church on one side, and on the other is only the kitchen."

The Curé regarded us tenderly, and murmured:

"Thérèse, I love thee! Thérèse, I love thee!"

But what need to conceal it when one loves?

She looks in my eyes and smiles; then in her turn see a peasant who watched us over the hedge.

"Thou wishest to become my child?" he said.

She was an orphan; her uncle, the Curé, had the poppies in their red hoods disport themselves upside down.

* * * * *

"Is it you, Monsieur Valentine?"

"How pleasant it is here!"

In the Curé's garden there are strawberries, peony seemed to say to me:

I have eaten the fruit, I have gathered the flower, which is written "For the poor." There are peach is not in the whole village. On one condition, is a Holy Virgin; under the Holy Virgin is a box on tears.

In the Curé's garden the Curé entered, and came and sprinkled with little yellow stars; in the niche the birds sing of love, they warble of the morning which at this very moment were turning the village to seek us.

The strawberry was exquisite. I put the pansy in her eyes, and was happy, so happy that I did not adopted her—he spoiled her, the good old man!

* * * * *

In the Curé's garden I forgot the whole world, of thorns, from behind which we were espied by the poor, that I found happiness in the Curé's garden.

I say to Thérèse:

"It is, then, very good to love the creature? Gravel is the waxed floor of the garden. I prefer God and the Virgin Mary! They are not alone, they build in the trees, they hop in the grass—they strawberry, gather a pansy, or give a penny to the peasant.

The Curé answered:

"And I? Have you forgotten me?"

"You resemble a cook, and you belong only to Thérèse, the Curé's niece.

* * * * *

I looked at Thérèse, so pretty, so good, so sweet, surprises on every side; rosy honey-suckles, makes wine.

The peasant told all to the Curé.

Jean Pierre bowed his head and retired, ashamed.

And I had the air of replying:

"Jean Pierre, I have confided them to the good pansies have little faces like heraldic griffins.

"They were alone," he said. "He kissed her!"

* * * * *

I threw myself on his neck; Thérèse burst into my buttonhole.

And I kissed her hands, I looked earnestly into everything, my faith! in the Curé's garden.

I ate a strawberry and gathered a pansy. The arbour is a bench, on which is seated Mademoiselle she takes my hand, and placing it on her heart:

"Feel how it beats!" she says.

HONOR LUCELLE.

Digitized by Google

THE LAST KING OF ATLANTIS

By GEO. C. WALLIS, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

SUMMARY.

ARNON'S memory of his early days begins at a time when he finds himself abandoned on the seashore, whence he discovers the cave of a band of pirates, by whom he is captured. Under the care of Didron the Chief he grows up as one of them, and on the death of the former he takes command. Viol is the daughter of Didron and marries Arnon, who, on one of his voyages, lands at Miropis and consults the Priest of the Spirit of Truth, from whom he learns that within a year and a half he will be a captive in a foreign land, and that he need not fear death until he has visited the Grotto of the Sleeper three times. On returning, he finds his ship burnt and men killed. After fighting he escapes, and meets and falls in love with Briseis, daughter of King Dulo X. of Atlantis, and to her he reveals his identity. Vichri, Briseis' cousin and lover, believes Arnon to be dead. For several months he lives at the Court; but the old roving spirit returns, and he sets out to discover the cave of treasure left by Didron and his band. On his return from an unsuccessful attempt, he finds his identity discovered by King Dulo, and is sent away as a galley slave. During his absence in a small boat up a creek on the Coast of Nubia, the ship is taken by rebels. Led by Arnon, the whole of the population, starving and fearing annihilation by the rebels, set out for another town.

CHAPTER VII.

THE LAND OF KHEM.

FIVE thousand strong we left our starting place. Less than two hundred strong we staggered, footsore, despairing, into the ominously silent streets of deserted Eklohn. Our last faint hope was broken. The city had fallen long ago—perhaps before we had begun our fruitless quest.

Grass was growing on the public pavements, noxious weeds and rank shrubs everywhere filled the air with their deadly odours and forced their way between the huge stone slabs, uplifting even the very longest; jackals and hyenas, bats and vultures, roamed savagely or flitted clumsily in the marble halls that for many months, perchance, had echoed to no sound but their quarrelsome snarlings, hoarse screechings, and dog-like barks as they fought over the bones of the dead; pillars lay where the ruthless hands of the barbarians had thrown them, broken, disfigured; three large merchant ships from the far East, veritable giants of the deep, lay rifled and rotting by the moss-grown quay, over which, on one side, now that the harbour-dredging had ceased, the sand had drifted in great, red masses, bidding fair in time to choke up the haven and leave Ekholn, once famous as a seaport, far inland, buried in a desert or a reedy marsh; and over the whole of the great city, like a funeral pall, hung a dense, miasmatic mist, whose breath is a shivering fever that ends in death.

I held down my blade.

The Temple of Truth, far-famed for its grandeur and the opulence of its priests, stood in grim and silent protestation to the ruin that surrounded it, the great female figure typical of Truth looking to the west and to Atlantis with her sightless eyes over the great round world, unmoved by the evilness of mortal men. On a stone, hard by, one of the priests had scratched his last lament for the defeat of his country and the loss of her fairest province, writing it, perhaps, in his death-throes, when the sackers had left the city, and he alone remained—to die.

It may well be that in untold ages, after I am resolved into the elements, when Atlantis herself shall be but an ill-remembered name, some daring traveller will penetrate this land of hot deserts, tangled forests, and great lakes, and, coming here by chance, will wander wonderingly through these mighty ruins, amazed at their grandeur, and marvelling greatly that the builders thereof should be so utterly forgotten amongst the nations.*

But our eyes saw no grandeur in those relics of struggle and sack, and so, in a fierce mood, we turned our steps to the west again, and then to the north, past a rocky barren region, where the hills are honeycombed with monstrous caves, and into the great forest once more.

Fever now thinned our ranks with deadly speed, and one by one the children and the women and the weaker men were left for ever, loosely buried in the undergrowth, till only three score fighting men remained. Amongst the happy dead were my good old captain, and Teli, the aged waterman, both jettisoned now in their last port.

For some days we had seen no trace of our black foes, and our vigilance relaxed, so that one night we all slumbered, even the solitary watcher at his post, and our wanderings were at last ended. Thus it came about.

Being the most wary of the party through the lessons of my pirate life, I woke with a start towards the middle of the night, when the full-orbed moon was shedding her silver beams far and wide, and throwing up the shadowy forms of the leaf-laden trees with a weird distinctness, and peering round me to discover the cause of my disturbance, discerned some slightly moving shapes behind a clump of dates. Cautiously I woke my fifty and odd comrades in turn, enjoining strict silence, and when all were ready, with weapons to hand, we lay and waited. On all sides we saw the moving figures, now here, now there, and at intervals caught the flash of light on polished metal as a shield or a spear showed in the leafy openings.

* NOTE.—Those who have read Mr. R. Haggard's "She," will, perhaps, recognise in this the solution of the mystery of the immense ruins there and here described!

Digitized by Google

Then, with a sudden, simultaneous rush, they came at us from every point in the encompassing circle, and we were fighting back to back against fearful odds for our very lives. A cloud, presageful of storm, crept up and overspread the pallid face of the moon, so that we could scarce make out our foes, and thus in semi-darkness we strove like lions brought to bay, with the energy born of a terrible hate and a fixed despair.

Ye spirits! How we wrought that night in the Nubian forest! How we charged and were driven back, how they pressed us sorely, but could not make us yield, how many were the dead who encircled our last stand like a rampart of human flesh! Our enemies, we saw, in the moments when the moon stole through the clouds, were armed with long shields, all covered with mystic symbols and writings—strange shields for Nubians to wear, we thought—and once or twice, in a lull in the struggle, I fancied that when I caught a glimpse of a head and face, it seemed not black and woolly, but a swarthy colour, and covered with a closely-fitting head-gear.

Amongst them came troops of dancing girls.

However, I fought on, now with sling and now with sword, till presently I stood with back to a broad tree, separated from the rest and antagonised by a stalwart foe with long, keen sword. He waved off these who would have aided him, meaning me for his own prize, doubtless; and there, for sheer vexation, I kept him thrusting and parrying till the day broke and the birds began to sing in joyous ignorance of the slaughter that had been.

Long before then the rest of my comrades had fallen, every man of that brave band, and once again I alone remained alive in a struggle when all my friends were slain.

"Now yield!" cried he of the long keen sword, and I understood his speech, though it differed somewhat from my own or that of the blacks. "Now, yield, and I will spare your life, as I would be glad to do."

I thought a moment, and then, reflecting that I had shown him that my knowledge of sword-play was not of yestereve, held down my blade, something—from whence I know not—whispering in my ear that not yet nor thus should I meet my end.

"You have fought well," said he to whom I surrendered; "methought, before daybreak, that you were no Nubians. Whence came you, and what is your nation?"

"Atlantis is my nation, a land far out in the western sea," I answered, "and they whom you have slain were the last of my countrymen whom the Nubian rebels had left alive in this that was once our province. But I thought you were Nubians till I saw your shields. Of what nation are you?"

"I come from Egypt, the Land of Khem," said he with pride, "being sent by Pharaoh to chastise these turbulent blacks, a great band of whom we met and routed but three days ago. Never before have Egyptians ventured so far south as this, and to-day we shall return, having taught the barbarians a lesson. But tell me of your country, for even rumour of it hath not reached me before to-day."

"It is much I could tell you, stranger," I replied, "and much of myself also—so much that you would be wearied before I had told you the half of it. Tell me your name and let me learn your tongue—near though it be to my own—a little better, and I will tell you as we journey north, for I would fain see your land, even if I must see it as a prisoner."

"That you need not do," said he with a brave man's generosity; "you shall go as my friend, whom I have rescued from the blacks. And men call me Asos, the son of Osymandyas, and in peace time I live at Memphis, where the Court is. It will be many months' journey before I see it again, even if no war should need me, for I am a captain in the army, and must do many little businesses for the King before I may return. But how are you named, friend whom I have found at the sword point?"

"My real name is Arnon, the son of Didron the pirate," I answered, "and I have been known as Phrena the Iron-fingered, of late."

"Art young for thy skill and strength and experience," he remarked, when I told him of that last sea-fight when old Didron fell. "Art young, or I would get thee into the King's bodyguard. Tell me more of thy country."

So, as we travelled northward, keeping my sword and sling and marching with the others as a soldier, dressed in the uniform of a fallen Egyptian, I told Captain Asos of the greatness of Atlantis; of its colonies in the great land to the westward, peopled for the most part with savages more crafty and cruel than those of Nubia; of its wealth and luxury, that was sapping the vitals of its vigour; of its temples and buildings, its harbours and fortresses, its navy of a thousand ships, and its army of twenty times ten thousand men.

Digitized by Google

Asos listened gravely to my tale. He was a tall, clean-shaven man, with sinews strongly knit, a mind that knew no fear, and a face that seldom broke into a smile; but when I told him of our army, thinking to astonish him, he laughed at me outright. I asked him why.

"Talk not of armies!" said he, with a scornful glance; "when you come to Khem, I can show you an array that would swallow up your men five times over."

"In numbers, it may be," I retorted sharply, my patriotism rising for the first time, "but not on the battle-field, methinks!" And this time it was my turn to smile.

Thus, with boast and counter boast, and comparison of peoples and their ways, we emerged from the forest and set out across a narrow stretch of desert, glaring balefully under a burning sun, full of rocky hillocks and ridges, indeed, but without a shade sufficient to cool our many men in the heat of the day.

Tantalisingly beautiful and enticing mirages we saw also, when our throats were most parched and our feet most weary, but never a fertile oasis or a refreshing spring. It was soon passed, however, and after a dank morass and another desert march, with a slight gale blowing the fine, red sand into our faces in scorching clouds, we came to Egypt, and, passing by the three great pyramids, larger even than the great group to the north of Kronos, where the Kings of Atlantis are buried, we entered into the Royal city on the banks of the mystic Nile.

On all sides, as we trod the stony central way, a festive throng beset us, singing, dancing, shouting, and some clad in the most outrageously grotesque costumes, many-coloured as the rainbow. Amongst them came troops of dancing girls, wantonly capering to the clashing of cymbals, the tinkling of square tambourines, and the shrill, piercing music of single and double pipes; while after these tumultuously ran, jumped, or rolled, bands of hired buffoons disporting themselves to the same silly medley of music, these latter, mostly blacks, being clad in bull's hide, so cut and worn as to leave a tail hanging ludicrously behind!

A little further on, as we neared a massive temple with the sun glittering from its polished marble towers, and reflected from its gates of bronze where the lepers sat, the low but swelling chorus of its priests fell upon our ears, now rising, now falling, now pouring forth in volumes of rich, strong melody.

"What means this merry-making?" I asked of Asos, thinking to myself that here, at least, was a city large as Kronos, which before I had thought matchless.

"It is the nineteenth day of the first month, that is named the month of Thoth," said he, "and this is the feast that is called by that name. See, here come the priests of Pthah!"

Slowly the brazen temple doors swung back, and, still chanting the tuneful song of Maneros, a long procession of clean-shaven, hairless, hard-skulled priests came forth, and greeting us with the salutation, "How sweet a thing is truth!" wended their stately way adown the avenue of tamarisk trees and were lost to view beyond in the ever-mingling throng of roysterers. Severity and temperance, in food and drink, charity and truth, no matter what befall, they preached to the careless crowd, many of whom, even as they listened, pledging each other and making themselves drunk with the heady zythus of Pelusium. So little valued they the admonitions.

Asos, impatient, moved on, and having reported the fruits of his mission to the King—named, he told me, Menophres—and transacted his business with his superior officer, led me to his own dwelling, for he had taken a strange liking to me.

It was a large house, stuccoed and flat-roofed, and as we entered the porch before the door, with its two columns flanking the stone statues of the bull Apis and the Athor Isis, my host pointed out to me some cabalistic scrawlings on the slab above, thus: which he said was the sign of the good house; and some other gravings on the stone—curious birds and fishes, and to me quaint meaningless strokes and circles—which, he told me with pride, was the name of the King, and could only be written upon the houses of those who were his servants.

Then when we had entered, and I had been presented to the wife of Asos, Itaska by name, who regarded me too boldly, I thought, for one bound to another, and I had eaten of honey and eggs, which is customary at the feast of Thoth, I rose and went out into the cool night air, thinking to enjoy the strangeness, the novelty, of all things I might see. What I should do, what would be my lot in this great land, where wealth was scattered broadcast, I knew not, thought not, cared not, but only, as I stood in the open air, beyond the houses of the city, bethought me for the thousandth time of the loss of Briseis, and wondered yet again if she were false or true.

Whether the Spirit of Love works her ends by means we wot not of, or whether the other gods must bend to her will and order things to suit her fancies, I cannot say, but this I can aver, that if I had not wandered, a solitary stranger, that peaceful eve, I had never beheld Atlantis more, had never been its King, had never clasped my dearest love to my arms again, so fateful were the doings of those midnight hours.

Far from the city, now sunk into slumber, save for its watchmen and the priests who meditated on the pylons of the temple of Pthah, I strayed—forgetful in my reverie, of Asos—into the arid, treeless waste to the south, where the dreary dryness of the soil was unrelieved except by rocky ridges, and here and there a collection of tombs dug out or built upon the hillsides, the last resting-places of the bodies of the poorer classes who could afford no costlier mausoleums.

Bright and clear, in that dry and thirsty atmosphere, shone the countless stars, shining down alike upon the lately festive city and the fertile fields to the north and east; upon the deep, wide-rolling flood of Sihor, resistless in its majesty, and the great four-angled pyramids pointing ever up into the roofless sky; upon the grave, immobile features of the giant Sphinx Horemku, and upon the place of tombs where I stood, marvelling greatly at the weird vastness of all that I saw that was of the handiwork of man, and the niggardness of parent Earth, who, but for the ancient river, had made this land a howling wilderness.

Truly the Nile—the Mother of Rivers, as her people call her—is the sole upholder of the Land of Khem, without whose tireless torrent and yearly flood, temples, cities, villages, and fields would alike be buried under drifting storms of finely-sifted desert sand.

Now, as I stood, thus pondering, a feeling grew upon me that I was not there alone—a strange, uneasy feeling, as of a spirit's prompting. At first I scouted it and put it from me, but it came again and again, and, half fearful, half angry, I turned my gaze to the tombs amongst which I had wandered.

Seeing no sign of the presence which I felt, I turned my steps, now here, now there, among the mazy ways, and at last, coming round the side of a huge stone cairn, thrown up, it may be, to cover a goodly number of the luckless dead in a common grave, I beheld a sight that caused the blood to chill in its channels, and my heart, for a moment, to stand still with horror.

By the side of a low-built tomb sat a fair maiden, weeping softly to herself over the cold covering of the dead, her rich auburn hair falling loosely on her shoulders, and partly hiding the sweetness of her dainty face, which, for all the dimness of the light, was plainly visible. But it was not she, for all her loveliness, that riveted my awestruck gaze. Near her—so near that she might almost have touched him by putting out her arm—crouched a spotted leopard, ready to spring, deterred only for the moment by the light sound of my footfall, which his suspicious ears had caught.

Digitized by Google

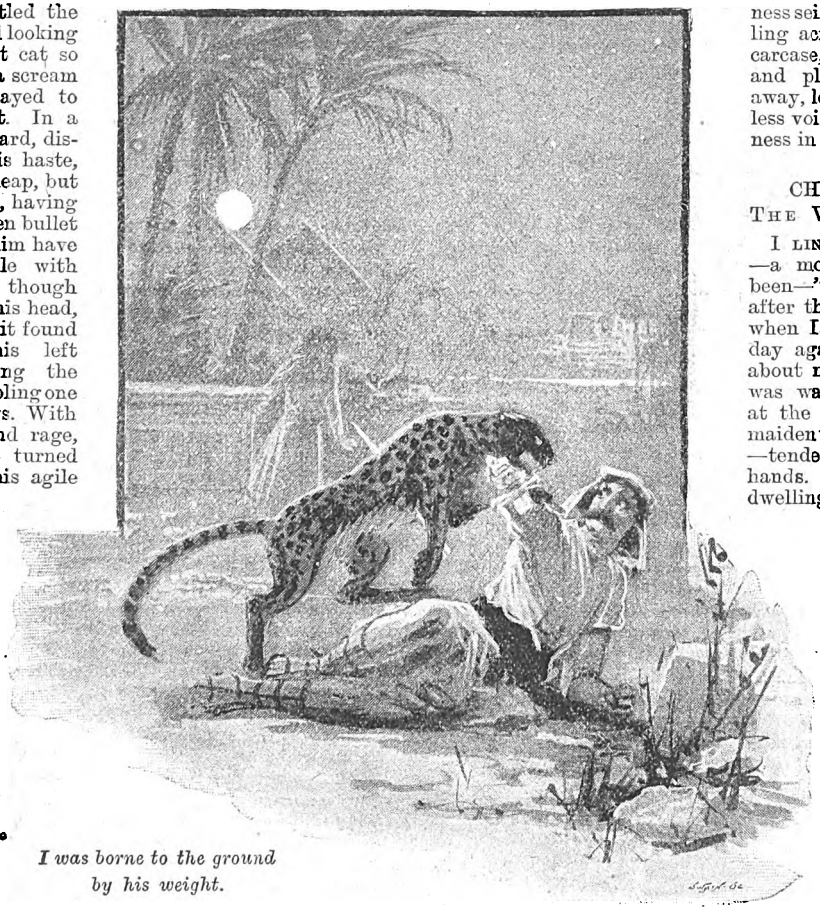
A great, evil beast he was, with cruel, rolling eyes, and sleek, shining coat, and thickened tail softly twitching on the dusty ground in anticipation of his easy prey. Yet he must have been hungry to have ventured so near the haunts of men and for his ribs to stand out so boldly that, given time, I could have counted them!

For a brief space, it seemed less than the lasting of a lightning flash, I stood motionless, whilst he glared fiercely at me for my intrusion, and snapped his cruel jaws, and gave a low, angry snarl.

The sound startled the weeping maid, and looking up to see the great cat so near, she uttered a scream of terror and essayed to fly from the spot. In a moment, the leopard, disregarding me in his haste, made his deadly leap, but that same moment, having fitted my last leaden bullet to my sling, I let him have the hissing missile with terrific force, and though it failed to reach his head, as I had meant, it found its billet in his left shoulder, shattering the bone and thus crippling one of his taloned paws. With a growl of pain and rage, the spotted beast turned upon me in all his agile lissomness, but I had thrown aside my useless sling, and sword in hand, awaited his onslaught with a grim, exultant joy.



I was borne to the ground by his weight.

High he sprang, with claws extended and jaws open, roaring with pain the while; down he came full weight upon my upheld blade, the point passing clear through and out above his back, missing the spine by the merest of unlucky chances.

To my dismay, before I could withdraw it, before I could ward off the blows and scratches of his great sharp talons, the sword was snapped off at the hilt by the violent twistings of the maddened brute, and, weaponless, I was borne to the ground by his weight, hearing as I fell a cry of fear from the maid.

But I was not called the Iron-fingered for nothing! and so, with a powerful grasp, I seized him by the throat, pressing out his life as I had done old Zerah's years before. This time, however, by the gods! I had a tougher task, for it seemed likely that I should be torn to pieces before the breath was stifled in that vicious animal, who must have had a dozen lives to have struggled with all those wounds and with that sharp-edged sword rankling in his body!

Over and over we rolled in the death grip, I and that raging beast, his three uninjured feet ripping and scratching, his hideous mouth opening and closing with short, savage gasps, his flaming yellow orbs fixed on mine in horrid enmity, and his great chest heaving laboriously against my own.

Now his struggles abated, his breath came shorter, the blood-wetted claws relaxed their hold, the flaming orbs ceased to roll and begun to glaze with the ghastliness of death, and presently, with a quiver, the lithe form lay still at my side. Till then—till I knew that he was dead, not once had my fingers loosed their grasp; then a great dimness seemed to pass between myself and all around, and I had scarce time to extricate me from that awful embrace when the faintness seized me, and, stumbling across the yet warm carcase, all sense of time and place and act fled away, leaving only a voiceless void of densest darkness in its stead.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Vision of Isis.

I lingered some weeks—a month it may have been—'twixt life and death after that awful fight, and when I knew the light of day again and could look about me, I found that I was watched and tended at the house of the fair maiden whom I had rescued—tended, too, by her fair hands. It was a spacious dwelling on the northern side of Memphis, its grove of cedars leading into the temple grounds, and its windows looking out upon the sculptured obelisks of the portal.

"Sleep hath held thee long, stranger," said a middle-aged man who stood by the bedside when I first came to full consciousness, his hand upon the maiden's head, as if in tender blessing. Well I remember him, whose kindly soul befriended me so long and truly in that far-off land of mighty buildings and ancient lore; a tall man, plain and rugged, on the further side of fifty years, with a restless mouth, and a way of laughing silently when he spoke with mirth—which was not seldom—that was terribly infectious.

"It is well for me, then," I answered him, "that I have slept at the house of a friend," the memory of what must have led to my being there coming up before me as a vision.

"Other than a friend's my house could not be," he said, "to one who has risked his life for my only child. Few of our people would have dared so much."

"I dared not have dared less," I replied, "when so fair and young a maiden was in peril."

Digitized by Google

"Seemst thou canst use a honeyed tongue as well as sharpened steel, my son," said Mitres, as my host was named, with one of his quiet smiles, "and it may be as dangerous to young and untried hearts to see or hear too much of thee as to court the company of hungry leopards amongst the tombs."

"Nay, art too pointed in thy sayings, father," protested the maiden, "and may offend this stranger who called himself Arnon in his sleep, when we would fain offer him our gratitude for his timely help."

"'Tis a gentle soul of thine, Vesta" answered he, "but surely thou knowest that I spoke in jest, and am every whit as thankful as thyself for our guest's brave deed. Now, tell him, pray, for what thou sat in that solitary place at night, weeping like a lovesick maid!"

Tended, too, by her fair hands.

At this, sweet Vesta hung her head, blushing in the prettiest confusion, but would not speak, and her father reiterating his request with a mirthful twinkle in his eye, strange to see on so grave a face, she fled from the room, though first casting a brief look upon me from those confiding eyes of hers that opened my own and filled me with dire forebodings.

Wherever there are women there are troubles, soon or late, I had found in my short life, and it was as though I saw the shadow of a coming cloud in that swift-shot glance. When the hanging draperies had closed behind her, Mitres spoke:

"An she will not tell thee herself, I must, my son. She wept over the grave of one whom she loved, one who was of a lowly caste and not worthy of her, and whom the gods (in their wisdom) called to Amenti before it was too late. May Set rend him! May Atmoo, Nef, and Amun curse him!" Then, calming himself after this sudden outburst, he went on: "But since you rescued her she has ceased to visit the spot, and has seemed a different child."

Leaving me to make what I could of this information, my host reclined thoughtfully in his chair for a time. At last he broke the silence.

"How had you thought to live, stranger, now that you have no kin in the land? For Asos, the captain, who has now been made a general, has told me how he rescued you from the black barbarians he fought and slew."

"It was in my mind to join the King's army," I returned, "for I have a sore sorrow in my life, and where the battle-press is thickest, and the clash of arms is loudest, is to me the greatest joy."

To which my host answered that he would rather I became a priest, as he was, promising me great riches, grand dwellings, honour, and the envy and admiration of all men therewith. At first the idea did not please me, who was so used to action, and had heretofore looked down on the priestly calling; but so many were his arguments and allurements, and promises of help and friendship withal, that I wavered a little out of mere respect for his superior years; and finally, so urgent was he, so imperative, that I was fain to consent, the more so when he told me, as the crowning inducement, that war had ceased for the time being in the Land of Khem, that the army was partially disbanded, that quiet reigned in all its nomes, and on all its borders peace.

So I prepared to become a priest and to be instructed in all the learning of the Egyptians, as Vesta's father wished, though why he so desired I could not divine, nor did I discover till after his wish was fulfilled.

To hundred-gated Thebes the King now moved his court, and thither went Mitres and his daughter (for his wife was dead), and also Asos and his family, for all must needs be in attendance on the wants and whims of Pharaoh and his royal wife and sister, Queen Hameuse. With them, of course, I journeyed, having first been initiated into the rudiments of priestcraft, and having spent a night of watching in the arched gallery cut in the rock near Memphis, where, in their huge stalls, like the sarcophagi of giants, the embalmed Apis bulls are buried, and where they will repose for ages in awful, silent solemnity.

At Thebes I was enrolled among the many priests in the mighty temple of Karnac, where I learned many things that are made known only to the privileged orders. They taught me the enchantments that have power with the lower gods; the raising of the Ancient Sin, the dread demon that sleepeth in every soul, and is of icy chilliness until it is warmed and wakened into baleful life; the sign of doom, which will reveal to the daring questioner the hour and the moment and the manner of his dying, and the utterance of dread, which none may speak and to which none may listen, with uncovered head and yet live, and which, when spoken, discloses to the mental gaze the million-million shades that haunt the vasty halls of grim Amenti, and gives the speaker power to bring back from there for a space, and question, the triple spirits of the newly dead. I was made to understand the secret mysteries of the esoteric faith; of the birth, death, and resurrection of Osiris; of his love for the world, which was so great that he gave his son Horus to save men from their wicked ways, and of the Mother Isis, the Spirit of the Universe, who reveals the fringe of her glory only to a favoured, faithful few.

Her I saw once only in all my nightly vigils, but the memory of her appearing haunts me even now. It was in an inner chamber of that sculptured, columned Temple of Karnac, where the neophyte must pass many days in prayer and fasting. Mitres, who stood high in the land for his piety and goodness, was with me, aiding my supplications with his own, and bade me be of good cheer, for if the presentment of the Great Mother should appear to me that night, my days of trial and preparation were over, and I could go forth fully instructed.

Already I was wise in the lore of the stars, in the reading of the Sacred Book of the Dead, in the mystic symbol writing of the sculptures and in the sending forth of the spirit; and one thing only I lacked; one ordeal alone remained.

In the dread silence of that darkened chamber we waited, I and that jolly priest, hearing even the throbbing of our hearts in the stillness, and seeing strange weird shapes and shadows in the spectral gloom, till, as the heavens lost the dim afterglow of the twilight and the sparkling stars came out, first one by one and then by tens and hundreds, the pale rays of the Northern Star, round which the firmament revolves—the star in the figure of the dragon—shot through the slanting window in the wall and rested on the golden scarabæus that gleamed with iridiscent lustre on my forehead.

Digitized by Google

"Now is the appointed time," said Mitres slowly, "and by the awful name of Osiris, which none may unworthily pronounce and live, I ask our Mother Isis to smile upon thee, our adopted son," and whilst he spoke he drew back a space, and waved the wand over my head, twice, thrice, and then was still.

With a loud, vibrating roar the room and all within vanished, its four walls receding to the north and south and east and west, its roof ascending to the zenith, and its floor falling—falling into the bottomless gulf beneath, till, in the twinkling of an eye I seemed to hang on nothing in the centre of the awful abyss of space. Even my bodily form and feelings disappeared, leaving me a naked soul suspended motionless in the dread darkness that was void and yet intensely real.

Then all the stars blazed out in their innumerable multitude, ten thousandfold more plentiful than the keenest earthly eye can see, and, by Apis! when I looked again more carefully I saw that most were coloured, shining in all the many tints of red and green and blue and orange and yellow, some in pairs and some in clusters, and all attended by a train of subject worlds, as earth and the seven other planets dance around the gorgeous sun, only that on many of those favoured orbs a day would see them pass through the glories of an orange sunset and a deep blue dawn, with, perchance, a violet noon between.

Again I looked, and this time I saw that all these gleaming stars were fiery, flaming suns, some smaller, but most larger than our own, and that intermixed with them, invisible to mortal gaze, but countless in number as the grains of dust in a desert storm, there floated on the sea of space a multitude of dark, cold orbs, as it were suns that were burned out and rolled along in silent lifelessness for ever.

At last the Shape spoke.

And everywhere throughout the round immensity there roamed strange astral shapes, now whirling madly past a glowing sun, now slowly traversing an empty region, and anon breaking up, like a shower of sparks, into innumerable fragments, huge cosmic dust-swarms, which drifted hither and thither in quantity that passes comprehension.

Then it seemed to me that I moved, though I felt no quiver of translation; the stars shot past me on either side like long flashes of many-coloured light, behind, they closed in swiftly on my track, in front, the figure of Orion opened out and widened till its points were lost in the dark vault around, and I hung near the giant cluster of orbs which men call the Pleiades, itself a universe of flaming suns, mid which stood out nine giant worlds, transcending all their neighbours.

Through the distance shone the fierce Dog Star, blazing red, a veritable monarch of the skies, out-shining all and sundry of its rivals in the visible portion of illimitable space.

Then suddenly, as I gazed in wonder at the marvels of the heavens, I heard a sound as of the beating of many spirit-wings coming from afar. It deepened and deepened till it grew to the noise of a mighty rushing wind, it softened again to a murmur as of many waters and then ceased, whilst, but faintly heard in infinite vastness, came stealing the distant sound of music, the piping of the sweet-toned flute, the twanging of the seven-stringed harp, and the harmony of the rattling rings and jingling bars of the sistrum; and not one flute I heard, but many, not one harp, but a chiming chorus, not one sistrum, but the mingled melody of a thousand sistra, yet one and all invisible.

Now, as the cadences of heavenly music rose and fell in pure, majestic chords and sweetest symphonies, I saw a Shape grow slowly in the region beyond the stars, a shadowy Shape which, seen through the long vista of heated suns and dancing worlds, seemed to have a dim and wavy form, suggesting something of a female figure, yet so awful in its surpassing loveliness that my soul trembled at the sight thereof, and I feared the Unknown Form. Nearer and nearer it came, growing larger and more definite with its approach, and I doubted no longer that it was given to me to behold the presentment of the Mother Isis, who was and is and shall be.

But what pen, what tongue, can describe the glory of her face, the power of her mere presence, the beauty of whose form was Loveliness's Own? I cannot, nor wish, nor shall make attempt; enough to say that even my memory now refuses to recall the spiritual charm of that cloud-Shape in its entirety.

At last the Shape spoke, though it seemed to me that the sound came from the unfathomable depths beyond the great star-clouds like the far-off echo of a rippling stream, with something of the sighing of the summer wind intermingled with it; and this was the burden of the speech, so sweetly borne upon my spirit ears.

"Thou whom men call Arnon, dost feel no fear in my presence, who appear but once to mortal men?"

And I answered tremblingly:

"I fear, on account of the strangeness of my vision, but not of thy power, oh, Mother of worlds!"

Digitized by Google

"Well is it spoken, mortal," the sweet voice said, still sounding faintly, as heard through a thick, deep veil; "but know, thou of little faith, who expected not this vision, who art still at heart an alien to Egypt's gods: know this, that I have granted thee this favour to speak a word of comfort to thee, that thou may'st take heart and live, and do the work that it is ordained thou shall perform."

There was a moment's pause, in which I heard, softly as before, the sound of the ringing staves of a thousand sistra, shaken by spirit hands. Then the voice went on:

"Great is thy part, mortal, in the doings of thy land, and thither shalt thou return when the time is ripe, but deem not that I shall cease to watch thee when thou goest out of the Land of Khem. 'Twas I who guided thy childish hands to the stairway on the rock when thou wast nigh to death by the buffetings of the thoughtless waves; 'twas I who brought thee unscathed through the fire when all thy comrades fell at Miropis; 'twas I who put mercy into the heart of Asos, when otherwise his men had slain thee in the Nubian forest; and in the hour of thy greatest need 'tis I will ward off the blow from thy head, and save thee from Amenti till the span of thy years be full.

Here I waited, listening.

"And this remember, favoured mortal, that thy true beloved thou shalt meet again, and all shall be between you as before; yet on thyself alone it turns whether thy days with Briseis be many or few, for a great temptation shall beset thee in thine own land, and as thou falleth before it or resisteth it, so shall thy wages be thereafter; but even in the worst, for mortal flesh is weak, it is granted thee to live when thy country dies, to succour many in their last distress, and to be clear in mind and sound in frame to the last.

"It has been given to many to whom I have revealed the fringe of my glory, to see the birth of suns and worlds from the fragments scattered through a million leagues of chaos, but inasmuch as thou art not of my chosen people, and will never pass behind the inmost veil of my temple, it is denied to thee.

"And now farewell, and if thou shouldst seek to see my face again or to hear once more the sound of my voice, thou must gaze upon the face of nature and hearken to the music of birds and brooks and whistling winds, for all things are in me and I in them, from Infinity to Infinity and from Everlasting to Everlasting."

The voice sank to an indistinguishable murmur, and then ceased, the shadowy Shape of incomparable beauty melted to a hazy cloud vanishing adown the vista of whirling worlds, and in that fearful, boundless vault was silence deep and dread. Then, like a meteor flash, I returned to the place where I had first hung motionless, the stars slid back on their courses, the great cluster of the Pleiades dwindled to a tiny cloud of twinkling points, the figure of Orion closed in to its wonted size, and all was still amid the glare of the many-coloured suns, till out of the north came a great blackness, swallowing up the heavens with capacious maw, and a voice said:

"It is enough!"

By the last gleam of light that remained I saw the roof of the chamber fall down from among the stars, the floor rise up from the gulf below, the walls close in from the four points of the heavens, and in bodily form I stood by the side of Mitres, in the temple of Karnac, the glow of a new dawn pouring in through the slanting casement.

"Breathe no word of detail of what thou hast seen or heard," said Mitres warningly, leading me before the assembled priests, where I was received with sacrifices and thanksgiving songs; and that day I entered on my duties, though more thoughtful and solemn than is my wont.

Mitres was hugely delighted that I had passed the ordeal so well, was unfailing in his words of good cheer and his quiet, catching mirth, the best of jolly companions, insisting most strongly that I shared his home till I could buy one for myself—which, he vouched, would not be long hence, and, when I hesitated, brought Vesta to join her entreaties to his. And so masterful was she with all her shy, sweet grace, that in the end I was fain to yield me to their wishes, lest I be thought churlish and ungrateful.

One thing I now saw clearly, that Vesta loved me, and that her father not only knew of it but rejoiced in the knowledge, having no object nearer to his heart than my union with his fair daughter, and yet neither had spoken a word to me that I could take advantage of.

But I did not love Vesta then, in spite of her youth and beauty, and whenever it came into my mind to marry her, seeing that Briseis was false and far away, the face of my Lady of Kronos, with royal blood in her veins, would rise before my mental eye, and I would put the thought from me, vowing inwardly that if I could not be hers I would be no other's.

So I stayed at the house of Mitres as a privileged guest, attending daily in that wondrous temple, reading the picture-writings on the wall, and watching the sculptors chiselling the shapeless slabs of stone to forms of love and awe, and recording Egypt's greatness and her conquests in imperishable monuments of living rock, destined, perchance, to endure when Khem herself shall be only a wreck of her present glory.

The days sped on. The Nile had overflowed its banks, covering the land with a deep deposit of rich, fertile soil, and the workers, relieved for a time from the drudgery of watering the land by means of poles and pitchers, had made merry over the signs of harvest when the swift-sown seeds sprang up from the grateful ground. The summer had waned and the month of Athyr come, when the Etesian winds had ceased, the Nile gone to its former bounds, and the nights grown longer, when fortune so favoured me that my name became famous through all the land.

It chanced one eve, as I walked through an inner corridor of the Temple, bending my way towards the Place of Counsel, where those in distress came to ask of Amun, that I heard hurried footsteps on the stony floor, and a warning whisper, "Peace!"

My curiosity was wakened, for I knew that dark deeds were sometimes planned in those shadowy chambers, and, resolved to know what need these unknown whisperers had of secrecy, I softly passed under a noiseless, swinging stone into a hidden recess running parallel to the corridor from whence the footsteps sounded, and from which every word uttered in the latter was distinctly audible.

Here I waited, listening.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

THE FRUIT OF THE RANDOM SEED.

"A Bank Manager, provided that the Chief Cashier is with him, and a visit from the Inspector is not imminent, has a better opportunity for wholesale robbery than the most accomplished professional thief in existence."

The words were spoken lightly and carelessly by a man in the stalls of the Pall Mall Theatre; yet if one person were more capable than another in judging such matters, it were assuredly the Chief Cashier of the Seacomb County Bank.

He did not know that his friend, the Manager of the Bank, was sitting in the seat behind him; he did not know that he had heard his words, with white face and starting eyes, and that he had repeated them over a hundred times as though to engrave them on his memory. How should he realise that the handful of seeds that he had thus sown at random had fallen on rich soil, and had taken firm root, and that they were destined to ruin his own life, and that of his colleague?

It seemed to the Bank Manager, sitting in the stall behind his Cashier, that the great theatre had drifted out of sight; the air of the swinging chorus grew fainter and fainter; the music of the orchestra was far away. Only these words rang incessantly in his ears: "Bank Manager—opportunity—opportunity—opportunity."

He rose from his seat and left the building; at that moment a roar of applause greeted a patriotic song, and from the midst of it voices were whispering to him, "Opportunity-tunity-tunity."

He went out into the streets. London in the midst of its revelry was ablaze with lights, but he heeded nothing. Men shouted to him, as bare-headed, wild-eyed, he crossed their path regardless of the traffic. Newsboys called out their news to him; men and women jostled him at every step; cabs dashed past him; but he saw them not; he went steadily forward until he left the roar of the great city behind him, and found himself in the Park, where a cool breeze was blowing, and the bright stars above were shining down.

He seated himself on a chair. "A Bank Manager," he spoke aloud unconsciously, "provided that the Chief Cashier is with him, and a visit from the Inspector is not imminent, has a better opportunity for wholesale robbery than the most accomplished professional thief in existence."

He paused for a moment, and then went on, "I am a Bank Manager; my Cashier is with me; aye, he is in my power, body and soul; the Inspector will not come yet."

He spoke in a curious, monotonous voice, and very earnestly.

"I am deeply in debt; my father lost £3,000 in the concern; if I take that sum I shall merely be taking what is my own."

The breeze whistled shrilly in the trees, and the man's over-strained nerves seemed to detect these words; "Lead us not into temptation; deliver us from evil."

He sprang to his feet with a hoarse imprecation.

"There is no temptation," he shouted back defiantly, "there is no evil; I shall merely be taking what is my own."

He ran hurriedly forward, and, hailing a cab, drove to his hotel. His mind was determined.

Thus the random seed which the Cashier had sown took firm root, and sprang into life.

* * * * *

The Manager's private room of the Seacomb County Bank was usually considered to be remarkably comfortable. The clerks looked into it with envious eyes when the door was open; the junior partner was wont to remark condescendingly that it was not half bad.

In the dead of night, however, when the inhabitants of the old-world, sleepy little town of Seacomb were wrapped in slumber, and the high stools and long counters of the Bank were deserted, the aspect of the little room was different. There was a weird, ghostly feeling in the air on the night when the Manager and Mr. Smithkins, the Chief Cashier, were closeted together for the last time.

"Smithkins," said the Manager, "have you forgotten what I once did for you?"

"How can you ask, sir? I shall never forget it as long as I live. Whenever the chance comes for me to do a good turn for you, I will take it. You may depend on me, sir."

"You will, Smithkins? You swear it?"

"Everything that is in my power I will do for you. I swear it."

"Well, the chance has come, Smithkins. Remember, you have sworn. My father, as you know, lost £3,000 in this bank. At the present moment I am deeply in debt, and, as I have often told you, I am thoroughly tired of this commercial life. How I came to be a manager of a bank, Heaven only knows. I have resolved, therefore, to take the sum of £3,000, to leave the country for ever, and to spend the remainder of my days in quiet and seclusion. You follow me?"

Digitized by Google

"What are you saying, sir? You must be mad. You cannot mean it—that you are going to run away with £3,000." The Cashier was dumfoundered.

"I mean it, Smithkins. I am not mad. I shall take £3,000, not a penny more, and all that I want you to do is to cover my retreat."

"It is impossible. I shan't allow you to do it. I shall stop you."

"You won't. You daren't."

The Manager shot the words out, and brought his fist down on the table with terrific force. The Cashier looked at him with the appealing eyes of a devoted dog.

"Think of Miss Catherine," he said at last. "You would not desert her."

The Manager was silent for a moment. Then he looked up with a bright smile.

"I leave her to you, Smithkins. You have frequently told me that she would be willing to marry you if I gave my consent. I leave her to you. She could not be in bett-r hands. On this condition you will do as I tell you?"

It was a terrible moment for the Chief Cashier. He loved his master's daughter more than his life, but he could not so easily be persuaded to allow a man to do so dark a deed. Yet he knew that no words of his would persuade the Manager; long ago he had sold himself to him; he was a tool in his hands.

"I agree," he said.

"Very well. It is late; let us go home."

The Manager preceded Smithkins to the door, locked it, and left the Bank. On the morrow, with £3,000 in his possession, he left for America, and not a trace of him was to be found.

Thus the random seed grew in strength, and bore fruit.

* * * * *

The Cashier stood on the door-step of his late Manager's house. His heart was beating like a sledge hammer.

"Is Miss Catherine at home?"

The door was held open, he passed in, and a moment later found himself in her presence.

"Miss Catherine, I bring bad news to you."

"Bad news, Mr. Smithkins? Mind I don't have your head chopped off, as they used to do to the bearers of evil tidings."

Miss Catherine was a charming little personage, who had no fear for anyone, and certainly not for her father's Cashier. At one time she had even amused herself by pretending that she was in love with him.

"Your father has suddenly been called away on business, and may not be home again for some time."

"How long is that, Mr. Smithkins?"

"A year, or—er—perhaps, two."

"This is, indeed, bad news. Did he leave no message for me?"

"He left a message, and by delivering this, I hope to reinstate myself in your favour. If you like it, you will not have my head chopped off?"

"Let me hear it first and then I will tell you."

"Well, his last wish was that you should marry——"

"Marry? Marry whom?"

"An ugly, unworthy person—me, Miss Catherine."

"You, Mr. Smithkins?"

"You do care for me, Miss Catherine? You will marry me?"

"Yes, but——"

The door opened, and Catherine could not finish her sentence. Thus she did not have an opportunity to answer, "Yes, she cared for him, certainly, but as certainly she did not love him."

Mr. Smithkins pressed her hand in a transport of delight, and left the room. A young man, handsome, dashing, well-dressed, came forward.

"Oh, Lord Harry, what do you think has happened? Mr. Smithkins came to say that my father has gone away for two years, and that he left a message that I was to marry him, and he asked me whether I didn't care for him and I said yes, and then you came in, and now he has gone away and thinks that I have promised to be his wife. What is to be done?"

"Why, you had better marry me at once," cried Lord Harry, as he took Miss Catherine boldly in his arms, and kissed her on her cheek.

Poor Smithkins at home thought that he would go mad with joy. He was a different man; he seemed to be living in a new world; his dingy lodgings were transformed into a palace. How deep and strong was his love for this poor girl he alone knew.

For the time he forgot the presence of the black cloud hanging over him that was soon to burst. The troubled times that were coming did not affect his happiness.

The cloud burst sooner than was expected. Some ten days after the Manager's disappearance the Inspector paid the periodical visit to the Bank. Then everything was discovered.

Never had the sleepy little town of Seacomb known such excitement. People swarmed to the Bank by hundreds to inquire after their savings. The wildest rumours were circulated on every side, and with the loss of the money the Manager's name was invariably associated.

At the earliest opportunity the Chief Cashier presented himself at the Manager's house. He must do his best to comfort Miss Catherine, and to prepare her for the alarming rumours which, sooner or later, were sure to reach her ears.

"Is it true, Mr. Smithkins," she cried, as soon as he had entered the room, "that £3,000 has been stolen from the Bank?"

"Ah, I was afraid that you would have heard. It is only too true. And I grieve to tell you, Miss Catherine, that, since no trace can be found of your father, people are talking—insinuating——"

"Insinuating that he took the money, Mr. Smithkins? How dare you hint at such a thing? Leave me this instant. Oh, this is too cruel."

The poor girl burst into a flood of tears.

"Believe me, Miss Catherine, not for a moment would I have harboured such a thought against your father. I was merely going to warn you against any idle rumour that you might hear. Your father is the most upright and honest man that ever lived."

The Cashier did not know what he was saying. The sight of the girl's distress completely upset him.

"Oh, Catherine," he cried, "will you not be my wife, and let me comfort you?"

The girl dried her tears, and choking back her sob, answered in a brave voice: "That is impossible, Mr. Smithkins. I am already engaged to Lord Harry. I fear that you misunderstood me the other day."

With these words ringing in his ears, broken-hearted,

Digitized by Google

the Cashier left the house. Presently, without knowing that he had moved, he found himself in his lodgings. A crumpled envelope, addressed in a well-known hand, was lying on his table. He tore it open hastily; it came from the father of the girl he loved, and contained only these words: "I am dying. The doctor says that there is no hope."

A great cry went up from his soul; he buried his face in his hands, and for a long while remained quite still. He thought of his past life, and of all the deeds that he had ever done—and he thought of the future. He thought of the sweet face of the girl who had no love for him. Now there was a stain on her name, and her life would be ruined. Her friends would desert her; who would have dealings with the daughter of a felon?

Sobs shook the strong man's frame.

Presently he seized pen and paper, and in a short, kind little note, told the poor girl that her father was dead.

"What is life to me now," he cried. "Why should I live longer?"

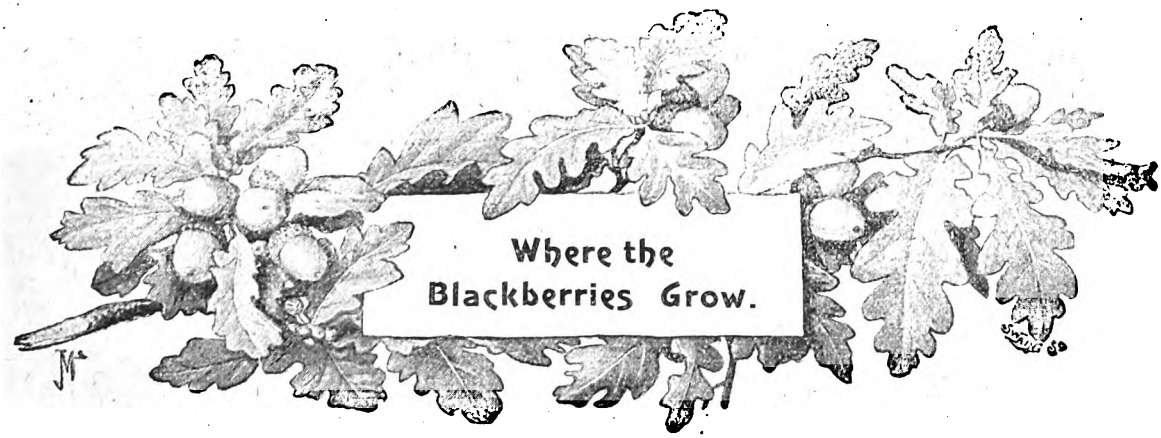
Taking a clean sheet of paper he wrote again, and the words that he wrote cleared, in this world, at least, the dead man's name of all stain of the crime of which he had been accused.

"I alone," he wrote, "stole the money from the Bank."

It was a masterly confession from beginning to end He thought long and carefully over it, so that it would leave no doubt in the minds of those who read.

Then, taking his hat, he stole out into the street.

Many people noticed that night a hollow-eyed, sad-looking man, standing near one of the parapets of the bridge that crossed the river.



THE girl stands looking at the picture; the man who painted it stands looking at the girl. What a sweet face it is, so girlish, so untouched by the sorrows and passions of life! The look of pleased admiration in the soft eyes gives him an odd sensation of pleasure. He is glad that his work pleases her.

The girl is presently joined by a tall, graceful woman. Shirley gives a slight start.

"Eleanor!" he murmurs.

"Oh, mamma," the girl is saying, "isn't this a sweet picture? I like it better than anything I have seen here."

Some of the faint, delicate colour fades out of Eleanor Seaton's beautiful, tired face as she looks at the canvas that has aroused her daughter's enthusiasm.

"Yes," she murmurs mechanically, "it is a beautiful picture."

And then with hands which are a little tremulous, she opens her catalogue and seeks the number of her picture.

"'Where the Blackberries Grow—John Shirley.' I was sure of it," she murmurs, and looks again at the picture.

A field in which there are quantities of wild flowers, tall, beautifully coloured grasses, and bushes laden with ripe berries. In the midst of the blackberry bushes stand a boy and girl. The former is busily picking berries, and his face is averted; the latter is a charming little figure in a calico slip and a small, pink sun-bonnet pushed back from a fair baby face, the pouting lips deeply stained with blackberry juice. A mass of gold coloured curls falls over the childish brow.

A fellow artist has joined Shirley.

"Mrs. Seaton and her daughter appear to be admiring your picture, Shirley," he says. "Come, let me introduce you. Mrs. Seaton is a charming woman."

"And the young girl is her daughter?" says Shirley, as they move away.

"Yes, but she will never be the lovely woman that her mother is," is the reply, and Shirley smiles.

Some hours later Mrs. Seaton sits before her dressing-room fire. There is an unusual quickening of her languid pulse. In the leaping heart of the fire she sees mirrored all the years since she and Shirley gathered blackberries in the acre field, one summer day long ago. How faithfully he had reproduced the scene in his painting!

The picture in the fire shifts a little; still the fields with its wild flowers and its laden bushes, but a young man and maiden replace the boy and baby girl. Back from the long past there comes to Eleanor Seaton the ecstasy of that unforgotten day.

Digitized by Google

But the picture has faded from the fire, and another replaces it. A wedding party: the bride, young and fair of face, and white as her bridal robes; and the bridegroom—not the boyish young lover, but a middle-aged, cynical looking man. Her youth and her innocence had caught his fancy; and she had bartered herself for his gold; sacrificed truth and, as she but too soon realised, happiness also. But she had soon learned the lesson many a woman had learned before her—to hide her aching heart beneath a smiling face. Girlhood, happiness—her own hand had slain them. With the coming of her child something like peace had crept into her heart.

Then Seaton died, and she was once more free. Of her young lover she heard nothing. She knew that he had left the old farm, that he had gone abroad to study art. Now, after all these years, they met again. The farmer's son had become a well-known artist. A grey-haired man replaced the lover of her youth.

The pictures of the past have died in the leaping flames. Other scenes are mirrored there, and hope paints them.

"What? Not dressed yet!" exclaimed a fresh, girlish voice. "Have you forgotten that Mr. Shirley and Mr. Halwell are coming to dinner, mamma?"

With dreamy eyes Eleanor Seaton turns and smiles up into the fair face of her young daughter. The girl wears a simple white gown. She is very girlish and very sweet.

"Oh, mamma! How lovely you are!" Ray exclaims, later, as her mother enters the drawing-room in a beautiful rose pink gown which is exceedingly becoming to her dazzlingly fair skin and pale gold hair. And Eleanor Seaton's cheeks softly flush and her eyes grow radiant. She is glad for the first time in many years that she is beautiful.

How swiftly the days and the weeks and the months glide by after that night! Shirley is a frequent visitor at the home of Mrs. Seaton. Then, when the summer comes, Eleanor Seaton has a fancy to visit the old farm.

The artist follows her and her daughter. One evening Eleanor stands at the old farm-house door. The air is full of the perfume of roses. The sky is crimson and gold. The woman's face is beautiful with the soft radiance of a love dream.

Then Ray comes towards her through the roses. The girl's face is flushed, her eyes droop. She moves slowly to her mother's side.

"Where have you been, dear?" the latter asks, wondering a little at the change in the girl's face.

"To the blackberry field," the girl replies. "I went with Mr. Shirley; he wished to show me the scene of his painting. Oh, mother," and the girl's arms go about her mother's neck, "he loves me—can you imagine it? He wants me for his wife, and I—I am so happy."

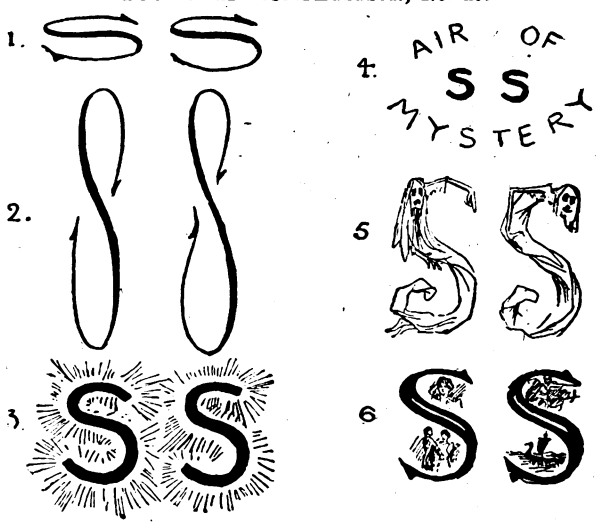
There is a silence for some moments. Then Eleanor Seaton lifts the sweet face from her breast, and presses her lips to her daughter's flushed cheek.

"I am very glad, dear, that you are happy," she murmurs.

The sunset glow has faded from the sky, leaving it pale and cold and grey. Eleanor shivers in the warm, perfumed air. Her eyes, to which all the old weariness has returned, look past the brown head of the girl towards the field "where the blackberries grow."

Emma Howard Wight.

POST-CARD COMPETITION, No. 17.



The pairs of letters shown above indicate by their formation the character of the short stories found in S.S. For example, S S would signify "Thick Short Stories." A guinea is offered to the reader who first sends to these offices a post-card containing the solution of this puzzle. Readers should put the numbers in tabular order, and the sort of story against each, commencing with number six, and going backwards. Another guinea will be sent to the reader living a greater distance than 100 miles from London under the same conditions. Post-cards only, please.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION, No. 16.

Mr. C. F. Adams, of 9, Fitzalan Street, Kennington Road, S.E., secures the London guinea this week; while the provincial guinea is divided between Miss B. Thorn, 19, Furnace Lane, Aston, Birmingham, and Mr. A. Clayton, 226, Wheeler Street, Aston, Birmingham.

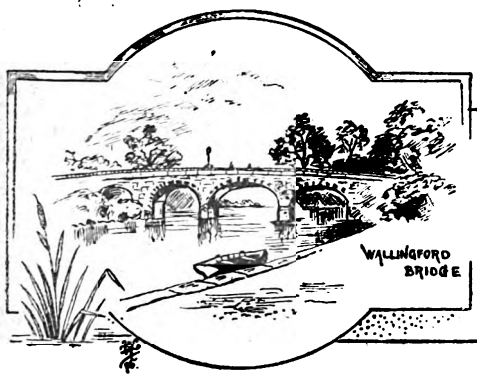
RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION, No. 14.

£5 has been sent to Mr. H. H. Harrod, 7, Dingwall Avenue, Croydon, S.E., who was the only competitor who succeeded in correctly solving this jumbled story. Attempts forwarded by the following readers contained only one mistake, and a sovereign each goes to Mr. H. P. Wright, 72, Evelina Road, Nunhead, S.E.; Miss Rosina Adams, 2, Ironfield Lane, Stonehaven, N.B.; Mr. W. Spencer, 8, Bettridge Road, Hurlingham; Mr. E. Beardsley, 31, Ponsonby Place, Westminster; and Mr. E. J. Milner, 26, Rosebank Crescent, Leeds.

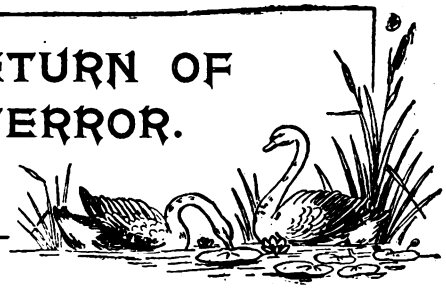
KEY.

22	5	62	99	39	90	69	83	85
1	37	19	97	31	64	17	27	100
30	10	42	41	43	93	88	79	52
81	21	54	20	2	75	24	32	70
92	96	98	101	45	60	72	102	66
4	29	68	77	8	89	50	57	95
84	36	23	63	25	74	55	73	87
35	82	18	38	34	33	51	104	65
14	103	86	47	44	48	53	7
94	80	40	26	12	59	78	61
9	71	11	46	28	58	91	56
13	67	16	15	3	49	6	76

Digitized by Google



THE RETURN OF THE TERROR.



THE people who live in Jenkins' Rents are about as poor as they well can be; but the establishment at the corner, which ministers to their necessities in the way of liquid refreshment, boasts every modern improvement. There are little compartments all round the bar, divided off by mahogany partitions, each compartment with a swing door of its own, and its particular name in white letters on stained glass.

A man with close-cropped hair stood outside, one afternoon, with an expression of lost bewilderment on his by no means handsome countenance. He looked at the swing doors one by one, as if in doubt which to enter, and finally pushed his way into one which, by putting itself at the end of the public-house front, had taken an air of semi-privacy.

He found himself alone in the compartment, with a glimpse of other customers across the bar, in their pens at the other side, and waited till a frizzy-headed damsel came round to his part of the counter. She listened with a weary expression for his order, economising her animation for more showy customers.

The visitor cleared his throat.

"Is old Blazer in?" he asked, leaning forward, with his elbow on the mahogany counter; and the girl opened her eyes.

"Who?"

"Old Blazer, the boss?"

She shook her head.

"I don't know who you mean. Our proprietor's name's Smith."

The barmaid turned away as she spoke to serve three-pennyworth of rum to a lady with a hoarse voice, at the other side of the bar; and the man who had asked the question was preparing slowly to leave the place, when a shrill voice came from the next compartment:

"Blazer's been dead this five year. Died suddent of 'perplexy, and his wife sold the business to these ere people."

The stranger grunted an acknowledgment and cleared his throat again.

"D' yer happen to know what's become of a young person as used to live in the Rents 'ere, o' the name o' Bet Pawkins?" he asked, addressing the query to the mahogany wall which divided him from his unseen informant.

There was no immediate answer; but peering round the end of the partition by the counter came the white, wrinkled face of an old woman. She stared through bleared eyes at the stranger for a minute or two, and then burst into a cackling laugh.

"Why, bless us!" she cried, "it's Jim the Terror come back. How long 'ave yer been out, Jim?"

"Came out to-day," said Jim, his voice sounding not very friendly. "Where's Bet?"

The hag cackled again, wrinkling her hideous old face into new furrows.

"Oh! Bet's bin gone long ago. She won't have nothin' to do with yer now."

Necks were being craned and heads stretched round partitions. A general interest was awakened among the customers in the story which was being unfolded before them.

A man who had heard the old hag's cry of recognition hurried round to Jim the Terror's compartment to greet an old friend; but the man had no eyes for him. He was looking with a stern, set face into the bleared eyes of his informant.

"What d'ye mean?" he asked hoarsely. "Where d'ye reckon my Bet's gone to?"

"Oh! I don't know. She went off with a quarryman, and married him, about six months after you were nabbed. Lawks! that's seven year ago—ain't it? You got a 'tenner.' I suppose you're out on ticket?"

The man had been staring at her all the while she spoke. Now he answered excitedly, catching at the bony hand which she stretched at him.

"Now I remember yer, old Mother Guzzlefoot, and I knew yer for the worst liar in Jenkins' Rents. But I'll teach yer not to tell lies about my Bet!"

He shook his fist in her face,

"S'elp me, it's no lie!" cried the old woman with energy, as she shrank back behind the partition. "Betty Pawkins has married a respectable man from up North, who knew her before she came to London, or took up with you!"

There was a ring of indignant sincerity in her voice, and the Terror's face turned a queer yellow-white.

"Where did she go to with him?" he asked.

"Back to where she lived when she was a gal, if yer know where that is."

The man returned no thanks for the information; but turned to go, jostling roughly aside the man who had come round to renew an old friendship. At the door he paused, and shouted over the partition to the old woman:

"Well, if you meet Betty Pawkins before I do, which ain't likely, you can tell her I am out of quod, and I'll never rest till I'm even with her for forgetting me. D'ye hear?"

He struck open the swing-doors as he finished, and stamped out into the street with a look on his face which explained the nickname they had given him in Jenkins' Rents—Jim the Terror.

* * * * *

Nearly two weeks after Jim the Terror's return from

Digitized by Google

gaol, a woman was kneeling at the edge of a stone-quarry in Yorkshire, looking down the precipitous side.

From behind a man approached her stealthily. He was dusty and travel-stained, but there was no sign of weariness in the step with which he crept forward. His face was rigid and pale through his brownness; his eyes gleamed. The moment had arrived for which he had come on foot all the way from London. All the way his heart had been consumed by the one desire for revenge, now the desire was about to be satisfied.

For the man creeping forward was Jim the Terror, of Jenkins' Rents, and the woman was Betty Pawkins, who had given him up, as soon as he was safely in prison, to marry another man. All those years in gaol he had looked forward to seeing Betty when he came out; and to find that she had deserted him turned in one moment all his eagerness into a passion for revenge.

He had travelled to her native place on foot to satisfy it; he had inquired in the village, and following the direction given him, had come upon her kneeling at the very edge of the quarry. It was as if Fortune had tried to make matters as easy as possible for him. He had but to approach her carefully, seize her arms, while he explained what he was going to do, and then throw her down without anybody being the wiser. It was almost too easy; but he had no intention of losing the chance.

He was close upon her, when suddenly the woman gave a scream. But she did not turn her face, and it was quite clear that she was not aware of the Terror's presence.

Why did she scream? Jim's curiosity was aroused, and he crept to the edge to look down, without touching her.

Below him, half-way down the almost precipitious side of the quarry, a little fellow of five or six, who had evidently slipped from where the woman was standing, hung desperately to a jutting-out block of stone. Below him was a sheer descent of thirty feet, and it seemed as though the child's little strength must soon be exhausted, and he fall and be killed.

Jim the Terror took in the position at a glance. A foot above the boy's head was a narrow ledge on which the boy could rest in safety till help arrived, if he could but reach it. But it was quite impossible for him to reach it by himself; it would be easier for Jim to get to it, sliding down the steep rock, and helping himself on his way by means of jutting edges.

There must have been a soft place somewhere in his heart for children, for the sight of the lad's danger took all thought of his revenge quite out of his mind.

Without even a look at the woman whom he had been about to kill, he crawled over the edge of the precipice, and began to descend carefully.

In less than five minutes he was on the ledge, which was almost a foot and a half wide, and lying full length on it had reached down and grasped the just relaxing arm of the youngster. In another minute the boy was sitting on the ledge at his side. Then, for the first time, he looked up into the strained white face of the woman above him.

"Run and fetch some men and a rope," he shouted; and the woman disappeared.

The boy seemed to realise his danger only when he heard the words, and he began to whimper.

Jim soothed him roughly.

"None of that, you young imp!" he said. "You're all right now. We've only got to wait till they bring us a rope."

The boy stared at him.

"Where's mother gone?" he whimpered.

"Who?"

"Mother—she's gone away. Where has she gone?"

Jim did not reply; but after a little pause, he said:

"Oh! that's yer mother, is it?"

"Yes."

The youngster stared at him with wide-open eyes.

"And what's your name?"

"Charlie."

"Well, Charlie, how would you like to lose yer mother—eh?—and never see her again?"

The boy began to whimper again, and there was another silence while they sat side by side on the narrow ledge of the rock. Then Jim the Terror went on with his catechism.

"Nice home have you got—eh?"

Charlie nodded.

"Got a good father?"

Another nod.

"Come, speak out," said the man; and as he went on talking, the youngster found his tongue and prattled away merrily, looking up with a smile every now and then into the rough face bent over him. "Does your mother ever talk about London, and what she used to do there?" Jim asked; and little Charlie, who was growing cheerful again under this examination, answered readily:

"Oh, yes; she talks about big London sometimes," he said with his childish lisp. "But not often; and she looks so sad when she does. She used to live there, and was so poor, she hadn't no bread even; and if daddy hadn't found her, and brought her home with him, she would have died with having nothing to eat. Wasn't it awful?"

He looked at his big companion for a reply, and this time Jim could only imitate him and nod.

The child ran on, telling the story, no doubt, word for word as he had heard it.

"And wasn't it kind of daddy to go all the way to London to find mother, and to save her when she was starving?"

He waited for an answer, and again the Terror nodded.

It was quite a relief to him after this questioning to hear voices and find that the help he had sent the woman for was come. There were two men looking over the edge of the quarry, and letting down a rope. He tied it round the boy first.

"You'd better let it down, and I'll steady it!" he shouted.

It was easy enough to get out of the quarry at the other side, once a person was safe at the bottom of it. In less than ten minutes Jim and Charlie were together on firm ground, walking hand in hand towards the quarry opening. They reached it before the people from the top could do so. The Terror lifted the boy in his arms then, and rather shamefacedly gave him a hug.

"Good-bye, old man," he said hoarsely. "Yer mother'll be here in a minute for you."

But the boy hung on to his hand, unwilling to let him go.

"Won't you come home to tea? Mother would be ever so glad!" he said.

Jim shook himself free, however, and answered, with a grin smile:

"I don't think she would, youngster. No, I'll go my way, and let yer mother go hers;" and the next moment he disappeared round a projecting rock, as the child's mother came in sight. H. F.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

A SOCIAL STAB.

"HERE, what the devil!" began Braetoun savagely. Then, crushing down the ignoble thought: "Ah, that pain again. Talking to her," he continued, with a feeble little laugh, "about me?"

"Perhaps so, my lord," said the woman drily. "Shall I stay here at the window?"

"Eh? No, of course not. Yes, stay and tell me. Is he still talking to her?"

"Yes, my lord, very impressively."

"Humph! Pills and potions, and all that confounded stuff. Why the deuce doesn't he go? I hate all this underhanded business of talking about a man behind his back."

The nurse sighed.

"Here, what the deuce do you mean by pumping out sighs like that?"

"Did I sigh, my lord?"

"Yes, you did sigh, my lady. What about? Because the doctor's gone?"

"Oh, my lord!"

"Not in love with him, are you?"

"Oh, my lord, you shouldn't speak to me like that."

"I shall speak as I like. I believe you are. You good-looking, dark-eyed women are not above taking a fancy to people. Anything between you two?"

"Oh, my lord, for shame!"

"Oh, my lady, for shame," said Braetoun mockingly. "It is that, isn't it? That's why you sighed."

"I sighed because I was sorry for your lordship, that was all."

"Gammon! I know better."

"Indeed, my lord, you are wrong."

"Now, then, out with the truth. I've watched you, my lady. You are a bit taken with him, eh? You like him just a little, eh?"

"I like him very much as a medical man, my lord, but in no other way."

"Don't believe you. Here, hasn't that brougham gone? I didn't hear the wheels."

"No, my lord. Doctor Murray is still talking to her ladyship."

"What about?" cried Braetoun impatiently. "What can they have to say?"

The nurse tightened her lips and was silent, while Braetoun fidgeted about on the couch.

"Gone?" he said at last.

"No, my lord; they are still talking."

"Look here; he's giving her all kinds of instructions, and I won't have her interfere. You are to see to everything I require, and I will not have matters taken out of your hands. You hear me?"

"Yes, my lord, you may depend upon my doing my duty."

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

"Ah, at last. Tell her not to disturb me. I think I shall have a nap."

"That was not Dr. Murray's carriage, my lord, but another one passing."

"But they are not talking still at the carriage door?"

"Yes, my lord, but Dr. Murray is saying good-bye now. He has again taken her ladyship's hand."

"Humph! He didn't take mine," muttered Braetoun "Hang him! I say," he continued, with all the childish petulance of one still weak from a long illness, "how long is he going to keep her talking there?"

The nurse drew a long, deep breath, and Braetoun turned to her angrily.

"Look here! what the deuce is the matter with you?—why do you keep on sighing like that?"

"I—I beg your pardon, my lord," faltered the woman.

"Don't beg my pardon: don't do it," he cried. "Well, is he gone?"

"No, my lord."

"D——n!"

"But he is moving away now, my lord. No; it was for the footman to open the door, and he is helping her ladyship to alight."

"Humph! Deuced civil and polite. Better be off to his patients. Ah, there's the bell. Somebody ought to have been at the door."

The nurse came away from the window and walked softly to the fireplace, took a bottle of scent from the mantelpiece, and sprinkled a little about the couch.

"Don't do that," he cried irritably.

"It will help to calm you, my lord, for your sleep. You are tired now."

"No, I'm not. Not in the least. And do stand still. How am I to hear my wife come upstairs?"

She drew back, and he lay listening for some little time, and then with his face twitching he cried:

"Why, she can't have come in. Go to the window and look."

"I beg your pardon, my lord. I heard her ladyship come in and go upstairs."

"Then why the devil didn't you say so? But, go upstairs without coming in here first? Nonsense! Open that door."

The nurse obeyed, and the convalescent lay listening till footsteps were heard overheard.

"Her ladyship has gone up to take off her things, I think, my lord."

"Confound what you think! There, shut that door. That's better. But don't look at me in that way. What's the matter? I don't look worse, do I?"

"Your lordship looks very careworn and troubled," said the woman in a low, sympathetic voice. "Pray let me bathe your forehead with a little of this scent."

"Then I do look worse," he cried, with a sudden catching of the breath; and he made a snatch at the hand which held the scent-bottle.

Digitized by Google

"No, no, no, my lord. Don't think that," she said in a pitying way. "Indeed, you only look troubled," and she sighed again.

"Look here," he said angrily. "You're thinking something. You're keeping something back. What is it?"

"Don't, don't pinch my arm like that, my lord, you hurt me."

"Curse you! and you're hurting me. Look here, I can read you. You're keeping something back, I tell you; what is it? You were sighing just now. What was that about?"

"Oh, nothing, my lord—only, perhaps, because I was sorry for you."

"Then you think I'm worse?"

"Indeed, indeed. I don't, my lord. Pray loose my arm."

"Then what is it? Curse you! Will you speak?"

"I musn't—I daren't, my lord."

"And I say you shall. Do you hear me? I say you shall."

"Oh, my lord, my lord," cried the woman in a frightened whisper, "you must not, indeed, you must not give way to passion like this. It is so bad for you—it is, indeed."

"Then speak out, and tell me what you were thinking, or, curse you, I'll have a fit."

"I dare not, indeed, I dare not," she whispered. "I must not tell you."

"You shall," he cried, holding her now with both hands, while she made a feeble show of trying to get away. "Will you speak?"

"Indeed, indeed, I dare not, my lord," she sobbed now. "It is nothing—only a fancy of mine. I mustn't tell you. Don't, pray, force it from me, because I know it's wrong, and you'll have me turned out of the house in disgrace for saying it."

"Whether I do or no, you shall speak," he cried. "Now then, what was it?"

She sank upon her knees by the couch and held up her clasped hands as he still held her.

"Don't, pray don't make me speak, my lord. It's cruel to me. It was only a wicked thought or two that came into my head."

"What was it?" he growled fiercely.

"Must—must I speak?"

"Yes, and at once. Curse you, I'll half kill you if you don't."

"But you'll drive me away for saying it, and I can't afford to make enemies, my lord."

"Out with it," he cried, as he gripped her as hard as his weakness would allow. "Now."

"It—it was only that—that I thought—oh, pray, pray don't make me say it, my lord."

"Speak out, curse you, you jade!"

"That—that her ladyship oughtn't—oughtn't to talk so much—to Doctor Murray, and you lying ill and helpless."

"You—you thought that?" he said fiercely.

"Ye—yes, my lord. I couldn't help it. I often felt so—in the long, dark nights when you were insensible. It was very wicked of me, but it was when I was extra tired, perhaps, and felt so sorry for you to be lying there."

He let her arms go free, and lay back gazing at her with a peculiar, stony aspect.

"There—there," she sobbed, as she wiped her eyes. "You made me say it, my lord, and now you're going to punish me."

"Hold your tongue," he said. "Get up. No, don't go away. Sit down in that chair."

She obeyed, and seemed to be trembling.

"You noticed that, did you?" he said in a husky whisper.

"Yes, my lord," she faltered.

"And a good deal more?"

"Oh, don't, pray don't make me say anything else," she whispered.

"I'll make you say everything I wish," he snarled. "Now then, out with it. I want to know the whole truth. Now tell me everything you saw."

CHAPTER XXXV.

Emsworth Makes Mischief.

"Ah, Mr. Emsworth!" said Murray, rising, as Rancer showed in the bearer of that name one morning, "I'm very glad to see you."

"Don't seem like it," said Emsworth surlily. "Haven't been near me for over a month. But it's the old story: a rich man has no friends."

Murray smiled sadly.

"I was in hopes that though rich men have no friends, this was meant as a friendly visit—but I see you are ill."

"D—n bad, my dear boy. Don't take any notice of my surly words, only you should have come to see me. But there, I know you've too many miserables to attend to as it is. Well, how are you?"

Murray laughed pleasantly.

"Pretty well worked to death, sir. But let's hear how you are, and see what I can do?"

"Oh, you can't do anything. It isn't a case for pills, unless it's blue pills made of lead instead of quicksilver. My complaint's brain, and a local application of that kind is the only thing that would put me right."

"Indeed! and what about your daughter?"

"Hah! There you have me on the hip," said Emsworth with a weary sigh. "But I often wonder why I have passed a life of slavery to make money, only to find that the position I've won is all thorns. Mustn't make hers worse, though, poor child. I dare say I shall get some rest in the next world, for I'm having plenty of punishment for my sins in this. But don't quite cut me. Come and see me a bit more. You always do me good; you do, indeed."

"Well, I will try and be more sociable. It is not out of unkindness or a wish to be neglectful."

"Oh, I know that," said Emsworth, fidgeting about in his chair; and Murray waited with a strange sensation of misery troubling him, knowing full well as he did that Emsworth must have some bad news to communicate—news which would affect him as much as its bearer. At last it came.

"Seen the Braetouns lately?"

"Yes. I have been there twice during the past week. Braetoun sent for me. Return of his old complaint."

"His nature's all unscrewed," cried Emsworth passionately, and he brought his fist down heavily upon the table. "There's no fairness in it all. Here's a fine, healthy fellow in one case, with eight or nine young children and a wife, gets cut off, and those he has to leave behind him, without a shilling; and on the other side, men like Braetoun, a mere shadow of a man, to go on living, injuring everyone about him. By George, what a blessing it would be if he would only die!"

The old man was silent, and the pause grew painful.

Murray broke the silence by saying the words that came uppermost, but repented speaking the next moment.

"Have you seen Lady Braetoun lately?"

"No; he comes between us like a blight. I can't go near them, because if I do it's a misery. I see things which make me boil over, and then, poor child, she takes his part. She thinks me hard and harsh, and I'm better away."

The stream had begun to run now, and Emsworth went on as if it was an intense relief to take someone into his confidence.

"It's of no use to be mealy mouthed; he's a scoundrel, a heartless scoundrel. Anyone would have thought, after the way in which Olive forgave him, and nursed him through his long illness, he would have turned over a new leaf. She behaved like an angel to him, and in return he tramples upon her best feelings, and I believe he would throw her over altogether, if it was not for the hope of getting hold of my money when I die. But he shan't, not a penny. I'll —I'll leave it to you."

Digitized by Google

"For Heaven's sake, don't," cried Murray. "I thought you wished to call me your friend."

"Well," said the old man, staring, "can't one leave a friend a few thousand?"

"Not this one," said Murray, smiling. "I have a good income, sir, so long as I work, and work is my greatest relief. Don't do anything to make me feel that I can be idle."

"I shall do as I like with my own," said Emsworth sulkily.

"Do so, by all means, but please don't mention money to me again."

"Very well. Then I'll build a church, or endow a hospital. I can't go and spend it, for I've lost all taste for enjoyment of any kind. Oh, it's maddening. He has thrown off every feeling of shame or compunction now, and carries it all off openly. He's hardly ever at home — always at Brompton or his place in Surrey with that cursed Delilah. It all began again after that unlucky journey from Brighton. I've done everything I could to stop it—bribery and corruption—ah, it didn't want any of the last. Plenty of that, eh? But it is no good. I give you my word of honour that I've been and seen the girl—there. I called her a Delilah—I beg her pardon. Poor little wench! I don't believe there's anything more in her than a genuine liking for that scoundrel. I've appealed to her and her old aunt over and over again. I've offered them any amount they liked to name to go right away. The aunt is always on my side, and told me that if I'd allow her niece a hundred a year she should go right away, and never see Braetoun again. So I've had a quiet, kind, fatherly talk with the little thing.

"I never said a bullying, unkind word, but regularly appealed to her, telling her about what I felt for my child, and pointing out the cruelty of the position. Then I thought I'd got her, for she seems a tender-hearted little thing, and she began to cry. I told her what her aunt had said, and that I thought a hundred a year was too little. So I would allow her two hundred and fifty a year, and give her at once a set of handsome diamonds. But I might as well have offered her nothing, for she only shook her head. Then I doubled it, and she said, 'Don't ask me, sir; I can't, I can't.'"

Murray sat with his head resting on his hand, listening, his eyes half closed, and Emsworth went on.

"I went away in a rage, but within a week I was back, for I'd been to Chester Square and seen the poor, white face and strained eyes there, and I felt that I must make any sacrifice for her sake. So, right or wrong, I went back, and the little thing—by George, Murray, she'd have made a good woman if she'd come into the world differently—she met me with a little, sad smile, and as soon as we were sitting down together she began at me, with the tears running: 'It's of no use, Mr. Emsworth,' she said, 'I can't, I can't.' 'Wait a moment, my dear,' I said, 'and hear what I've got to say'; and, old fool as I am, I offered her a thousand a year—and I'd have paid it to secure Olive's happiness. But as soon as the girl heard it she laughed, and her eyes seemed to sparkle through her tears. 'I don't want money, Mr. Emsworth,' she said. 'I loved him, and he loved me, before he ever saw you and yours, and I wouldn't give him up for millions.' There, I don't care, law or no law, Murray, if I could only get her to consent, I'd take my girl off to Africa, and Braetoun should never see her again. But she wouldn't listen to me, poor child, and my hands are tied. I did say something to her one day, and there was such a look of horror in her eyes that I shall never dare to speak so to her again."

Emsworth took out his handkerchief to wipe his face, and sat gazing at Murray's wrinkled brow the while.

"Then there's this miserable horse-racing, too. The devil always seems to do his best for the greatest scoundrels. He has been having a regular run of luck lately with that mare of his, Bella Donna. Hah! Poison, and no mistake! But it's found him in funds, and made him a bit independent, so he hasn't sent my poor girl begging to me."

The old man stopped short, and then laughed in a curious manner.

"I was laughing at the queer way in which things turn out. Remember my bringing Olive here? Hah! That was a nice piece of advice of yours, my boy, to take her on that voyage. Pretty day's work, too, to send that scoundrel with us."

"For Heaven's sake, don't reproach me with that," cried Murray, in so agonised a tone of voice that the old man was startled.

"Oh, no, I don't reproach you, my lad," he said, laying his hand upon the other's shoulder. "We can't see what's going to happen. You gave me good advice, and there's no fighting against fate. But it was a sad business for all of us, and I know you've suffered as much as I."

"Heaven knows I have," said Murray in a hollow voice which startled Emsworth.

"Thank you, my lad, thank you," said the old man, taking his hand. "I know you have; I know you have. There isn't a doctor in London who could have done me so much good as you have this morning. It's too bad of me to come pouring out my woes to you, but you've been a good fellow to me, Murray, and I'm not blind. I've seen for long enough the tender, brotherly feeling you've felt towards my child. Braetoun was your old school-fellow and patient, but you wouldn't have given up your time and worked for him as you did over his accident if it hadn't been for my poor darling. Do you know what she says?"

Murray raised his eyes and looked at the speaker in a startled way.

"She says she is sure that Braetoun would have died again and again if it hadn't been for you But there, I'm wasting your time, and I'll go. God bless you, my dear boy. Come and dine with me to-night."

Murray shook his head.

"Well, to-morrow, then?"

"Don't press me, Mr. Emsworth. I'll come and see you soon. There, I can promise no more."

"Always welcome," said the old man, shaking hands warmly; and when he was gone the Doctor sat gazing straight before him at vacancy, pondering on his visitor's words respecting his brotherly affection for Olive.

"Was he sincere?" he thought, "or does he read me through and through?"

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Murray Goes Mad.

But it's a long lane that has no turning. Braetoun's mare had been making a fortune for him, and Vinniss, who saved his winnings, grew more independent and insulting to his employer, who was dependent, for he spent his. Sam, the weedy son's riding, had carried all before it, and presuming upon his run of success, Braetoun determined upon a grand coup, made his stroke, and, to use his own expression, "came a cropper."

That night he went home looking ghastly, and literally raged against his wife for some trivial little omission, swore at her, and told her she was the curse of his life. Then as Olive was feeling that her misery was greater than she could bear, her reviler suddenly broke down, staggered, and would have fallen but for her willing arms guiding him into a lounge.

Then the imploring message reached Murray once more, and at an unlucky time, for in spite of all self-control, his passion had broken away after a visit to Eaton Place, where he had heard from Emsworth what had happened.

He was walking up and down his room after trying to calm himself for the visit by taking a dose of the drug he used, but it had lost its old effect.

Digitized by Google

He shuddered, and stood gazing blankly before him, not daring to repeat in words what it might mean.

But he was himself again directly.

Rancer had tapped and entered, to say a cab was at the door, and Murray looked calm and stern enough as his servant helped him on with his coat, and he stepped into the vehicle to have himself driven swiftly to Chester Square.

"Is that Doctor Murray?" cried a voice, as he went upstairs; and there stood Olive, looking, as he thought, more beautiful than ever, with her mild, appealing eyes gazing at him as the one friend who could bring her help, and a thrill ran through him as she caught his hands in hers, and cried, with a sob of relief:

"I thought you so long. He is worse than ever—one of those terrible fits. Pray—pray come."

She was quite right. Braetoun was worse than ever. He had, in spite of endless warnings that he must be very cautious in the use of stimulants, flown to brandy, and then to the French liqueur, as soon as he knew the extent of his losses, and the result has been shown.

Then followed the old miserable business of the fight with the wild delirium, which finally gave way to Murray's remedy and skill, and Braetoun sank into a heavy stupor, looking more dead than alive.

They were alone in the sick man's room, and the house was very still, for the clock had just struck three, and the weary servants, no longer alarmed by these attacks, had gone to rest. Olive, who, from old experience, had been able to read the changes which had taken place, knew that the crisis had passed, and sank upon her knees by the bed, while Murray, who all through the weary hours had been maddened by her presence, the touch of her hands, and the intoxicating perfume of her hair, as she helped him to calm the delirious man, and at times even hold him down, stood watching her, till she rose with a faint smile trembling on her lip.

"I can't speak to you now," she said. "Wait a little. Go down to the drawing-room. You are quite exhausted. There is a tray there. The servants will have taken one up. Please go down."

"And you?" he said in a whisper. "You are utterly worn out. You must come down, too."

"No, no; he must not be left," she cried appealingly.

"Yes; he will sleep now for hours. The danger is past, and he will not hurt. You must rest now."

"I could not sleep, indeed, and I can rest here."

"Then I must fetch you some refreshment. You are paler than ever, and look ready to faint."

"I cannot have you waiting on me," she replied, with a faint smile. "I will come down. But are you sure that he can be left?"

"You know now as well as I," he said quietly. "We have gone through all this wretched business before."

"Yes," she said, with a weary sigh, and laying her hand upon his arm they passed out of the chamber together, and down the silent staircase into the dim, calm, and peaceful drawing-room, where, upon a side table, there stood tea, coffee, spirits, and a kettle just simmering over a gas jet.

Olive hurried to the table as soon as the door closed behind them, turned up the gas, and proceeded to make tea, while Murray took a turn up and down the dimly lighted room, and then threw himself into a chair, turning his face towards the shade, but listening intently to every movement she made, the click of the china, and the rustle of her dress.

Then he shivered, for the rustle of the silk came closer, and he looked up with a start, to find that she was bending over him.

"How tired and worn you look, Doctor! The tea will be ready in a minute," she said gently. "I could not speak upstairs; I should have broken down and cried like a child. I can tell you now—what I wanted to say—that—that——"

In spite of her words the tears gushed to her eyes, brimmed over, she burst into a passionate fit of sobbing, and covered her face with her hands, as Murray sprang to his feet and caught her in his arms.

"Don't, for God's sake, don't give way like that," he cried wildly. "I cannot bear to see you suffer. It is too horrible."

For a moment she did not shrink, but went on sobbing hysterically. Then with a start of surprise, as he pressed her closer to his breast, she drew back, but he retained her hands.

"Don't shrink from me," he whispered; and the words which had been kept back so long came rapidly and full of passion. "You don't know, you cannot tell all I have suffered for your sake."

"Yes, I know, I know," she said in a startled way, but as if not quite realising, not willing to believe herself. "You have been so patient, so kind. You have saved his life again and again. We can never thank you enough. But come, now you need rest and refreshment."

"Saved his life!" he said wildly; "and for what? Do you think I am blind and deaf to everything? There have been hours when in my misery and despair I have been ready to end my own. Olive, from the first time we met I have loved you with all a strong man s first passionate love. I have gone through a year of madness, realising first how it was impossible that you could listen to me, then ready to rejoice that you were going to be happy in the love of the man you chose, and gradually awakening to the fact that I had stood by and seen you brought to misery, wretchedness and despair. No, no, don't, in Heaven's name!" he cried angrily, as with a quick movement he drew her tightly, more tightly to his breast, while she pressed her hands against his shoulder and forced herself away, trembling, scared, and horrified at his declaration, and with her eyes wildly dilated as she gazed in his, but, utterly helpless as she felt her position, unable to utter a word.

"I cannot, it is impossible to tell you all I have gone through in my ever-growing love. I, who would have died to spare you pain, forced to be a witness of your misery and unhappiness, till I have reviled myself in being as it were a partner in your husband's guilt. You struggle, you thrust me from you, but you cannot be so cruel; you cannot—you who are so lonely and despairing, cast from you a love that can know no end, for I live, I breathe, only for you, and if, now I can hold back no longer, you cast me off, there is but one release from my misery, and that is death."

"Doctor!" she panted at last.

"No; your slave."

"Doctor—Doctor Murray," she cried wildly, in her vain struggle to escape. "For Heaven's sake! You must be mad!"

(To be continued.)

THE NEXT NUMBER OF

PEARSON'S MAGAZINE

Appears on the First of November.

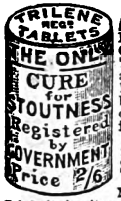
POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d. NERVINE

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/-, C.O.D. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 183a, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON,

Drum in position, 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "C. A.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid. VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (259 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 185, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

70

NEW SONGS (words and music) Piano Pieces, Dances, etc., with packet of Freeman's exquisite Scent and Booklet of racy reading, 12 Stamps.—Turner's Piano and Music Depot, London Rd., Preston

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

"OH, YES! REVENUES from ECONOMY are ENORMOUS."

The Richest Provision in Knowledge made absolutely easy for the Accumulation of this income. Write to Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, who will provide you with full information, posting you free (if, when writing, you mention this Paper) a large, amazingly interesting, valuable, instructive, and detailed illustrated "Pioneer" Reduction Catalogue, showing you what you can save, what to buy and where to buy Carpets, Mats, and Hearthrugs of every manufacture, including Wilton, Plush, Brussels, Velvet, Antique, Foreign, and Furs, also Queen's Royal Household, Prudential, Eclipse and Alarm Carpets and Hearthrugs (Regd.). Also Blankets, Curtains, Sheetings, etc., and a thousand other articles wanted in every household. (Copyright.)

Gigantic Sale of the "Queen's Royal" Household Reversible Rich Turkey Pattern

CARPETS (Reg.)

Trade Mark on all Goods. Beware of Imitations.

Admittedly the Cheapest in the World. Woven without seam Altogether superior quality, with handsome border to correspond. A marvel for excellence and beauty. Thousands of Repeat Orders and Testimonials received, giving the highest satisfaction. When Ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

6ft. by 9ft	Sale Price.	9/6	10½ft. by 12ft.	Sale Price.	20/6
8ft. by 9ft.		11/6	12ft. by 12ft.		22/6
6ft. by 12ft.		12/6	9ft. by 15ft.		21/6
9ft. by 9ft.		13/6	12ft. by 13½ft.		25/6
9ft. by 10½ft.		15/6	12ft. by 15ft.		28/6
9ft. by 12ft.		17/6	12ft. by 18ft.		33/6
9ft. by 13½ft.		19/6	12ft. by 21ft.		38/6

A Queen Royal Hearthrug, 6ft. by 3ft., to match, 2/- extra.

SPECIAL OFFER.—Three for 5s. 9d., Six for 11s. 3d., Twelve for 22s.

COLOSSAL SALE OF RICH VELVET PILE

REAL BRUSSELS CARPETS

Extraordinarily Heavy, very Best Quality, Newest and Choicest Designs. In Old Gold, Sultan, Terra Cotta, Crimson, Sky, Navy, and the latest colours. With handsome border to correspond. Guaranteed to wear for years and give every satisfaction. The sizes and prices as follows (all ready for putting down):

REDUCED SALE PRICE LIST.

4½ft. by 7ft.,	11/-	VELVET PILE BRUSSELS CARPET SQUARES.	9ft. by 12ft.,	38/-
6ft. by 9ft.,	18/-		11ft. by 12ft.,	47/-
7½ft. by 9ft.,	23/-		12ft. by 13½ft.,	59/-
9ft. by 9ft.,	28/-		12ft. by 15ft.,	69/-
9ft. by 10½ft.,	33/-		12ft. by 18ft.,	77/-

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any colour preferred.

A Velvet Pile Rug, 6ft. by 3ft., to match, 5/6 extra.

SPECIAL OFFER.—Three Rugs, 16s.; Six, 31s.

AH! AH! THE MILDNESS OF THE SEASON HAS DONE THIS.

100,000 Ladies' Luxuriously Handsome, Rich Dark Brown

OPOSSUM FUR NECKLETS

With Life Imitation, Natural Head combined; a most elegant and soft fur, quite equalling in style anything offered at 15/6 each, and for durability not to be surpassed. Similar to illustration.

"SHORT STORIES" SPECIAL NECKLET COUPON. 24/10/95.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above (post free this week only) to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

POST FREE 4/6 WORTH TREBLE.

Cheques and P.O.'s payable to—
F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,
Woodsley Road, Leeds. Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS." Telephone No. 948.

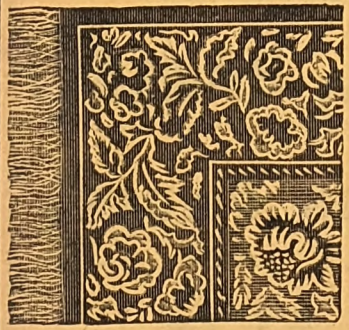
OUR NEW VENTURE.—Yes, Two different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright.)

IN THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CHANCERY DIVISION), HODGSON v. WEBB BROTHERS.—On the 18th day of July, 1890, his lordship, Mr. Justice Chitty, granted an interim injunction, restraining Messrs. Webb Brothers, of Hackney Wick, from infringing Mr. Fredk. Hodgson's Trade Mark, "Eclipse," No. 93,774 (Leeds).

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ECLIPSE" CARPETS (Regd.)

GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.



This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, in our New (Reg.) Waterlily and Persian designs, the largest ever sold at the price, suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. An "Eclipse" Rug sent with Carpet 1/- extra.

Sale Price 3/6 Each.

SPECIAL OFFER.

Two Carpets and Two Rugs 8/-, or Four Carpets and Four Rugs 15/6.

P.S.—When this Design (registered) is wanted in Carpets or Hearthrugs, as above, kindly quote No. 268,493.

We Rely upon Spontaneous Repeat Orders from our Clients for the Maintenance of our Trade. Established nearly a Quarter of a Century.' All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON. 24/10/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send any goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.
Cash returned in full if not satisfied.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE "PRUDENTIAL"

REVERSIBLE CARPETS

(Registered).

Reversible, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 12 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian, and on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

Size.	Each.		Size.	Each.
6ft. by 9ft.	4/9	REDUCED SALE PRICE.	9ft. by 15ft.	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft.	5/11		12ft. by 12ft.	12/9
9ft. by 9ft.	7/6		12ft. by 13½ft.	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft.	8/6		12ft. by 15ft.	15/9
9ft. by 12ft.	9/6		12ft. by 18ft.	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft.	11/6		12ft. by 21ft.	22/6

When ordering, please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Regd.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1/6 extra, size 2yd. long and 1yd. wide. Special Offer, Three Hearthrugs for 4/3, or Six for 8s., or Twelve for 15/6, sterling value.

P.S.—When this Design is wanted in Hearthrug or Carpet, as shown above, kindly quote Registered No. 268,496.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers and Merchants, WOODSLEY RD., LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address: "ECLIPSE, LEEDS," National Telephone No. 948.
N.B.—Foreign Orders executed and packed free, and shipped at lowest rates.

A STORY FOR LOVERS OF THE MYSTERIOUS APPEARS ON PAGE 553.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

NO. 409. FOR WEEK ENDING OCTOBER 31ST, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

GRAND PIONEER REDUCTION SALE

By Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son, the well-known Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, will take effect on sight of this advertisement. Super-eminent.—The Queen's Royal Household Prudential, Eclipse, and Alarm Carpets and Hearthrugs,-to (Reg.). Amazingly interesting, instructive, and detailed Grand Reduction Catalogue post free, if, when writing, you mention this paper.

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a Carpet for the money. Be it so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft by 9ft.—even for 2s. 11d. TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU.

OUR NEW VENTURE! Yes, Two Different Pattern Hearthrugs or Carpets for the Price of One! (Copyright).
This is a wonderful step in economy.

PRODIGIOUS SALE OF THE

"PRUDENTIAL" Reversible CARPETS

(Registered.)

Reversible, with a different pattern on both sides, woven throughout with handsome border to correspond; richly blended in several colours to suit any furniture. Made in 10 sizes only. These carpets are the production of much care, labour, and forethought, and are made in handsome and elaborate patterns (which are protected by registration). They combine on one side the rich blended colours of the Turkish and Persian with on the reverse the elegant designs of the Wilton. These goods cannot be distinguished from real Brussels when laid down, and cannot be excelled in durability.

	Each.		Each.
6ft. by 9ft., Reduced Sale Price	4/9	9ft. by 15ft., Reduced Sale Price	12/6
7½ft. by 9ft. " " "	5/11	12ft. by 12ft. " " "	12/9
9ft. by 9ft. " " "	7/6	12ft. by 13½ft. " " "	14/6
9ft. by 10½ft. " " "	9/6	12ft. by 15ft. " " "	15/9
9ft. by 12ft. " " "	9/6	12ft. by 18ft. " " "	19/6
10½ft. by 12ft. " " "	11/6	12ft. by 21ft. " " "	22/6

When ordering please mention if for Bed, Dining, Drawing, or Sitting Room, and any particular colour preferred.

"Neal Lodge, Upper Norwood, S.E., January 18th, 1896.
"The Dowr. Lady Abercromby is pleased with the 'Prudential' Carpet she ordered."

Blairquhan, Maybole, N.B., August 3rd.
Lady Hunter Blair writes: "Will Messrs. F. Hodgson & Son send her another 'Prudential' Carpet, same as before, crimson and gold, dimensions, 9ft. by 10½ft. Cheque inclosed."

A Reversible "Prudential" Hearthrug (Reg.), to match above Carpets, sent for 1s. 6d. extra, size 2 yards long, and 1 yard wide.

SPECIAL OFFER.—3 Hearthrugs for 4s. 3d.; or 6 for 8s.; or 12 for 15s. 6d.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. We will forward direct from the looms to any address on receipt of amount, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, the largest ever sold at the Price.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as per advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER. 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d.
Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON, 31/10/96.
On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied.
(Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON AND SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants,
WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.
Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:
Newball & Mason,
HYSON GREEN WORKS,
Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 2 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON

Digitized by Google

"THE NIMBLE 9D."

Great Reduction in price to 9d. per lb. in order to reduce stock, but

QUALITY GOOD AS EVER.

NEARLY 100,000 BEDS ALREADY SOLD

TO THOROUGHLY SATISFIED PURCHASERS.

NEWHAM'S LINCOLNSHIRE FEATHER BEDS

THESE BEDS are warranted doubly purified, dusted, and perfected in our own extensive factory at Boston, Lincs., made in strong linen bordered tick. The quality, sweetness, and purity of every bed guaranteed. These beds ALWAYS GIVE SATISFACTION, and many thousands of purchasers have sent us flattering testimonials and other orders for beds. Note following prices, which are 25 per cent. less than our recently advertised prices.

No. 1—Single Bed, Bolster and Pillow, 6ft. 3in. by 3ft. 6in., weighing 40lb. 30/-

No. 2—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 50lb. 37/6

No. 3—Double Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 4ft. 6in., weighing 55lb. 41/3

No. 4—Extra Size Bed, Bolster, and Two Pillows, 6ft. 6in. by 5ft., weighing 65lb. 48/9

Any sized Bed only 9d. per lb., Carriage Paid, to any station in the United Kingdom. FEATHERS ONLY 9d. PER LB. The trade supplied. All orders must be accompanied by cheque or P.O.O. (which, as security to purchasers, may be post-dated ten days). Send for samples of Feathers and Ticks, Price Lists, etc., which will be sent Post Free and need not be returned. A great reduction on three or more Beds. Please mention this paper.

S. S. NEWHAM & CO., Boston, Lincolnshire.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

ARE YOU LOOKING for the cheapest and best firm to supply you with Wood for FRETWORK & WOOD-CARVING?

Send for price list. EST. 25 YRS.

PETER PATRICK,
Wharfedale Saw Mills, OTLEY.

VARICOCELE.

Its speedy and painless cure by the latest and most improved method of treatment for this disease. Send for Illustrated Leaflet, entering fully into the subject. It is the only reliable and effective means of curing this disease without operation. Sent sealed post free for three stamps, by

B. FORBES, 57 and 58, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92a, Aldersgate Street, London.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 44
Oct. 31, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 26, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

BLUSHING

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

Dr. Mackenzie's
ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 42, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

Wanted, a Wife to dress her husband's Linen with St. Bernard's Enamel. Mrs. Donald writes: "I never saw anything give so much satisfaction; it makes shirts and collars beautiful." Sample packet 3d. stamps, 12 packets post free 2/-. Address: D. P. AITCHISON, St. Bernard's Enamel Works, Edinburgh.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.
Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

THE "SURPRISE" WHISTLE.

A Piercing, Penetrating, Nerve-Racking, Ear-Splitter!

The rubber bulb on the end makes it capable of producing 1,000 different effects, from purling or muffled tones up to a great swelling, booming, two-mile piercing note, that will equal a steamboat or locomotive whistle. A PERFECT DOG OR QUAIL CALL. Cyclists will find the "Surprise" a magnificent road clearer. Post free 13 stamps.—MILLARD BROS., Dept. 9, 123, HOUNDSDITCH, LONDON, E.C.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

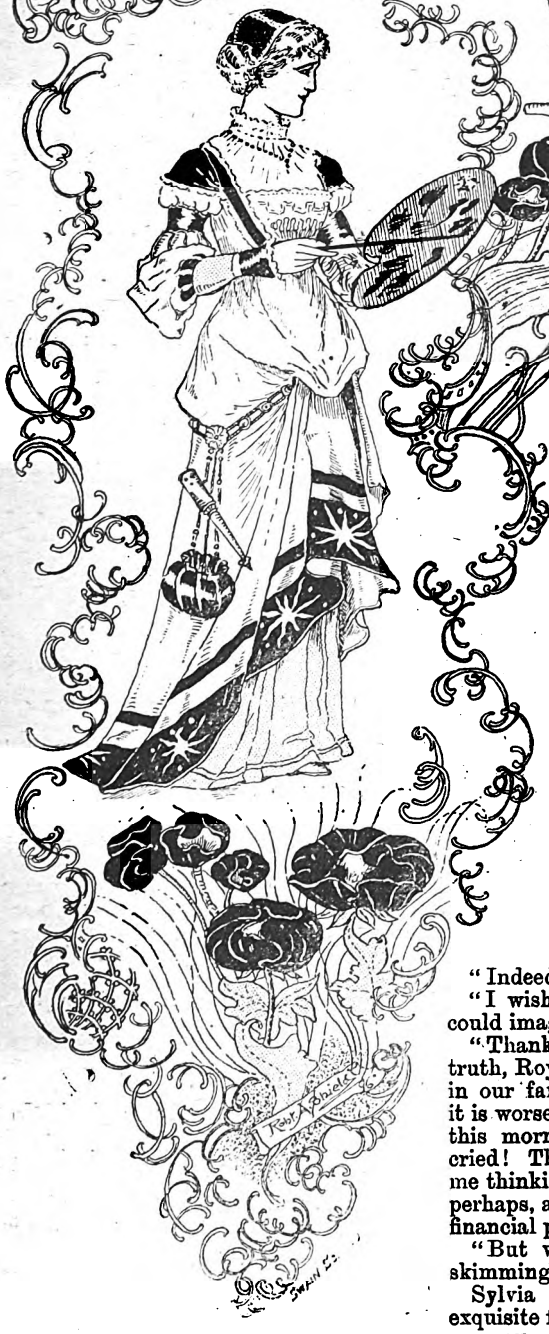
Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

Edited by C. Arthur Pearson.

No. 409.] [One Penny.

For the Week ending October 31st, 1896.



MRS. BLAIR.

CHAPTER I.

"HERE is the beautiful Sylvia—late as ever!"

A slender girl, in palest mauve, crossed the river lawn, and was handed into a skiff.

"We thought you were never coming," said her cousin, as he sculled her away.

"Did you?" raising her eyebrows, "and you know how I love boating. What a large picnic! Two punts, three canoes, a dinghy, and electric launch. Tell me about the people—anyone amusing?"

"Well, there's Mr. Blair."

"Point him out."

"Just in front, canoeing."

"That type of man does not appeal to me. I noticed him as we started—he stared!"

"Really! very rude, but I expect you're used to it. Many girls would rather like being stared at by Mr. Blair."

"Why?"

"He is irritatingly eligible, disgustingly rich."

"Indeed! how interesting!"

"I wish I had not told you, Sylvia; you're just the sort of girl I could imagine marrying for money."

"Thanks for the compliment to my good sense. To tell you the truth, Roy, I was born extravagant; it is a kind of hereditary disease in our family. I've nearly ruined poor papa with my debts; he says it is worse than having a son at college. There was a terrible scene this morning when my dressmaker's bill arrived; mother actually cried! They say I am driving them into the bankruptcy court. It set me thinking. Life is too short for worry, and I just dawdle on; but, perhaps, after all, marriage might be worth considering from a purely financial point of view."

"But what about love?" asked Roy, leaning on his oars, and skimming them along the surface of the water.

Sylvia bent over the side and glanced at the reflection of her exquisite features.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"I have already succumbed to the one overruling passion of my life. I love what is real and substantial, not a dream, relying on the fitful slumbers of the emotions. I want wealth and luxury, to be envied by everyone, to see the world coveting me! Ah! you smile, but I am not joking. That is my ambition—grand, isn't it?"

Roy rowed on with vigorous strokes. Was it the rays of the sun that flushed the boy's face scarlet; or only a clearer knowledge of life than that of the speaker under her lilac sunshade?

"Perhaps," he said at last, "you had better make friends with Mr. Blair."

"Yes," she replied lightly. "I think I should like to know him."

Under the shade of island trees, Roy introduced Sylvia Holland to Hesketh Blair.

A moment later the two were drifting in a backwater, talkative and alone.

The girl was smiling sweetly, conscious that her beauty had already made an impression on the man.

Sylvia leant back lazily, one white hand dabbling in the tide, the witchery of her eyes peeping through long, brown lashes.

"You are dreaming of something pleasant," he said, after a momentary pause.

"Yes," with a low laugh—"dreams that wave before the half-shut eye. I love what is beautiful, and hate the commonplace. This is beautiful," glancing round at the summer scene, while her thoughts added, "but you are commonplace!"

CHAPTER II.

"WHAT a house! What a hostess! What a hall!"

The speaker gazed at the overpowering luxury of the tout ensemble. Mrs. Blair's friends were taking their leave, and sweeping down the marble staircase. She overheard the remark, and it pleased her well. The thin yet well shaped lips smiled. Admiration was her food—her substance, her very being.

To be beautiful, popular, successful—that comprised the essence of life, as Sylvia Blair discerned it.

"Good-night," said Roy's voice at her side. "You have had your usual triumph, Sylvia—packed rooms, and the most select crowd in London."

The carriages rolled away, the huge hall grew empty, and Sylvia Blair was left standing alone among her household gods.

She loved the dazzling setting that marriage had given her; it was good to be rich and powerful. She thought of it, and laughed softly. Until Hesketh Blair laid his fortune at her feet she had been like a leafless tree.

"What are you thinking of, Sylvia?"

She started from her reverie, and moved listlessly away.

Her husband followed her to a sofa, upon which she sank with a yawn.

"You are tired, my darling," he said softly.

Mrs. Blair shook her head.

"Oh! no, I was only wondering how I looked. This gown is very daring, but extremely Parisian."

"I never felt prouder of you in my life," he answered. "The new music-room was immensely admired. How splendidly Madame de Montesquien sang 'Il mio cuore,' from La Traviata?" Sylvia turned her beautiful eyes upon her husband as she spoke. Something in his face frightened her.

"How old you are looking Hesketh," she said a trifle sharply. "Haggard, thin, and your complexion positively grey."

"This electric light is unbecoming," he replied, with rather a hollow laugh.

"Not under crimson shades, surely?"

A pause. Hesketh's lips were compressed, his eyes had a hunted expression in them which was new to Sylvia.

"Does this life satisfy you?" he asked suddenly.

"Yes," replied his wife. "So long as we continue popular and prosperous I am perfectly happy. What more could a woman want?"

"And if," he continued, shifting his eyes uneasily, "if hard times should some day knock at our door, and we were to go away, Sylvia—just you and I together—to live in some quiet spot——"

"Hesketh!" Her voice vibrated with horror; she interrupted him with a short cry as she pronounced his name. "Why do you talk like that, and imagine such dreadful things?"

"It is late—I am tired—forgive my foolish romancing. Wealth," laughing loudly, "never slips through the fingers of its possessors, however readily they fling it abroad, to feed their friends, and live every moment of their lives—eh, Sylvia? You never heard of Mammon playing such a shabby trick?"

She felt as if something cold and clammy were creeping down her spine. Her bouquet lay at her feet, faded; she kicked it impatiently.

"You are in a most lugubrious and disagreeable mood. I suppose you are trying to frighten me into economy, but it's absurd, Hesketh, positively preposterous. I hope you won't rake up the subject again."

He took her firmly by the wrist, and drew her to the door. Then flinging it open wide, pointed at the driving rain.

"How would you like to be out in that," he said, "with no cover to your head, soaked to the skin, and homeless?"

She shrank back into the soft red glow of the great hall, looked at him reproachfully, but did not speak.

"The world is not all a 'Valley of Diamonds,'" he added.

"Except," added Sylvia, "to women like me."

She drew herself up, and her beautiful eyes flashed. The brilliants were shining in her hair, and on her neck and arms. The whole attitude was defiance. His wife's beauty soothed Hesketh's spirit of unrest. He gazed at her as at a beautiful picture, while a proud sense of possession stimulated his troubled spirit.

"You cannot complain," he said, "I have given you everything I have; if I died to-morrow and left you without a farthing, you would have no right to murmur."

CHAPTER III.

MRS. BLAIR was driving back from Ranelagh with Lady Cameron.

"You must scold your husband for disappointing us," said the latter.

"Yes," replied Sylvia. "I really don't know myself why he did not come. I got a most vague telegram just before starting, telling me not to wait lunch. He is always doing those tiresome things. Some men have no conscience!"

The carriage drew up and Sylvia alighted. The house in Park Lane was a mass of flowers, every window sill a bank of yellow bloom. "Has Mr. Blair returned?" she asked.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, madam. He is in your boudoir."

Mrs. Blair raised her eyebrows. Hesketh never sat there when she was out.

She made her way to the dainty little room, so characteristic of herself. The very wall-paper was redolent of Sylvia's personality—a French design of cupids, rose garlands, blue ribbon and butterflies. Novels and fashion papers lay about, flowers and photographs (chiefly masculine) in profusion. Her husband was in the window seat, half concealed by Pompadour silk curtains; she noticed he looked pale.

"Hot, isn't it?" drawled Mrs. Blair, taking up a huge silver scent bottle, and shaking the perfume over her hands. "You were well out of it, Hesketh. Sitting in the sun has given me an abominable headache."

He rose, and bent over her tenderly, an expression of passionate adoration in his eyes.

"My poor darling," drawing her to the sofa, "and I failed you. It was very horrid of me, but," with a sudden break in his voice, "I had business to attend to——"

"Business," tossing her head impatiently, "I hate the word; it sounds so mundane and unbeautiful. I believe," turning to him with a deprecating gesture, "that things have been going wrong—your money affairs, I mean. But don't tell me about it, Hesketh; just put it all right, and do not publish your private worries to the whole world by looking blue over them. Take a pattern by your wife; you never find me moping! By-the-way, dear, I am getting so tired of this room, these tints were all very well at first, but they pall after a time. I want it redecorated. White and silver is my latest fancy; how do you think it sounds?"

He bent his head, and a deep scarlet flush crept over his features; he bit his lip to conceal his emotion. How could he tell her? how nerve himself to strike the blow, and deny this radiant creature the accessories her beauty demanded? The hand of Fate that robbed him of his all seemed pressing with a deadly force upon Hesketh now, in the presence of his luxury-loving Sylvia. He could bear his own misery—not hers. That was beyond all mortal endurance. To see her fond eyes fill with tears, to soothe her silent weeping, and know that this was only the beginning of the hard struggle with life.

"White and silver," he murmured. "Oh, yes; all white and silver, like your name and your soul!"

She smiled, and pressed his hand.

"Dearest," he asked suddenly, "have you ever known any real suffering? Is it possible that from the beginning life has been only a playground, a pleasure garden?"

Mrs. Blair laughed a soft little ripple, and looked down at the jewels on her fingers.

"It would need a bold woman to answer that question in the affirmative. But shall I tell you the secret of sailing joyfully over the troubled seas in which poor humanity drowns, chokes, and struggles on all sides? It is a very simple method, though it may shock you. Annihilate your heart; do away with it altogether; it is a superfluous article, that glories in stirring up uncomfortable emotions. To be utterly heartless is to be immeasurably blessed. I realised this at the age of ten. My canary died, and I sat huddled up on a haystack crying for hours. When my governess found me and took me in, she pointed out the fact that my white frock was crumpled, my pretty eyes spoiled for the day, and that the canary was still dead. I inwardly digested the fact. That governess was a very sensible, if an extremely worldly woman. She used to call me an angel, and buy pink ribbons for my schoolroom frock."

"Don't say you are heartless, unless it is that you have given all your heart to me, and I cannot spare a morsel of it," he replied, feasting his eyes hungrily on her. "You don't know what you are to me; sometimes the force of my love comes over me like madness, and I feel I could sooner kill you than that we should be parted."

He clasped her to him and kissed her fiercely.

"You are crumpling my chiffons, Hesketh. Don't be foolish," waving him away airily. "It is too hot for these outbursts of affection; besides, I know all about it. You are a good, dear boy," speaking patronisingly, as to a child, "and you love me very much, enough to kill me, terribly flattering! Now I must go and dress for the opera, we are dining alone, tête-à-tête, for your birthday treat. What! did you think I had forgotten that auspicious occasion? No, only I was painfully conscious of not providing a present, I've spent all my pin-money and over; you shall write me a cheque to-night!"

She moved towards the door, but he started forward with a cry, placing himself between Sylvia and the exit.

The time had come, he must speak, though his heart should break.

"You—you can't go to the opera," he gasped. "I've something to tell you."

She saw the beads of perspiration on his forehead, the trembling of his hands, and heard his short, quick breathing.

Sylvia toyed with the mantel border, and looked annoyed.

"Oh! go on," she said, irritated at his interruption.

He looked her straight in the face with quivering lips, while two words broke from him: "I'm ruined!"

Sylvia's colour faded, her eyes were bright and hard as steel, her nostrils dilated, she drew herself up in an attitude of defiance.

"She is dazed by the blow," he thought pityingly; "she cannot speak."

"Sylvia—my love—my life—we will bear it together," he whispered, taking her hand; "we are both young, and I can work."

But she drew sharply away.

"Don't touch me! For mercy's sake spare me your comments on a hopeless, degrading situation. Ruined, are we? Do I look like a woman that could suffer poverty lightly, a drudge, a housewife? Bah! it is imposible. If you have any respect for yourself left, do not talk of dragging your wife down to your own miserable level, and bearing it together!"

He staggered back, numbed and paralysed by Sylvia's cruel utterances. That such words should come from the lips he had loved and prized bewildered him. The scales fell from his eyes, and as he stared at the splendid figure drawn up against the brocade hangings of the flowered grate, he saw her as she was!

Where lay hidden the tender grief, the sympathy which in his devotion he had trembled to awake? Now that the moment had come, when he yearned for some sign to appease his grief, she stood apart, while the love and solace he expected ended ignominiously in nil!

"What would you have me do?" he asked hoarsely.

Digitized by Google

She raised her head and looked him full in the eyes, advancing a step as if to emphasise her words:

"Shoot yourself, I have no further use for you!"

The bald, crude phrase came like a blow upon his temples.

"Sylvia!"

The word rang out like a cry of agony, vibrating through the room.

She turned away, and pointed to the door.

"Go," she said; "I wish to be alone."

He obeyed mechanically.

"You will not retract your—your advice!" with a curl of his lip.

But his sarcasm was lost upon Sylvia, her soul was too bitter, and her heart too hard for remorse or shame.

CHAPTER IV.

She went to the window and watched him drive away from the house.

Her face wore an expression of unutterable horror, not at the idea of the suggested suicide, but of the ruin that stared them in the face.

She still had her youth and beauty, and if Hesketh could be driven to destroy himself.

Sylvia's thoughts stood still; her mind became a blank.

She knew that the future without her husband would be possible, and with him intolerable. She paced the room with restless tread, every moment was a torture of suspense.

Then, flinging herself on the sofa, Sylvia burst into fits of hysterical laughter, which waned to fretful sobs. "He shall not spoil my life," she muttered; "he will kill himself, I know it, I read it in his face when he looked at me. I am safe! safe!"

The door opened, Hesketh advanced towards her. The sight of him was repulsive to his wife.

"Where have you been?" she asked, seeing how late it had grown.

"To buy this," he answered with a sinister smile, drawing a revolver from his pocket, "and to think the matter out."

She winced at the sight of the weapon.

"Why do you bring it here?"

"Because it will be easier to die if you answer a few questions—first. Don't lie to a doomed man, Sylvia."

"Go on."

"Did you ever, even for a day or an hour, love me? Was it all the dastardly acting of a hypocrite from beginning to end? Had you one tender feeling towards me, a single thought above my money?" She shook her head.

"I had no heart to give, but the sham appeared to content you. What else have you to say?"

"Is it still your wish that I should rid you of my presence? Will you repeat those words which must condemn your soul everlastingly: 'Shoot yourself. I have no further use for you!'"

Sylvia's lip curled in scorn. "Once was enough, I do not retract them."

"I am satisfied," he answered coldly, the blood frozen in his veins.

The table with the silver scent bottle, scattered flowers, novels, and bric-à-brac stood between them. Hesketh glared across it at the fair form of the woman he had loved and pampered—the creature who, in her soulless selfish beauty, was waiting for him to free her.

The devil in Sylvia seemed to enter into the man. His eyes glowed suddenly; fresh vitality crept through him. He raised his arm and levelled the revolver across the table at his wife. He was between her and the door.

"I considered this matter," he said quite calmly, "and decided that your fate and mine should hang on your answers to my questions. Having perfectly convinced myself of your worthlessness and treachery, I shall spare, or postpone, my own demise."

"Then take care how you handle that pistol!" she retorted, moving aside; "can't you see you are pointing it at me!"

He followed her direction with hand and eyes, the stamp of deadly determination on his features, then spoke in a tone that was strangely unfamiliar to the woman.

"Don't you understand, Sylvia? I am going to shoot you, instead!"

Petrified by the terrible threat, the cowardly spirit of Mrs. Blair crept out through the ghastly anguish of her eyes.

Abject, awful terror consumed her being; she could not move or utter, the pallor of death stole over her face and lips, drawn by unspeakable fear. She could only stare with chattering teeth at the weapon, raising her hands feebly as if to ward it off. A sharp, shrill cry escaped her; half incoherent words broke in despair from the wretched wife.

"Take it away for the love of Heaven," pointing at the pistol. "Are you mad, Hesketh? I didn't mean it—not a syllable—my mind was unhinged by your news. I am like that, I don't know what I say. I'll go away with you—anywhere—to the end of the earth!"

"A longer journey than that," he added unmoved. "You have tricked me enough."

She pulled herself together, though the violent trembling of her body was still visible.

"Stop this fiendish joke!" she cried, "have you not bullied me sufficiently for to-night? To-morrow we will plan a future. Put that revolver back in its case, and face facts."

"That is exactly what I am doing, but I have not yet finished with my birthday present," pointing to the weapon. "I gave it to myself to celebrate the day."

An awful pause, in which the worldly, pleasure-loving life of the woman rose before her eyes.

"No, no," she moaned. "I can't die—I'm not fit—God knows—you know. Hesketh! Hesketh! Spare me—don't send me to hell like this!"

She rushed frantically towards the door, in a paroxysm of fear, but he was before her, still covering her with the revolver.

"Yes," he hissed, "that is the place for devils! Go!"

His demoniacal laugh mingled with the sharp report that shattered the transient beauty of Sylvia Blair's false face, and left her victim red handed in the waning light of a summer evening. Winifred Graham.

Digitized by Google

TALKING IT OVER.

Dramatis Personæ.—Miss Nina Moore and Mr. Bertie Fairfax.

Scene.—A library in Miss Moore's house. A wood fire blazes on the hearth. Low bookcases line the walls. Plants and flowers fill the windows. Magazines and papers are scattered on small tables. An escritoire conveniently stocked with writing materials is near the window. A tea-table by the mantel is covered with dainty cups, old silver, and the inevitable kettle. Miss Nina Moore, on a quaint settee, sits by the fire pretending to read.

Time.—Five o'clock in the afternoon.

Miss Nina Moore (to herself): "I wonder if he will come. I think he has sense enough to realise that there is no reason why we should not be friends. Oh, dear, I hear him in the hall."

Mr. Bertie Fairfax (pushing aside the portière): "I have come at your request, Miss Moore. I believe that you suggested in your note this morning that you would like me to bring, instead of send, your letters and—the other things."

Miss Moore (stiffly): "Thanks, very much. The letters first, if you please; the other things, which you so politely name the ring and scarf-pins, I care nothing about."

Mr. Fairfax (handing her a small package of letters, generally minus envelopes): "I did not mean to be rude, but if we are to talk things over, as you said, you should not become cross at once, you know."

Miss Moore (not noticing his remark): "Are these all the letters? I thought I had written to you quite often in the last three months. I have stacks of yours. I believe you have lost them."

Mr. Fairfax (guiltily): "I don't know. Perhaps, the others are. Sisters have such a way of clearing out a fellow's top drawer."

Miss Moore (indignantly): "Your sisters, indeed! Charming idea that!"

Mr. Fairfax (in confusion): "Oh, I did not mean that! They—they are only put away so carefully. I will come across them some time when I least expect. But you told me in your note that you thought it best that we should talk over our broken engagement, and I am here for that purpose."

Miss Moore: "Yes; let us be perfectly frank with each other—the only way to be in such affairs, I always think, and——"

Mr. Fairfax (interrupting her): "You speak like a veteran, as if you had dissolved engagements by the dozen."

Miss Moore (ignoring the interruption): "You see, our engagement was rather peculiar. I had heard so many pleasant things of you from Alice Long that I was prepared to like you from the first. Then you had just come from Africa, where so few people go, and there was a report that you had shot an elephant; you danced well; you wrote clever notes, and sent the most beautiful flowers; and, altogether, I found myself—well, we became engaged before I knew what you really were."

Mr. Fairfax: "Your frankness is delightful. I never knew more reasons for an engagement than you have just given. If it is anything in my favour I admit the elephant."

Miss Moore (reminiscently): "Yes, I do not quite regret the affair, but I feel sure that a platonic friendship will be the only thing for us, and therefore please observe that I am giving you back the ring and watch, but shall keep the books and the silver candlestick, which looks so lovely on my desk."

Mr. Fairfax (mechanically taking the bundle she offers): "What do you mean by a platonic friendship?"

Miss Moore: "Well, you may come and see me once or twice a month. You can take me out occasionally to a dance or a theatre; and if you see me at a party with anyone I loathe, you can come to my rescue."

Mr. Fairfax (sarcastically): "Delightful position! Thanks very much, Miss Moore!"

Miss Moore: "Now you are angry still. I am sure that we can do this, and prove to the world that the mere fact of having been engaged does not necessarily makes us hate each other for ever afterwards."

Mr. Fairfax: "A broken engagement is not as a rule conducive to friendship, particularly when the whole story began and ended so suddenly, without rhyme or reason, one might say."

Miss Moore (wrathfully): "One might of course, be guilty of such a rude speech, but it would reflect little to his credit or knowledge either. Pray is not every engagement suddenly made or broken?"

Mr. Fairfax: "Most emphatically, no. One should not enter into such a state except reverently, wisely, and——"

Digitized by Google

Miss Moore (hastily): "Now you are quoting from the marriage service, which is quite foreign to the subject, and has nothing whatever to do with it."

Mr. Fairfax (in surprise): "An engagement nothing to do with marriage? I beg, Miss Moore, that you will explain what you mean."

Miss Moore: "Oh, why are you so disagreeable? I hate to argue. How different Will Barton was last year when we decided that we could agree better apart."

Mr. Fairfax (freezingly): "Really, Miss Moore, do you consider such reminiscences in good taste? You have never honoured me with your confidence before in regard to Mr. Barton."

Miss Moore (slightly embarrassed): "Oh, it was nothing serious! We merely thought that we cared for each other, and found afterwards that we did not."

Mr. Fairfax: "Like your own case."

Miss Moore (very angry): "How generous you are to remind me so often that you made a mistake in asking me to marry you!"

Mr. Fairfax: "I am sure that I never said so. But why prolong this interview? You must see that we are as great failures at platonics as we were in the lovers' business."

Miss Moore (scornfully): "The 'interview' shall end at once; but let me put up the candlestick with the ring, and you can give it to Alice Long."

Mr. Fairfax: "Why should Miss Long's name be dragged into this conversation, when I scarcely had a bow from her for months? And why should I be burdened with so large a bundle? I do not want the candlestick. Keep it; you may need extra light when you write to Mr. Barton."

Miss Moore (perfectly furious): "You are insulting. Take it. I do not want anything to remind me of one so hateful as you are! When I wrote you the note I did it for the best. I thought that we could at least be friends"—(beginning to cry)—"but I find you worse in that rôle than you were as a fiancé."

Mr. Fairfax (with a man's horror of tears): "Don't cry, please, don't, Miss Nina; I am so sorry."

[Draws his chair closer to the settee and tries to take her hand.]

Miss Moore buries her head in the sofa cushions, pulls her hand away, and murmurs through her sobs: "I suppose you will tell your wife, when you get one, what a goose you think me."

Mr. Fairfax (smilingly): "I think probably she will know without being told. But, Nina dear, you must not call the future Mrs. Fairfax names."

[Again takes her hand.]

Miss Moore (forgetting to remove it, raises her head slightly from the cushion): "Then we can try platonics?"

Mr. Fairfax (positively): "No, darling, we cannot; wiser people than we have tried and failed. We are lovers or nothing. Nina, sweetheart, look at me."

Miss Moore (wiping away one or two tears, gazes at him pathetically): "Then we are—but suppose we quarrel again, Bertie?"

Mr. Fairfax (seating himself beside her on the settee, and securing both her hands as hostages): "Suppose we do, we can make it up, as we are doing now."

Miss Moore (coyly): "May I not have my ring? It seems to be a sort of chaperon. And will you take care of my letters next time?"

Mr. Fairfax (laughing): "That depends upon what's in them. So see that they are pleasant, and begin no more with 'Mr. Fairfax, Dear Sir,' like the one I received to-day. Besides, they must not savour at all of 'platonics,' although I am always willing to come and 'talk over with you.'"

E. Massey.

AIMÉE.

La Force.
September 17th, 1793.

Friends of the Faubourg St. Germain: You would be grieved if you could see me now as I sit writing to you by the dim light of a feeble candle.

Does it shock you, this heading of mine, that stares so boldly in your startled eyes from the top of the page? Does it say that I am disgraced, and do you believe it? If so, pardon me for the sake of old times and old friendships. But in the old times the King ruled, and we sang, "O Richard, O mon Roi!" But now the people, gone mad, have their say, and we must suffer and endure, and listen to them sing, "Ca Ira."

You would ask how I came here. When I have answered, you will say, what a fool to have gone back. Just so. Yet listen.

You know that when the rest of us fled, my brother remained behind. He had done much for the people and trusted to their gratitude. You cry out, how foolish! Exactly. He thought they would not harm him. He was mistaken. They would have torn a dog to pieces if it had borne my name.

They seized and condemned him to death. I heard of his imprisonment and went back to save him. It was unjust that he should suffer for my sins. I came too late. From a sheltering doorstep I saw the mad mob rush past me, and in their midst, on a pike held high in the air, was my brother's head. I tried to get across the frontier and escape, hiding in the woods and under hedges by day, and dragging myself along the road by night, living on the refuse that dogs would not eat.

I was discovered by a vile ditch-digger from Rouen, who, meeting me on the road, recognised me; and, urged to patriotism by the remembrance of what he was pleased to call his daughter's wrongs, he hastened to the village and reported his discovery, and so this worthy patriot, with a score of equally worthy patriots, lay in wait and seized me as I staggered wearily along.

The peasants have become virtuous, my friends, or desire to appear so, and have tenacious memories for former trifles that were better forgotten. A strange time is this when the people are become hypocrites, and we nobles, in sackcloth and ashes, pose for martyrs.

They placed me in charge of an escort, armed with pikes and old muskets, and sent me off to Paris to the court of condemnation. I could tell you of things that I saw en route that would make your blood run cold, but I spare you. Apropos, this word of warning. If you value your heads, keep away from here, for the people are gone mad, and our blood flows freer in the present than ever did our wine in the past.

Digitized by Google

To make a long story short, we reached Paris the next morning, and my trial came off without delay. When my worthy friend, the patriot from Rouen, told how he knew me, and ended up his remarks with a burst of tears, it was all over with me. The galleries howled and stormed: "Down, Lamouette—down! to the guillotine, Lamouette!" You should have heard them!

The Judge rang his bell, and the jurors voted separately, and at every vote the galleries roared anew. Decreed in the name of the Republic, One and Indivisible: The prisoner is an enemy of the people. Back to La Force with him, and death within the week. Dog!

Picture to yourself a long, low hall with hard, wooden benches nailed to the stone walls; long, narrow windows with great iron gratings hardly admitting a ray of light. This is our prison—I say ours, for there are some six-score of us altogether. Fair-haired girls and grandmothers, courtiers, nobles—all are represented.

The whole company rose and bowed to me as the gaoler thrust me into the room, and a tall, elegantly-formed man with white hair and a face like a Greek philosopher, stepped forward.

"May I ask," said he, bowing profusely, "to what cause we owe the pleasure of your company?"

"The Republic is displeased with its humble servant."

He smiled quietly. "It is a breach of good manners that needs correcting; we are all, I fear, sufferers from the same rudeness," was his comment. There was a laugh. He then asked my name and condition, with the remark that it would be rude, if made elsewhere, but the time and place permitted it. My reply was evidently satisfactory, for he turned to the others and said:

"This gentleman, the Marquis of Lamouette, has had the good fortune to be sent among us for a short time, and I hope you will all strive to make his stay as pleasant as possible. And you, monsieur, will, I hope, take part in all our gaieties and be cheerful and entertaining, forgetting your own misfortunes and striving to make others forget theirs. This is the only duty required of you." He then took me by the hand and introduced me to all in the room.

What astonished me most was the perfect composure, and even gaiety, pervading all their actions. I hardly noticed an anxious look or a nervous movement among them, yet, like myself, they are all condemned to death.

There is one person to whom I am quite attracted, a sweet young girl of some twenty years, with long brown hair and very dark blue eyes. I imagine I hear you laugh. "Up to the old tricks again," you say. You are mistaken. This is not the time or place. Man goes to his death better than he goes through life.

September 18th.

Our life here is a constant round of theatrical entertainments, readings, game playing, and even dancing—anything to make the time pass quickly and keep our minds from the thoughts of what the future has in store for us all. Last night we had a little play, written by Madame Duron, which was well presented by the Dramatic Club. You would be surprised to have seen how well the parts were taken. We are to have another performance to-night. If it were not for the gloomy surroundings, wooden benches and cold stone walls, with their little windows, you would think, to see us, that we are attending a levée at the Tuileries. Our clothes are somewhat in need of repairing and brushing, but our manners, as ever, are correct.

The Count and I have become quite friendly since he took me in charge yesterday. He commanded the French guard at the Palace on the 10th of August—his accounts of the affair are most interesting. I asked whether, in his opinion, the King could have crushed the revolution if he had placed himself at the head of the Swiss and other faithful troops. He shook his head. "It might have been; there was every chance of succeeding. Even if the King had trusted Dumoriez all would have been well; but the King was weak, pitifully weak. Poor Louis! he was a good man, but the hand of fate was against him, and all he could do was to die as a King should."

"I cannot see," I said, "how you bear yourself so calmly amid such scenes as these about us, for you always appear gay, as if there was nought but happiness in the world." He looked at me keenly, and an amused smile lighted up his features. "My dear Marquis," he said, placing his arm in mine, as we began to walk towards the end of the room, "a man should forget himself in times like these, and live only for others. I have faced death too often in the service of my King to fear it now, when I am in the service of my fellow-men. There are frail girls and weak women here, and I strive to make them forget that there is such a thing as to-morrow, but teach them to live only in the present. And they are willing to laugh at anything, that they forget to weep." He is a true and noble man, this Count; if I were a Christian I would say: "God bless him!"

After the play last night I danced the minuet with the little girl I spoke of in yesterday's entry. Her name is Aimée Dumont, and she is of Provence.

"Monsieur," she said, when we had taken our places for the dance, "you are from Provence, are you not?"

"I have that pleasure," I replied.

"And may I ask if you are a relative of Richard Lamouette?"

"We are one and the same person."

Her eyes met mine, and I saw in them a look almost of hate, and certainly full of scorn. She lowered them immediately, and said sarcastically:

"I have heard of you before."

"You might add that you have never heard any good of me; that would have been nearer what you really meant."

"I have heard, monsieur, that you took advantage of the laws—and that only recently. It was a cruel thing to do, and one that has caused much bloodshed and hatred in this poor country." She had continued to keep her eyes upon the floor, but suddenly looking up into my face, added, "I hope they slandered you, monsieur."

I meant to say they had, but those deep eyes, fixed full upon me, made me hesitate.

"Alas, mademoiselle, it is but too true."

"And did you tell the starving people who came to you that you cared not whether they lived or died, as long as they paid the taille? I heard this told of you, too."

I had recovered myself somewhat, and answered meekly, as if I were one bitterly wronged:

"In that they slandered me. I was sorry to see them dying, but what could I do? They hated and would not trust me. I did all in my power, and yet they would have torn me to pieces last year had I not escaped."

Digitized by Google

She folded her hands before her, and leaned forward, with upturned face, as if interested.

"Why, then, did you return, if you were in a place of safety?" she asked.

My voice trembled at the memory of that dreadful scene at Rouen, and she looked at me as if astonished at my show of feeling, and her face seemed kindlier.

"I had a brother who was in their hands. I came back to save him, to give myself up, if need be, to their vengeance, if they would spare him."

"And you saw him?"

"He was dead, mademoiselle. I had come too late."

Just then the dancing began, but I noticed that she kept glancing at me continually throughout the dance. After we had finished, she bade me good-night without another word, and went down to the other end of the corridor, singing the old Royalist refrain:

"O Richard, O mon Roi, l'univers t'abandonne."

September 20th.

O Sleep, thou that comest to us in the silence of the night, bearing to the heart, weary of toil and of vain struggle, a certain rest and quiet from daily temptations; thou that art a sign and promise of a deep and everlasting peace that shall be ours when the curtain falls upon the comedy of our vanity and folly, how hast thou betrayed me! Through all the night hast thou been summoning before me the phantoms of past misdeeds, and hast awakened to resurrection the voice of a conscience long slumbering. But yet there has been this alleviation for thy betrayal; for through the blackness of these shadows thy face, O Aimée, shines upon me, and I hear thy voice singing softly:

"O Richard, O mon Roi."

Burdened with such fancies, I could not sleep, so I walked up and down the room to rid myself of this vague feeling of unrest. I had been walking perhaps a half-hour, when, as I approached the lower end of the hall, I heard someone call me. Turning round, I found myself face to face with mademoiselle.

"You are restless to-night, monsieur, or is it the cold?"

"The cold, surely; are you suffering from the same cause?"

She looked down shyly, and her voice was grave when she answered:

"Yes, monsieur, but a little nervous, too. You know I go to-morrow."

I nodded thoughtfully. She sat down on the bench just under the window and motioned me to sit beside her.

"May I ask you a question, monsieur?"

"Whatever you wish."

She leaned forward, resting her chin on her hand.

"Have you any brothers or sisters or parents living, monsieur?"

"No; they are all dead."

"And have you no wife or children who will miss you?"

"No, I am all alone. There will be few to care, thank God."

She looked up suddenly, her hand on my knee.

"Hush, monsieur! That word is never spoken here but in jest." Her voice grew wistful, I thought, from eagerness. "Are you a Christian, monsieur, may I ask?"

"No, mademoiselle."

"I am so sorry."

Her voice quivered—seemed almost sad.

"Will you, over there on the bench, keep still? Pity a man can't sleep in peace, and the last night, too. Go to sleep, you, or keep still."

It was the querulous voice of old Hulot, the Farmer-General, one of the morrow's victims. We spoke no more, but sat waiting for daylight. Only once she leaned over and whispered:

"Monsieur, you will forgive me for what I said the other night? I am sorry."

I pressed her hand gently and we both were still. A little later she fell asleep, her head sinking upon my shoulder. I took off my coat, and wrapped it round her, then leaned back against the wall, to wait for the dawn. "To-morrow," thought I, looking down upon that fair, sweet face, "she will be far from here. She will have reached the goal." The voice of someone speaking aroused me. It was the Count; he, too, was restless.

"So Cupid has squeezed in even here," he said gallantly.

"She is asleep," I said; "speak softly."

He came a little nearer and looked down into her face.

"Poor little girl! How much the Republic would suffer if she lived! Don't move," he said, as I shifted my position; "let her sleep. The time flies swifter and the agony of suspense will be the shorter. She goes to-morrow, does she not?"

I nodded.

"By-the-way," he added, "I shall have the pleasure of your company the day after. The gaoler told me last night." He bent over and kissed her hand like the old chevalier that he was, and with a "Bonsoir, monsieur," he turned and walked away.

The night seemed very long. I dared not move lest I should wake her, so I sat still and waited. Her fair young head, with its wealth of long brown hair, rested quietly on my shoulder.

It must have been almost morning when she awoke. "Have you been awake all night?" she asked, looking up into my face.

I nodded.

"And you are shivering with cold, and have wrapped me in your cloak to keep me warm; you are very kind, I can never repay you."

"You owe me just one thing," I replied; "you will let me kiss you?"

She smiled and hesitated. "Monsieur, you may, just once."

It was eight o'clock when the gaoler came and called out the names of those set apart for the day. I stood beside her when her name was read, and she never winced. There was the usual silent clasp of the hand as friend parted from friend; sometimes a last kiss was given and taken as they went to their places.

She came back to me when she had gone the rounds. "It is time to say good-bye," she said.

I nodded, not daring to trust my voice.

She looked full in my face when I did not answer. She must have read my thoughts. "Did you care for me so much?" There was a pause——

"Monsieur, you may kiss me just once more."

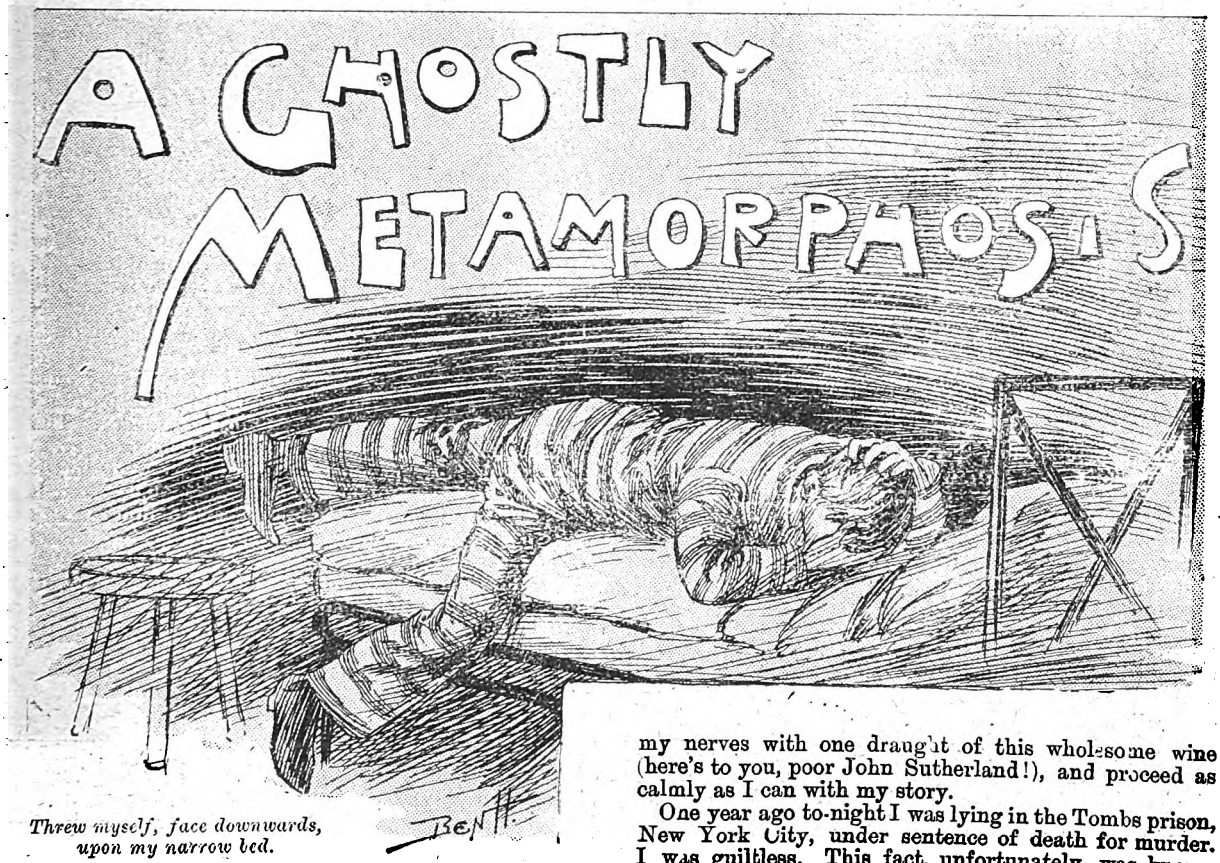
There was the rumbling of the tumbrils in the court below; the harsh monotonous voice of the gaoler calling out the names of the doomed as they passed separately through the gate. A last lingering pressure of the hand and she goes. The heavy gate swung back upon its hinges, and I see her no more—shall never see her again in all this world, never. The tumbrils creak and rumble as they pass through the street. I listen until the rumbling dies away in the distance. Farewell!

This to Eugène Saint Aubert, of Coblence, by the Gaoler Fouquier. Let him be rewarded.

Geo. W. Ellis.

Digitized by Google

A GHOSTLY METAMORPHOSIS



Threw myself, face downwards, upon my narrow bed.

IF my pen continues to remain a pen, and my ink changes not into blood or wine until the purpose is accomplished, I shall, I think, succeed in giving to the world a tale as wondrous strange as any to which the world has, for many years, listened. There is nothing in the appearance of this gracefully pointed bit of steel and its cedar wood handle, as I hold it between my eyes and the lamplight, to suggest a possibility of its suddenly becoming a serpent's tail or a devil's divining rod, nor do I perceive in the contents of my crystal inkstand anything beyond a superior quality of black writing fluid; and yet for caution's sake, and lest I all unexpectedly become again the victim of a supernatural practical joke, I beg the privilege of prefacing my story with the above absurd, as you will say, provisos.

There are going to be in the unfolding of this narrative, as everybody will discover, several very embarrassing factors, chief of which is this, that although I suppose I am relating certain extraordinary events which have happened to me, I have no positive means of knowing that such is the case. The two of us, by whom I mean Harry Jessup (who certainly once was, and still seems to be) and poor John Sutherland (who clearly is not), are so closely, so intimately connected—soul intertwined, if I may use the expression—that I (or is it he?) who speak can be certain of all things more easily than of my (or is it his?) identity.

Clearly, however, we shall not get on at all at this rate. Though honestly endeavouring to enlighten, I perceive I am but mystifying my readers. Let me quiet my nerves with one draught of this wholesome wine (here's to you, poor John Sutherland!), and proceed as calmly as I can with my story.

One year ago to-night I was lying in the Tombs prison, New York City, under sentence of death for murder. I was guiltless. This fact, unfortunately, was known only to myself. In justice to my memory (or, should I say, justice to the memory of John Sutherland?) I must briefly relate the circumstances which led to that error of justice which condemned an innocent man to the gallows.

I was born (that is, supposing I am the person who, though contrary to all external appearances, I still believe myself to be) in the City of London. If I had parents I never knew them, neither was I acquainted with brothers, sisters, or relatives, even of a remote degree. I purloined what little knowledge I had of the world from the lips of gentlemen at the backs of whose chairs I stood during the breakfast and dining hours at some of the most reputable restaurants in London.

I got a bit of book learning at an evening school, and other odds and ends of accomplishments I picked up at merry places by gaslight. It was while employed at one of these "Homes of Harmony," that I obtained that knowledge of the pianoforte which, in spite of its superficiality, is to-day so great a source of wonder to those persons with whom I am now surrounded. I read more than fellows of my sort, and, as a consequence, soon became educated beyond my station, and I emigrated to America.

Upon my arrival in New York I found work at fair wages in an eating-house somewhere east of Broadway. I was put to share the room of an Italian waiter, a surly, ill-favoured person, who, within two months after I had taken quarters with him, cut his throat while I lay by his side in bed, a circumstance which brought him no greater harm than it brought to me, since on the following morning I was thrown into gaol, and six weeks later removed to the Tombs, under sentence of death.

Digitized by Google

A year ago to-night, at just about this hour, to avoid the gaze of the curious newspaper writers who clustered thick about the stove at the end of the narrow corridor upon which my cell opened, and who (the gaoler having permitted me the freedom of the passage) pitilessly noted down my every despairing movement, I stepped back behind my grated door, and threw myself face downwards upon my narrow bed.

I remember that the cot was covered with a coarse grey blanket, across which, near either end, was woven a narrow strip of red. The gaoler rattled the grating of my door and spoke kindly, advising me to remove my coat and boots, and get a bit of sleep. I lifted my head as he spoke. The blood-red streak in the blanket was immediately under my chin; I had thrown myself down, my throat across it. I sat bolt upright on the bed. My hand went involuntarily to my throat.

The gaoler's kindly face seemed to my terror-stricken vision the face of a devil. I knew that within a few hours I was to be murdered, and he was to be my murderer. I felt that I ought to hate him; that if I were half a man, I would seize his beard, and batter his head upon the rusty iron of the cage. Yet, when I spoke, my voice was low, courteous, even modestly submissive, as I thanked him for his attention. Great Heaven! think of it—I thanked the man who stood at my cell door keeping watch over a stalled ox for the coming of the butcher.

He turned to go. The rage which in my soul had found birth and death without power of expression was followed by a frantic grief, an overwhelming self-pity. I longed to throw myself upon my knees before the retreating figure, and beg for mercy; but again my limbs refused to act, and as the gaoler faced the grating for a last look at his victim, I think he must have seen a smile upon my face, for he brightened, and said:

"That's right, Jessup; I'm glad to see you keeping up a good heart."

Tell me the face is the soul's mirror! The soul is as powerless to control the body as the body is powerless to control the soul. Rage, grief, despair incite to action, and the body mocks them all. True, I am an unlearned and unlettered man, but of the soul's relation to the body who on earth should know more than I have been taught?

It is possible that the suicide, just prior to the carrying out of his purpose, is made acquainted with that sickening, muscle-relaxing, nerve-tightening despair which comes to the man who is to be executed to-morrow, but I do not think so.

In the case of suicide, there must be (and this, before long, I shall fully discover) an absence of that pitiful helplessness which tears the heart-strings of the man who is to be put to death by his fellows.

Oh, the grief of it! The haunting horror of any human form! With pistol in hand—even when its cold round muzzle is pressed against his throbbing temple; even to that fractional part of a second in which the cruel deed is done—the suicide is soothed by a consciousness of an optional escape. There is no time fixed. He is the master of his punishment. The inexorable is lacking in the refinement of his torture.

When the gaoler had disappeared from view, I sank back upon the cot. I turned myself upon my back, and looked at the plain white ceiling. I tried to people its vague surface with heaven's lamps—to imagine it was God's firmament. There were the countless stars twinkling as cheerfully as though no sorrow anywhere existed. Spread out about me was the mighty ocean, foaming and rolling near by, then stretching away like a great black, silent plain.

I was once more upon the steamer—the accursed steamer that brought me from England to be killed. The motion—how delightful!—swing so, swing so. My hands went to the sides of the cot for the protection of my balance. Oh, the motion!—now up, now down! The stars, how bright! The waves!—see, see how high! Mercy! what pleasure! Great tears flow down my cheeks. Crash!—we've struck! We're sinking! My fingers go to my eyes. Rub, rub, and there is again the white ceiling. No stars? I spring to my feet. No ocean? A prison cell; death by strangulation in the morning.

I staggered to the cell door! I pressed my cheek against the grating, and was able to see a portion of the group of watchers at the end of the corridor. Their heads were together; somebody was relating a story. A fat man had his profile to me. From time to time his hands went down upon his knees with a slap, and his sides shook. He was being amused by reminiscences of the trusty gaoler. Amused! These men being amused, and I——

I could no longer endure the sight of my fellow-men. Again I threw myself upon the bed. The red stripe on the blanket had lost its terror. I saw nothing, thought of nothing, but men—crowds of men in black—coming after me. Coming with a rope to strangle me. I, a man like themselves, with head and legs and arms like theirs. They would take me by the hands, and we should touch one another; they would look in my face and I should look in theirs, and nowhere, nowhere, would I find anybody to help me, to save me! Shut up in a cage awaiting the approach of my own species; sons of women like myself; men, with toilets carefully made, coming—deliberately, relentlessly—coming to put me to death! Coming, perhaps, from happy firesides, and waiting only until I should be dead to return to their wives and little ones. Not a man among them but would lend an arm to the meanest cripple in the street; yet coming, coming to butcher me. Could the good Lord, who made us all in a world of sin and suffering, approve it?

I got down upon my knees; I tried to pray, but just as comfort seemed approaching, a sudden, awful sensation, as of the presence of the executioner standing at my back, rope in hand, brought me trembling to my feet.

Again I fell exhausted on the bed. And now a mighty terror of my own body seized upon me. My head was raised, so that I saw the entire length of my figure. It seemed to me to be the body of a strangled corpse. I moved my foot to dispel the illusion, but with the cessation of its motion the frightful hallucination returned. I madly assisted the delusion. I crossed my hands on my breast; they seemed to become waxen, cold, and bloodless. I closed my eyes and pressed my elbows tightly against my sides to avoid contact with the linen of a coffin. A sickening nausea arose within me; my heart seemed turning over in its place, and then—consciousness ceased; merciful sleep had come to my relief.

* * * * *

I awoke with a start. When I make this statement I feel that I am doing scant justice to an extraordinary phenomenon. How do I know that I ever awoke? May

Digitized by Google

I not still be lying in a dream on that prison bed? May not the gallows and rope be yet in store for me? Well, if such be the case, surely my supposing that it is not the case can do no harm? You, my mythical readers, will not worry over it if you are mythical; and if you are real, why, then, I, too, must be real and the phenomenon a reality.

I think that I awoke suddenly, and with the thought of the dire business of the morning very present in my mind. It was broad day ight—the light of that day I had shivered to think of—the light which was to be a signal for all those men in black, with crêpe on their arms, to take their victim to the sacrifice. A film seemed stretched across the balls of my eyes, upon which were mirrored a multitude of colours, that now, as my staring pupils dilated, took form in a hundred beautiful things.

I put my hands to my eyes.

First of all, I seemed to see, just in front of me, the face of a pretty child, smiling from a halo of yellow hair; a sideway glance, and heavy curtains of some bright red material parted to permit my dazzled eyes to behold a window flaming with reflections of the morning sunlight. Overhead, my sky was a plane of of brown and gold. My hand, falling at my side, rested upon a texture as soft as swansdown; my body undulated upon a bed softer than any it had ever before known.

It is now a year since the day of that awakening. I have been for the last ten minutes endeavouring to recall my first impressions, my earliest thoughts, as this scene, the beau y of which I have but hinted at, dawned upon my senses. I may have supposed myself in Heaven; but, if so, the idea could have been no more than momentary, for it was impossible for one lying as I was lying, in a position commanding a view on all sides, not speedily to discover that he was the occupant of a very comfortable bed in a decidedly luxurious bedchamber. My little girl of the golden hair hung in a massive frame on the tinted wall directly opposite the foot of my bed. The window through which came in the early sunlight was in a corner of the east wall; my brown and gold sky was excellent fresco, equal to anything I had ever seen in those establishments in which my livelihood had been gained on the other side of the water.

How long I had been staring at these marvellous surroundings I cannot say, when suddenly there came a soft rap at the door, which was on the right of the apartment, and a very cheery voice, the voice of a young girl, exclaimed: "Jacko! Jacko! Are you going to sleep all day?"

I listened in amazement, and naturally made no reply.

"Jacko," continued the pretty voice, "I tell you it's after eight o'clock, and we are all waiting for you."

Clearly the child was addressing some person whom she supposed to be in the room of which I was the only occupant. The rapping on the door of an obviously impatient little fist continued. It was necessary to respond. I said: "Hello!"

"All right," replied the little voice. "I'm glad you are awake at last. Now, do hurry!"

Hurry? Hurry where? I had an engagement at nine o'clock, the child assured me, and a French clock on the mantel confirmed her statement that it was past eight. Where was I? What did it all mean? I softly protruded one foot from the yielding bedclothing and planted it upon the thick carpet on the floor. How warm and grateful was the sense! My other leg followed, and I stood erect. In what was I dressed? White linen, with beautiful scarlet loops in place of common buttonholes—the night-robe of a prince! I smoothed the fabric with my hand, and was surprised discover a roundness and plumpness in my limbs, which I had never before been conscious. I put my hand to my bewildered head. A beard? A beard upon my face which had ever been beardless?

In the corner was a handsome dressing-table, surmounted by a high mirror. With wild, uncertain steps I crossed the room. The polished glass of the mirror showed the face of an utter stranger. Forgetful of the fact that had he stood behind me my own figure must have obscured his image, I wheeled about and confronted—no one. The room was occupied by myself alone. Again I faced the glass. There stood the stranger, with face as white as that of a corpse and eyes that seemed starting from his head. I put my hands to my eyes; the spectre in the glass imitated the motion. I screamed and fell to the floor, the image in the glass disappeared simultaneously with my fall. I had never fainted in my life, and did not become unconscious. Lifting myself upon my elbow, I looked round me.

The base of a wardrobe immediately opposite my point of vision was set with plate-glass. In that mirror I again saw the stranger, lying, as I was lying, with his cheek upon the palm of his hand. I got upon my knees and clasped my hands. The figure in the glass followed each motion. I jumped to my feet, the head and shoulders of the image disappeared, but from the waist downwards, remained. I then perceived that the mirror in the base of the wardrobe was less than three feet high. It was, then, my own reflection that I saw!

No, not my reflection, for I was a man six feet in height, slimly built, with light hair and blue eyes, and a beardless face. The object in the glass was scarcely five feet nine, inclined to stoutness, with short, curly brown hair, and a heavy beard. I turned to the mirror above the dressing-table, my knees quaking under me from consternation.

Digitized by Google

The ashen face of the brown-bearded stranger again confronted me. I lifted my finger to my lips in a dazed meaningless way, and the man in the glass did the same. Just then there came a loud knock at the door, and a heavy voice said:

"Open the door for a moment, Jack, I've something to say to you."

Was the voice addressing me? I stood still, alternately growing hot and cold.

"I say, old man, open the door," continued the voice from without.

Half unconsciously I approached the door and pushed back the bolt that held it. A handsome young fellow, rosy and radiant as from a brisk walk, and bearing a striking resemblance to the image in the glass, rushed in as the bolt was drawn, and clapping his hands upon my shoulders exclaimed:

"Jack, old man, it's all fixed! we're going with you. The governor gave in at the last when mother, Nell, and I all got after him in a body. But what's the matter with you, Jack?" (holding me at arm's length, and peering anxiously into my face.) "You look as if you'd seen a ghost. Here, Nell!—mother! Jack is going to faint."

I have before mentioned that I never faint; neither did I then, though I doubt not Walter had good cause to imagine that I would. I felt the blood leaving my body; I became limp in the strong young fellow's arms as he tenderly assisted me to the sofa.

Placed her arm lovingly round my shoulder.

Attracted by his call, there entered a moment later a matronly-looking woman of fifty or thereabouts, followed by a girl of fifteen, whom I at once recognised as the original of the portrait, grown a few summers older. Both threw themselves on their knees at my feet. Mother (I give the title by which I to-day address that estimable lady) placed her arm lovingly round my shoulder and drew my head towards her own, while Nell grasped one of my hands, and began to kiss it gently.

"My poor boy," began the lady, "you have overtaxed yourself, just as I feared you would, and the anticipation of this morning's event, in the weakened condition of your nerves, has made you ill. I shall be glad when the ceremony is over, and you are comfortably off."

Great Heavens! What was the lady speaking of? "The anticipation of this morning's event?" "Weakened nerves?" "Comfortably off?" What does it mean? Had I really been executed in the prison-yard, and was I in some place of purgatory waiting to go through the agony under different surroundings? Was this the beginning of a sinner's eternity? Were these people fiends in the guise of angels? Was I to go on for ever being executed in different shapes?

"Come, dear," continued the lady; "Walter will help you with your clothes, and after a good cup of coffee you'll be yourself again."

"And," chimed in the pretty little maiden, "we won't tell Julie what a devoted husband she is to have. A man—oh Jacko, for shame!—who becomes ill on his wedding-day merely at the thought of being married!"

During all this time my lips had refused to utter a sound, and I could now only exclaim, "Heaven have mercy on me!" a remark which caused Walter and his mother to hold a hurried conversation at the back of the sofa, and then to leave the room, saying cheerfully that they would not be gone a moment.

Left alone with me, the young girl clasped her hands over my knees, and looking into my face, said:

"Now, Jacko, my darling, tell me what is the matter? You won't keep anything from your own Nell? I admire Julie and I respect her, but if this marriage is going to make you unhappy, I'll break it off if I have to go to the girl myself and tell her that you do not love her. Oh, Jacko! my best, my dearest brother, tell me what is the matter?"

"Please leave me," was all that I could articulate.

"Dear Jacko," cried the affectionate girl, "I cannot leave you. You never spoke to me so before. My brother, my dear, dear brother!"

"Where is your brother?" I cried.

There was probably a look in my eyes that terrified the girl, for she rose to her feet and, with tears streaming from her eyes, left the room.

I was alone, and again approached the glass. The brown-bearded man looked haggard and unnatural. "For the love of Him who made us," I cried, speaking to the stranger in the mirror, "tell me who you are, and who I am?"

"Why, Jack, my boy, what is the matter?"

I felt a strong hand upon my shoulder, and, turning, confronted a pleasant-mannered, middle-aged gentleman whom I rightly inferred to be a physician. Just behind stood Walter and his mother. I do not know whether it was the strong individuality of the doctor that impressed me with a sense of the reality of my surroundings, which up to this moment had seemed illusory and vague, but I suddenly felt a warmth of blood returning to my limbs, and a sense of rest and security in my condition; a determination to drift willingly whithersoever fate might lead me. A smile must have shown itself in my face, for the doctor turned to the anxious lady, and said: "It is nothing, my dear madam; mere nervous excitement, which will soon pass away."

Digitized by Google

He then prepared a potion, which I cheerfully swallowed. Walter inquired whether he should not assist me to dress, and I assented. The drollery of my existence now began to take precedence of all other emotions. The brown-bearded man in the glass was no longer an object of terror in my eyes; he became amusing.

I saw, I could not fail to see, that his motions and actions were entirely in my control. Little by little, I came to a grateful acceptance of my new identity. A man who has been hanged, said I to myself, cannot be chooser in any subsequent allotment of events.

This mild acceptance of my extraordinary fate, at that time, was probably due in a large measure to the drug which the doctor had administered—a powerful narcotic no doubt—that quieted my nerves and caused my troubled brain to become languid.

Piloted by Walter, who happily insisted upon keeping hold of my arm, I passed through a spacious and handsome hall, and down a broad pair of stairs to a very luxurious breakfast-room, where, for the first time, I met the head of the family, a mild-eyed man, past middle-age, who during the strange scenes of the morning had been absent from the house, and who now greeted me very tenderly.

Throughout the breakfast which followed I remained completely silent. There was a pier-glass opposite me in which, with quiet amusement, I beheld the brown-bearded man put morsels of food into his rather handsome mouth, I myself enjoying the sensation of swallowing the same. I did not fail to notice that my silence and evident pre-occupation was a source of keen distress to the others at the table, but I was powerless to improve matters.

As the soothing effects of the doctor's potion wore away, my thoughts became more troublesome and bewildering, until finally, unable to remain any longer quiet, I rose from the table, and fled to an adjoining room.

There seemed to have been an intention on the part of some member of the family to follow me; but the head of the house exclaimed, "No, let Jack alone; he'll come out all right presently."

Upon a table in the room in which I had taken refuge lay a newspaper. I picked it up. The date—that dreadful date to which for weeks I had looked forward with sickening consternation—showed me that it was the latest issue.

The paper was called the Denver Tribune and was printed in Denver, Colorado. As I scanned the sheet, a faint recollection as of something heard in childhood came upon me. I recalled a conversation caught in a fragmentary way years before, while talking of this "Denver, Colorado."

What were they saying? Oh, they were speaking of Denver as the chief city of a cattle-raising province in the United States.

I was, then, still in the United States! In Denver! But how in Denver? How anywhere except in a murderer's cell in the Tombs prison, New York?

A clock on the mantelpiec struck nine.

While pondering with aching head upon these questions, my eyes encountered the following paragraph:

Harry Jessup, the brutal murderer of Eduardo Italiani, is to be hanged in the Tombs prison, New York City, at seven o'clock this morning.

Again and again I read this paragraph. My eyes devoured the three brief lines of print, till every word and letter seemed eating its way into my soul. "Harry Jessup, the brutal murderer of Eduardo Italiani, is to be hanged!" Is to be hanged? A clock on the mantelpiece struck nine. "Is to be hanged at the Tombs prison, New York City, at seven o'clock this morning." Is to be hanged? I, Harry Jessup, am to be—Oh, Heavens! what does it mean? This is the day, this is the morning, and the sun, which rose at five o'clock, is four hours old! My eyes dropped again upon the paper, which had fallen in my lap, and I read the following notice:

The marriage of Mr. John Sutherland (better known to his countless friends in Denver as "Jack" Sutherland) to Miss Julie Chamberlain will take place at the residence of the bride this morning. It is to be a very quiet affair, only the immediate friends of the two families having received cards.

For a moment my brain seemed to be bursting. The sickening nausea which I felt in the prison returned, and then, quietly, like a great wakening of some hitherto dormant intellectual faculties, there stole into my soul the consciousness of a miracle performed. I had not suffered at the hangman's hands. I lived. I had never ceased to live. Every action of my life was accessible to memory. I was still Harry Jessup. Were I dead, had I passed into another world, my store of knowledge would of necessity be increased or diminished but it remained the same.

I mentally ran over my past life, and at every station found proof of a personal and intimate knowledge of but one man, and that man was Harry Jessup. I rose and approached the glass. There stood the brown-bearded stranger.

Digitized by Google

I looked in the face, and knew that he had stolen my soul. The mirror showed me the body of John Sutherland, with the soul of Harry Jessup. But the soul of the man whose body I wore, what of it?

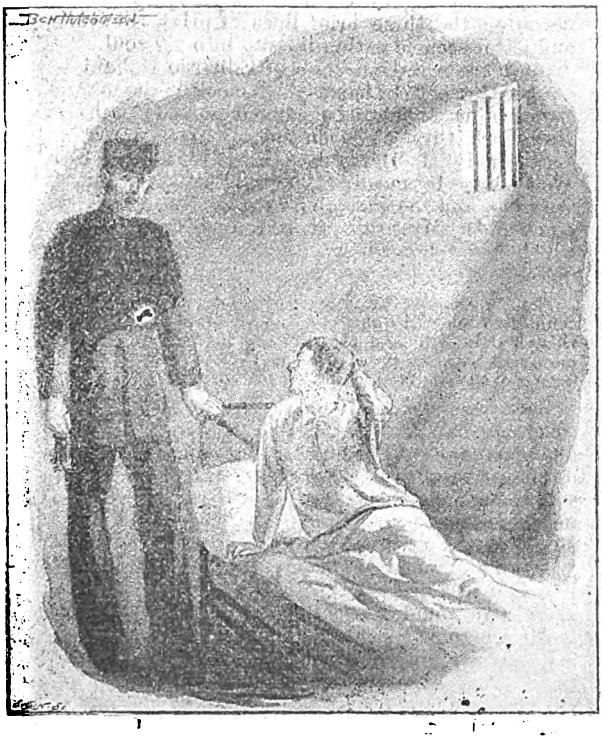
The sound of voices, subdued but earnest, come to my ears from the adjoining room. The name of "Jack," "dear Jack," was constantly upon the lips of the distressed parents of the loving brother and sister.

It needed no marvellous perspicacity for me, stranger as I was to them all, to discover that this "brother Jack," into whose suit of flesh I had unwittingly stepped, was a very dearly beloved member of the household. I learnt from such fragments of their talk as reached my ears that the loved ones were sorely troubled at my (at John Sutherland's) behaviour, and were at a loss what to do.

The newspaper paragraph, taken in connection with the young lady's remark in my chamber, made it obvious to me that this was to have been the wedding-day of the brown-bearded man, and I readily understood the dilemma into which his (or rather my) unaccountable conduct had thrown the entire family.

Remember, I am now writing of events a year old, and, if I seem singularly composed, it is only because time has graciously permitted me to grow accustomed to the contemplation of these wonders.

As I listened to the tender whisperings of mother and sister, so full of solicitude and anxiety, an overwhelming sense of my own enforced duplicity took possession of me. Who and what was I that I should have entered ghost-like into this happy family circle, bringing sorrow and suffering to all its members, and unwarrantably usurping the place of the eldest son; turning him from his bride, driving him——the thought flashes like fire upon my brain: Where is John Sutherland? This is his small, fat, white hand I hold before me. This is his heart which I feel beating; but his soul—himself—the man—the being who called himself Sutherland? Where is he? Was it an exchange of bodies? Between the hours of twelve last night and seven this morning I threw off the flesh and form which was my own, and assumed another mortal dwelling-place. The occupant of this body—the body which I see staring at me from yonder mirror—abandoned it for mine. It must have been so.



"Who are you?"

And my body—the external man Jessup—the corporeal shelter which this fond son and loving brother had been forced to enter; what of its fate? Dragged into a prison court-yard, and stretched by the neck at the end of a rope, two hours ago?

I do not remember all that occurred in the fever and subsequent delirium which fell upon me. I am told that I lingered between life and death for several months, tenderly watched by the parents and the sister of the unhappy man who died in my place.

When I was able to move about, my ignorance of all surroundings, which, as may be imagined, was complete, was attributed by the family physician to a shock of the brain centre, which, he explained, had destroyed my memory. I must, he said to Mr. and Mrs. Sutherland, be treated as a child, and retaught all that I had ever learned.

He suggested a trip to England, and we are now, after many months, about to leave America. My failure to recognise the affianced bride of John Sutherland has, I am told, thrown that young lady into a decline. No member of the Sutherland family has ever crossed the Atlantic, and my intimate knowledge of London will, if I ever reach London, be a new source of wonder to my companions.

We arrived in New York yesterday from Denver, and as soon as I could decently excuse myself from my "relatives," I went straightway to the Tombs prison, in Center Street. Having obtained a card of admission, I entered the inner prison, and made my way to the corridor known as "Murderers' Row." Cell No. 5, my cell, was empty. The gaoler, at sight of whom I came near to faint, informed me that Cell No. 5 had not been occupied since one Jessup, the murderer of an Italian, left it for the gallows a year ago.

"And tell me," I inquired, with a calmness which amazed me, "how this—this Jessup met his fate?"

"Terrible, sir, terrible!" replied the gaoler, evidently having, as he spoke, a vivid picture of the scene in his mind. "I never want to see the like of it again. You see, sir, he was a very nervous customer—most extraordinary so—and I expected we'd have trouble with him. But not long before midnight he fell into a sleep, just like the sleep of a child, and at half-past six he was slumbering as pretty as anything you ever saw. We hated to wake the poor fellow, but it had to be done, so I steps inside the grating and takes hold of his arm. He was awake and bright in a minute. 'All right, Walter,' he says, cheery like: 'I'm with you.' Then he looks round in a dazed sort of way, and says he: 'Why, hello! What the devil's all this?' and looking at me, he says: 'Who are you?' I told him, as kind as I could, that it was time to be going. He was on his feet then and staring round. 'Well,' says he, 'this may be a very pretty joke the boys have played on me, old man, but I don't like it. I suppose this is the County Gaol, and I'm in West Denver, hey? The boys must have got me pretty full at Charpiot's, and yet I could almost swear that I went home straight.'

Digitized by Google

"I saw at once that he was crazy, and I thought it would be a mercy to get through the business as soon as possible; so I called in the deputies and we read him the death-warrant. It's been a puzzle to me ever since, to know what that young chap was thinking about while we were reading the warrant. At times he'd laugh, and then he'd look sort of dazed and wild like.

"After the reading I told him we'd have to be moving and that I should be obliged to pinion his arms. 'All right, old man,' he said; 'everything goes, but I'll get even with those fellows when their time comes, you mark my words. I suppose now,' said he, with a laugh, 'you're going to haul me up?'

"I tell you, sir," continued the gaoler, "it made the cold shivers run down my back to hear him so joking like, just as if it was all a bit of fun. When we had his arms tied we started for the yard. There was a priest with him, at whom he laughed, saying: 'Well, the boys seem to want to make it as real as possible.'

"After we got into the court behind the prison where the gallows stood, and he saw the squad of police and the reporters and deputy sheriffs, he began to tremble, and then suddenly, in a voice that I can hear to this day, he screamed: 'What does it mean? Help! Murder!' As quick as possible we got him under the drop and pulled the black cap over his face, and then I think he fainted, for he cried: 'Julie! Father!' and fell down in a heap. The work was well done, and he didn't suffer much; but I can tell you, sir, I don't want to have to hang any more crazy men."

Well, as I said before, we are off for England in the morning, but I do not think I shall reach the other side. I have an idea that somewhere about half-way across the Atlantic I shall drown this brown-bearded man whom everybody calls "John Sutherland." N. P. B.

You Cannot Get Number 11 of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE Before Saturday, October 31st,

But on that day you will have an opportunity of getting in exchange for sixpence the following budget of literature and art:

Gates and Pillars of the Empire. Robert Machray.
No. 6.—Calcutta and Bombay Illustrated.
The 'Eathen. Rudyard Kipling.
Illustrated by Georges Montbard.
How Nelson Lost His Arm. Randolph Murray.
Illustrated by F. T. Jane, and from photographs.
Vengeance is Mine. (Complete Story.) William Beatty.
Illustrated by Stanley L. Wood.
The Poor Man's Club.
Written and Illustrated by Harry Furniss.
The White Slaves of England. R. H. Sherard.
No. 5.—The White-Lead Workers of Newcastle.
Illustrated by H. Piffard.
Perchance to Dream. Rudolph de Cordova.
(Complete Story.)
Illustrated by E. F. Skinner.
The Most Popular of Presidents. Marie A. Belloc.
Illustrated with photographs.
Music as a Medicine. W. Paill.
Wisdom Let Loose. W. L. Alden.
Illustrated by Charles May.
A Sea Change. (Complete Story.) Morgan Robertson.
Illustrated by S. Nation and G. W. Peters.
Ancient Military Types.
Illustrated by Crow.
A Dog-Fancying Duchess. Robert Machray.
Illustrated with photographs.
Secrets of the Courts of Europe. Allen Upward.
Second Series. No. 5.—"The Perfidy of Monsieur Disraeli."
Illustrated by Hal Hurst, R.B.A.
Harnessing the Stars. Alfred T. Story.
Illustrated with photographs.
The Last Extreme. (Complete Story.) J. S. Fletcher.
Illustrated by Sydney Cowell.

Jumbled Story Competition.—18.

On pages 572 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 November 2nd, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
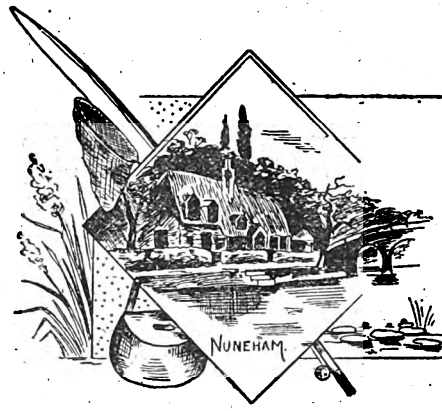
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the first of the readers living in Ireland who succeeds in forwarding the correct, or most nearly correct, solution.

Digitized by Google



Glanders, of Squatters' Gulch.

THE stranger was intoxicated. There was no mistaking it. He was also ugly. There was no room for a doubt of that, either. The hilarious patrons of the Tarantula Saloon had for some hours been watching his increasing opulence of alcoholism and combativeness, with that interest which always marked them when prospects of a fight became prominent.

It may be supposed, therefore, that the movements of the stranger, upon the night of which I write, were viewed with something more than common interest. One by one the leading citizens had dropped into the Tarantula Saloon during the evening, until the tables were all well surrounded, and the bar was lined with watchful observers.

"Who's the stranger?" inquired Tom Cathcart carelessly, as he dealt three cards to Jack Gashwilder.

"Dunno," briefly responded that authority, throwing his hand down in a disgusted way. "He's on'y just arriv', and it's my opinion as how, if he keeps on, he'll reach the end of his lariat extremely quick."

"I've half a mind," mused Mr. Cathcart pleasantly, "to rise up and give him a benefit myself. I don't like no Missouri mud-eater to stand the boys up like he's doing."

"Never mind," affably rejoined Gashwilder, with that air of authority which gave his opinions such great weight, "hold on a bit. Fur-lined George will be along soon, and the stranger will have to take water then. Let him go on. Gimme two cards."

"Hello!" ejaculated Mr. Cathcart, a moment later; "the ball has begun."

Every man in the room had risen to his feet. The tall Missourian, a man of angular frame and sinister visage, had at last succeeded in drawing somebody into a controversy. The citizens of Squatters' Gulch were about to be entertained.

"Humph!" muttered Mr. Cathcart, "it's a shame for him to pick a row with Glanders. The poor chap can hardly hold his own head up, let alone fighting. I've a mighty good notion to sail in myself."

"Hold on!" cautioned Jack Gashwilder, with his index finger laid knowingly along his nose. "Thomas Glanders is all right; he is slow, but sure. Look there!"

The quarrel at the bar had been growing louder. The stranger, inflamed with the fiery liquor he had been drinking, had selected one of the least offensive men in the settlement as the special object of his displeasure. This person, a Mr. Thomas Glanders, was a quiet, respectably-dressed man, with a stolid face and a dejected manner, who was looked upon in a friendly, often a pitying, light by his companions. There had been something sad in his life—that was known to the entire population of the Gulch. What it was no one precisely knew, and no one cared. But nearly everybody took an interest in him, and not a soul lived in the town who would not have fought for his sake at any time.

The stranger was heaping abuse on Glanders' head—abuse which he could not comprehend, and which seemed to half bewilder him. But the offensive Missourian went on, goaded to increased fury by his own words. Still Glanders stood helplessly gazing about him, making no reply, but occasionally passing the back of his rough brown hand across his forehead. Finally, in a transport of rage, the stranger drew a revolver. Then Glanders seemed to awaken. He spoke for the first time.

"Put it up," he said quietly, "or I will kill you."

The stranger laughed, and the crowd, angry and menacing, began to close in upon him. Glanders motioned them back.

"Put it up," he repeated, "or I will shoot you in your tracks."

The stranger fired, and Glanders' hat fell to the floor.

Few of the citizens of the Gulch had known or would have believed he could act with such decision. He had hitherto been thought by them to be a slow and easy-going person, too inoffensive to be trodden upon, and too gentle to respond with violence. But upon this occasion he belied his reputation. Quick as lightning—so quickly that only one or two in the room saw the movement—a derringer sprang from his pocket, a deep report sounded through the room, and the stranger fell to the floor.

There was silence for a moment. Then the wounded Missourian, after writhing a moment where he lay, beckoned Glanders towards him. He was no longer violent. The fumes of the drink had quite evaporated from his brain, and he realised what had happened. Glanders, whose anger had disappeared as quickly as it came, when he saw he was the victor and his life was no longer threatened, stepped forward and raised the stranger's head to his knee.

"Whisky," he said shortly, to the bar-keeper.

The liquor was brought, and he poured it between the stranger's lips. It was a dramatic scene. So deep, so solemn was the colouring of the picture, that not a man in the crowd—usually a turbulent one—had as yet uttered a word.

The wounded man, somewhat revived by the stimulant, motioned Glanders to lean closer, and he obeyed. There was nothing but pain in his red face now, and great beads of perspiration stood out upon his forehead. The stranger whispered a few words brokenly, and then suddenly fell back, dead. Glanders lowered the man's head to the floor, and then slowly rose to his feet. The hush which had some time ago fallen upon the crowd was not yet disturbed.

Digitized by Google

"Boys," said Glanders, in a voice which trembled slightly, "I hated to do it, but it couldn't be helped. I'm sorry it was so, and I'm willin' to abide by what you say. If it was murder, string me up, and be quick about it."

A murmur that rose almost to a shout ran through the room. Every man there endorsed his cause. Glanders began to move slowly towards the door. He paused once, drew his hat down over his eyes, buttoned his coat tightly about his throat, and thrust his hands into his pockets with an air that indicated a purpose.

"Poor things!" he muttered, as he strode into the night. "They're orphans now, and I made 'em so!"

* * * * *

Drawn back some paces from the roadway, close to the trunk of a tall pine tree, some distance from the sturdy settlement of Squatters' Gulch, was one of those huge, ungainly vehicles which, in the early days of pioneering, were known as prairie schooners. Near by, dimly seen through the darkness, were two lean, unhappy-looking horses, browsing in a helpless way upon the scant herbage which the place afforded. At the foot of the tree a heap of smouldering embers showed that there had been a small fire earlier in the night.

This was the scene into which Glanders peered half-an-hour after the tragic occurrence I have just described. For a long time he sat, thoughtfully and silently, upon the pole of the waggon. So far as any sign of his was concerned he might have been asleep. Possibly he was going over the events of the evening. Perhaps he was framing a scheme for the future.

When more than an hour had thus slipped by, he came out of his reverie, and rose to his feet. Thomas Glanders was a methodical man. For years he had plodded along in a quiet, careworn manner, accomplishing nothing that any of his companions could discover, but never complaining of ill-fortune or pain. Men supposed he must have money.

He lived well, but unobstrusively, and he never had difficulty in meeting his obligations. To the suffering he was always kind. Indeed, the local clergyman, who found few but sour grapes in this vineyard, was wont to say that Thomas Glanders could be relied upon, when charity was needed, to give as liberally as a gambler.

But there was no ostentation about him. He lived by method. He rose and went to bed at certain hours, he ate at prescribed times, and he drank his four glasses of whisky every day as regularly as he breathed. His was a purely matter-of-fact life. Whatever bad luck came to him—and it was altogether out of proportion to his good fortune—he accepted it without a word of complaint.

If, as was rarely the case, he had a touch of more than ordinarily pleasant luck, there was never a sign of jubilation in his conduct. He rarely talked, saving when words were absolutely necessary. What he had to do he did, and he made very little fuss about it.

When Glanders rose from his position upon the pole of the waggon, his first operation was to pile a few sticks of wood upon the coals. In a little while there was a blaze, which, after spluttering a moment, gave out considerable light. This illumination, or the sound of Glanders' footstep about the place, apparently aroused some degree of life inside the waggon, for there was a slight movement, and then a childish voice, rather petulant in its tone, said:

"The old man, I s'pose."

"Shet up!" responded another voice, obviously that of a lad, "or you'll get another larrupin'. Ef he's full, he's sassy."

Glanders leaned against the tree, and all became quiet again. For the second time since he had arrived upon this scene he fell to thinking, and, as before, his reflections were so absorbing, that he lost all conciousness of what was passing around him. He did not even notice that the canvas flap of the waggon was raised, and that two very big, blue eyes were peering cautiously through the aperture thus formed. It was also without his knowledge that the owner of those curious eyes stole out of the waggon and crept slyly towards him. Not until she spoke was he aware of her presence.

"Where's the old man?" were the first words Glanders heard.

They startled him slightly, and he looked earnestly into the young face that was upturned to his. Perhaps it was the flickering of the firelight that caused the quick shade that fell across his face. But it looked like an expression of pain. The girl, annoyed at his silence, went on impetuously:

"Don't you hear? What's the matter with you? Where's the old man?"

"Down the gulch," replied Glanders slowly, and with some difficulty.

"Oh," said the girl, with an odd mixture of sarcasm and curiosity. "He sent you up to say he was drunk, I s'pose? Said he wouldn't be home till he got good and ready—didn't he? Told you to tell us to look sharp, or he'd lick both of us when he got home, I reckon—hey?"

"Does he beat you then?" asked Glanders, with a weak attempt at evasion.

"Does he? Now you just bet he does. And I've got my opinion of a big loafer, that licks a little gal like me, what can't help herself. Some day he'll wake up the wrong outfit, and then he'll get put under the daisies with his boots on—you hear me?"

Glanders did hear her, and he shuddered. But he was strangely attracted by the big-eyed, rough-spoken little girl, who stood there looking him in the face and ejecting her words with an energy that would have been ludicrous under other circumstances. She was a slender child, perhaps twelve years old. Her hair was curly and light, and it fell in a tangled mass over her forehead and neck. She was poorly clad, and her brown feet had long been strangers to the cramping influence of shoes. There was a touch of great pity in Glanders eyes as he looked at this child standing there in the firelight and regarding him fixedly.

"Come here," he said, after awhile; "come here and talk with me. I want to ask you some questions."

He went over and sat down again upon the pole of the waggon. The girl looked at him for a moment without moving. Clearly her first impulse was to resent his suggestion. But that design lived only for a moment, and she approached him without shyness.

"I'll do it," she declared, in a voice from which the sharpness had all gone. "I don't know who you are, but I like you, though I can't tell why. It ain't 'cause you're handsome—that's dead sure."

Glanders paid no attention to this uncomplimentary allusion to his personal appearance. With him it was no time for idle words or thoughts.

Digitized by Google

"Tell me," he said, when the girl had settled herself on the ground in front of him; "do you like the old man?—are you fond of him?"

"Well," responded the girl, after a pause, "I can't say as I'd like to eat him. He's too handy with the back of his fist to make me so awful much in love with him."

Glanders sighed, as though he felt relieved from some anxiety.

"But, then," the girl went on, with childlike frankness, "you can't quite hate a man when he's the only purtector you've got. 'Though he was ugly he put all the bread into my mouth as ever went there, and I've got to remember that. Sometimes there wasn't much of it, and sometimes it was mighty queer bread. But as a gen'ral thing he did the best he knowed how, and —say, what are you thinking about so hard?"

Glanders was just at that moment thinking he was about the darkest criminal in the world. To save himself from possible destruction he had killed a fellow-being—an act, I regret to say, which was not sufficiently infrequent in those days, and in that section, to call for any special regrets upon its own account. But Glanders reflected that in depriving the Missouri bully of his life, he had also taken away the only prop upon which this helpless child leaned for support. It was a reflection which filled him at first with dismay and self-reproach, and then with a certain definiteness of purpose.

"Sis," said he, after a moment, passing his hand over her straying curls with a kind of rough tenderness that was not without its element of magnetism: "Sis, ef thar was a man—mind ye, I don't say thar is a man—but ef thar was one as come to you and says, says this man: 'Ef so be as you two children wants a home, bein' without one, ye can come and live along of me, and though it ain't a refined and ellygant abode'—ef any man was to say this to ye, and yer dad didn't particularly mind, what would you answer?"

The girl looked full in his face.

"Answer? Why, I'd collar the offer like chain-lightning—only"—she hesitated an instant—"only the old man never'd stand by and let me have such a good thing as that—never."

"He'll never bother you any more, my child," said Glanders. "Do ye feel very bad about it?"

"Bad?" she echoed.

"Yes. The old man has been took, as it were. He was killed, my child, and the man what offers to take ye into his home is the one as did it."

The young girl started back, and regarded Glanders with a strange expression. It was not a look of repulsion, or anger, or fright, but rather a look of astonishment. Presently, after peering into his eyes for some little time, she said:

"Then I don't believe it was your fault. You ain't the kind of man to do that sort of thing 'thout a cause. And as for me, it's astonishin' he hain't ketched it afore."

Glanders took a deep breath, which sounded like a sigh of relief.

"Then," said he, "we must be movin'."

In the morning the camp of Squatters' Gulch was surprised to see a huge emigrant waggon drawn up to the door of Glanders' cabin; and, later in the day, it was still further astonished to observe two children, a boy and a girl, playing about the place. Who they were, and where they came from, was a deep and absorbing mystery. That their advent was connected with the death of the stranger was not a theory which occurred to many of the citizens. One of the leading explanations put forward by those who conversed upon the subject was the proposition that Glanders' suppositious wife in the States—an appendage which was attached in a greater or less degree to the main bulk of the population of that salubrious locality—had forwarded her children to be cared for by their legitimate protector. But whatever Squatters' Gulch may have thought or expressed upon the subject, Squatters' Gulch did not carry its curiosity offensively near to Glanders, or his cabin on the hill.

Meanwhile, in the cabin itself there were some odd developments. The new residents had quietly domesticated themselves with that affluent confidence which is the distinguishing trait of that migratory childhood of the West, which, being cast this way and that by the changes which constantly occur in new countries, readily accustoms itself to fresh surroundings. One night, sitting before the fire, with his short clay pipe in his mouth and the children on the floor at his feet, dreamily regarding the coals, Glanders broke the silence.

"Sis," said he, "I don't want to pry into no family secrets of yourn, 'cos it ain't none of my business perticklery, but, at the same time, it ain't reasonable for me to go on always a-callin' of ye 'Sis,' and the young chap 'Bub.'"

"That's so, I reckon," promptly replied the young girl. "My name's Lucy Bryton. And his'n," pointing to the boy, "his'n is Robert. His t'other name ain't like mine, though, 'cause he's only a 'dopted brother. His name is Rathbun—Robert Rathbun. Hello! What's up, Mr. Tom?"

"Nothing?" replied Glanders, whose face had become rigid. "On'y I dropped my pipe, that's all. Go to bed, youngsters. I want to think. Hold up a bit. What became of yer mother, Bub?"

"Dead. Drowned in the Missouri overflow. I haven't seen her since I was a baby."

When they were gone, and for hours afterwards Glanders sat looking gloomily into the fire.

"Pore gal!" he muttered, after a long time. "Ef matters had come out a leetle different, that would hev bin my boy. Mine. Well, what's to hinder now?"

Having by some acute mental process convinced himself that nothing was to hinder, Glanders went thoughtfully to bed.

* * * * *

The soft autumn days, gilded by the clear and genial Colorado sun, melted slowly away into the crisp and vestal winter. Then came the budding spring, the lazy summer, and the blushing autumn again. So the weeks glided into months, and the months closed into years, until Squatters' Gulch, ashamed of its rough and uncouth name of other days, adopted the more exalted title of Clarion City.

There were other changes, too, in the general atmosphere surrounding the place. The rough and somewhat uncouth dwellings which formerly covered the steep sides of the ravine had almost entirely disappeared, and their places were filled with more sightly cottages. The business part of the town had grown commensurately with the other portions of Clarion City, and the place presented an altogether sightly appearance, cosily tucked away among the pine-clad foothills.

In a tasteful cottage, far towards the outer edge of settlement, lived Mr. Thomas Glanders and the members of his family, who have heretofore been described in this veracious narrative. It was a pretty place, and it was marked here and there by the unmistakable traces of a woman's presence. Neat white curtains hung in the windows, a hammock swung on the verandah, and a trailing vine grew up over the posts by the door.

Digitized by Google

One night, as the sun was climbing down across the western sky, the verandah was occupied by two young people. A strong, hearty young man was swinging in the hammock, while sitting beside him, idly moving the network backwards and forwards, was a lithe and graceful girl. She was blushing deeply, but not hanging her head. There was, indeed, in her large, blue eyes, a look of open frankness, which I do not think is often found about the faces of young women when they are discussing the subject which was at that moment occupying her attention.

"There is something which seems almost like sacrilege about it, Robert," she said with a touch of remonstrance in her voice. "I have grown to think you my brother in reality."

"But you love me, Lucy! You have told me so."

His voice was deep, and not unmusical to the ear. And it had about it, in the time of pleading, a persuasive tenderness which, I fear, more than one of the fluttering damsels of the Gulch had found it difficult to resist. But Miss Lucy was not of the common sort, and she did not heedlessly assent to the proposition advanced.

"What," she asked presently, "would he think?"

It was apparent that the young man did not require a more definite descriptive term to understand who was referred to.

"He would scarcely object, Lucy. You know he loves both of us very dearly, and his greatest happiness would be in making us happy."

"True," replied Miss Lucy thoughtfully. "But if—if he should rather we did not seek this kind of happiness. Robert—you know we owe him a very great deal! Our home, our rescue from an existence that would have left us both more to be pitied than if we were dead; our education—all were given us by him. We can scarcely do anything that may bring him pain, Robert."

The young man in the hammock was silent for a moment.

"Tell me," he said, in a little while, "why you suppose there is any reason that he would object."

Miss Lucy's face assumed a deeper scarlet.

"I—I—well, nothing. It is probably my imagination."

"Will you ask him?"

Another pause. Then, in a low voice:

"Yes, I will ask him to-night. If he consents, Robert, I will do all that you have asked."

"That's a dear, sweet Lucy!" exclaimed Robert, springing to his feet and kissing her lips. "We shall be very happy."

As he strolled down the hill, Lucy's eyes followed his retreating figure sadly. When he was gone, she drew a long and slightly tremulous breath, and laid her head against the post. She still sat thus with her eyes bent upon the ground, when a heavy footfall aroused her attention.

Mr. Thomas Glanders, returning from his office at the mouth of the Giant Mine. Not quite the Thomas Glanders we have known heretofore. His eyes were serener now than they were of old, and his tread had not that element of hesitation which formerly marked it. Thomas Glanders, mine-owner and operator, with a pretty home, and the benefits of solicitous female society, was rather inclined to be an ornament to his sex.

"Good evenin', Lucy," he said kindly, as he drew a chair up to her side, and seated himself so that the folds of her dress brushed against his knees. "I met Robert as I came up the hill. A fine boy that, Lucy. I'm as proud of him as if I had been his father."

A moment of silence, during which Miss Lucy breathed a trifle quickly. One hand lay unemployed in her lap. Glanders picked it up, and held it in his own. It looked so small, so white, so lovely, in his great palm, that he speedily covered it up by drawing his brown fingers about it.

"It's a whiter hand," he began, slowly and reflectingly, "though it ain't much bigger than it was when I first took it into mine, that night under the big tree. Ah, my girl, I didn't see then; and I didn't get to imagine that you would be so dear to me some day. I didn't know that in the course of time you would get to be—what you are to me. If I had——"

Another pause. This time Lucy was slightly trembling.

"If I had," he continued, "I should almost have been afraid to see you."

"Afraid!" The words came reluctantly and almost in a whisper.

"Afraid I might some time lose you—afraid that some other love but the regard you had for clumsy, poor-spoken old Tom Glanders might some day be stole away by a deeper, a greater regard for another man."

Mr. Glanders rose and walked to the other end of the verandah. Then he came slowly back, and placed his heavy hand, light enough now, upon the sunny head.

"Lucy," he began—"child, you are more to me than I can tell you—more than I know. There is but one happiness for me—but one rest after my day's struggle. And it has been a struggle, Lucy, that ain't always been easy for to get the best of. But, Lucy, I don't want to find fault, nor to complain, if it has brought me you. Eh? Why, child, you are cryin'! Dearie, if I've said anything that's grieved ye, don't mind me. Lucy, I'll never speak of it again, as long as I live. I take it all back, Lucy. I do!"

Mr. Glanders was down by her side, holding her hands and trying to soothe her. In a moment she became quite calm.

"You have been kind to me," she said, after a little while. "I was only a stranger's child—a stranger who would have taken your life. You took me in, and cared for me, and worked and toiled for me, so that I might have comforts and be happy. You took me, a ragged, rough, ill-bred child, and you gave me the chance to become a lady. You have earned my—my love, and——"

"Don't speak that way, Lucy. I didn't calculate to buy your heart. I didn't, Lucy, and I wouldn't take it like that."

"You didn't buy it, you—you won it. Tom, I love you very, very dearly. It may not be the kind of love you expect, just yet; but, by-and-bye, when we have grown used to each other, when we have forgotten that we were——"

"Father and daughter, almost," he broke in. "Are you sure, Lucy? Will you never regret this?"

"Never!" she cried impulsively. "But let it be quick. Do not wait a day, but have it done at once! It—it must be without delay, or—or——"

She did not finish the sentence, but with a sharp, convulsive kiss upon his brown cheek—a kiss which sounded like a gasp—she was gone.

Digitized by Google

In the gloaming of his porch that night sat Mr. Thomas Glanders, a very happy man. Behind him lay all the gloom, and sorrow, and pain, that could never come to him now. In the future—what? He could not answer, though it seemed very bright.

* * * * *

It was quickly and quietly accomplished. Almost before the staid citizens of Clarion City were out in the streets, Mr. Glanders and his bride had walked to the little chapel down the ravine, and back again.

He had noticed that Lucy was very pale that morning, and that there were long, deep lines in her face. Clearly she had not slept. But Mr. Glanders attributed the fact to a weakness of the sex, and imagined that in a little time it would soon wear away. Robert did not come home during the night, having gone a twenty mile ride to visit some friends.

Mr. Glanders had wished to defer the quiet ceremony until his arrival, but Lucy had refused with a feverish haste, which her companion set down to the score of diffidence. It was some hours after the marriage, that Mr. Glanders, failing to stir up any enthusiasm in Lucy's breast regarding the various topics of conversation, kissed her tenderly, and strolled out for a walk among the trees.

"She's better alone for a time," he muttered apologetically to himself. "When I come back in half-an-hour's time she'll be as bright and cheery as ever."

For a long time after he went away, Lucy sat looking blankly at the wall. Then she rose and walked out upon the porch, and stood looking down the hill, where she had last seen Robert pass away. In a few moments she became conscious that some one was near her.

It was Robert, white as a ghost, and trembling nervously. She looked into his face, but could not speak. There was a deep, pathetic inquiry in her eyes, which spoke more plainly than words.

"Yes, I know," he said, in a strange and worried fashion. "I heard it as I came up the street. I shall not reproach you, Lucy, for, if he asked you to marry him, it was the only return you could make for all his more than fatherly kindness."

There was a footstep not far away, but it was not noted by the two young people.

"I have come, Lucy," continued Robert, in the same hurried and unnatural fashion, "to say good-bye."

"Robert!" she gasped, "do not—do not go away."

"I must," he said, in a strange tone, regaining a part of his own force as he saw a touch of weakness in the woman he loved. "There is no other course. It would break my heart to stay here and see you the wife of another. It would wear out my gratitude, my manhood. Day by day, all that is good about me would fade and fade away, until I died of shame and mental agony, or became a reproach to all the world. It must be, Lucy. We love each other too dearly to have it otherwise."

She was silent.

"Good-bye, Lucy," he said, quietly, taking her hand.

"Good-bye," she whispered, in a choking voice.

For a moment he held her hand in his. At the same instant a shadow that had been thrown by the sun across the ground almost at their feet, began slowly and stealthily to steal away.

"Try," said Robert, struggling hard to regain his composure, "try to forget me. You can only find happiness in that oblivion. Or, if you think of me sometimes, remember me only as the brother who grew up with you and loved you with—with only a—brother's love. Good-bye. God bless you, little sister!"

He turned on his heel, and took a step forward. The sharp report of a pistol from the rear of the house arrested his attention.

"What was that?" asked Lucy, turning a shade whiter.

In a moment they were both under the great pine tree which stood a few paces up the side of the hill. What they saw at that moment will never be forgotten by either.

Stretched upon the soft carpet of pine needles, with a look of ineffable gentleness in his fast glazing eyes, a smile on his lips, and her portrait on his heart, lay the rigid figure of the husband of the stranger's child. L. R.

POST-CARD COMPETITION, No. 18.

A GUINEA is offered this week to the reader who first names the noun of four or more than four letters mentioned most frequently on pages 551 to 560. Another guinea is offered to readers living more than 100 miles from London under the same conditions. Post-cards only, please.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION, No. 16.

THE London guinea goes this week to Miss Strickland, 11, Park Walk, Fulham Road, S.W., and the provincial guinea to Miss Emma Bates, 26, Hunter's Vale, Birmingham. The sentence was: "She caught the girl's hand, and pressed a sovereign into it."

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION, No. 15.

SEVERAL competitors tied for the first place in this competition, and the £5 has gone to Miss Tomkis, 12, Portland Place, Leamington, whose solution was the first to hand with only three errors. As none of the Irish readers succeeded in getting within four numbers of being correct, the £2 is added to the remaining £3 and the total equally divided among the following readers: Mr. Siegfried H. Herkomer, Lululaund, Bushey, Herts; Miss Mannion, 16, St. George's Road, Ladbroke Grove, W.; Mr. Alan S. Holland, Llangathan, Oxford; Mr. G. V. Padmore, 2, Bedford Villas, Gerard Road, Weston-super-Mare; and Mrs. M. E. Wynne, 56, Algeron Road, Lewisham, S.E.

KEY.

51	30	252	2	141	21	154	88	106
145	143	191	76	133	198	268	8	7
258	4	155	69	124	108	236	111	211
86	122	255	251	55	92	224	33	95
130	181	186	247	96	15	188	66	125
56	153	39	221	97	132	217	75	225
227	31	180	136	22	213	9	245	139
223	194	265	37	168	157	152	131	114
148	10	195	205	138	87	176	123	150
140	253	94	44	165	189	109	82	210
248	112	34	57	65	242	246	115	54
98	6	45	90	201	156	182	52	89
64	266	144	261	40	80	216	93	204
117	59	202	60	244	61	228	270	91
70	254	84	81	229	256	121	185	163
220	231	3	260	239	16	11	207	32
19	203	25	196	222	240	103	104	47
41	250	79	197	206	164	24	14	101
13	226	36	199	159	257	135	49	151
23	175	263	243	238	172	116	214	127
73	53	167	27	209	126	171	48	184
78	85	38	142	190	193	77	233	110
149	50	264	267	129	46	161	12	107
118	234	230	177	74	120	183	147	29
26	235	241	137	17	99	62	35	119
219	262	128	134	249	160	71	200	218
63	215	102	58	259	100	67	212	83
269	208	18	146	178	166	68	20	237
158	187	28	43	162	169	105	179	5
42	170	1	173	72	192	174	232	113

Digitized by Google

OR,

The Romance of a Lost Continent.

By Geo. C. Wallis, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

SUMMARY.

ARNON's memory of his early days begins at a time when he finds himself abandoned on the seashore, whence he discovers the cave of a band of pirates, by whom he is captured. Under the care of Didron the Chief he grows up as one of them, and on the death of the former he takes command. Viol is the daughter of Didron and marries Arnon, who, on one of his voyages, lands at Miropis and consults the Priest of the Spirit of Truth, from whom he learns that within a year and a half he will be a captive in a foreign land, and that he need not fear death until he has visited the Grotto of the Sleeper three times. On returning, he finds his ship burnt and men killed. After fighting he escapes, and meets and falls in love with Briseis, daughter of King Dulo X. of Atlantis, and to her he reveals his identity. Vichri, Briseis' cousin and lover, believes Arnon to be dead. For several months he lives at the Court; but the old roving spirit returns, and he sets out to discover the cave of treasure left by Didron and his band. On his return from an unsuccessful attempt, he finds his identity discovered by King Dulo, and is sent away as a galley slave. During his absence in a small boat up a creek on the Coast of Nubia, the ship is taken by rebels. Led by Arnon, the whole of the population, starving and fearing annihilation by the rebels, set out for another town. His followers are routed, and he is captured by Asos, an Egytian captain, by whom he is taken to Memphis. He saves from a leopard, Vesta, the daughter of a priest, and himself becomes a priest. While walking through the Temple he hears voices.

CHAPTER IX.

THE PLOTTERS FOILED.

AT first no sound rewarded my anxious ears, but presently, their confidence being restored and their fears allayed, the unseen speakers breathed more freely, and began to talk among themselves.

"'Twas but a bat in the passages," said one, with a deep, gruff voice; "go on with your plan, and let us be away on our duty."

"Art hasty?" answered another in a thin, suspicious tone. "Wert ever so, Amasis? Lucky it will be for thee if it were only a bird of darkness, and not a spy of the King. But it hath gone, and now we may speak freely."

"Gone, indeed," thought I. "You do not know, my friend, that Arnon, the son of Didron, is behind this thin, deceitful wall."

"Then speak, and quickly as well as freely," said a third voice, in eager impatience, "for you know the time is short, and there is much to do."

"And thou, too, art hasty," said the gruff voice grumblingly, "and art like to spoil all if thou art not careful. Well, it is this I wish to say, that after Menophres sleeps you must draw your sword, calling on Osiris to witness that the King is dead, and the new king reigns. Pamonthes shall be waiting by the door of the banquet-room with a picked and well-paid band of armed men, and I shall be with him; and then it only needs that we bestir ourselves, and Pamonthes will be Pharaoh by to-morrow's sun, for the soldiers love him better than his elder brother. And then, my friends, our places in the land will be high, and thou, Amasis, shalt have the house and wealth of this fat old Mitres and his upstart, adopted son.

"Already, near the quarries of Silsilis, a secret army is drilling, and all is in readiness. See to it that you play your parts well, and victory is ours."

Well I knew now who the speaker was, and who the listener whom he called Amasis; the first a priest of the temple, who envied Mitres his place and fame, and the second a captain of the Royal Guard, a favourite of young and dissolute Pamonthes, the King's brother. The third, whom I could not make out, spoke next, answering Mexo.

"So far, good. But what is my task, and at what hour shall the blow fall?"

Digitized by Google

"Thine it is to see that the Royal Guard, who will be making merry in another room, be well drugged in their cups, so that their Royal leader may call on them in vain when the plot is out. At midnight, when the revelry is at its height, and the sober citizens are a-bed, that is the time. Dost understand all instructions now?"

"One thing only," said Amasis, "the potent powder on which success depends——"

"Is here," replied the chief conspirator. "Take good care of it. And now to your posts; I shall not fail."

Vain boaster! little he recked of one well named the Iron-fingered!

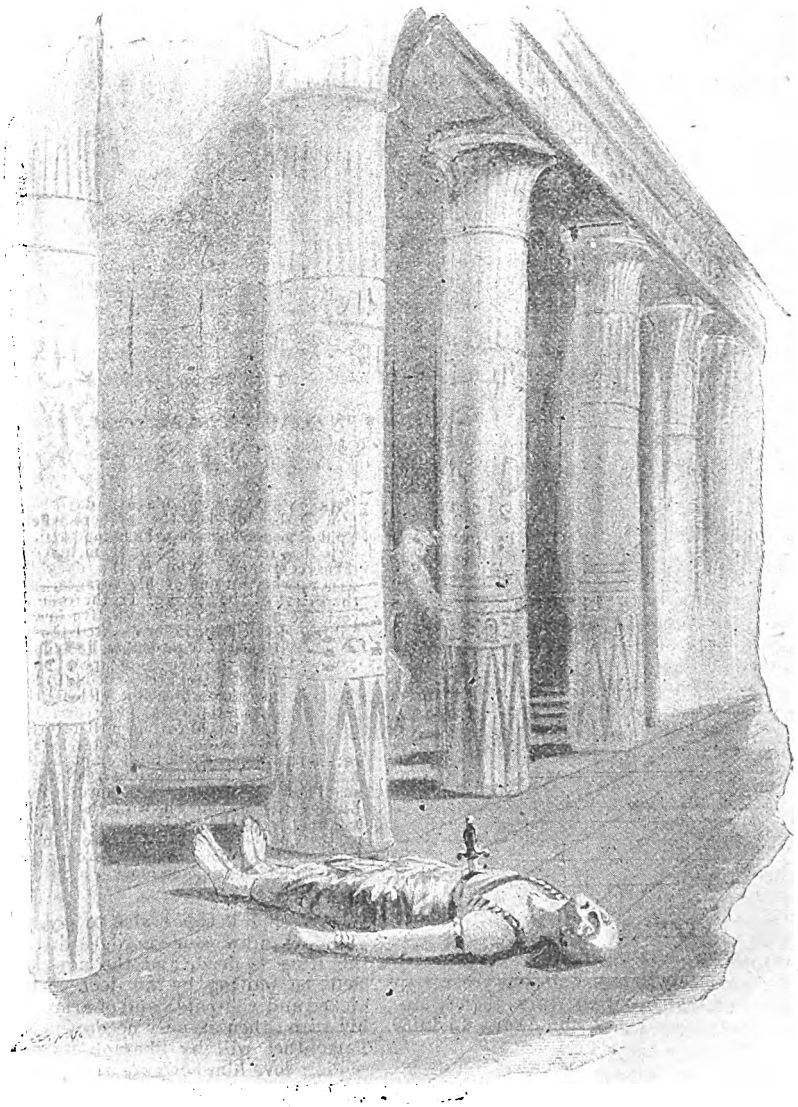
The retreating footsteps of his two confederates echoed down the stone-flagged court, and for a time Mexo paced slowly along the narrow passage, rendering it impossible for me to leave my secret recess without his knowledge, for, through a chink in the wall, I saw that the moon was now flooding the corridor with a garish light, where before had been darkness. I waited awhile, thinking how best to frustrate this murderous plot.

A great banquet was spread in the palace, I knew, and already it wanted but two hours of midnight; the guests would be sipping the first goblets of wine wherewith to whet their pampered palates, and it was a full hour's walk from the temple. Amasis had gained a good start of me with the deadly poison that was to be slipped unnoticed into the King's cup, and doubtless some time must elapse before the vile stuff could do its work. Meanwhile, the schemers of this nefarious plan were gathering their forces together. And not only was the King in danger, but Mitres, my host, and, judging from the bitter manner Mexo had spoken of me, my own life, perhaps, depended on whether I could reach the palace before the fatal draught was drunk.

Still that suspicious villain paced before my means of egress, seeming in no way disposed to leave the spot, and presently I discovered why.

As he walked up and down, I heard him muttering to himself:

"How much longer before they come? . . . . Surely Pamonthes is not delayed. . . . . The time is passing. . . . . I made him understand the place of meeting!"



So I left him.

Now I saw that at any risk I must escape, and that quickly, so as noiselessly as possible I slid back the stone and stepped into the corridor when his back was turned towards me. But as ill luck would have it, a bat flew noisily overhead, brushing the wall with his clumsy wings, and Mexo, starting, turned and saw me. Further secrecy was useless, so I greeted him with a derisive laugh.

"Seest that walls have ears, Mexo, when treachery is planned! Pamonthes will rail well at thee, when he comes, for a careless chatterer!"

"Or at thee, for a vile spy!" cried Mexo, rushing at me with uplifted hand, in which gleamed a short dagger. Not a muscle I moved, not a step I stirred, till that flashing point hovered just before my eyes, and then, with a lightning movement, I seized in an iron grasp the hand that held it, wrenching the wrist round with such sudden force that the bone snapped, the weapon fell from the nerveless fingers, and the arm hung useless at his side, whilst a cry of pain and rage burst from his lips.

In another moment my own dagger had done its work, and I dragged the traitor's body into the full light of the moon, leaving the blade stuck upright in him.

"There, disloyal wretch!" I said, "Pamonthes will find thee waiting for him patiently."

So I left him, and set forth for the palace in breathless haste. Down the echoing halls of that mighty temple, through the sacred groves, beyond the outer pylons, and down the giant avenue of sphinxes, five thousand paces long, I ran with flying feet, the clatter of my teak-wood sandals jarring on the still night air. Never before had that awesome avenue, with its huge, stolid heads gazing in grim indifference upon the doings of puny man, its wide, staring roadway void of sheltering shadow, and the buildings of the great city looming up as I neared the further end, seemed so interminably long.

Digitized by Google

Some priests coming up to the temple would have stayed me to inquire the cause of such unseemly speed, but there was that in my face made them give way for me, dallying not for any answer to their questionings.

On, on, I ran, till I came to the great arch that spans the roadway at the outer end, and there met those whom of all on earth I least wished to meet just then—Pamonthes and a troop of his followers. Fortunately, none of them knew me by sight.

"Whither now, in such haste, priest of Amun?" asked the Royal rebel suspiciously, whilst his men surrounded me.

"To one who sits at the banquet table of the King to-night," I answered quickly, ready-witted for once in my life, "with a secret message from one Mexo, whom thou knowest."

"And the name of him to whom you take this message?" asked he, partly satisfied.

"Amasis," I replied, without hesitation, "a captain of the guard, who stands high in favour at Court, and hopes by to-morrow's sun to stand higher still."

"It is well. Go on thy way swiftly, and it may be that thou shalt find a prouder post before to-morrow's sun has set," said Pamonthes, now reassured.

"I doubt it not, Prince," I answered, "and hearken, you will find Mexo, already armed, waiting for you in the great corridor of the northern hall."

Then, chuckling in anticipation of the angered astonishment of the conspirators when they should find how they had been tricked, I passed under the arch, and away to the palace. It now wanted less than an hour to midnight, and the fate of Egypt hung upon the swiftness of my feet.

Past noble dwellings, fertile, fairy gardens, deep, pellucid pools, stone-banked irrigation streams, where pilfering fishers cast their nets surreptitiously under the shade of the persea trees, past scores of humbler houses, crowded together in unhealthy closeness, and through the terraced flower-strewn walks of the Royal abode, thick-starred in their season with sweet-smelling roses, lowly violets, gorgeous chrysanthemums, fragile anemones, fragrant lotus, acinon, bay trees in bloom, and the twining flowers of the papyrus; past all these, without a thought for their strange beauty under the pale-faced moon, I ran, till I came to the portal of the palace, then, past the soldiers of the guard, roughly brushing aside the wardens of the brazen doors, and tearing costly hangings from their hooks in my hasty passage, to the horror of the Royal servants, I rushed on till I gained the banquet-room, and burst into the presence of Pharaoh, dressed in my priestly panther skins, with the golden scarabæus of office glowing on my forehead, the long, straight-handled censer-cup, with brazen hawk perched at the end, swinging loosely from my girdle, and the dagger of Mexo in my hand!

The assembled guests dropped their glasses on the groaning table and turned towards me, as I advanced up that gilded room, with surprise, annoyance, fear, and perplexity sweeping across their countenances, according as they were in the plot or ignorant thereof.

Bending low, I whispered in his ear.

Grim, implacable, not heeding their dismay, I strode to the seat of Pharaoh, who was even at that crucial moment lifting a coloured goblet of fine Anthylla to his lips, and before the possibly death-laden draught could reach them I had hurled it out of his hand, smashing the brittle ware into a thousand fragments on the marble floor, and scattering the costly wine upon the unstained board.

"By the stone-toothed Fish of Sebek!" cried Menophres angrily, "an thou hast not good reason for this thou shalt die the death before the sun rise. What meanest thou?"

Bending low, I whispered in his ear:

"To save thy life, if it be not too late. Hast a trusty messenger?"

"Yes, by all the gods," said Pharaoh, and then, in a louder tone, "Hither, Plexis!"

A youth all gorgeous in silk and purple trappings came forward, bowing low. To him the King, at my desire, gave order to take his signet seal to Asos, the chief captain of the guard, bidding him command his men to instantly cease feasting and hold themselves in readiness by the door of the banquet-room, and also to close the doors without till word was sent to re-open them. As the fleet-footed youth sped away on his mission, Amasis, the plotter, rose from his seat, and was about to follow him, but quick as thought the King saw it, and in a stern tone called him back.

"Be seated, Amasis. I like not my guests to leave until the feast is over. Bethink thee of that pale, rich Teniotic thou hast not yet tasted."

With an ill grace the soldier obeyed the command, gulping down a deep draught to hide his desperation and chagrin.

"And now, priest, tell us the reason of this strange interruption to our festivity," asked Menophres.

"Another word for thine ear alone," I said. "Who passed thee that goblet of wine I dashed so roughly from thy lips?"

Digitized by Google

"Amasis," answered the King, "but saving a draught of zythus, which my own servants brought, it was the first drink of the night."

"Then thou art safe," I replied, "and as to my story, it were better told so that the company can hear it."

By this time the attendants had cleared away the spilt Anthylla wine, and carried off the red amphora from which it had been poured. Then as briefly as I could I related what had passed between the three conspirators in the temple, and their plans for carrying out their plot, omitting only their names; and all the time I spoke Amasis watched me with eyes half-fearful, half-threatening, and hand upon his sword. When I told how I had slain Mexo, a muttered oath burst from his lips, which the King noticed but ignored.

"And the names of the three wretches?" asked Menophres.

"He whom I slew was Mexo, the priest, the third I know not, save that he is among the Royal Guard, and the second is Amasis yonder," I answered, pointing to the culprit.

"Seize and bind the traitor!" cried the King, rising and flashing with wrath, "and to-morrow he shall lie on the bed of torment!"

But even as he spoke there came the sound of the clashing of swords and the cry of conflict from without, telling that Pamonthes and his armed men were attacking the palace, and, hearing it, Amasis drew his sword, calling upon all who favoured the young Prince to quit themselves like men and hurl the old tyrant from his throne.

Scores of the guests unsheathed their blades at once, and leaping back from the table, joined him, while the others gathered round the Royal chair, prepared to defend it to the death. And I saw that the parties were evenly balanced, so that not yet was the danger past.

"Fear not, my son," said a voice in my ear, "for the gods will surely fight for us this night. Take this sword and use it well—it is one of the two I always wear at royal feasts."

I turned at the familiar tone, and saw Mitres at my side, armed with a bright, broad-bladed knife of sacrifice, and his face beaming with a quiet glee. Ay, he was as merry as a merle that night. Then there came the shock of arms, and the din of strife within deadened the sounds of battle from without. It seemed as though a million of the evil spirits of Amenti were let loose to work havoc on earth, so fearful was the uproar, so terrible the confusion that reigned in that gilded room.

The great table, loaded with its costly viands and fine old wines, was overturned in the midst of the turmoil, stools and chairs were flung about in inextricable chaos, arrows whistled down the lengthy chamber, and were transfixed in the oaken beams of the walls and roof, spears flashed over our devoted heads, swords swung in deadly strokes, and through it all rang the piercing shrieks of the women, huddled trembling in a corner furthest from the strife.

Those who fought on the King's side now gained the better of the fray, and where stern Pharaoh's sword cut its way with wrathful fury, where Mitres used his bright, broad blade with grimmest joviality, and where I wrought with quickening pulse and savage joy, the rebels gave back terror-stricken, dismayed, and would have fled, but that the door was barred. In desperate strait, like rats driven to a corner, they turned again, and fought us doggedly, falling beneath our onslaughts one by one.

Amasis still lived, and to him, through all the press of men, I forced my way, till we were face to face, for all the lust of battle that had fired my pirate days came over me that night like a surging flood, drowning every other feeling in its mad and deep intensity.

"Now, plotter," I cried exultingly, "prepare to die as Mexo died!"

His face contorted with the evil passions that worked within, he answered me with a cry of rage and then a sweeping stroke of his sword, but stepping back a pace, I parried it, dealing him in reply a home thrust that sent my blade through armour and tunic and body, pinning the wretch to the wooden beam of the doorway.

He slain, the rest lost heart, and very soon we stood alone, the victors in that blood-stained room, but a dozen men all told, each cut and hacked and pierced with many wounds, and listening with bated breath for the sounds from outside to tell us whether friends or foes had triumphed there.

At last the King bade them open the door, and in rushed Asos, followed by the remnant of the faithful guards, leading a prisoner with hands bound behind him, sullen of mien, and hatred glaring from his blood-shot eyes.

"Pamonthes," said his elder brother sternly, "thou seest how vain it is to fight against the appointed of the gods. Now what is thy pleasure?"

"To ask no favour from thee, tyrant," was the only answer the rebel made, and that with taunting insult in his tone.

"Away with him!" cried Menophres, angered at his stubborn hatred; "nor let me see his face again alive."

So they took him, and he passed to his doom, and though it was on my tongue to ask him: "Didst find Mexo waiting for thee?" I forebore, so miserable it is to see a man going to meet his death that way, even when he goes to meet it as did this man, scowling and defiant.

The first glimmerings of dawn were now lighting up the ghastly relics of the chamber, so the King bade the attendants clear away the corpses, and prepare for a still more sumptuous feast on the morrow, to hold revel over the defeat of the traitors, commanding Mitres and myself to be present. He then dispatched a strong force under Asos to the quarries of Silsilis, with orders to attack the rebels there gathering, and slay them to a man without mercy; and having seen the loyal regiment start on its mission, we retired to our several homes.

The city was in a ferment of excitement for some time, many thousands of the disaffected needing little urging to break into open revolt, but the news that the plot had failed and Pamonthes was executed, together with the vigorous measures taken for keeping the peace, prevented the uproar from getting beyond bounds, and by noon the tumult had subsided and all fear was at an end.

CHAPTER X.

Love and Jealousy.

Night came, and the banquet, a feast more lavishly extravagant than any at which I had yet broken bread. The table glittered from end to end with the costly vessels of gold and silver and pattern-coloured glass; great earthern dishes held groaning weights of the richest food the land contained; on a hundred dainty platters, all temptingly arranged, reposed a hundred toothsome morsels—dear-bought luxuries, spices and fruits that far-off Ind had been ransacked for, and which stood for the ransom of many humble, toiling, unknown lives, and the weight of many of the gold and silver rings which the Egyptians use for money.

Of wine there was no end; nay, it seemed as though old Sihor himself were tapped and running into the vast chamber, so plentiful in number were the pointed amphora resting in their stone rings, that the servants were emptying and carrying away, only to bring in a fresh supply in return. In the outer hall, visible from the banquet table now that the doors were flung open, sat the soldiers of the guard, feasted and honoured for their brave defence of the night before, and the bands of musicians, hired jesters and dancing girls, these latter all gaily and scantily dressed.

Pharaoh Menophres was a medium-sized man, clean-shaven as a priest, liberal handed with what he had, no matter from whence or how it came, and, save when angered or in a sullen humour, merry of speech and jolly of countenance. Near him, on his right, sat I, with Mitres on one side and Itaska the wife of Asos on the other, and many were the bright, bold glances that the stately matron cast upon me whilst we talked, or when our hands met in passing the dishes on the board.

Digitized by Google

She was a great favourite with Queen Hamense, I perceived, and for all my fame and royal favour, I felt ill at ease that night beneath my mask of festive talk and gay demeanour.

"Come, my valiant priest!" cried Pharaoh, holding out his glass to be refilled, "pledge me in a draught of rare Anthylla, such as thou dashed from my lips but yestereve. I'll warrant thee it is not death-laden this time, but life-giving."

"I drink to thee, O King," I said, draining the cup, thing to ask, and a vision of the sea floated before my eyes as I pondered.

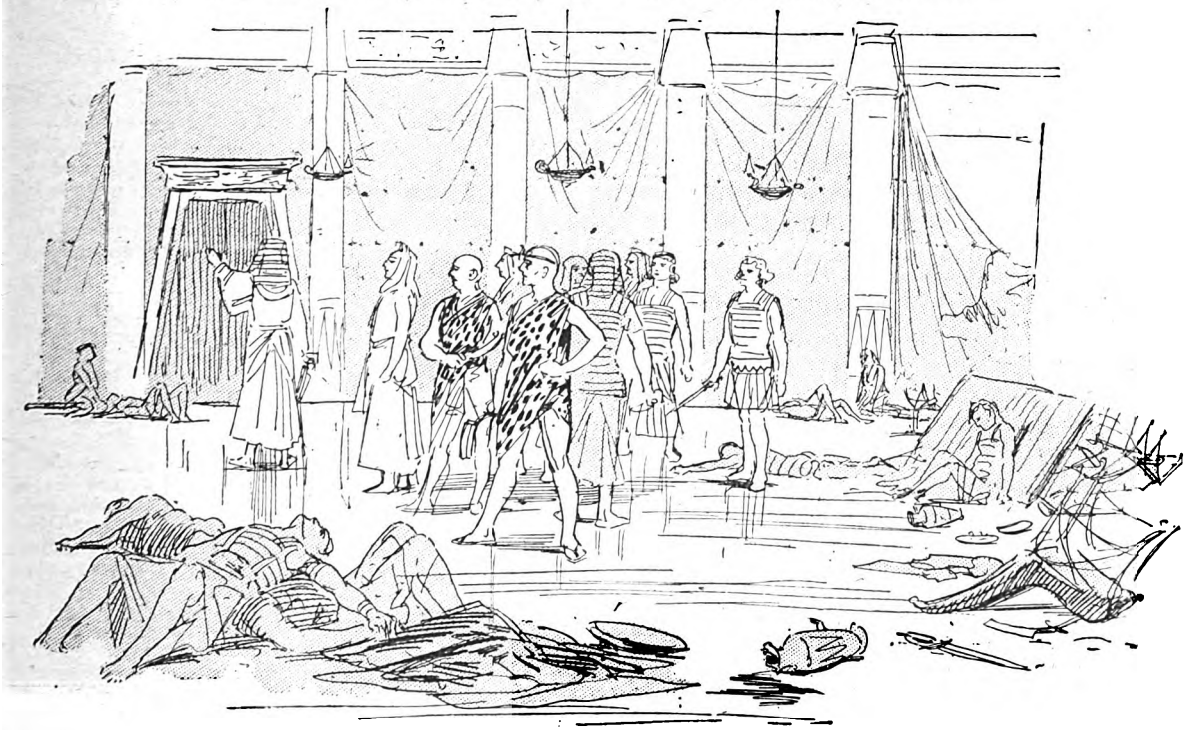
"Art slow of speech all suddenly," said the Queen.

"'Tis a weighty thing to ask boons of monarchs," I answered, "and needeth a wise head to make good choice."

"Perchance 'tis a matter of the heart, my priest!" said Pharaoh, with a broad smile, "and even so, speak on."

Before I could make reply Mitres struck in, quaking with his quiet jollity, and told the whole story of my fight with the leopard, and how his daughter owed her life to me. Itaska at my side drew off a space at this, frowning darkly.

"By Isis and Osiris!" cried Menophres, hugely amazed, "since the reign of the Timeless Kings there hath been no such man in Egypt. Out with thy wish, man, that I may grant it; for as to this maid of thine, Mitres, it seemeth that thou and herself and this priest can best settle that matter. Out with thy wish, Arnon!"



At last the King bade them open the door.

'but methinks a fill of the wine of Mareotis would be better." This, I knew, was his favourite.

"Hast sound sense, as well as quick wit, swift feet and a strong arm," said Menophres, "and shalt have thy wish. Thou, Mitres, I know, favourest most the pale Teniotic wine, and the Queen here, with Itaska, swears by the juice of the Thasian grape from the Sebennytic nome; but I and thou, Arnon, will drink together the elixir of Mareotis in preference."

Thereat they brought us an amplitude of the sweet, white-coloured liquid, which, though kept for a great time, has ever a light, fragrant aroma, and does not confuse the head like other wines, and we drank deeply of it to the destruction of all our enemies and to the increasing greatness of Egypt.

"Now ask of me," said Pharaoh, "what boon thou dost most crave, and it is much that I will grant thee, but for whom I had not been here to-night."

Now I thought awhile, racking my brain for the wisest

"Above all things," I said, "I desire a swift ship, that I may sail the waters of the great sea to the north, for it has ever been my longing to ride the wind-raised waves."

"Shalt have the swiftest ship in all my fleet!" answered the King, "and another on the Sea of Shari, that is to the east, if thou likest."

"Then am I well repaid for my duty," I answered, bowing to the throne-seat.

Then a draught of Thasian wine, such as the Queen liked best, was passed round the board, and all drank freely, so that many began to nod their heads, and men wandered in their talk. The King then spoke, in a voice growing husky with the liquor, slapping his thigh when he began.

"If thou art repaid, then I will grant thee still further guerdon, so that thou mayst be under obligation to me, and for that I shall demand of thee an act in return. I will make thee, with Mitres, my private counsellor, give thee one of my palaces in which to live, and as many of the golden rings as thou mayst want at any time, if thou wilt but fulfil me one desire."

Digitized by Google

"And what may that be, O King?" I asked, dazzled by the greatness he put before me.

"Only that thou take in marriage the daughter of Mitres here—Vesta—whom thou rescued from the leopard," he replied.

At this Mitres brightened, and, seizing my hand, pressed it warmly; but Itaska's face grew darker than before. I hesitated a moment, but by then the Thasian wine had reached my head, it hummed within my ears, it cast a whirling maze of colour before my eyes, it drowned the memory of a fair one far away, and, thinking that I could not do better than wed the sweetest maid I had seen in Khem, who loved me unreservedly, and feeling, moreover, the greed of wealth and power roused by the King's promise, I made answer that his request was more than acceptable to me, and that I felt overpaid for my services.

And so the matter was settled, and the feast wore on till daybreak, when the grim skeleton which had stood by the wall was removed, and we dispersed to our homes to sleep off the follies of the night.

Towards noon, when I woke from a troubled slumber, I found Vesta's father waiting for me in the tiled hall. He said that his daughter awaited the presence of her lord, for, she sent me word, how did I know that her hand was to be given in marriage so readily, who had never spoken with her concerning it?

"That is so," I said. "How should I know?"

"Nay, have no fear on that point, Arnon, my son," said the shaven priest; "her heart hath been set on you since that night your eyes first met, and I tell you plainly that nothing could please me better than this has done. Perhaps, you see now why I would have you a priest?"

"I see no reason," I answered, stroking my chin. "I was ever keener in sword-play than in wit."

"Seemeth so," said Mitres testily. "Well, this is the wherefore of it. It is customary for the daughters of priests to marry priests, though it may at rare times be otherwise; and after the death of the low-born serf whom Vesta fancied in her folly, I swore an oath by all the gods that she should wed a priest or go husbandless to the tomb. Seest now, O wise King's counsellor?"

"Light glimmers on the way," I replied, unmoved by his sarcastic tone; "thou wouldst have me a priest so that this thing might befall as it hath done?"

"Thou hast said it," he responded, the old quiet smile coming back as he spoke. "And now to thy prize, for I'll warrant me she counts the moments till you come." And as I turned to the room where Vesta daily sat sewing, the kindly soul went on his way to the temple, light of heart. The one desire of his life was given to him, now his daughter well betrothed, for he loved her as the apple of his eye.

For myself, my heart was not so light. There was but one whom I loved, and here was I, about to wed another whom I only cared for as a friend. It is true, as the Book of the Soul says, that a man's love is more to him than a woman's is to her; for a woman will wed a man who loves her, though she returns not his affection, trusting to the fire of his passion to warm both hearts as the years go on in wedlock, but a man will seldom desire a woman he loves not, though she worship him never so deeply.

So stood I to Vesta, but I had given my word to the King, wealth and power drew me on, I could not thwart the will of my friend Mitres, and least of all could I face Vesta herself with refusal on my lips.

I thought of the saying of Unim, the priest, in the grotto of the Sacred Sleeper; I called to mind the words of Isis that I had heard in my vision in the Temple of Karnac, and saw no way but to take what joy came to me, leaving to the Spirits the task of bringing their words true.

One thing I was glad of; that was that the great temptation Isis had warned me against was to be met in Atlantis, and not here in Khem, so that this marriage with Vesta could not be of evil influence upon my fate.

So, thus cogitating, I came to where Vesta sat, and talked with her, and so winsome a maid was she, so prettily she chid my clumsiness in making love, as she thought my hesitation, that I felt recompensed for my faithlessness to my other memory, and grew to think myself a fortune-favoured man that my steps had once been led to the place of tombs near Memphis.

In our happiness—for I was ever moved by Beauty's charms, and loath to go from Beauty's side—we lost our count of time, nor was it till Mitres, stern of face but merry of eye, came to tell us that the evening meal was ready that, she all rosy red with maidenly confusion, and myself calmer than I had been for many months, we woke to the consciousness that the round of daily life was still revolving on. One thing that I was glad of after, was that I told both father and daughter of the danger that threatened from Itaska's jealousy, for I knew that now she would be my enemy beyond a doubt.

I married my fair Egyptian.

My fame spread, as the days passed, from border to border of the land, from the confines of the Bugaitai Desert to the fortified city of Syene, from Pelusium to Aphtis; wealth flowed in upon me till I had more than I knew how to rightly deal with, and night after night I sat at meat with the King and his household.

In my ships I sailed down the Sea of Weeds and into the Sea of Shari, venturing far into the trackless ocean to the east, and in the swift vessel that rode upon the waters of the Great Sea into which old Nilus empties I visited many a fragrant isle where dates, and figs, and oranges, and lemons, and citrons grow in prodigal profusion, touched keel on many shores of the great mainland to the north, and once put through the narrow strait to the west, standing out a few leagues into the heaving sea beyond, and would have sailed further, but that my crew were seized with fear, being mostly river-sailors, and I must needs return.

I rated them heartily for a set of faint-hearted fresh-water crabs as we scudded back past the giant rock to the north of the strait,* where hovered, numberless as a swarm of bees, screaming and clanging hoarsely, a cloud of flying sea-birds, black, and grey, and white. We passed the channel swifter than I had ever sailed before, for the Seamew was a speedy vessel, being low in the water, with high masts

* The Rock of Gibraltar.

Digitized by Google

and rigging fashioned in dainty lines, as though she were a fairy craft that skimmed the wave like a stormy petrel.

And when we cast anchor again in the Nile I sent the cravens about their business without more ado, engaging in their stead a goodly company of deep-sea sailors from the eastern shores of the land of Khem, weather-beaten, bronze-browed seamen who had dared tempest and wreck for many years between the ports of Egypt and of Ind.

A year and a little more had gone since the banquet of which I have told, when I married my fair Egyptian at the Festival of Burning Lamps. I thought at first that it would prove a loveless link to me, but Vesta confided in me so fully, hung upon my words as though I were a god, and was withal so fair and sweet, that I came to cherish her with a quiet affection, calm enough on the surface, but deep, too, as I found when harm threatened this lovely daughter of Khem, who was mine.

Of Itaska I ceased to take heed, though, for all the glamouring pretence of joy she made at the bridal feast, I misdoubted me much of her flashing eyes and evil smile; a smile such as the syrens of the sea are said to wear when they lure luckless wanderers to their weed-grown caves.

'Twas a peaceful life I led, those twice five years I lived as Vesta's lord in Egypt, and though our union was childless—for which I have since felt glad—we grew to cherish and love each other more, albeit, at times, another face, crowned by a wealth of darker hair than my bride's, would rise before me, and with mute gesture bid me to her side. I never dwelt on the vision then, for my love for Vesta was to my love for Briseis as the full glow of a risen sun is to the paleness of a clouded moon, and it grieved me to cause a moment's pain to one who thought I lived for her alone. 'Twas pleasant, those ten eventless years, to live in the lap of luxury, powerful as a prince, more famous than any of the generals of the King, and honoured wherever I chose to go.

Thus things went with me till the ten peaceful years were nearly run, and then I noticed a coolness in the King's manner towards me that I could not reconcile with his former gratitude, while Queen Hamense was as curt and cutting in her speech to me as if I had done her a grievous wrong.

Also, a priest named Sethos, who looked ever upon my greatness with a jealous eye, grew mocking in his tone whenever he spoke of me, calling me, in derision, Arnon the Priest-Slinger, for my skill in the use of that weapon; and this, in a land where even the husbandmen use slings to frighten birds away from the vineyards, was in itself an insult.

Once I dared this Sethos to mortal combat for his insolence, but he declined—the coward—saying that it was not meet for priests to slay each other without great provocation, which he did not know that he had given; and with that, as the King upheld his plea, I had to be content.

I took counsel with Mitres at last, telling him how all things stood.

"Sharp sword, slow wit," he said; "'tis as clear as noon to me, and an evil outlook, too."

"What is the reason of it?" I asked again.

"A plague on your dulness! Canst not see the hand of Itaska in all this? See not that she has won the Queen to her side, and has taken Sethos, who grudges you your fortune, into her confidence, and that the three of them are turning the King's mind against you? 'Tis clear as noon."

"By Neith, and so 'tis!" I answered; "what would you counsel?"

"To take no heed of it, and leave the matter to me," said Mitres. "This Itaska is a cool and calculating woman, or had worked her jealous ends long since. But she cares not to strike the blow herself, and so bides her time till she can make others the tools of her vengeance. Doth Asos know of her infatuation?"

"No, nor ever will from my lips," I replied, "for he is a worthy man, and I would spare him sorrow."

"Well spoken, Arnon," said Vesta's father; "and now I will tell you what I plan. Take no heed of this secret plotting, and I will cause a watch to be set upon the movements of these enemies, so that they may be caught in their own snare. Meantime, be ever on your guard against treachery. Promise me that you will ever wear that sword I gave you when we fought in the banquet-room, for it is a mighty weapon, forged, they say, on the anvil of the gods in Amenti. Sunderer, 'tis named, and a sunderer shall it be, so long as he who wields it keeps a stout heart within him."

I promised him to wear it ever, for I saw that the old man loved me as a son, and then we departed to our daily tasks, I, for my part, forgetting for a time the danger that threatened.

But one day—it was the second day of the month Mesoré, the last month of the year—my fair one's father came to me with a troubled face. I questioned him concerning his unusual gloom, rallied him for his stillness, and asked where his jollity had gone, but he only shook his head dolefully.

"This is an evil world, my son," he said at length, "and it will be well for many of us when we reach the shades beyond the tomb. It hath come to this, Arnon, that thou and I must soon part."

"Why so?" I ventured, a chill striking me. "Hast news of Itaska's plotting?"

He inclined his head, saying, "Even so." Then, after a pause, "Listen, while I tell thee all.

"As was my wont," he went on, "I betook myself to the Place of Counsel as the day broke, but few came for guidance. At last, just as I thought to turn away, Sethos entered, and seeing him, I withdrew behind the purple curtain before he had time to notice that anyone was within. He seated himself in my seat—for it is his turn after mine—and waited, impatiently, it seemed to me. Presently he moved as if hearing footsteps, and soon a voice—Itaska's voice—spoke through the hollow stone. I strained my ears to listen.

"'Art alone, Sethos?' said Itaska warily.

"'Yea, speak on in safety, lady,' answered he.

"'Then I have come to say that at last I know the history of this Arnon,' said the voice exultingly.

"I heard an exclamation of surprise from Sethos at the news, and listened with all the more intent.

"'He is no son of Egypt,' the voice went on, 'but a stranger from a far-off western land. This I have from the mouth of Asos, my husband, who had it from the Slinger himself at their first meeting in the wilds of Nubia. It has cost me great trouble to make Asos speak, but it is done, and methinks we have now a weapon wherewith to bring about the downfall of this stranger who penetrates the secrets of our wisdom and takes the daughters of our priests in marriage!'

"'True, lady,' said Sethos, 'and what is now thy will?'

"'That you go to Azil, the High Priest of On, and tell him the story, while I tell it to Queen Hamense, who will inform the King, and then, when he is called to trial by the head of the nation and the head of the priesthood, it shall be yours to swear that in secret the Slinger is unfaithful to the gods and mocks at their worship and hath led Vesta, his wife, to the same mind. Then his downfall and hers is assured, and you will surely take his place.'

"Sethos, lured by the bait of gold and power, held out to him, agreed to the compact, though he asked, curiously:

"'What hast thou to gain, lady, by this deed?'

"'That is my own business,' she answered, 'see thou to thy part and take no heed of me.'

"Then she went away and presently Sethos followed. Now I ask you, Arnon, is this tale true?"

"It is," I said, "and you must see why I have told it to none but Asos."

"Yes," he returned; and for some moments we stood there, facing each other in silence, scarcely knowing how to frame the words that both knew must be spoken.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY No. 18.] [See Page 559.

DOING THIS FEAT OF PRINTING HE PUT DOHEE.

Scene,—An old-fashioned cottage verandah, with flowering to the ground. Miss Waring, in a light summer muslin frock. honeysuckle trained over a trellis, and a flight of steps leading on a small wicker table by her side. Enter John Gray, discovered "mending," with a large basket of work standing clad in riding coat, breeches, and boots.

Jane Waring (a spinster of twenty-seven years).
John Gray (a bachelor of thirty odd).

Miss Waring: "Well, I never heard of such a shameless way of begging an invitation!"

Gray: "Does that make any difference?"

Miss Waring: "Of course!" (Gray seats himself astonished.)

Gray: "Why not let me tell you that I think you altogether objectionable in a friend, but it is hardly true, honest, and, as I said before, old-fashioned? Sometimes that kind of behaviour might not be possible, why it should be perfectly proper for me to explain how it all happened; but, as he finished up and noting her mocking expression): "You don't let me tell you what I think of you?"

Miss Waring (ignoring the compliment): "No, notwithstanding that you possess all those virtues this very minute."

Gray: "What a nice little housewife you would average twice a week for the last three months? That I believe you to be careful, industrious, and anything else in the world. Won't you believe me?"

Miss Waring: "Hardly!"

Gray (doggedly, as he rises): "Evidently I do love you! Indeed—indeed I do! Oh, tell me how "why, 'the proof of a pudding is in the eating'!"

Miss Waring (resignedly): "If it gives you any which are ordinarily stigmatised as unattractive, I can prove it?" (Miss Waring slightly shrugs her arms, and the latter was submitting to being kissed as if to bid him good-bye): "The proof of the slice of pudding."

Gray: "Did you really make a pudding?"

Miss Waring (without rising, or looking up from sight of the Leghorn hat.) "Let me see—you arose with the lark; but, after toying playfully with a whole subject of conventionalisms, and find out, if a good manager—in short, everything that the old-fashioned books, you know; and you impress what I have been doing this morning."

Gray (with one foot on the steps leading to the kitchen and made a pudding, which is being boiled deliberately): "Yes—that I love you."

Miss Waring: "How can I prove it, then?"

Gray: "Why—why—you must believe me! I do not know how to show it, but I love you more than I find you charming? Why not let me tell the subject."

Miss Waring (looks at him more kindly; then, it should be very improper for me to dine with you, until it is time to go home, in a lazy sort of way, with the lark—that is the way girls used to do in copy-books say a woman should be? And, the thing I should expect from—from my lover."

Gray: "Then why try to correct me? Why not ride over to see the beloved object whenever there gone to town, and will not be back until after invitation to dine?"

Miss Waring: "Mr. Gray!"

Gray: "The eating."

Miss Waring: "I will not have any discussion on pleasure."

Gray: "What am I to do? It's too late to go dinner."

Miss Waring: "You are most incorrigible."

Gray: "Then I am not to be invited to dinner?"

Miss Waring (smiling): "I might send you out a light and delicate breakfast—What! No again? Have I not stayed? Have I not been unconscionably to sit here and talk with you all alone, or to go off continually in the room?"

Gray: "But why not? Why not discuss the shoulders.) "Have I not ridden over here on an flat basket over your arm, and sallied forth into the verandah): "Good-morning, Miss Waring."

Miss Waring: "Most certainly not. Mother has her work): "Good-morning, Mr. Gray. Have you else from her childhood up.)

Gray: "Yes. May I sit down?"

Miss Waring: "Does that mean you expect an garden to pluck flowers—the prettiest flower of them too, by Jove! What a treasure you will be to believe me?"

Gray: "Let me see." (Gazes about, and catches in a most complicated piece of darning. Gray slightly amused): "Are you quite sure about it?"

Miss Waring: "No!"

Gray: "Prove"—(then, with a happy thought)—Why, this will never do! After a heavy meal, you is nowhere else to go. Then to hang about the place not opening your lips for half-hours together. "No? Well, that is immaterial—you didn't arise the lark, then." (Miss Waring shakes her head.) pudding, Mr. Gray, is in——"

Miss Waring: "No; I will not discuss it."

Gray: "Does that mean I have got it?"

(She drops her work into her lap, and gazes at me as being distinctly old-fashioned—you arose with the proverb, John Gray held Jane Waring in his all."

Gray (innocently): "Quite sure." (Then, looking on steps.) "I do not believe that you can guess nothing half so romantic. I went down into the back to Woodlands."

Miss Waring (looking more astonished, and been riding?"

Gray: "Yes."

Miss Waring: "And is that your idea of love? To him, half frightened, half pleased, and wholly by him as if she had been accustomed to do nothing dull?"

Gray: "I don't believe it."

Miss Waring: "I really did."

Gray (who is looking at the toe of his boot, which suddenly notices the nature of her work.) "Darning, constructively alone, but with your servants and walk with you all alone in the woods, and yet put on your sun-bonnet and gauntlets, hung a big, make!" (Miss Waring becomes intensely occupied with a gleam of mischief in her eyes, as she also rises somebody, Miss Waring!"

(It would be quite impossible, in a stage direction, he flicks with his crop, while he adds very talking when you are so inclined, and frequently you that—that I love you?"

Gertrude Warner.

Digitized by Google

By George Manville Fenn.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Another Shattered Idol.

"Yes, mad—mad with love—mad with passion—maddened by being a constant witness of that man's brutality to you. Olive, my own, my darling, listen to me. Don't turn away like this. You know—you must have known—how I loved you, and that I have waited and striven to do all that man could do to honour him and his love for you; but the passion has grown too strong. Had he been a true husband to you I should never have uttered a word; but, knowing what I do—the neglect, the cruelty, the patient forgiveness, and the repeated insults thrown in your face—I—I—I say—who loved you from the first, should have been more than man if I had not spoken as I have."

"Ah!" she cried at last, as she struggled free and tried to fly from the room.

But Murray caught her hands again, and in her desperation she backed away from him, till with a sudden snatch she tore them away again.

"Oh!" she cried, "is there no such thing as faith and truth in this unhappy world? You—you whom I have trusted and believed in as a true gentleman, my father's, my husband's friend—the man to whom I have always turned as if he were my brother—you speak to me like this—these cruel words. Oh, you must be mad—you must be mad!"

"Yes," he cried, fiercely now, "mad; but no, you cannot be so heartless, so cruel, as not to listen to me. Olive, dearest, think, think of all this weary past, this hideous time of suffering for us both. What right have you to go on letting this man blast your life and force you to submit to his infamies? Love! Pah! he never loved you. A miserable, despicable roué, who, with his wretched, worldly-minded mother, had but one thought, your father's money, while he, poor trusting, loving heart, believed he was working for your benefit, proud to see the child he loved so well worshipped, titled, and the honoured of all. I tell you he has told me all this again and again."

"Yes," cried Olive wildly, "told you—the man he believed to be his friend. What would he say now if he could hear that same man tempting his helpless, despairing child to forget her honour, duty, to her husband. Oh, it is an infamy! You do not know what you are saying. It is all impossible from you."

"Impossible! Duty to your husband!—honour! What duty do you owe him who has broken all ties to you again and again?"

"I am a woman, sir—Lord Braetoun's wife. If he has sinned against me, it is against me alone."

"No—no—against all who love you."

"I say against me and my father, sir; and if we forgive him, and he repents, what is that to you?"

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

"You have forgiven him," cried Murray passionately; "where is his repentance? Whose is the infamy—mine, or his?"

"Yours, for he trusted you. I, his wife, trusted you. My father has a hundred times said to me: 'If I am not near, and you are in trouble, there is Murray. You can trust him as you would me. He is the very soul of honour.' And, alas! that I should have to say it—that another idol I have worshipped should be cast down before me—where is that honour now?"

"Olive, for God's sake, have mercy," he cried, as he, as if to illustrate her words, threw himself at her feet, and caught her dress in his hands to press the hem against his lips.

"Yes, you are mad—you must be," she said softly now. "It cannot be you who spoke; it is too cruel—too horrible. I cannot crush you with bitter words. Your own heart will punish you enough. Please, go now, and let me think only of the friend I trusted, whom we all thought the soul of honour and truth."

"Olive," he cried piteously, "are those words from your heart? Is it you speaking now?"

"It is Lord Braetoun's wife, sir. I am a weak, helpless woman—alone with you here. My husband, who should be my defender, lies above us, stricken almost unto death. As a gentleman, sir, I ask you to leave me now, and go. We must never meet again."

"Olive, for mercy's sake, have pity on me!" he groaned, with his hands outstretched.

"I cannot have mercy. I cannot pardon you now. Once more, pray go."

He rose to his feet, and stood with one hand pressed to his forehead, gazing at her wildly, as if hardly able to grasp her words. But her attitude spoke volumes. There were pity—despair—agony—sorrow, all in the wild, dilated eyes which met his; while her left hand was outstretched toward the door, her right resting upon her breast, as if it were the only protector left.

And so they stood facing each other for some minutes. His lips moved again and again, but no sound came, and when he did speak his face seemed utterly changed, and his features were drawn and haggard.

"Go?" he said. "Go?" And he took a step or two toward the door. "Yes, go. My punishment for loving as man could hardly have loved before. Yes, go out into the cold, empty world alone."

There was a pathetic misery in his way of uttering the simple words that made his hearer tremble, and a look of pity beamed in her eyes; but they grew stern again, and did not shrink from his for a moment, as utterly crushed and humbled, he literally staggered from the room and down the stairs, supporting himself by the balustrade.

The calm, stern look left Olive's eyes the moment the door closed and she stood listening for a few moments; then gliding out, she darted upstairs, closed and locked the door behind her, and tottered to the bedside, where she fell upon her knees, caught Braetoun's hand in hers, and drew his arm about her neck, a violent hysterical fit of sobbing seizing her. But she felt safe, and by degrees the paroxysm passed away, to give place to a sense of loneliness and misery such as she had never suffered before.

Digitized by Google

And there she knelt till the rising sun shone through the window, but all looked to her cold and desolate, for another idol had been rudely broken, and lay shivered at her feet.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

His Straight Course.

Olive's experience of her husband's malady and the way in which it acted upon his shattered nerves was sufficient now to assure her that he was better that next morning; but she knew that much had to be done, and as she watched by his side her trouble and agitation increased.

For her position was terrible. She had no faith whatever in the result of calling in another medical man, for, however clever he might be, he would not have the slightest experience of Braetoun's constitution, and, though he might treat him admirably, the risk was terrible.

What should she do?

The nervous excitement was maddening, and the strain seemed more than she could bear. The fight, as it were, for life when Braetoun's delirium was at its height; the horror of Murray's declaration; and now the position in which she found herself.

"It is more than I can bear—it is more than I can bear," she sobbed, as she walked softly up and down the room, wringing her hands.

What to do?

If she sent for her father, his first question would be: "Why is not Murray here?" And then she must explain—tell him of the wild, excited declaration. She could not tell him—she dared not. It would be cruel to herself, a ten times greater cruelty to one who had saved her husband's life again and again. It was horrible, criminal, but how could she sit in judgment upon a man whose crime was that he loved her?

The blood flushed to her temples with the shame of the thought, and yet there was a feeling of misery and despair as she felt that they must never meet again, that she could never more frankly take the hand of the man for whom, in all innocence, she had felt a warm affection—the love she would have felt for a brother, even as her father looked upon him and treated him just as if he were a son. No, she could never look him in the face again, she told herself. It was an insult—an outrage. He must have been lost to all sense of respect and reverence for her—he must have been mad.

And for this to come at such a time, when she was so lonely, when she longed so for the help and counsel of someone whom she could trust. Her father? Yes, but she could not talk to him about her unhappy life; far less to Lady Braetoun.

Why, she ought to send for her at once, and tell her of her son's fresh attack; but how could she, when the first question would be: "Why is not Dr. Murray here?"

These thoughts rushed together through her brain till it grew chaotic; and there were moments when she felt that she must go mad. She was hedged in by difficulties, a very thorny tangle, out of which there appeared but one way of escape, and that was to send for Murray, and treat the scene of the past night as if it had never occurred.

"Impossible—impossible!" she moaned, as she flung herself upon her knees by the bedside, the blood once more flushing her temples, and the angry feeling of shame and indignation mastering everything else.

"How dared he?" she thought. What would he think if she sent for him? He would look upon her as weak, and ready to condone his offence.

It was impossible. Another medical man must be summoned at all hazards, and if—if—"Oh, Roderick," she moaned, "what shall I do? It is your honour, your life, for which I am fighting; tell me what to do? I want to love you dearly, my own husband. I forgive you the past. Take me to your heart and guard me. What have I done that you should have treated me so? Weak, inexperienced, I know all that, but I wanted to love you, dear. And now I dare not send for another; it is like risking your life. I dare not send for him; it is as if I were risking your honour. Roderick, dearest, I am your own weak, foolish wife; tell me, tell me what I am to do?"

She had taken his hand to press it to her burning forehead, and her softly-breathed words were full of tender love and reverence; but there was no reply. He lay in a state of utter insensibility more than sleep, and the black despair swept over the unhappy woman like a wave, as she moaned again and again:

"What shall I do—what shall I do?"

"I beg you pardon, my lady," said a soft voice at her side. "I'm afraid I've neglected you; but we were all so tired last night. How is his lordship this morning?"

Olive started to her feet, scarlet and then ghastly white, for the horrible thought flashed through her that the words she had uttered had been heard.

But the woman's face was grave enough, and there was no sparkle of curiosity in her eyes, only pity, for she knew well enough her lady's troubles—troubles which were pretty well canvassed all through the house—and she had not heard a word.

"Very, very ill, Melson," said Olive sadly; "but the terrible paroxysms are over. Oh, thank you. It was very good and thoughtful of you to bring that, but I could not touch anything."

"Oh, I beg your pardon, my lady," said the maid with quiet decision, as she set down the little tray of tea and toast which she had brought; "but you must, please. I went into the drawing-room, and you hadn't touched anything there, though the tea had been made. I don't believe you have had anything since yesterday."

Olive shivered as the maid's words brought up the scene in the night, and she saw once more Murray's wild eyes, listened to his passionate words; and she closed her eyes to shut out the horror.

"I thought so," said her maid to herself, and Olive started and uttered a wild cry, for she felt arms about her, and in her strangely exalted nervous state she gazed wildly in the eyes which looked into hers, and began to struggle, but resigned herself directly to the hands which lowered her into a lounge.

"I thought—I thought——" she faltered.

"Yes, my lady; it's because you are so nervous and overdone," said the maid, who hurried to the dressing-table and then bathed the agitated face with eau-de-Cologne before pouring out some tea. "Now try and drink this, my lady. Please, please."

Olive took the cup without a word, and sat back sipping a little from time to time, while her maid went softly about, arranging the disordered room, and glancing now and again at the cadaverous face upon the pillow.

Each glance she gave, though, was longer, and her brows contracted, while a look of anxiety deepened in her eyes, but she refrained from speaking till she had almost forced Olive to finish the tea. Then, as she took the cup away and began to bathe her temples again, she said gently:

"I don't want to alarm you, my lady, but his lordship's face looks very, very strange."

Olive uttered a cry, sprang up, and dragged back the curtain, as she bent over the pillow and then hurriedly felt Braetoun's temples, heart, and hands.

"I—I don't think he is different—he has been like this for some hours," she faltered.

Digitized by Google

"Yes, my lady? But he looks very bad. Oughtn't you to send for Doctor Murray?"

Olive's eyes dilated with horror, and she stood panting and trembling.

"No, no," she said in a hoarse whisper; "impossible! I——"

"I didn't mean to frighten you, my lady. You know best. You've seen so much more of his lordship when he has had these fits—but I thought I ought to speak."

Olive's eyes seemed fixed upon the speaker as if she were unable to turn away, while the agitation in her brain was extreme, and she went quickly through all the agonising struggle again.

At last, though, her looks were so wild that the maid caught her arm and shook her.

"Oh, my lady, my lady," she cried, "don't look like that; you frighten me."

Olive uttered a moan, and turned to the bed again, to see what struck her as being a terrible change in the ghastly countenance, and she flung herself upon her knees.

"He's dying—he's dying," she wailed. "Fetch Doctor Murray. Go yourself, and tell him I beg and pray of him to come—for God's sake to come back with you at once, and——"

The words froze upon her lips, and she turned slowly round, white as marble now, conscious that somebody had thrust the maid aside on hearing her words.

"I am here, Lady Braetoun: has there been some change?"

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Father and Child.

Olive's lips parted as she gazed in the dark, questioning eyes which met hers, but no words came. She could only point to the bed, and Murray threw back blind and curtain and bent over the patient, while, with a sigh of relief, Olive threw herself into the arms extended to her, as she saw that someone else was present, someone who had followed Murray into the room.

"Oh, father! dear father!" she moaned, as she clung to him. "Thank God you are here!"

"My poor, poor darling," whispered Emsworth, "are you to always suffer like this? I ought to have been told. Murray came to me at six, and roused me up. He said he was coming on here, and he told me about how bad Braetoun had been. He wished me to come with him. He said he was here till four. What a good fellow he is!"

"What a good fellow he is!" seemed to echo in Olive's breast, and, in spite of all, her resentment was for the moment somewhat quelled as she waited, panting, to hear him speak; but she shuddered and trembled, for the thought came, as if to crush her and make the shield of none effect: "He must have heard every word you said—your message praying him to come back."

There was some relief for her directly. Murray turned away from the bed, and said in short, decisive tones:

"He looks very bad, Lady Braetoun, but you need not feel alarmed. He was sure to turn like this. He must have a couple of nurses this time—one for day, and the other to relieve her at night."

"I shall"—began Olive hastily.

"Excuse me, Lady Braetoun," said Murray coldly; "it would be better not. Lord Braetoun needs the calm, unemotional nursing of a couple of trained persons. I should prefer that, if you please."

She did not speak, but her heart beat fast. Was this the same man as he who had addressed her in those words of passion in the night?

Even then she would gladly have freed herself from his presence, but she knew that it was impossible.

"I was afraid, from what you said, that matters would be worse," said Emsworth, with a sigh.

"They could not well be, Mr. Emsworth," said Murray. "He will get over this, and be about again; but these fits are weakening, and each one grows stronger. It is a pity. He has it in his own hands, not to enjoy good health, but to avoid these attacks. If he will bring them on by his folly, he must suffer. There, you must excuse me now."

"But Braetoun — what about him?" said Emsworth anxiously.

"I will come in and see him last thing to-night. Will you be here, so as to have the last report?"

"Yes—no. Come and dine with me, and we will come on together."

"Not to-night, Mr. Emsworth," said Murray coldly. "I will call at the institution, and send on the nurses, or at all events one. I will try and send Nurse Jennett for the night duty, if she is not engaged."

"Then you do not think that there is immediate danger?" said Emsworth quickly.

"No, there is none," said Murray abruptly. "He looks very bad, but his stupor will gradually give way to a very long sleep, and then probably he will wake in his right mind. Good-morning, Lady Braetoun," he added coldly, but without extending his hand. "Will you come down with me, Mr. Emsworth?"

He bowed, and left the room, the stern, firm physician, and Emsworth followed humbly behind, impressed by him, but not reading, as his daughter read, the firm, hard fight he had fought over self, and apparently to win.

She sighed, and waited anxiously for her father's return, ready to question him with her eyes.

"Yes, gone," he said. "Ah, my darling, if I could only take you back home with me! But what a man Murray is! I never felt so much respect for him before."

Olive was looking at him with her eyes full of the resentment she felt, but he did not notice it, and went on.

"We have been fortunate to find such a friend, and in the future, my dear, when I'm taken away, I can go feeling that I leave my affairs in the hands of a just steward, who will watch over your interests, and be ready to protect you, come what may."

"Father, father!" whispered Olive, as she buried her face in his breast; "don't, don't; you can't tell what agony you are giving me. You'll break my heart."

"My own darling!" he cried. "Well, well, I'll never talk to you like that again. But it is the truth, pet. I'm getting an old man, now, and work and worry, and failures of plans, and not seeing you as happy as I could wish, have told upon me. There, I won't die yet, though."

"Father, father!" whispered Olive, as she knelt before him and laid her hands upon his breast, "don't talk of going. I want you always to think of me, not as Lady Braetoun and Roderick's wife, but as your own little girl, who used to be so happy with you, and whom you used to pet and spoil. Hah!" she sighed, nestling to him as his strong arms clasped her; "like that—like that. I feel so safe and happy now. Yes, stay with me; why not come and stay with me always?"

"Eh? Stay with you always? I should only just like to. But no, no, no, it wouldn't do, my dear. There's someone else to study, someone else who wouldn't like me to stay here. And besides, I'm a very hard, harsh, disagreeable old man, and soon put out of temper; and when sometimes I saw little things that I didn't like I'm afraid I should be showing my teeth, and then somebody else would be showing his teeth, and there would be a fight, and your father would get the worst of it—a foolish old dog for interfering in another dog's kennel!"

"Oh, father, father!" sighed Olive.

"And oh, Olive, Olive!" sighed the old man; "things are best as they are. I mustn't quarrel and find fault, whatever I see, and I mustn't come and live with you, but I may visit you as often as I like, eh? And, yes, we'll have good times together after all, just as we used, and you must get Murray here as often as you can."

"No, no," she cried quickly.

Digitized by Google

"Eh? Well, then, we will not have him to come between us, and make us think of physic. You trust me, my pet; I'll come as often as I can, and make you feel safe and happy. There, now, a hot breakfast will do us both good. Come, wipe your pretty eyes, and let's have a smile. Braetoun's very ill, and it was all very dreadful, but you know he is getting better, or Murray wouldn't have taken it so coolly and been so cross. Enough to make him, after a long day with patients, to be kept up all night by a man who has been drinking himself mad. All right; I won't say another word about it. Fried sole for me, my pet, if it can be had. If not, I'll have an omelet."

"Oh, dear, oh, dear!" said Emsworth, as he went home an hour later, "he'll end by making her loathe him. I believe it's begun now, or she wouldn't beg of me to stay with her, and cling to me, and talk of feeling safe in my arms. Married so short a time, too. There's a look in her eyes I don't like. She's no longer a girl, but a woman—a thoughtful woman, and it's just as if something fresh were waking up in her brain. No, I don't like the look in her eyes, and if he don't mind he will some day wake to the fact that he has gone too far."

CHAPTER XL.

Murray Has a Telegram.

Olive was seated one afternoon alone in her despair, dwelling upon her position, and asking herself whether she was wanting in any way as to her duty toward her husband.

He had pretty well recovered from his last attack, but his manner toward her grew daily more cold and distant.

Was she cold and distant to him? she asked herself. She thought not; but by slow degrees it dawned upon her that, in spite of all her efforts, she did not feel the same to him as of old. And how she had tried to be unaltered, ceaseless in her efforts to cheer him when he suffered from the terrible fits of depression that came over him, begging him to take her to some place of amusement, in the hope that it would divert his thoughts!

At times, too, when she would gladly have shut herself up in her chamber to sit and sob, reading to him, going to the piano to sing one of his favourite ballads, and making one brave fight to ignore the past, so as to teach him that her love was unchanged.

On one occasion Olive's lips had parted to tell her husband all, but it was months since that terrible scene in the drawing-room, and Murray's manner to her had undergone a complete change.

It was the following of his conduct the next morning; and when he came to attend Braetoun it was always the stern medical man who addressed her, while he hurried away as soon as he could.

Hence she arrested the words that struggled to escape her lips, and told herself that the time was gone by for speaking—confessing, she called it. It had been impossible for nearly a month after, in consequence of Braetoun's state of health, and she felt that now it was madness to revive the trouble and cause enmity between her husband and him to whom he owed his life.

She was thinking of that and similar scenes on this particular afternoon. She was in lower spirits than usual, for the feeling was growing stronger that in spite of all her efforts she could never wean her husband from his old life.

Some day repentance might come, and then——no, the old girlish love never could return, but she prayed for help to do her duty as his wife.

Something more than ordinary was wrong, and she trembled for fear that Braetoun might have another of his outbreaks. She dared not ask him what was the matter—old experience had taught her that she must not question him—but she could pretty well tell from his eager examination of the newspapers, the telegrams he received, and the constant reference to his pocket-book, that the mental trouble was caused by his turf transactions.

He had gone out that morning soon after breakfast, looking more than usually careworn and haggard; and when she had spoken affectionately, asking him if he would not lie down for an hour first, he turned upon her angrily, and told her to mind her own business.

"It is of no use," she sighed, for perhaps the thousandth time; "he never liked me; it has all been one great mistake."

The door opened, and the servant announced Dr. Murray; and for the first time since the night of his mad declaration they were face to face, alone.

In spite of her self-control, Olive started, and the blood suffused her face, and then retreated to her heart, which began to beat wildly, as she motioned the visitor to a chair, trembling for fear that he should notice her agitation.

But she might have known that he would in the quick comprehensive glance he directed at her, with eyes whose study it had been for years to read the faces of those he saw.

"I am sorry to have to come," he said; and his tones brought relief to her directly, and she felt that she had nothing to fear.

The feeling was momentary. She had been thinking of herself, but the visitor's words must refer to someone else. Something was wrong—Roderick—some sudden seizure?

She sprang to her feet with a faint cry; the room began to glide round, as the horrible deathly sensation of faintness began to creep over her, till she was conscious that Murray had sprung forward.

His touch was galvanic; a wave of strength swept through her, and she recovered herself, repulsing him, and her eyes flashed as he drew back, slightly shrugging his shoulders, and his face looked hard as steel.

"It has gone now," she said, as she clutched the back of a chair. "Tell me the truth. I'll try and bear it. Where is he?"

"I was about to ask you that question, Lady Braetoun."

"What? My husband—is he ill?"

"I presume so by your telegram," said Murray, drawing a paper from his breast, and reading: 'Very bad. Come on at once.—Braetoun.' You sent this?"

"I? No!" cried Olive excitedly. "Roderick went out at eleven. Then he has been taken ill somewhere, and sent the message himself. Is there no address?"

"None. The name was considered enough, I suppose."

"Too ill to think," cried Olive wildly. "Oh, Doctor Murray, what shall we do?"

The hard look faded from his face, and her distress evoked his pity and compassion, while he felt a strange emotion as her tones told him that she was appealing to him once more for help—as of old.

It was all momentary, passing like a flash, and her eyes fell upon the telegram.

"Ah, yes," she cried, for mutual sympathy directed her thoughts in the same channel as his.

The postmark would show whence it was sent, and, perhaps, afford some clue.

But as she made a quick movement to snatch the paper from his hand, he crushed it angrily, and stood frowning.

(To be continued.)

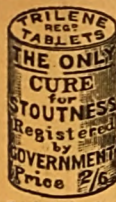
POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



ALL FAT PEOPLE

Readily Reduce Weight and Cure Corpulency Permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are very agreeable, harmless, and never fail to PRESERVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of diet. Reduction begins immediately.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Mrs. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" Celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in 4 weeks."

Bretton West, near Wakefield.—"Miss L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.—Mr. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17st., and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.—Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 13st."

127, Out Gang Lane, Old Radford, Notts.—Miss E. P. PARSONS says: "I was 16st. before taking Tablets, and am now 15st.—going on nicely."

Send 2/6 to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent:
D. H. WILSON,
Drum in position, 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

70

NEW SONGS (words and music) Piano Pieces. Dances, etc., with packet of Freeman's exquisite Scent and Booklet of racy reading, 12 Stamps.—Turner's Piano and Music Depot, London Rd., Preston.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

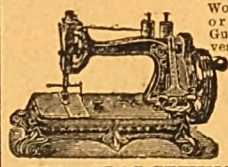
TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20

See Illus. Guide and Catalogue (.59 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 185, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair
FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE,
and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.
VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

HAVE YOU A POST-CARD?

If not, please obtain one, and send it to

THE PEARSON POTTERY CO., HANLEY,

with your name and address on the back, and you will receive by next post full particulars of the most wonderful package of crockery the world has ever seen.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

100 PIECES FOR £1 1s.

A Dinner Service of 50 pieces is included, which is guaranteed to be worth the guinea alone, and a China Tea Service of 28 pieces, finished in gold, together with a lot of useful kitchen crockery. The Secret of the Success.—The Pearson Pottery Company are manufacturers, not middlemen, like many other advertisers. The Pearson Potteries have nearly 2,000ft. frontage to the town of Hanley. Thousands sold all over the world. Everybody not only satisfied but amazed at the quantity and quality given. Hundreds of these packages are applied for as Wedding or Birthday Presents. And what more useful present can be given? Every item is useful.

Post-cards and Letters to be addressed to the

PEARSON POTTERY COMPANY, HANLEY.

Digitized by Google

J. THEOBALD & CO.'S SPECIALITIES.

OUR GRAND CHRISTMAS BOX PARCEL.

DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE PRIZES.

A CHANCE SELDOM MET WITH.

GIVEN AWAY Free of Charge to our Customers, 100 Golden Sovereigns, 100 Half-Sovereigns, 100 Five-Shilling Pieces, 100 Real Silver Watches, 500 Framed Oil Paintings, 500 Clocks, 500 Keyless Watches, 500 Real Gold Brooches, 500 Real Gold Rings 500 Silver Brooches, 500 Silver Rings, 500 Silver Pins.

We guarantee at least One Prize to every ten persons entering into our grand Bonus Parcel scheme.

Each Parcel contains a pair of very handsomely carved Wall Brackets, one representing a blacksmith at work shoeing, and the other in the form of a magnificent stag; a beautiful Miniature Photograph, mounted in Ivorine frame, representing Old Father Christmas, with powerful magnifying glass complete; Glass Mirror in frame; large carved-out model of a Tramcar, made to take to pieces and put together again, and which moves along the ground; Yacht Race Game, consisting of a coloured board representing the sea, some little movable model yachts, and either dice or revolving pointer for playing; a large size figure of a Mechanical Clown; Nanky Po, the real Japanese Doll, from Yokohama; splendid coloured figure One of England's Brave Defenders, standing 15-in. high, and which sells at 6d.; six of Raphael Tuck's Christmas Cards; large Scrap Book in colours, with a variety of Scraps included; coloured Story Book of the Ten Little Nigger Boys; the popular game of Blizzard, with board, revolving disc, and balls complete; packet of Black Peter, a card game for any number of players; beautifully coloured packet of cards for Snap; 100 Japanese Fairy Fire Stars; The Magicians' Album, which can be shown full of blank leaves, and at word of command changes to animals, then is found full of letters of the alphabet, these change to butterflies and again to plain leaves—about 12 different transformations; real Japanese Fish Game, containing 12 Japanese Fish and two double-jointed fishing rods; complete game of Lotto; Marvellous Swimming Frog, which, when placed in water, goes along; also a packet of Fortune-telling Cards, Grand Family Card Game of Robinson Crusoe, The Flutina Bagpipe (the New Japanese Musical Instrument), The Magic Maze, The Square Card Puzzle, The Maltese Cross Puzzle, The Magic Scissors Trick, The Performing Egg Trick, and the curious Optical Illusion of the Coster and the Obstinate Donkey.

2/6 each, or two Parcels for 4/6.

In each parcel is a Prize Coupon, which entitles you to a chance of obtaining one of the valuable prizes which we give away at the end of this year.

SPECIAL PRESENTS.

Ladies, Real Gold Brooches, 3/6. Fancy Dress Rings, all Gold, 4/6. Ladies' Silver Watches, 10/6; best quality 18/6. Gold Watches, 26/6 Gents' Silver Watches, 10/6.

SPECIAL PRESENTS.

Centre Second Chronograph Watches, with instantaneous stop movement, 10/6. Silver Pencil Cases, 1/3 Silver Brooches, 1/3. All best jewellery far below store prices.

MECHANICAL NOVELTIES.—Performing Leotard 1/6. Jumping Horse, 1/3. Mouse, 3d. Rat, 1/3. Circular Train, 1/3; on Lines, 1/6, 2/3, 4/6; with station or tunnel, signals, &c., large size, 7/6, 10/6, 15/0, 21/0, 30/0. Fisherman and Boat moving along and Fishing, 1/3. Blacksmith's Forge with Smiths at work, 1/6. All the above fitted with best mechanism and guaranteed. Pair of Wrestling Figures, 1/3. Flying Bat, 1/3. Moving Beetle, 1/3. Mechanical Models for Window Attractions, &c. Set of Working Signals, 1/4; large size, 2/10.

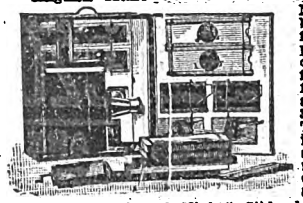
ELECTRIC COILS, with Battery complete, 1/3; larger, 2/9, 5/6 Electric Motor, same prices. Powerful Gas Engines, 12/6, 35/0. Hot-Air Engines, 5/6, 8/6, 15/0. Electric Bells, 2/9. Electric Lamps, 1/3; with Two Batteries, 3/6. Electric Telegraph Instruments, 1/3 per pair; 3/0 complete with Connecting Wires, Batteries, &c. Pair of Real Telephones, 10/6.

CHRISTMAS GAMES.—Ludo, 3d. and 1/3. Football, 1/3. Halma, 3d. and 1/3. Old Maid, 3d. and 1/3. Chess, Dominoes, Draughts, 3d., 1/3, 2/6. Ivory Playing Cards, 1/3. Hundreds of other similar games. Scotch Bagpipes, warranted to play, 1/3, 2/6, 5/0.

STEAM NOVELTIES.—Marvellous Steam Roundabout with moving horses 1/6. Fire Engine, 1/6. Steam Tricycle 1/6. Locomotives, 1/3, 2/6. Superior, with brass fittings, safety valve and steam taps, 5/0. All brass, with whistle in addition, 8/6. Six Wheel ditto, 8/6 and 10/6. Reversing action, 30/0. Steam loco with circular lines, 3/0. 5/6, 15/0, 25/0 Steam Vertical Engines for Working Models, all brass, 1/6, 2/6, 3/6, 5/6, 10/6. Powerful slide Valve Steam Engine. Very strong, 5/6. All these Engines guaranteed to work by steam. Working Model Water Mill, Fountain or Lathe, 1/6 each.

THE CELEBRATED BIJOU MAGIC LANTERNS AND SLIDES.

English Make throughout. Splendid Value.



No. 1 set comprises a best English lantern, fitted with two lenses, paraffin lamp, glass chimney, silvered reflector, 60 really comic figures on twelve long slides 6 extra slides, 3 complete Nursery Tales, each tale having 12 pictures on 4 slides, making 36 more pictures; 3 Comic Slipping Slides, 2 Moving Panorama Slides, 1 "Good Night" Slide, 1 "Welcome." 1 Man Swallowing Rats, 2 Chinese Firework Slides, 1 Rackwork Slide, 2 Lever Slides, 1 Queen and 1 Curtain Slide, making 120 pictures in all, complete with instructions, giving a picture on the sheet of 3 feet diameter. Price 10s. 6d. No. 2 precisely similar but having a No. 2 Lantern and No. 2 Slides, forming a larger size throughout. Gives a picture 4 feet in diameter. Price 14s. 6d. No. 3 size, much larger still, very suitable for a special present, gives a 5 feet diameter picture. 21s. Special Bottles Chemical Oil, 1s., 1s. 6d., 2s, 6d.

J. THEOBALD & CO., 19, Farringdon Road, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 60 YEARS.

JOHN JACKSON,

Skittle and Skittle Ball Turner,

113, PENTONVILLE ROAD,

LONDON, N.

Hornbeam Skittles; Sycamore Skittles; Four Corners; American Pins; Cheese Ball, Warranted; Round Ball, Warranted; Lawn Bowls.

FRAMES LAID AND REPAIRED.

Price List on Application.

Digitized by Google

A GLANCE AT PAGE 604 MAY MEAN £5 TO YOU.

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 410. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 7TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

AH! AH! THE MILDNESS OF THE SEASON HAS DONE THIS.

100,000 LADIES' LUXURIOUSLY HANDSOME, RICH DARK BROWN

OPOSSUM FUR NECKLETS.

The SHORT STORIES SPECIAL NECKLET COUPON. 7/11/96. On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above (carriage free this week only) to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

Sale Price 4/6 each. Worth Double.

With Life Imitation Natural Head combined; a most elegant and soft fur, quite equalling in style anything offered at 15s. 6d. each, and for durability not to be surpassed. Similar to illustration.

All Orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, Woodsley Road, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

"OH, YES, REVENUES FROM ECONOMY ARE ENORMOUS."

The richest provision in knowledge made absolutely easy for the accumulation of this income. Write to Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, who will provide you with full information, posting you free (if, when writing you mention this paper) a large, amazingly interesting, valuable, instructive, and detailed illustrated "Pioneer" Reduction Catalogue, showing you what you can save, what to buy, and where to buy Carpets, Mats, and Hearthrugs of every manufacture, including Wilton, Plush, Brussels, Velvet, Antique, Foreign, and Furs, also QUEEN'S ROYAL HOUSEHOLD, PRUDENTIAL, ECLIPSE, and ALARM CARPETS and HEARTHRUGS (REGD.). Also Blankets, Curtains, Sheetings, &c., and a thousand other articles wanted in every household. (Copyright.)

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a Carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2s. 11d. TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. WE WILL FORWARD DIRECT FROM THE LOOMS TO ANY ADDRESS ON RECEIPT OF AMOUNT. A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, THE LARGEST EVER SOLD AT THE PRICE.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER { 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d.
{ 4 Carpets and 4 Rugs ... ... 14s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON. 7/11/96.

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above (carriage free this week only) to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

MASON'S EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

SEVEN PRIZE MEDALS.

C. BRANDAUER & Co's CIRCULAR POINTED PENS

These series of pens neither scratch nor spurt. They glide over the roughest paper with the ease of a soft lead pencil. An assorted sample box for 7 stamps from the works, Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

"SHORT STORIES" best suit the mood of this eager, restless age, so

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

Ready-made and to measure, may be briefly and simply set down as

"ABSOLUTELY the BEST VALUE in the WORLD."

MODEL 583 is one of the latest up-to-date designs made in that ideal fabric, The John Noble Cheviot Serge. It has a smart well-cut Bodice, with the back shaped to the figure and the front pleated at the waist.

10/6. There is a pretty Yoke Collar, and the whole is very daintily trimmed. The Skirt is a full, wide, tailor-made design. Price, for complete Costume, only 10/6; safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

SKIRT ONLY, as sketched, 5/6; carriage 6d. extra.

SIZES IN STOCK fit figures 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust, under arms; skirts being 38in., 40in. and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

COLOURS. — Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cinnamon, Electric Blue, Fawn, Grey, and Petunia.

John Noble's Knockabout Frocks,

With long full sleeves, saddle top, and pocket.
Sizes 21 24 27 30 33 36 38 42 45in.
Prices 1/6 2/- 2/6 3/- 3/6 4/- 4/6 5/- 5/6
Sent Carriage Paid 4½d. extra.

"AN IDEAL SCHOOL OR HOLIDAY GARMENT FOR GIRLS."

AN UP-TO-DATE FASHION VOLUME, containing numerous choice designs of Ladies' and Children's Costumes, sent, together with Patterns, post free on application. PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES."

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,

Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,

Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

THE "SURPRISE" WHISTLE.

A Piercing, Penetrating, Nerve-Racking, Ear-Splitter!

The rubber bulb on the end makes it capable of producing 1,000 different effects, from purling or muffled tones up to a great swelling, booming, two-mile piercing note, that will equal a steamboat or locomotive whistle. A PERFECT DOG OR QUAIL CALL. Cyclists will find the "Surprise" a magnificent road clearer. Post free 13 stamps.—MILLARD BROS., Dept. 9, 123, HOUNDSDITCH, LONDON, E.C.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 45
Nov. 7, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

On receipt of stamped addressed envelope a lady will send to those afflicted with Superfluous Hairs, free particulars of a simple remedy which permanently removed a large growth from her sister's face without injuring the skin. Address, in confidence, Miss E. R. DALE, 20, Belvedere Rd., Lambeth, London.

BLUSHING

Particulars of a self-treatment for a permanent cure, as prescribed by eminent physicians of the U.S.A., forwarded free to all sufferers on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. B. F. FIELD, 15, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London, W.

Dr. Mackenzie's
ARSENICAL TOILET
SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and Sun Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.
Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœopathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 410.] For the Week ending November 7th, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

THE STORY OF THE THREE BEAUTIFUL PRINCESSES.

IN olden times there reigned a Moorish King in Granada, whose name was Mohamed, to which his subjects added the appellation of El Haygari, or the "Left-handed." Some say he was so called on account of his being really more expert with his sinister than his dexter hand; others, because he was prone to take everything by the wrong end, or, in other words, to mar wherever he meddled.

Certain it is, either through misfortune or mismanagement, he was continually in trouble; thrice was he driven from his throne, and, on one occasion, barely escaped to Africa with his life, in the disguise of a fisherman. Still, he was as brave as he was blundering; and, though left-handed, wielded his scymitar to such purpose that he each time re-established himself upon his throne by dint of hard fighting.

Instead, however, of learning wisdom from adversity, he hardened his neck, and stiffened his left arm in wilfulness. The evils of a public nature, which he thus brought upon himself and his kingdom, may be learned by those who will delve into the Arabian annals of Granada; the present legend deals but with his domestic policy.

As this Mohamed was one day riding forth with a train of his courtiers, by the foot of the mountain of Elvira, he met a band of horsemen returning from a foray into the land of the Christians. They were conducting a string of mules laden with spoil, and many captives of both sexes, among whom the monarch was struck with the appearance of a beautiful damsel, richly attired, who sat weeping on a low palfrey, and heeded not the consoling words of a duenna who rode beside her.

The monarch was struck with her beauty, and, on inquiring of the Captain of the troop, found that she was the daughter of the Alcayde of a frontier fortress, that had been surprised and sacked in the course of the foray. Mohamed claimed her as his royal share of the booty, and had her conveyed to his harem in the Alhambra. There everything was devised to soothe her melancholy; and the monarch, more and more enamoured, sought to make her his queen. The Spanish maid at first repulsed his addresses—he was an infidel—he was the open foe of her country—what was worse, he was stricken in years!

Everything was devised to soothe her melancholy.

The monarch, finding his assiduities of no avail, determined to enlist in his favour the duenna who had been captured with the lady. She was an Andalusian by birth, whose Christian name is forgotten, being mentioned in Moorish legends by no other appellation than that of the discreet Kadiga—and discreet in truth she was, as her whole history makes evident. No sooner had the Moorish King held a little private conversation with her, than she saw at once the cogency of his reasoning, and undertook his cause with her young mistress.

"Go to, now!" cried she, "what is there in all this to weep and wail about? Is it not better to be mistress of this beautiful palace, with all its gardens and fountains, than to be shut up within your father's old frontier tower? As to this Mohamed being an infidel, what is that to the purpose? You marry him, not his religion; and, if he is waxing a little old, the sooner will you be a widow, and mistress of yourself; at any rate, you are in his power, and must either be a queen or a slave. When in the hands of a robber, it is better to sell one's merchandise for a fair price than to have it taken by main force."

The arguments of the discreet Kadiga prevailed. The Spanish lady dried her tears, and became the spouse of

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Mohamed the Left-handed; she even conformed, in appearance, to the faith of her royal husband; and her discreet duenna immediately became a zealous convert to the Moslem doctrines; it was then the latter received the Arabian name of Kadiga, and was permitted to remain in the confidential employ of her mistress.

In due process of time the Moorish King was made the proud and happy father of three lovely daughters—all born at a birth; he could have wished they had been sons, but consoled himself with the idea that three daughters at a birth were pretty well for a man somewhat stricken in years, and left-handed!

All three peeped cautiously through the lattice.

As usual with all Moslem monarchs, he summoned his astrologers on this happy event. They cast the nativities of the three Princesses, and shook their heads. "Daughters, O King!" said they, "are always precarious property; but these will most need your watchfulness when they arrive at a marriageable age; at that time gather them under your wings, and trust them to no other guardianship."

Mohamed the Left-handed was acknowleaged to be a wise king by his courtiers, and was certainly so considered by himself. The prediction of the astrologers caused him but little disquiet, trusting to his ingenuity to guard his daughters and outwit the Fates.

The three-fold birth was the last matrimonial trophy of the monarch; his queen bore him no more children, and died within a few years, bequeathing her infant daughters to his love, and to the fidelity of the discreet Kadiga.

Many years had yet to elapse before the Princesses would arrive at that period of danger—the marriageable age. "It is good, however, to be cautious in time," said the shrewd monarch; so he determined to have them reared in the royal castle of Salobreña. This was a sumptuous palace, incrusted, as it were, in a powerful Moorish fortress on the summit of a hill that overlooks the Mediterranean Sea.

In this delicious abode, in a propitious climate, and under a cloudless sky, the three Princesses grew up into wondrous beauty; but, though all reared alike, they gave early tokens of diversity of character. Their names were Zayda, Zorayda, and Zorahayda; and such was their order of seniority, for there had been precisely three minutes between their births.

Zayda, the eldest, was of an intrepid spirit, and took the lead of her sisters in everything, as she had done in entering first into the world. She was curious and inquisitive, and fond of getting at the bottom of things.

Zorayda had a great feeling for beauty, which was the reason, no doubt, of her delighting to regard her own image in a mirror or a fountain, and of her fondness for flowers and jewels, and other tasteful ornaments.

As for Zorahayda, the youngest, she was soft and timid, and extremely sensitive, with a vast deal of disposable tenderness, as was evident from her number of pet flowers and pet birds and pet animals, all of which she cherished with the fondest care. Her amusements, too, were of a gentle nature, and mixed up with musing and reverie.

Years rolled on smoothly and serenely; the discreet Kadiga, to whom the Princesses were confided, was faithful to her trust.

The castle of Salobreña, as has been said, was built upon a hill on the sea coast. One of the exterior walls straggled down the profile of the hill, until it reached a jutting rock over-hanging the sea, with a narrow, sandy beach at its foot, laved by the rippling billows. A small watch-tower on this rock had been fitted up as a pavilion, with latticed windows to admit the sea-breeze. Here the Princesses used to pass the sultry hours of midday.

The curious Zayda was one day seated at one of the windows of the pavilion, as her sisters, reclining on ottomans, were taking the siesta, or noon-tide slumber, her attention had been attracted to a galley which came coasting along, with measured strokes of the oar. As it drew near, she observed that it was filled with armed men. The galley anchored at the foot of the tower; a number of Moorish soldiers landed on the narrow beach, conducting several Christian prisoners.

The curious Zayda awakened her sisters, and all three peeped cautiously through the close jalousies of the lattice, which screened them from sight. Among the prisoners were three Spanish cavaliers, richly dressed. They were in the flower of youth, and of noble presence; and the lofty manner in which they carried themselves, though loaded with chains and surrounded with enemies, bespoke the grandeur of their souls.

Digitized by Google

The Princesses gazed with intense and breathless interest. Cooped up as they had been in this castle among female attendants, seeing nothing of the male sex but black slaves or the rude fishermen of the sea-coast, it is not to be wondered at that the appearance of three gallant cavaliers, in the pride of youth and manly beauty, should produce some commotion in their bosoms.

"Did ever nobler being tread the earth than that cavalier in crimson?" cried Zayda, the eldest of the sisters. "See how proudly he bears himself, as though all around him were his slaves!"

"But notice that one in green!" exclaimed Zorayda "What grace! what elegance! what spirit!"

The gentle Zorahayda said nothing, but she secretly gave preference to the cavalier in purple.

The Princesses remained gazing until the prisoners were out of sight; then, heaving long-drawn sighs, they turned round, looked at each other for a moment, and sat down, musing and pensive, on their ottomans.

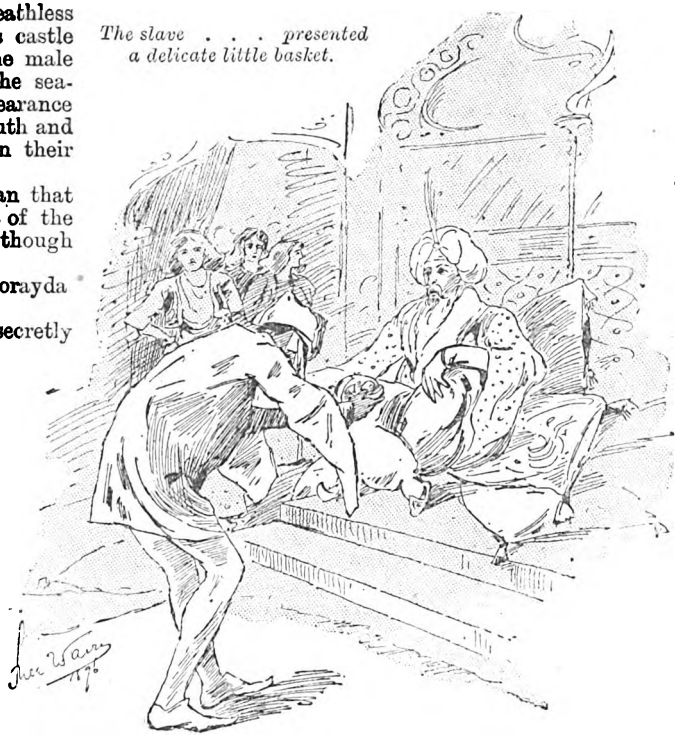
The discreet Kadiga found them in this situation; they related to her what they had seen, and even the withered heart of the duenna was warmed. "Poor youths!" exclaimed she, "I'll warrant their captivity makes many a fair and high-born lady's heart ache in their native land! Ah! my children, you have little idea of the life these cavaliers lead in their own country. Such prankling at tournaments! Such devotion to the ladies! Such courting and serenading!"

The curiosity of Zayda was fully roused; she was insatiable in her inquiries, and drew from the duenna the most animated pictures of the scenes of her youthful days and native land. The beautiful Zorayda bridled up, and slyly regarded herself in a mirror, when the theme turned upon the charms of the Spanish ladies, while Zorahayda suppressed a struggling sigh at the mention of moonlight serenades.

Every day the curious Zayda renewed her inquiries, and every day the sage duenna repeated her stories, which were listened to with profound interest, though with frequent sighs, by her gentle auditors. The discreet old woman at length awakened to the mischief she might be doing. She had been accustomed to think of the Princesses only as children; but they had imperceptibly ripened beneath her eye, and now bloomed before her three lovely damsels of the marriageable age. It is time, thought the duenna, to give notice to the King.

Mohamed the Left-handed was seated one morning on a divan in one of the cool halls of the Alhambra, when a slave arrived from the fortress of Salobreña with a message from the sage Kadiga, congratulating him on the anniversary of his daughters' birthday. The slave at the same time presented a delicate little basket decorated with flowers, within which, on a couch of vine and fig-leaves, lay a peach, an apricot, and a nectarine, with their bloom and down and dewy sweetness upon them and all in the early stage of tempting ripeness. The monarch was versed in the Oriental language of fruits and flowers, and readily divined the meaning of this emblematical offering.

"So," said he, "the critical period pointed out by the astrologers is arrived; my daughters are at a marriageable age. What is to be done? They are shut up from the eyes of men; they are under the eyes of the discreet Kadiga—all very good!—but still they are not under my own eye, as was prescribed by the astrologers. I must gather them under my wing, and trust no one else."



The slave . . . presented a delicate little basket.

So saying, he ordered that a tower of the Alhambra should be prepared for their reception, and departed at the head of his guards for the fortress of Salobreña, to conduct them home in person.

About three years had elapsed since Mohamed had beheld his daughters, and he could scarcely credit his eyes at the wonderful change which that small space of time had made in their appearance. During the interval they had passed that wondrous boundary line in female life which separates the crude, uninformed, and thoughtless girl from the blooming, blushing, meditative woman.

Zayda was tall and finely-formed, with a lofty demeanour and a penetrating eye. She entered with a stately and decided step, and made a profound reverence to Mohamed, treating him more as her sovereign than her father.

Zorayda was of the middle height, with an alluring look and swimming gait, and a sparkling beauty, heightened by the assistance of the toilette. She approached her father with a smile, kissed his hand, and saluted him with several stanzas from a popular Arabian poet, with which the monarch was delighted. Zorahayda was shy and timid, smaller than her sisters, and with a beauty of that tender, beseeching kind which looks for fondness and protection. She was little fitted to command, like her elder sister, or to dazzle like the second, but was rather formed to creep to the bosom of manly affection, to nestle within it, and be content. She drew near her father with a timid, and almost faltering step, and would have taken his hand to kiss, but on looking up into his face, and seeing it beaming with paternal smiles, the tenderness of her nature broke forth, and she threw herself upon his neck.

He prepared for his return to Granada by sending heralds before him, commanding everyone to keep out.

Digitized by Google

of the road by which he was to pass, and that all doors and windows should be closed at the approach of the Princesses. This done, he set forth, escorted by a troop of black horsemen, of hideous aspect, and clad in shining armour.

The Princesses rode beside the King, closely veiled, on beautiful white palfreys, with velvet caparisons, embroidered with gold, and sweeping the ground; the bits and stirrups were of gold, and the silken bridles adorned with pearls and precious stones. The palfreys were covered with little silver bells, that made the most musical tinkling as they ambled gently along. Woe to the unlucky wight, however, who lingered in the way when he heard the tinkling of these bells!—the guards were ordered to cut him down without mercy.

The cavalcade was drawing near to Granada, when it overtook, on the banks of the river Xenil, a small body of Moorish soldiers with a convoy of prisoners. It was too late for the soldiers to get out of the way, so they threw themselves on their faces on the earth, ordering their captives to do the like. Among the prisoners were the three identical cavaliers whom the Princesses had seen from the pavilion. They either did not understand or were too haughty to obey the order, and remained standing and gazing upon the cavalcade.

The ire of the monarch was kindled at this flagrant defiance of his orders. Drawing his scymitar, and pressing forward, he was about to deal a left-handed blow, that would have been fatal to, at least, one of the gazers, when the Princesses crowded round him, and implored mercy for the prisoners; even the timid Zorahayda forgot her shyness, and became eloquent in their behalf. Mohamed paused, with uplifted scymitar, when the Captain of the guard threw himself at his feet. "Let not your Majesty," said he, "do a deed that may cause great scandal throughout the kingdom. These are three brave and noble Spanish knights, who have been taken in battle, fighting like lions; they are of high birth, and may bring great ransoms."

"Enough!" said the King. "I will spare their lives, but punish their audacity—let them be taken to the Vermilion Towers, and put to hard labour."

Mohamed was making one of his usual left-handed blunders. In the tumult and agitation of this blustering scene, the veils of the three Princesses had been thrown back, and the radiance of their beauty revealed; and in prolonging the parley, the King had given that beauty time to have its full effect. In those days people fell in love much more suddenly than at present, as all ancient stories make manifest; it is not a matter of wonder, therefore, that the hearts of the three cavaliers were completely captured, especially as gratitude was added to their admiration; it is a little singular, however, though no less certain, that each of them was enraptured with one of the beauties. As to the Princesses, they were more than ever struck with the noble demeanour of the captives, and cherished in their breasts all that they had heard of their valour and noble lineage.

The cavalcade resumed its march; the three Princesses rode pensively along on their tinkling palfreys, now and then stealing a glance behind in search of the Christian captives, and the latter were conducted to their allotted prison in the Vermilion Towers.

The residence provided for the Princesses was one of the most dainty that fancy could devise. It was in a tower somewhat apart from the main palace of the Alhambra, though connected with it by the main wall that encircled the whole summit of the hill. On one side it looked into the interior of the fortress, and had at its foot a small garden filled with the rarest flowers. On the other side it overlooked a deep embowered ravine that separated the grounds of the Alhambra from those of the Generalife. The interior of the tower was divided into small fairy apartments, beautifully ornamented in the light Arabian style, surrounding a lofty hall, the vaulted roof of which rose almost to the summit of the tower.

The Princesses had been represented as always cheerful when in the castle of Salobreña; the King had expected to see them enraptured with the Alhambra. To his surprise, however, they began to pine and grow melancholy, and dissatisfied with everything around them.

The King, who was somewhat of a testy, tyrannical disposition, took this at first in high dudgeon; but he reflected that his daughters had arrived at an age when the female mind expands and its desires augment. "They are no longer children," said he to himself, "they are women grown, and require suitable objects to interest them." He put in requisition, therefore, all the dressmakers, and the jewellers, and the artificers in gold and silver throughout the Zacatin of Granada, so that the Princesses were overwhelmed with robes of silk, and of tissue, and of brocade, and cashmere shawls, and necklaces of pearls and diamonds, and rings, and bracelets, and all manner of precious things.

All, however, was of no avail. The Princesses continued pale and languid in the midst of all their finery, and looked like three blighted rosebuds, drooping from one stalk. The King was at his wits' end. He had, in general, a laudable confidence in his own judgment, and never took advice. "The whims and caprices of three marriageable damsels, however, are sufficient," said he, "to puzzle the shrewdest head." So, for once in his life, he called in the aid of counsel.

The person to whom he applied was the experienced duenna.

"Kadiga," said the King, "I know you to be one of the most discreet women in the whole world, as well as one of the most trustworthy; for these reasons I have always continued to keep you about the persons of my daughters. Fathers cannot be too wary in whom they repose such confidence; I now wish you to find out the secret malady that is preying upon the Princesses, and to devise some means of restoring them to health and cheerfulness."

Kadiga promised implicit obedience. In fact, she knew more of the malady of the Princesses than they did themselves. Shutting herself up with them, however, she endeavoured to insinuate herself into their confidence.

"My dear children, what is the reason you are so dismal and downcast, in so beautiful a place, where you have everything that the heart can wish?"

The Princesses looked vacantly round the apartment, and sighed.

"What more, then, would you have? Shall I get you the wonderful parrot that talks all languages and is the delight of Granada?"

"Odious!" exclaimed the Princess Zayda. "A horrid screaming bird, that chatters words without ideas; one must be without brains to tolerate such a pest."

"Shall I send for a monkey from the rock of Gibraltar, to divert you with his antics?"

"A monkey! Faugh!" cried Zorayda; "the detestable mimic of man. I hate the nauseous animal."

Digitized by Google

Zorayda . . . warbled a little Arabian air.

"What say you to the famous black singer, Casem, from the royal harem, in Morocco? They say he has a voice as fine as a woman's."

"I am terrified at the sight of these black slaves," said the delicate Zorahayda; "besides, I have lost all relish for music."

"Ah, my child, you would not say so," replied the old woman slyly, "had you heard the music I heard last evening from the three Spanish cavaliers whom we met on our journey. But, bless me, children! what is the matter that you blush so, and are in such a flutter?"

"Nothing, nothing, good mother; pray proceed."

"Well, as I was passing by the Vermilion Towers last evening, I saw the three cavaliers resting after their day's labour. One was playing on the guitar, so gracefully, and the others sang by turns; and they did it in such a style, that the very guards seemed like statues, or men enchanted. Allah forgive me! I could not help being moved at hearing the songs of my native country. And then to see three noble and handsome youths in chains and slavery!"

Here the kind-hearted old woman could not restrain her tears.

"Perhaps, mother, you could manage to procure us a sight of these cavaliers," said Zayda.

"I think," said Zorayda, "a little music would be quite reviving."

The timid Zorahayda said nothing, but threw her arms round the neck of Kadiga.

"Mercy on me!" exclaimed the discreet old woman; "what are you talking about, my children? Your father would be the death of us all if he heard of such a thing. To be sure, these cavaliers are evidently well-bred and high-minded youths; but what of that? They are the enemies of our faith, and you must not even think of them but with abhorrence."

There is an admirable intrepidity in the female will, particularly when about the marriageable age, which is not to be deterred by dangers and prohibitions. The Princesses hung round their old duenna, and coaxed, and entreated, and declared that a refusal would break their hearts.

What could she do? She was certainly the most discreet old woman in the whole world, and one of the most faithful servants to the King; but was she to see three beautiful girls break their hearts for the mere tinkling of a guitar? Besides, though she had been so long among the Moors, and changed her faith in imitation of her mistress, like a trusty follower, yet she was a Spaniard born, and had the lingerings of Christianity in her heart. So she set about to contrive how the wish of the Princesses might be gratified.

The Christian captives, confined in the Vermilion Towers, were under the charge of a big-whiskered, broad-shouldered renegado, called Hussein Baba, who was reputed to have a most itching palm. She went to him privately, and slipped a broad piece of gold into his hand.

"Hussein Baba," said she, "my mistresses, the three Princesses, who are shut up in the tower, and in sad want of amusement, have heard of the musical talents of the three Spanish cavaliers, and are desirous of hearing a specimen of their skill. I am sure you are too kind-hearted to refuse them so innocent a gratification."

"What! and to have my head set grinning over the gate of my own tower! for that would be the reward if the King should discover it."

"No danger of anything of the kind; the affair may be managed so that the whim of the Princesses may be gratified, and their father be never the wiser. You know the deep ravine outside the walls that passes immediately below the tower. Put the three Christians to work there, and, at the intervals of their labour, let them play and sing, as if for their own recreation. In this way the Princesses will be able to hear them from the windows of the tower, and you may be sure of their paying well for your compliance."

As the good old woman concluded her harangue, she kindly pressed the rough hand of the renegado, and left within it another piece of gold.

Her eloquence was irresistible. The very next day the three cavaliers were put to work in the ravine. During the noon-tide heat, when their fellow-labourers were sleeping in the shade, and the guard nodding drowsily at his post, they seated themselves among the herbage at the foot of the tower, and sang a Spanish roundelay to the accompaniment of the guitar.

The glen was deep, the tower was high, but their voices rose distinctly in the stillness of the summer noon.

The Princesses listened from their balcony; they had been taught the Spanish language by their duenna, and were moved by the tenderness of the song. The discreet Kadiga, on the contrary, was terribly shocked. "Allah preserve us!" cried she, "they are singing a love-ditty, addressed to yourselves. Did ever mortal hear of such audacity? I will run to the slave master, and have them soundly bastinadoed."

Digitized by Google

"What! bastinado such gallant cavaliers, and for singing so charmingly!" The three beautiful Princesses were filled with horror at the idea. With all her virtuous indignation, the good old woman was of a placable nature, and easily appeased. Besides, the music seemed to have a beneficial effect upon her young mistresses. A rosy bloom had already come to their cheeks, and their eyes began to sparkle. She made no further objection, therefore, to the amorous song of the cavaliers.

When it was finished, the Princesses remained silent for a time; at length Zorayda took up a lute, and with a sweet, though faint and trembling voice, warbled a little Arabian air, the burden of which was, "The rose is concealed among her leaves, but she listens with delight to the song of the nightingale."

From this time forward the cavaliers worked almost daily in the ravine. The considerate Hussein Baba became more and more indulgent, and daily more prone to sleep at his post. For some time a vague intercourse was kept up by popular songs and romances, which in some measure responded to each other, and breathed the feelings of the parties.

By degrees, the Princesses showed themselves at the balcony, when they could do so without being perceived by the guards. They conversed with the cavaliers also, by means of flowers, with the symbolical language of which they were mutually acquainted; the difficulties of their intercourse added to its charms, and strengthened the passion they had so singularly conceived, for love delights to struggle with difficulties, and thrives the most hardily on the scantiest soil.

The change effected in the looks and spirits of the Princesses by this secret intercourse surprised and gratified the left-handed King; but no one was more elated than the discreet Kadiga, who considered it was all owing to her able management.

At length there was an interruption in this telegraphic correspondence; for several days the cavaliers ceased to make their appearance in the glen. The three beautiful Princesses looked out from the tower in vain. In vain they stretched their swan-like necks from the balcony; in vain they sang like captive nightingales in their cage; nothing was to seen of their Christian lovers; not a note responded from the groves. The discreet Kadiga sallied forth in quest of intelligence, and soon returned with a face full of trouble.

"Ah, my children!" cried she, "I saw what all this would come to, but you would have your way; you may now hang up your lutes on the willows. The Spanish cavaliers are now ransomed by their families; they are down in Granada, and preparing to return to their native country."

The three beautiful Princesses were in despair at the tidings. The fair Zayda was indignant at the slight put upon them, in thus being deserted without a parting word. Zorayda wrung her hands and cried, and looked in the glass, and wiped away her tears and cried afresh. The gentle Zorahayda leaned over the balcony and wept in silence, and her tears fell drop by drop among the flowers of the bank, where the faithless cavaliers had so often been seated.

The discreet Kadiga did all in her power to soothe their sorrow.

"Take comfort, my children," said she, "this is nothing when you are used to it. This is the way of the world. Ah! when you are as old as I am, you will know how to value these men. I'll warrant these cavaliers have their loves among the Spanish beauties of Cordova and Seville, and will soon be serenading under their balconies, and thinking no more of the Moorish beauties in the Alhambra. Take comfort, therefore, my children, and drive them from your hearts."

The comforting words of the discreet Kadiga only redoubled the distress of the three Princesses, and for two days they continued inconsolable. On the morning of the third, the good old woman entered their apartment, all ruffling with indignation.

"Who would have believed such insolence in mortal man," exclaimed she, as soon as she could find words to express herself; "but I am rightly served for having connived at this deception of your worthy father. Never talk more to me of your Spanish cavaliers."

"Why, what has happened, good Kadiga?" exclaimed the Princesses in breathless anxiety.

"What has happened?—treason has happened; or what is almost as bad, treason has been proposed, and to me, the most faithful of subjects, the truest of duennas! Yes, my children, the Spanish cavaliers have dared to tamper with me, that I should persuade you to fly with them to Cordova, and become their wives!"

Here the excellent old woman covered her face with her hands, and gave way to a violent burst of indignation. The three beautiful Princesses turned pale and red, and trembled, and looked down, and cast shy looks at each other, but said nothing. Meanwhile, the old woman sat rocking backward and forward in violent agitation, and now and then breaking out into exclamations: "That ever I should live to be so insulted!—I, the most faithful of servants!"

At length, the eldest Princess, who had most spirit, and always took the lead, approached her, and laying her hand upon her shoulder, said: "Well, mother, supposing we were willing to fly with these Christian cavaliers—is such a thing possible?"

The good old woman paused suddenly in her grief, and looked up.

"Possible!" echoed she; "to be sure it is possible. Have not the cavaliers already bribed Hussein Baba, the renegado captain of the guard, and arranged the whole plan? But, then, to think of deceiving your father—your father, who has placed such confidence in me!"

Here the worthy woman gave way to a fresh burst of grief, and began again to rock backward and forward, and to wring her hands.

"But our father has never placed any confidence in us," said the elder Princess, "but has trusted to bolts and bars, and treated us like captives."

"Why, that is true enough," replied the old woman, again pausing in her grief; "he has, indeed, treated you most unreasonably, keeping you shut up here to waste your bloom in a moping old tower, like roses left to wither in a flower-jar. But, then, to fly from your native land!"

"And is not the land we fly to the native land of our mother, where we shall live in freedom? And shall we not each have a youthful husband in exchange for a severe old father?"

"Why, that again is all very true; and your father, I must confess, is rather tyrannical; but, then," relapsing into her grief, "would you leave me behind to bear the brunt of his vengeance?"

Digitized by Google

"By no means, my good Kadiga; cannot you fly with us?"

"Very true, my child; and, to tell the truth, when I talked the matter over with Hussein Baba, he promised to take care of me, if I would accompany you in your flight; but, then, bethink you, my children, are you willing to renounce the faith of your father?"

"The Christian faith was the original faith of our mother," said the eldest Princess; "I am ready to embrace it, and so, I am sure, are my sisters."

"Right again!" exclaimed the old woman, brightening up; "it was the original faith of your mother, and bitterly did she lament, on her death bed, that she had renounced it. I promised her then to take care of your souls, and I rejoice to see that they are now in a fair way to be saved. Yes, my children, I, too, was born a Christian, and have remained a Christian in my heart, and am resolved to return to the faith. I have talked on the subject with Hussein Baba, who is a Spaniard by birth, and comes from a place not far from my native town. He is equally anxious to see his own country, and to be reconciled to the Church; and the cavaliers have promised, that, if we are disposed to become man and wife, on returning to our native land, they will provide for us handsomely."

Gave way to a violent burst of indignation.

In a word, it appeared that this extremely discreet and provident old woman had consulted with the cavaliers and the renegado, and had concerted the whole plan of escape. The eldest Princess immediately assented to it; and her example, as usual, determined the conduct of her sisters. It is true the youngest hesitated, for she was gentle and timid of soul, and there was a struggle in her bosom between filial feeling and youthful passion; the latter, however, as usual, gained the victory, and with silent tears and stifled sighs she prepared herself for flight.

The rugged hill on which the Alhambra is built was in old times perforated with subterranean passages cut through the rock, and leading from the fortress to various parts of the city, and to distant sally-ports on the banks of the Darro and the Xenil. They had been constructed at different times by the Moorish kings as means of escape from sudden insurrections, or of secretly issuing forth on private enterprises.

Many of them are now entirely lost, while others remain, partly choked up with rubbish and partly walled up; monuments of the jealous precautions and warlike stratagems of the Moorish government. By one of these passages Hussein Baba had undertaken to conduct the Princesses to a sally-port beyond the walls of the city, where the cavaliers were to be ready with fleet steeds, to bear the whole party over the borders.

The appointed night arrived; the tower of the Princesses had been locked up as usual, and the Alhambra was buried in deep sleep. Towards midnight, the discreet Kadiga listened from the balcony of a window that looked into the garden. Hussein Baba, the renegado, was already below, and gave the appointed signal.

The duenna fastened the end of a ladder of ropes to the balcony, lowered it into the garden, and descended. The two elder Princesses followed her with beating hearts; but when it came to the turn of the youngest Princess, Zorahayda, she hesitated, and trembled. Several times she ventured a delicate little foot upon the ladder, and as often drew it back, while her poor little heart fluttered more and more the longer she delayed. She cast a wistful look back into the silken chamber; she had lived in it, to be sure, like a bird in a cage; but within it she was secure; who could tell what danger might beset her should she flutter forth into the wide world? Now she bethought herself of the gallant Christian lover, and her little foot was instantly upon the ladder; and anon she thought of her father, and shrank back.

In vain her sisters implored, the duenna scolded, and the renegado reviled beneath the balcony; the gentle little Moorish maid stood doubting and wavering on the verge of elopement; tempted by the sweetness of the sin, but terrified at its perils.

Every moment increased the risk of discovery. A distant tramp was heard. "The patrols are walking the rounds," cried the renegado; "if we linger we perish. Princess, descend instantly, or we leave you."

Zorahayda was for a moment in fearful agitation; then loosening the ladder of ropes, with desperate resolution she flung it from the balcony.

"It is decided!" cried she, "flight is now out of my power! Allah guide and bless ye, my sisters!"

The two eldest Princesses were shocked at the thought of leaving her behind, and would fain have lingered, but the patrol was advancing; the regenado was furious, and they were hurried away to the subterranean passage. They groped their way through a fearful labyrinth, cut through the heart of the mountain, and succeeded in reaching, undiscovered, an iron gate that opened on the outside of the walls. The Spanish cavaliers were waiting to receive them disguised as Moorish soldiers of the guard, commanded by the renegado.

The lover of Zorahayda was frantic when he learned that she had refused to leave the tower; but there was

Digitized by Google

"Allah guide and bless ye, my sisters."

no time to waste in lamentations. The Princesses were placed behind their lovers, the discreet Kadiga mounted behind the renegado, and all set off at a round pace in the direction of the pass of Lope, which leads through the mountains towards Cordova.

They had not proceeded far when they heard the noise of drums and trumpets from the battlements of the Alhambra.

"Our flight is discovered," said the renegado.

"We have fleet steeds, the night is dark, and we may distance all pursuit," replied the cavaliers.

They put spurs to their horses, and scoured across the Vega. They reached the foot of the mountain of Elvira, which stretches like a promontory into the plain. The renegado paused and listened. "As yet," said he, "there is no one on our track, we shall make good our escape to the mountains." While he spoke, a pale fire sprang up in a light haze on the top of the watch tower of the Alhambra.

"Confusion!" cried the renegado, "that fire will put all the guards of the passes on the alert. Away! away! Spur like mad—there is no time to be lost."

Away they dashed—the clattering of their horses hoofs echoed from rock to rock, as they swept along the road that skirts the rocky mountain of Elvira. As they galloped on, they beheld that the pale fire of the Alhambra was answered in every direction; light after light blazed on the Atalayas, or watch-towers of the mountains.

"Forward! forward!" cried the renegado: "to the bridge! to the bridge, before the alarm has reached there!"

They doubled the promontory of the mountains, and arrived in sight of the famous Puente del Pinos, that crosses a rushing stream often dyed with Christian and Moslem blood. To their confusion, the tower on the bridge blazed with lights and glittered with armed men. The renegado pulled up his steed, rose in his stirrups and looked about him for a moment; then beckoning to the cavaliers, he struck off from the road, skirted the river for some distance, and then dashed into its waters.

The cavaliers called upon the Princesses to cling to them, and did the same. They were borne for some distance down the rapid current, the surges roared round them, but the beautiful Princesses clung to their Christian knights, and never uttered a complaint. The cavaliers attained the opposite bank in safety and were conducted by the renegado, by rude and unfrequented paths, and wild barrancos, through the heart of the mountains, so as to avoid all the regular passes.

In a word, they succeeded in reaching the ancient city of Cordova; where their restoration to their country and friends was celebrated with great rejoicings, for they were of the noblest families. The beautiful Princesses were forthwith received into the bosom of the Church, and, after being in all due form made regular Christians, were rendered happy wives.

In our hurry to make good the escape of the Princesses across the river, and up the mountains, we forgot to mention the fate of the discreet Kadiga. She had clung like a cat to Hussein Baba, in the scamper across the Vega, screaming at every bound, and drawing many an imprecation from the whiskered renegado; but when he prepared to plunge his steed into the river, her terror knew no bounds. "Grasp me not so tightly," cried Hussein Baba; "hold on by my belt and fear nothing." She held firmly with both hands by the leathern belt that girded the broad-backed renegado; but when he halted with the cavaliers to take breath on the mountain summit, the duenna was no longer to be seen.

"What has become of Kadiga?" cried the Princesses in alarm.

"Allah alone knows!" replied the renegado; "my belt came off when in the midst of the river, and Kadiga was swept with it down the stream. The will of Allah be done! but it was an embroidered belt, and of great price."

There was no time to waste in idle regrets; yet bitterly did the Princesses bewail the loss of their discreet counsellor. That excellent old woman, however, did not lose more than half of her nine lives in the stream; a fisherman, who was drawing his nets some distance down the stream, brought her to land, and was not a little astonished at his miraculous draught. What further became of the discreet Kadiga the legend does not mention; certain it is that she evinced her discretion in never venturing within the reach of Mohamed the Left-handed.

Looking mournfully towards the mountains.

Almost as little is known of the conduct of that sagacious monarch when he discovered the escape of his daughters, and the deceit practised upon him by the most faithful of servants. It was the only instance in which he had called in the aid of counsel, and he was never afterwards known to be guilty of a similar weakness.

Digitized by Google

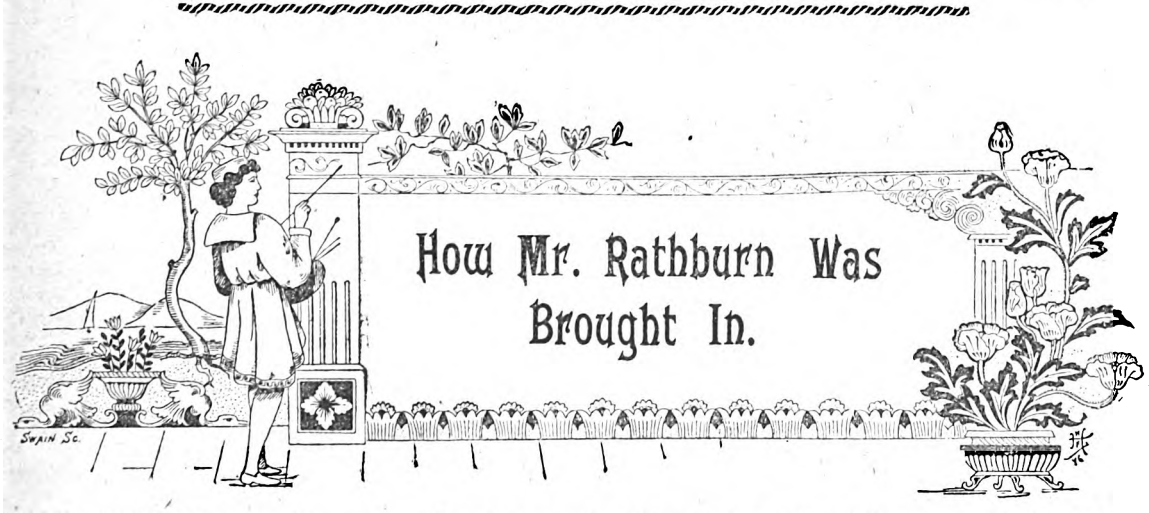
He took good care, however, to guard his remaining daughter, who had no disposition to elope; it is thought indeed, that she secretly repented having remained behind.

Now and then she was seen leaning on the battlements of the tower and looking mournfully towards the mountains in the direction of Cordova, and sometimes the notes of her lute were heard accompanying plaintive ditties, in which she was said to lament the loss of her sisters and her lover, and to bewail her solitary life.

She died young, and, according to popular rumour, was buried in a vault beneath the tower; and her untimely fate has given rise to more than one traditionary fable.

BADEM GOUGE.



RATHBURN paced the room with noiseless tread, now and then stopping to look at the tossing figure of the boy upon the cot or to listen to the words he spoke in his delirium.

Once he thought he caught the sounds of hoofs upon the trail, and he halted abruptly as his hand stole beneath the tails of his long English coat.

Mr. Rathburn's nerves were unstrung by the strain imposed upon them by recent and painful events. As he had expressed it to himself half a hundred times that day, "The gentleman who brings me in, whether it's afoot or in a pine box, goes just five thousand dollars to the good," and each time his thoughts had reverted to the powerful inducement the general public had to "bring him in," his hand had stolen beneath the tails of his long English coat; and the comfort he derived from so doing enabled him to say, "It won't be the first who tries, nor the first six who try, but the seventh gets the pot."

Mr. Rathburn had left Denver the morning previous in great and pressing haste, and with a careful avoidance of human kind. He had never been a social man, and the reward of five thousand dollars which was "out" for the man who would bring him in only served to intensify the natural austerity of his character.

The difficulties which beset Mr. Rathburn arose indirectly out of a quiet little game of poker, when the stakes had been high, and when the game had ended (two gentlemen going broke), the tempers of all concerned had been even higher than the stakes.

Mr. Rathburn's honour had been called into question. Certain remarks, chiefly notable because of their extreme brevity and almost brutal frankness, had been directed at him.

What followed was hasty and unpremeditated.

Now that time had given opportunity for reflection, Mr. Rathburn consoled himself with the thought that it was in self-defence. In his view of the matter he stood at variance with that of the public, which was "wilful murder."

Fear of public sentiment had, however, never been a potent factor in Mr. Rathburn's career, but now, for the first time in his life, this sentiment of disapproval was backed by money, and he was aware that several bands of men were patrolling the country, and that the various individuals composing those bands were anxious to get within speaking, or, to be more exact, shooting distance of him.

Rathburn had been making the best of his way over the range that afternoon in the usual unostentatious manner of a man fleeing from justice, when young Gordon saw him from his ranch near the trail and rushed in pursuit. Young Gordon will never know how near he was to death, for Mr. Rathburn turned and faced him, his hand beneath the tails of his long English coat. As a general thing, when people saw Mr. Rathburn's hand disappear behind him, they left precipitately, for that motion and the one which followed it were known to be singularly fatal to human life.

Young Gordon, in ignorance of this fact, had continued his approach, which after all was the best and safest thing he could have done, for Rathburn got a view of his face, and being a student of faces, he instantly decided that young Gordon was not looking for trouble.

Digitized by Google

The news of Mr. Rathburn's latest shooting affray had not reached the Foot Hill Ranch, and young Gordon did not know that the Governor of Colorado had deemed it expedient to offer a large reward to the man who would put a check upon Mr. Rathburn's further independent action and hand him over to the proper authorities in Denver. Whether or not Mr. Rathburn was to be turned in alive or dead was left to the taste and judgment of his captor; the prevailing tone of the proclamation suggested, however, that Mr. Rathburn dead was easier to handle than Mr. Rathburn alive, and at present there were bets pending as to the probable appearance Mr. Rathburn would present to the community when on view at the undertaker's shop; for the opinion that he was a "goner" was strong.

Young Gordon's face, white and drawn with sorrow and apprehension, was more eloquent than any words. His brother was sick—dying for all he knew. Would Rathburn remain at the ranch while he went for a doctor? He dared not leave his brother alone. Would Rathburn remain until morning?

Mr. Rathburn had looked down the trail. He was quite sure that somewhere behind him were a number of enterprising gentlemen, and that the reward of five thousand dollars had stimulated a degree of activity which would be his ruin if he lingered. He looked at the mountains beyond, which, when reached, promised safety, and they were very near.

An elevation and generosity of conception characterised many of Mr. Rathburn's acts. Outside of his profession, and when removed from the unworthy and corrupting influence of the flesh, he was not without a certain nobility of soul.

He cast one longing look at the mountains, wavered, and was lost.

Just ten minutes later young Gordon was galloping down the trail at breakneck speed, while Mr. Rathburn remained in attendance upon the sick boy.

As long as there was light in the sky he had turned frequently to the window, and followed with his eyes the dusty streak of grey across the range which marked the windings of the trail, but from without the distance there came neither sound nor sight of life.

By turns, as the night wore on, Mr. Rathburn was nervous and reflective, now sitting in a chair beside the cot, now pacing the floor restlessly. The present experience was a new one for him. To be sure, at various periods of his eventful and not entirely blameless life he had found it both safe and necessary to deprive certain localities of his presence. Perhaps the necessity would again occur if he succeeded in spite of the delay in making good his escape; but he was not prying into the future, the present was enough for him.

It was not long before he had forgotten his own troubles in his interest in the boy upon the cot, and it was borne upon his consciousness that the boy was very ill indeed, and that his fever had reached a crisis that unless a change for the better came before morning he would no longer need the doctor's aid.

The boy was very young, sixteen or seventeen at most.

Mr. Rathburn smoothed his pillow with gentle touch, and seating himself beside the cot took the boy's hand in his own. The boy tossed to and fro, his eyes open and glassy, his skin hot and burning. Mr. Rathburn placed his disengaged hand upon the boy's brow and set himself to work to control and quiet his ravings by his own force of will.

The hours wore on. One, two, three. The little clock on the shelf beside the door ticked them off; still the boy tossed from side to side. But the watcher noticed that from time to time there came moments of quiet to the sufferer. They grew in length and frequency as the hours passed.

"We are getting the better of it," murmured Rathburn hopefully.

"On the whole I am not sorry I stayed."

The hands of the clock were pointing to four, and the cold grey of dawn was stealing over the range shot with rays of light in the east, when Mr. Rathburn pushed back his chair.

The boy was sleeping peacefully, his breath coming soft and regular. For the first time that night Mr. Rathburn discovered that he himself was both tired and sleepy.

He pushed back his chair until he reached the centre of the room, then bringing his feet to an equal elevation with his head by means of a table, he, too, slept.

The sunlight was streaming into the room when sounds on the trail aroused him.

He awoke with a start.

His first glance was at the boy, who was still sleeping. Then he rose and walked to the door.

Four men were cautiously approaching the house, while a fifth held the horses of the party.

Mr. Rathburn recognised the sheriff of Arapahoe County and his deputies, and his hand stole beneath the tails of his long English coat.

He remembered the sleeping boy upon the cot.

Mr. Rathburn stepped into the yard.

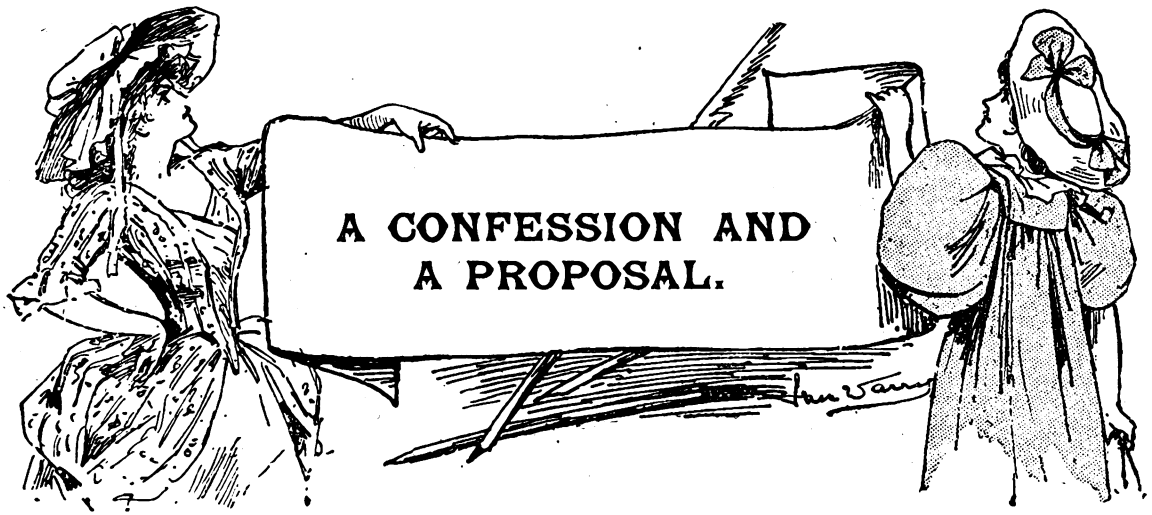
"Hush. Don't shoot," he said softly, "I give myself up."

VAUGHAN KESTER.

KEY TO JUMBLED STORY.—No. 16.

110	233	14	57	222	25	174	240	182
181	125	74	160	156	63	138	29	239
237	163	38	45	227	165	67	122	154
59	104	66	197	241	184	180	209	35
198	17	103	23	169	194	202	224	90
52	82	13	119	229	211	60	80	49
186	127	2	129	120	166	200	179	71
75	30	175	203	28	147	215	141	83
116	51	1	192	226	86	94	143	126
231	195	6	22	232	133	7	81	213
140	32	46	53	167	212	85	199	41
68	89	204	149	135	123	44	69	70
58	78	21	100	230	12	189	168	130
54	79	24	42	19	117	107	176	164
173	16	210	159	188	193	144	225	37
27	65	161	43	216	187	162	151	39
47	93	26	177	18	5	155	50	153
158	56	62	136	92	132	190	142	205
9	76	114	11	220	185	105	221	36
10	118	73	106	178	235	217	97	148
150	91	112	109	170	201	113	234	214
124	102	8	108	96	15	48	208	137
98	219	61	171	207	55	157	238	146
223	34	101	20	145	99	131	152	218
3	139	64	236	4	121	33	128	72
228	40	115	88	196	191	172	206	242
87	84	134	183	111	31	95	77

Digitized by Google



A CONFESSION AND A PROPOSAL.

"ONE of these powders at bed-time, and, if the patient sleeps well, do not disturb him. I will call round in the morning. Good-night."

"Good-night," replied the nurse; and I, Stephen Marsh, physician, buttoned my overcoat closely about my neck, preparatory to facing a sharp, blustering, wintry wind, that was sweeping through the streets of the little town of Baley and moaning about the corners and the chimney-tops with that peculiar sound which heralds the arrival of winter.

My patient was an old man, rich and single, and eccentric. He lay helpless and lonely in his great house, attended by hired servants, and looked in upon occasionally by a maiden sister, scarcely less sour and cold than himself, who shared his home. The cheerless grandeur of the house oppressed me. And the unsympathetic attendance of the hired nurse aroused my impatience, and it was with a feeling of gloom that I took my way homeward through the early shades of the tempestuous night.

Homeward did I say? Well, if a bare, cold room, with a fire-place, chair, and table, could be called home, then I was going home; for I lived in lodgings.

Reaching my own particular den, I turned on the gas at full glow, kicked the smouldering fire into a blaze, tossed my overcoat into a closet, and throwing myself into a chair, placed my feet upon the table, and proceeded to extract comfort from a cigar, while I ruminated upon the baseness of mankind, and the hollow and unsatisfactory conditions of things generally.

I was a bachelor, though I had no idea then that I was an object of commiseration on that account, and though I had been ten years in practice in the town, the marriageable women that I could be said to know socially I could count on my fingers; and not one of them had ever caused my heart to beat a whit faster, nor had their charms filled me with any desire for possession.

My profession was my world; my home my wife, and my books and cigars my children; and, hitherto, they had been adequate to my needs.

But somehow the gruesome image of that old man, lying there amid his cheerless luxury, unloved, unloving, and despised even by his servants, clung to my mind, and I fancied myself at his age in the same situation.

What was to hinder? Here I was at middle age even now growing selfish and morose. Hoarding money too; already there was a goodly pile of it to my credit at the bank, and it was with a great feeling of satisfaction that I added generous sums to it from time to time. What I was going to do with it? Build a hospital? Lose it in the interest of science?

Something suggested, "Build a home with it." What! a home like a miser? "No, a home with wife and children in it." Bah! I ran over in my mind the women I knew. Extravagant display of charms; affected manners, effusive small-talk that bores one to death. Oh, no; their society would drive me frantic.

"Give it to the poor," suggested the voice. The poor! What poor? The whining mendicant at the corner? The pilfering, profane gamins of the street? The bleareyed old women of the stalls, smelling of tobacco and whisky? The labouring class who are out of work? The worthy poor? working girls, widows with children? Their woes are exaggerated; the girls are well-dressed, impudent, saucy. They are comfortable, even if they cannot have everything they want. No; my money is my own. Women are silly, children are an abhorrence. I will not be bothered with either. I will found an institute and spend my money in the interest of medical science. And, throwing away the stump of my cigar, I scowled at the hearth, where the fire had gone out, and picking up my hat I started to seek diversion in the streets, and, perhaps, something else to drive away the blues that had got such a fast hold of me. Just as I reached the stair-landing a shrill scream rang out from a room beyond the hall; a door opened, and a girlish form came hurriedly towards me.

"Oh, Doctor," she cried, "do come to our rooms. My mother—oh, come quickly."

I followed her as she returned through the door, into a cosy-looking room. A grey-haired, regal-looking woman was lying upon a couch apparently in a dead swoon. I went at once to her assistance, while the girl, with a look of pathetic terror on her face, assisted me with brave but trembling hands. Meanwhile she told me that her mother had been ailing for some weeks with a nervous prostration, but that she had never been like this before.

"I am so thankful," she exclaimed, when the invalid had been restored to consciousness, "that you were so near."

Digitized by Google

"I am very glad, indeed," I replied, "that you met me in time. I was just going out."

"I thank you so much for your assistance," she said sweetly. And then I noticed, as she looked up at me, what great, pathetic, soulful eyes she had, and what a sweet, brave, patient face.

Just then the invalid opened her heavy eyes and looked up, and asked faintly:

"What is it, Agnes? Did I faint?"

"Yes, mother dear: but you are better now. This is Dr. Marsh, mother. I was a little frightened, and called him in."

"You were very kind, sir; I hope I am not going to be ill," said the invalid, speaking to me.

"I think not, madam," I said, as hopefully as I could. "Your system seems a trifle weakened, as by some over-exertion. I think that a few days of entire rest, a good nourishing diet, and a few simple medicines which I will prepare for you to-morrow, will restore you."

As I spoke I caught a swift glance as it passed between mother and daughter, a glance which seemed to express a trifle of dismay and much of anxiety.

As I lingered a few moments to note the symptoms of my patient, I glanced about the room with feelings of curious interest in these newly-found neighbours. The room was exquisitely cosy, and full of sweet feminine touches; but my masculine mind could not distinguish whether the lace curtains at the windows were of silk or cheap cotton, or whether the bright carpet was moquette or an imitation.

I knew that everything was in perfect order, and pervaded with a home-like air, that no bachelor with millions at his disposal could produce. But I had a vague idea that it was cheap, very cheap. I knew the girl's dress was of calico, and yet there was a fit, a hang, a what-do-you-call-it air about it that many a tea-gowned girl might strive vainly to attain. Yes, they were poor, I concluded—comfortably poor.

Evidently they had seen better days, for no two such queenly and self-possessed women could ever have known any real grinding poverty, such as hunger, cold, and the like. Such poverty degrades, and these women bore the stamp of highest culture and refinement.

I finally rose to go, finding no further excuse for lingering.

"And what is your fee, sir?" asked Agnes, looking up at me with such a strange sensation of uneasiness somehow.

"Ten-and-six," I said, simply, because I could think of no way to refuse the customary fee.

She took a tiny purse from her pocket, and handed me two little coins as carelessly as though there were thousands at the back of it.

But there was no rattle of any other in the purse, and it was too small to contain any notes. I took the money mechanically and bade her summon me if her mother grew worse, and said "good-night."

"Good-night," she said with a smile, "and thank you for coming."

Ere I crossed the hall I found I had left my cane. I turned back at once. The door was ajar. I lifted my hand to knock, when I caught sight of Agnes, standing by the table in the lamplight, the little purse in her hand, and a look of absolute terror on her face.

"The last sixpence!" I heard her murmur, as she threw the purse on the table. "Oh, what shall I do?"

I hurried away to my rooms. The two little coins were still in my hand burning and stinging my palm. How I hated them and myself at that moment. How could I return them to her? I must do it some way at once.

Stepping back into the hall, I tramped loudly, and, approaching her door, knocked.

"Pardon me!" I said, as Agnes appeared; "but I believe I left my cane."

"You did," she replied, handing it to me.

I took the cane. "Miss—ah! Miss," I stammered; and as the girl raised her face to listen, it seemed as though she were looking down upon me. "I hope—I—that is—I trust you will not—hesitate to call me if your mother should grow worse in the night."

"I will not, I assure you, and thank you."

I went back to my rooms, feeling somehow that I had grown some inches smaller in stature. Heavens! how that hateful money burned in my hand. And yet, for my life, I could not have offered them to that proud girl. They were mine. I had earned them. She would have regarded them as nothing less than charity, and I could scarcely dare offer that to either of those women.

They were comfortably poor—ah!

I went to bed to toss and dream, and listen, at intervals, half hoping to hear a timid knock at the door; I was not called, however.

Neither was I the next day.

I hung around my room nearly all the morning, but received no summons from the neighbours across the hall, nor did I catch any glimpse of Agnes. In the afternoon I went to call on Anson Sprague, and found him grim and gloomy as ever. I made my visit short.

When I returned I met Agnes on the stairs, and but for the experience of the previous evening, I should have taken her for the cherished daughter of some aristocratic family. I inquired after the mother, and was informed that she was not much better. And I could see that the girl was anxious and troubled, yet she did not ask me to call. How could she, when she knew I should demand ten-and-six, and she had already given me her "last sixpence"?

She carried a package in her hand, and as she passed out into the street, I followed. I kept her easily in sight for several streets, until she crossed a bridge which led into a different portion of the town. I still followed, and was not surprised when at last she entered a pawnshop. When she came out again she no longer carried the parcel. Turning homeward again, she entered a grocer's, and later emerged, carrying several small bundles.

I went back to my rooms and determined upon a plan of action. After a while I heard her climb wearily up the stairs and pass into her room.

I waited an hour and then went to their door and knocked. Agnes admitted me, seeming half glad, half embarrassed, and led me at once to her mother, who still lay upon the couch.

By her side stood a little table, upon which I noticed a dish or two, which Agnes hurriedly carried away. The mother looked pale and distressed; but Agnes's proud face betrayed no emotion except concern for the invalid.

"As you have not sent for me," I said carelessly, "I have taken the liberty of calling in a neighbourly way."

"You are very kind," said Agnes, with a smile that lit up the seriousness of her face like sunshine.

Digitized by Google

The mother smiled too, a very languid, tired smile. She had the same high-bred countenance as her daughter, and her hair lay in silver masses above her white temples.

She was a very beautiful woman, but such an expression of utter weariness I had never seen on a human countenance.

"Will you please tell me what you think of mamma's case, doctor?" asked Agnes.

"Looks like a case of"—starvation I had almost said—"entire prostration—over-work—over-worry—something of the kind. It is a case in which little medicine is required or desirable. Plenty of indulgent nursing, entire absence of care, and the most nourishing food that can be procured." Here I caught a look of pain on Agnes's face, but I went on heartlessly: "Some choice wine would be beneficial, and fruits, if it is necessary to tempt her appetite. She seems much debilitated, and needs a toning up."

Agnes remained silent, but the mother spoke with a forced cheerfulness:

"I am sure I shall do very nicely. Agnes is a capital nurse, and I have no doubt I shall be entirely recovered in a few days. Thank you for your advice."

I rose to go. Agnes rose too, still silent, and avoided my eyes.

"I will prepare a mild stimulant, which your mother will find beneficial," I said. "Will you come for it in the morning at nine?"

"Yes, I will come," she answered.

She came punctually at nine, half to my surprise—came in with a brave smile, strangely at variance with the dark shadows and the tired look about her eyes. I handed her a chair, but she refused to sit down.

"Sit down, please," I said rather peremptorily. "I have something to say to you—a confession to make; and I hope you will willingly absolve my crime, for I assure you it was unintentional."

"A confession!" she exclaimed, dropping into the chair.

"Yes. You will remember that I went back after my cane the night I first called to see your mother?"

"Yes."

"Well, I overheard your exclamation, as you stood with your purse in your hand, from which you had just given me 'the last sixpence.'"

"You did!" she exclaimed, while her face flushed hotly.

"I did. And, further, when you went out yesterday I had the meanness to follow you. You went to a pawnshop, you stopped at a grocer's to purchase food, you returned home."

"Well, sir, and what is all this to you?" she exclaimed, with angry eyes and quivering lips. "What business had you following me?"

"None, whatever," I said. "I told you I committed a crime, and asked you to forgive me at the start. Please be calm and hear me out, and I will try to convince you that I did not act with any desire to pry into your private affairs."

Under the force of my stronger will and my sincerity she sank back in the chair.

"Miss Agnes," I said, "if you are in embarrassed circumstances, I assure you that both you and your mother have my warmest sympathy, and I would be only too glad to do you any service." The half-sovereign and the sixpence lay on the table. "If you knew how I hated the sight of them," I said. "If you knew how small—how miserably mean I felt; how they haunted me and taunted me the whole night after I heard you say that, I am sure you would forgive my seeming impertinence.

"Miss Agnes, I could never clothe my meaning in seductive words. If a man is dying and asks me for the truth, I give it to him. I am nothing if not blunt, or, at least, plain; but I claim to be an honest man and a gentleman, and if you care to give me your confidence, you will not find it misplaced. The causes of your mother's present condition are over-worry and poor living. She needs all that I have told you, and must have it. If you desire it I will take her case professionally, furnish all medicines and other necessities, and you can repay me at your leisure."

I paused, and waited for a reply.

"You are extremely kind, doctor, and I believe you sincere," she said, in a voice which tried hard not to break down. "You must pardon my hasty temper. We are extremely poor, mother and I, but heretofore I have made comfortable wages at my occupation as bookbinder, but a change in the firm a few weeks ago threw me out of employment. But I am still searching every day. I will find something to do, surely, and if you will attend to mamma, it will take such a load off my heart; and, oh! doctor, I thank you so much. I never could tell anybody before," and the proud head went down on the table with a sob, while I—well, I felt as any man does, I suppose, when he sees a woman cry.

It didn't last long. She lifted her face with a smile, and rose to go, after again expressing her thanks.

"Stay," I said. "Would you go and read to an invalid—one of my patients—for a few hours each afternoon, for a compensation?"

"Ah, yes," she replied eagerly. "Indeed I would be glad to."

Accordingly, after that each afternoon found Agnes reading sonnets and love-stories to old Anson Sprague, at the rate of a good round sum per hour, and the old man thrived so well under this new treatment that I found myself in a fair way to lose my wealthy patient.

It happened sometimes that we walked home together; and to atone, as it were, for leaving the mother alone so much through the day, we gave her double company in the evening.

One chill night, as we hurried home through the wind, walking close together that we could better breast the storm, Agnes told me with a little embarrassed laugh that Anson Sprague had that day asked her to be his wife.

I stopped her short in the middle of a crossing.

"Heavens! What did you tell him?"

She laughed again—a tantalising little laugh that she had learnt of late.

"I told him," she said (though I could never quite believe her), "that you had constituted yourself my guardian; I would consult you about it, and abide by your decision."

"You did well, Agnes," I replied greatly relieved. "Darling, you are the sunshine of my life. I once made a confession to you, and now I make a proposal. Sweet one, do I ask in vain?"

* * * * *

We were married; and, what with the building of a home, with the dainty furnishings of an invalid's chamber, with milliner's bills, and something aside for the future little shoes and stockings, and my wife's increasing demands for charity funds, the medical institute is still a castle in the air, and the blues have gone to inhabit it.

ESTHER NOANES.

Digitized by Google

HOW MADAME PERROTT'S HAIR TURNED WHITE.

It was in Paris, in the year 18—, Madame Perrott, twenty years of age, sat waiting impatiently for her maid, whose task it was to undo the wonderful superstructure of hair which had excited so much admiration at the dinner from which the lady had just returned.

Every hair of all those golden braids and puffs grew on Madame Perrott's own head. It was the envy of every woman who really believed in it, and it was too great a task to unbind and comb it for the night with her own hands.

"Where was Felice? Why did she not come? She knew her duty; she had always been at her post before."

Madame Perrott rang the bell again.

"Send Felice to me at once," she said, as the servant opened the door.

"I have been searching for Felice ever since I received madame's directions," said the woman, in rather an injured tone. "I do not think that she can be in the house. Indeed, if madame will permit me, I think I can guess. The other servants have been talking for some time. Felice is in the habit of going out of evenings. Felice has a lover."

"Indeed," said Madame Perrott, who had some idea of propriety. "Well, pretty girls generally have beaux. Only she should not find him so fascinating as to forget her duties."

"If madame will permit a few more words, the servants say that this beau of Felice's is a gentleman—not a man of her own position," continued the old woman, "and that—but no matter; it is none of my business, only young girls were more prudent in my days."

"I will speak to Felice," said madame. "It was right of you to mention it."

Then she sank back in her chair and waited a little longer. She did not wait patiently, however, and she remembered afterwards that she felt very strangely. She was not a nervous person, her imagination was not strong, and she was in her own cosy room, pretty with paint and gilding, portraits of pretty women and china statuettes of belles and beaux in the costume of Louis the Fourteenth. Lace-curtained and gas-lit, the least ghostly place that one could fancy; and yet a gloom and dread, for which she had no words, began to settle down upon her. She shuddered, she grew cold, she dared not look behind her, she fancied strange voices were borne to her on the breeze, that lifted the curtains over the open windows.

In the darkest, most uncanny place, she could not have suffered more from these vague terrors, which were more poignant because she was totally unused to them.

In the adjoining room Monsieur Perrott and some old friends drank wine and played écarté.

She would have gone to them had she dared, but she dreaded the long corridor too much. She absolutely did not dare open the door.

Perhaps, indeed, she said to herself, these terrible feelings were really premonitions of evil. Someone who knew the value of the jewels she had worn that day might have followed her home, might be lurking outside the door, might be hidden even in the chamber—for instance, behind the great bed, with its lace hangings, or in the tall wardrobe. The idea of a black-visaged ruffian was so terribly vivid that Madame Perrott actually gave a little scream, and, seizing the small silver handbell which stood upon the table near her, rang it violently.

It was in this way that she was wont to summon Felice from her own little room. The servants only answered the bell which communicated with the kitchen, but Madame Perrott had now become too nervous to cross the room to touch it.

She rang the little silver bell. Tinkle, tinkle, tinkle! its voice rang in the air; tinkle, tinkle, tinkle! clink! as she dropped it on the table again; but as she did so, and looked over her shoulder towards the door, hoping that someone had heard it, the door opened and Felice entered slowly.

Her face was very pale; her large dark eyes were darker than ever. She made her little curtsey, and stood before Madame Perrott with her hands folded together.

"You have been a long while in coming," said Madame Perrott; "I have been waiting for you two hours. This must never happen again."

"No, madame," said Felice in a low voice, "never again."

"See that it does not," said madame, tossing her jewels upon her toilet-table, and beginning to disrobe herself. "My dressing-gown, Felice."

The girl already held it in her hands. Usually she was brisk and active in her movements; to-night she was strangely slow and solemn.

Digitized by Google

"If it were my shroud you could not be graver over it," cried Madame Perrott. "There, comb my hair and go; you are too frightfully solemn to endure any longer."

Felice took the comb in her hand, but did not smile.

"Is it madame's will that I should comb her hair?" she said.

"Of course," cried Madame Perrott.

"It is madame's will?" repeated Felice.

"Have you gone crazy, Felice?" cried Madame Perrott. "Have you not done it every night for a year?"

"If it be madame's will I must do it," said Felice in the same strange way, as she stepped behind the lady's chair.

Slowly the great masses of golden floss fell about the lady's shoulders. Softly the maid gathered them under her hands and began to pass the comb through them. As she did so Madame Perrott experienced such a shock as one receives from an electric battery.

"What a strange feeling!" she cried.

Again the comb entered her hair. Again she experienced the singular sensation.

"What are you doing to me, Felice?" she cried, starting to her feet. "What are you doing to me? You——"

But there was no one there; the door had not opened or shut. Felice had been standing behind her the instant before. Now she was gone. Gone where? Gone how? Madame Perrott turned. The dread of she knew not what was heavier than before; and, besides that, every hair on her head seemed to be rising at its roots, and she seemed conscious of every nerve in her body. She could neither scream nor run.

All that she could do was to drag herself to the bed and draw the coverlet over her head. Whether she fainted or lost consciousness she never knew.

It was late when she awoke; the sun streamed across the room. The hands of the alabaster clock upon the mantelpiece pointed to the hour of ten; but instead of the usual domestic rounds of the hour she was conscious of a strange bustle and confusion.

Resting her elbow on the pillow, she listened. She could distinguish her husband's voice and the shrill notes of the woman who had talked with her about her maid the night before, and she thought she heard the name Felice repeated in tones of horror more than once. At last she was certain. Felice, Felice—they were all talking about Felice. What was it? Why did he not come to her and tell her?

In a moment more the door opened, and Monsieur Perrott, wrapped in his quilted dressing-gown, came in. His face was very grave.

"You are awake, my love?" he asked.

"Yes, I am awake. What has happened?"

"You heard the noise, then? Yes, something has happened—something terrible. Your maid Felice is dead; she has taken poison. Her mother, a washerwoman, lives in the Rue St. Cyr. She went there yesterday afternoon, and this morning she was found dead in bed. The lamentations of the poor woman wakened me. She had brought a note which Felice had left for you Shall I read it?"

"Yes, mon ami," said Madame Perrott, trembling violently.

The husband went towards the window, and drew up the blind.

"Adored madame,"—(he began) "I shall never dress that beautiful hair again. I knew it when I arranged it an hour ago. When you return home, Felice will be dead. She is too miserable to live. Ah, madame, when you touch that little bell I have obeyed so long, it seems to me that my spirit must hear it, and come to you again. Amongst the strange thoughts in my distracted mind this one is very strong. Yes, it is possible I may return to you, though never in the flesh. Adieu, beloved mistress; pray that the soul of the miserable Felice may repose in peace."

"Henri!" cried Madame Perrott, with a scream. "Oh, Henri, this is terrible! Felice undressed my hair herself, at midnight. Felice, who was then dead. Come to me! Let me touch you! Save me from this great terror that is gathering about me!"

Monsieur Perrott flew to his wife's side. The light from the open window fell across the pillow. and over the beautiful head that lay upon it. He stared at it for a moment.

"Mon Dieu! my child!" he cried, amazed and horrified. "What has happened? Your hair has turned white!"

It was true; in all those flowing locks not one thread of gold now lingered. They were as white as snow.

And this is how Madame Perrott's hair turned white at the age of twenty, and she did not bleach it, as some folks pretend.

AGNES JEWLY.

You have probably noticed - - - - On the Second Page of Cover - A Coupon. -

This coupon may mean a difference of £100 to you, or to your neighbour. A similar one has appeared regularly every week in Short Stories and Pearson's Weekly since the beginning of January, and will continue to appear until the end of December.

Cut each of them out and keep them.

For to the reader who, on the 1st of January, 1897, sends in the greatest number, we are going to give

ONE HUNDRED SOVEREIGNS.

The best way to preserve them is to paste them into an exercise book, on one side of the paper only.

DO NOT SEND ANY IN BEFORE THE 1st OF JANUARY, 1897.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION. NO. 17.

THE first correct solution to hand was received from Mr. C. J. Lewis, jun., 7, Tonsley Place, Wandsworth, S.W. The provincial guinea goes to Mr. Geo. Humphreys, 19, Colville Street, Nottingham.

POST-CARD COMPETITION. NO. 19.

A GUINEA is offered to the first reader who discovers the longest word on pages 605 to 608, the letters of which will form an anagram of two words. Another guinea goes to the reader living more than 100 miles from London under the same conditions. Example: ELAPSED—Sad Peel.

Digitized by Google

Or, THE ROMANCE OF A LOST CONTINENT.

By GEO. C. WALLIS, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

SUMMARY.

ARNON'S memory of his early days begins at a time when he finds himself abandoned on the seashore, whence he discovers the cave of a band of pirates, by whom he is captured. Under the care of Didron the Chief he grows up as one of them, and on the death of the former he takes command. Viol is the daughter of Didron and marries Arnon, who, on one of his voyages, lands at Miropis and consults the Priest of the Spirit of Truth, from whom he learns that within a year and a half he will be a captive in a foreign land, and that he need not fear death until he has visited the Grotto of the Sleeper three times. On returning, he finds his ship burnt and men killed. After fighting he escapes, and meets and falls in love with Briseis, daughter of King Dulo X. of Atlantis, and to her he reveals his identity. Vichri, Briseis' cousin and lover, believes Arnon to be dead. For several months he lives at the Court; but the old roving spirit returns, and he sets out to discover the cave of treasure left by Didron and his band. On his return from an unsuccessful attempt, he finds his identity discovered by King Dulo, and is sent away as a galley slave. During his absence in a small boat up a creek on the Coast of Nubia, the ship is taken by rebels. Led by Arnon, the whole of the population, starving and fearing annihilation by the rebels, set out for another town. His followers are routed, and he is captured by Asos, an Egytian captain, by whom he is taken to Memphis. He saves from a leopard, Vesta, the daughter of a priest, and himself becomes a priest. He defeats a plot to dethrone the King, thereby gaining the favour of the latter, who is in ignorance of Arnon's former pirate life. Itaska, a woman whose love he rejects, discovers the story of his past, and is about to reveal it to the King, when Mitres, the father of Vesta, now married to Arnon, hears of her intention, and consults with Arnon.

CHAPTER XI.

ON THE STORMY SEA.

AT last I broke the spell, saying:

"There is no way out of the danger save by taking ship and leaving Khem, going I care not whither, so long as Vesta and yourself are with me."

"Take Vesta and go," the old man said, in a choking voice, "you have a swift ship on the great sea and can sail hence without suspicion, for the plotters will wait to act till you return, and I shall wish them joy of their waiting."

"But why not come with us?" I urged.

"I am a priest of Amun, a native of Egypt, and I should count it blackest treason to turn my back upon my King and country," he replied, with quiet dignity. "Nay, hear me out. Go, seek liberty and happiness in some other clime, with my daughter as your wife, and I will bide here to the end, for no man hath aught against me, and I would fain be embalmed and lie with my fathers."

Just then the door swung softly open, and Vesta entered, clad in a robe of faultless white, her fair hair rising from her head in a graceful crown, and love shining from her eyes. Her father groaned when he saw her.

"What ails thee, father, dear?" she asked, twining her soft arms round his grizzled neck.

"Only this, daughter," he said, "that to-morrow I say farewell to thee for ever."

"Wherefore?" said my fair, looking at me wonderingly.

I told her all my story, and what her father had overheard that morning in the Place of Council, and that we must sail thence on the morrow.

"But whither?" asked she.

Then I told them of the isles I had passed in the sea that we in Atlantis called the Eastern Ocean, but which from Egypt was to the south-west, and which could be reached, I doubted not, through the western strait of the Great Sea. I said that thither I would sail, and there, among that gentle race of islanders, find a safe haven in which to live and die in peace.

"And thou wilt go with me?" I asked of Vesta, though I had small need.

"Where thou goest, there will I go, husband," she answered. "It grieves me, though, that my father will not travel with us."

"Grieve not for me," said Mitres, though his face was hard set to hide his emotion, "I am safe and you two are in danger, so I must needs bear the sorrow when you are gone, and it will be tempered by the knowledge that I have saved you."

I left them, then, to go to the palace, where I sat at table with Pharaoh for the last time, and never before had I been so jovial in his presence, and never before so attentive to false Itaska, whose coldness melted swiftly under my flattering phrases. Asos was away on a distant mission, and the Queen but newly delivered of a son, so that the feast was not over-thronged that night.

As midnight neared, Mitres entered, and he, too, was never so brimful of quaint sayings and quaking mirth as at that last banquet I attended in the gilded room. I drank little wine but that of Mareotis, and once, when pledging Itaska in a draught of her favourite Thasian, I murmured:

"Seemeth that never till to-night have I looked on love with love's eyes."

She started out of her stately calm at that, her face flushing with the import of the words, and her hand sought mine, yet she said nothing.

"Did you know, fair one," I asked, "that to-morrow I sail for a pleasure cruise with my wife?"

She did not, and seemed surprised.

"Would you be glad," I whispered under my breath, "if this priest's daughter, of whom I am weary, were left behind in the sea-depths, that I might come back alone to bask in your smile?"

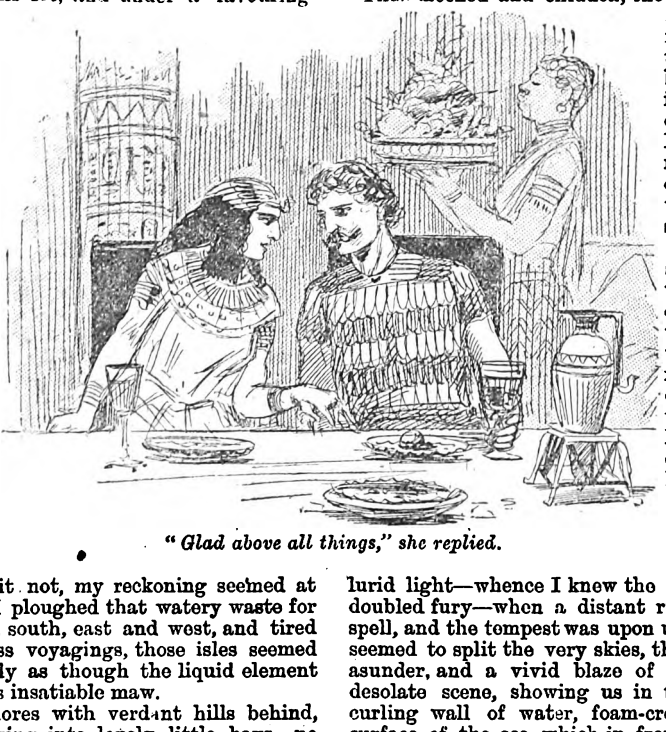
Digitized by Google

Her eyes flashed fire, and the hand that clasped mine burned with a sudden heat.

"Glad above all things," she replied, speaking low. "Art a bold wooer when you do begin, though tardy at beginning!" and then we said no more, except in the general talk.

Next morning I snatched a short sleep, and before the most of the citizens were abroad, took boat adown the Nile to where the Seamew lay. I shall never forget the mute sadness of that parting between Vesta and her father on the shore of the sluggish stream. Tears rolled down the old man's face as he embraced his daughter for the last time and saw us drifting away, leaving him alone in his land of mighty monuments and spacious temples. Down the river we swept with the current, Vesta and I, and that was the last we saw of him, standing there on the bank, waving his hand to us as long as our eyes could see. Then he was out of sight, and sweeping on, we came in due time to my vessel.

The crew were soon aboard and at their places, the anchor raised and the sails set, and under a favouring wind we stood out from the westernmost of old Nile's many mouths, and after coasting along the shore for a time, struck out northward, taking our last glimpse of the land of Khem as the evening sun sank beneath the leeward horizon in a blaze of golden glory.



"Glad above all things," she replied.

Then on sped the Seamew, ever keeping west by night and day, the men marvelling at my hurry, till we reached and passed the huge rock that rises up to the north of the strait, and emerged upon the boundless waters of that trackless sea upon whose bosom, somewhere I knew, reposed those fairy isles I sought, wherein to be at peace.

But as it had happened nearly a dozen years ago, when I searched for the treasure-cave and found it not, my reckoning seemed at fault again, and though I ploughed that watery waste for many weary weeks, north, south, east and west, and tired out my men with ceaseless voyagings, those isles seemed to have vanished as utterly as though the liquid element had gathered them into its insatiable maw.

No land, no shelving shores with verdant hills behind, no rippling streams pouring into lovely little bays, no mimic breakers on low, grey cliffs, no tiny boats nor long canoes with fair-skinned oarsmen, darting out of shady creeks, no smoke arising from the household fires of island villages.

Everywhere was water, water, water, until at last I lost my reckoning of the way we had gone, and the crew murmured openly as each day plunged us deeper in the unknown waste.

Then one day a gale arose. The wind blew with unabating force, and the Seamew shot forward like the bird whose name she bore, the spray flying from our stem and falling in harmless showers across our bows, the wind whistling through our rigging.

On we flew on the wings of the gale, the ropes singing in the breeze, and the spars humming.

The gale still grew in strength, veering round slowly to the north-east, that day and the next, and with the third sun had risen to a tearing tempest more terrible than any other I have known; so fierce its vigour, so high its rollers, so angry its hissing spray.

Our sails were furled and the helm lashed to keep the ship's head to the wind, and thus, bare-poled, wave-swept, reeling and staggering under the buffetings of the curling masses of white-flecked water and the mighty gusts of wind, the Seamew held her way, driven like a feather before the storm, her light hull now half-buried under the green billows, now falling headlong into the trough of the sea, now climbing the foaming crest of a liquid mountain, but ever righting herself and ever speeding on, with creaking timbers and straining cords.

My men, for the most part, had now lost heart, having never seen so wild a sea before, and Vesta clung to me in terror as the little vessel rocked and tossed, a helpless mite in the grasp of the cruel flood, but reckless as ever, now that I was in my element, I lashed my fair-haired dear to the stern-post, and stood by the helm, rallying my crew on their cowardice, and anon singing the rolling chant I had known in my early roving days.

Thus mocked and chidden, the Egyptians waxed wrath, many of them reviling me for having led them into the danger and going below to drown their fear in strong liquor, while others, amongst whom was Macis, remained on deck, mute, white faced, holding on to what came nearest to them, taking my scathing sneers in silence.

Now the wind ceased suddenly, the clouds thickened in an arch o'erhead, a patch of sky on the eastern horizon glowed with lurid light menacingly, and the air grew dreadfully oppressive in the darkening stillness. It was then, as near as I could calculate, about the hour of noon.

I had barely time to unlash the helm and put it hard round to bring the ship facing the point of lurid light—whence I knew the gale would come with redoubled fury—when a distant rumbling burst the awful spell, and the tempest was upon us with a mighty roar that seemed to split the very skies, the cloud-masses were riven asunder, and a vivid blaze of light lit up the wild and desolate scene, showing us in that one instant a great, curling wall of water, foam-crested, rushing along the surface of the sea, which in front was flattened down by the impetus of the hurricane's breath.

A few great drops fell pattering on the deck; then the thunder rolled again, the lightning flashed, and the roaring wall of water overtook us, shook us in its grip as an angry dog shakes a rat, and then passed on.

At last, having drunk themselves into a frenzy, the thirty Egyptians who had gone below came up, blaspheming and threatening as they staggered across the slippery deck, three of them, maddened into courage by drink and terror, flourishing their daggers at me as they came.

It was a fearful moment, for if I left the helm to swing loose we should be capsized, without a doubt, while to defend myself whilst holding it was impossible. Vesta swooned with fear.

"Back, madmen!" I cried hoarsely, "and sheath your knives! And you who are sober—seize them, for all are doomed if I let go the rudder."

The three wretches paid no heed to my entreaty, and the others were too fearful of their skins to stir a step upon the wave-washed boards.

Digitized by Google

"Your blood be on your own heads, then!" I cried, "put one foot forward and I let go!"

It was true that but for me they would not have come to this pass, but the misfortune fell on me equally with them. Had I reached the fair islands of my quest, I would have rewarded them handsomely, but fate having decreed otherwise, it was so ill to turn on me when I was doing my best, that I felt no pity for them when they put my life in danger.

With mocking laughs, and pitching steps, the three came on, knives uplifted, eyes glaring wildly; the others looking on in stupefied despair, not budging a step to my relief.

"Your blood be on your own heads!" I cried again, letting the tiller fly as it listed, drawing "Sunderer" from its sheath and laying the foremost traitor dead at my feet with one swift stroke.

The second hurled his dagger at me, and, passing my ear with an angry hiss, it was transfixed in the stern-post—for I was between him and the stern, then—and there stuck, but the length of a finger above Vesta's head. That wretch the sword made short work of, but the third crept round the mast with the cunning of insanity and was about to plunge his weapon into my back with all his force, when, like an intervention of the spirits, a brilliant blaze of light lit up the heavens, the mast was split from top to bottom with a loud crash, a strong smell of sulphur filled the air, and a lambent flame played on my sword and on the upraised dagger that I saw with a backward glance and shone upon the blade that gleamed above my dear one's head.

A moment only I saw all this, and the figure of the traitor, clothed in fire, when the blackness blotted out all sight, the thunder rolled, and with a grinding crash the guideless Seamew struck on a sunken rock!

She heeled over, began to fill rapidly, and a heavy sea washed across the slanting deck. To save myself I drove the sword into the timber on which I stood, and held on to it with all the strength of my iron fingers, and so good was "Sunderer's" steel, so powerful my grasp, that when the flood had drained away, I still hung there, safe.

That great flash and thunder roll was the climax of the storm, I think, for the sea calmed and the wind went down a short time after the ship struck.

I had now time to look around me, and saw Vesta standing where I had bound her—the dagger still sticking in the stern-post above—alive, but in an agony of dread. As for the crew, not one was left on board, all were swept into the pitiless sea, gone under for ever, lost through their own malice or apathy.

Assured of this and of the temporary stability of the vessel, I crept to Vesta's side, unloosened some of the cords, chafed her cold, wet hands, and seeing her eyes open, looking into mine with recognition, spoke words of courage and of comfort in her ear.

Night passed, and the day dawned, calm, smiling, sunny, as though the sky and sea had never worn an evil face, but had always been as they then were—bright and beautiful in their blue immensity. Not a sail was visible on the broad expanse, so that we two were alone with our thoughts on the solitary wreck.

"'Twere folly to stay here," I said, "for if the next storm does not send this smitten ship to the bottom, we shall die of thirst and hunger. We must make a raft as best we can."

Vesta assented to my plan, and so, after a good meal and a rehabilitation of our attire from the ship's store, we set to work in earnest, and it was wonderful how deft my Vesta's slender fingers were at tying the most incomprehensible knots in the thongs and cords with which we bound the decking planks together.

Having laden our new sea-going craft with as much food and water as she could carry—which was scanty enough—we put forth on the unknown waters, steering, by the sun and stars, a westerly course.

The sea continued calm, and the sky unclouded, and the straight downpouring of the burning solar rays told me that we moved in the tropic regions. Day succeeded night, and night followed on the heels of day, the sun curved slightly to the south at noon, showing that we drew north as well as west, and still the ring of sky and sea remained unbroken by a passing sail or a speck of land.

I rowed while Vesta steered, save when a favourable breeze let us put up our little sail to gain a spell of rest; and ever our stores lessened and lessened, till the water was well nigh gone.

Yet my fair Egyptian made no murmur, no complaint, bearing it all with a fortitude that amazed, and at the same time served to cheer me, for if a frail woman, born in the midst of luxury, could brave this hardship so well, surely I who had looked death in the face half-a-dozen times already could keep a stout heart through it all?

But at last one drink of water alone remained, and after that—all the horrors of unquenched thirst, or the fierce madness that follows on a draught of the salt-laden waves that danced about us in tantalising mockery.

Over that last drop of water we strove for a day, each desiring that the other should take it as the last chance of survival, and in the end, in consequence of my pleadings and violent threats, Vesta yielded to my wishes, though she did it grudgingly.

During the coolness of the night that followed I endured the thirst fairly well, but the next day, under the scorching heat, without a shadow beneath which to shelter, the agony became terrible, and Vesta, too, was little better than myself.

The sky seemed an arch of burning brass, and the sea a bath of molten silver, coruscating on the tops of its emerald hillocks with insufferable brilliancy, and dazzling our jaded eyes with its unceasing restlessness.

Two more days passed in excruciating suffering, and with throats parched, tongues blackened, and eyes bloodshot with straining over the changeless seascape, we sat upon our raft, food gone now as well as water, hope gone too, care nearly vanished, desperation bordering on frenzy the one remaining emotion that held us. Despite my warnings Vesta made several efforts to snatch a drink of the briny flood, and only my stronger arm prevented her.

Her head upon my arm in those sad, last moments—calm now the end was near—she lay and looked into my agonised face with love shining still from her sweet, confiding eyes.

"Say, darling," she whispered, her voice so low that I must bend to hear it, "say that you love me—now."

"Now more than I have ever done," I answered, the tears falling fast upon my cheeks, and scalding grimy paths down the brine that crusted them, "but tell me, Vesta, my dear one; tell me that you forgive me for bringing you to this."

She answered me, her tones scarce audible.

"'Tis not your doing, husband—but if it were—I would—forgive——" and the sentence died away.

I held her still, watching the changing of her features, which told as well as words how the spark of life flickered slowly to its end.

"It will not be a long farewell, sweet one," I said, "for soon I shall follow you."

Presently her frame quivered, her lips opened, and her eyes sought mine beseechingly.

"What is it?" I asked, bending low.

"Water! water!" she gasped, with a great effort.

Despairingly I shook my head, and then she seemed to recollect the melancholy situation.

"Husband—love—" she said, faintly, slowly, brokenly, "farewell—farewell——" and the soul fled to its home in the Shadow-Land. Frantically I called her name, vainly I begged for but one other word, hoarsely I cried aloud for help in my solitude and distress, but the dead answered not, and the murmur of a cooling, vaporous eastern breeze that now sprang up only served to mock my misery.

Digitized by Google

Then I arose upon the raft with clenched hands and blazing eyes, and shaking my arms at the sky I cursed the spirits and the gods with all the energy that my frenzied tongue could use; I cursed them again and again, blaspheming horribly; I cursed all whom I had known—the false Briseis, the treacherous Sothi, the rebel Nubians, Itaska the wife of Asos, Sethos the plotter, and most of all the coward drunken crew whose act had brought things to this pass: long and fiercely I stood and raved, till my throat refused to utter the words that strove for speech, till the sweat stood in beads upon my body, till my head seemed in a whirl of fire, and I sank, exhausted, upon the raft, in a deathlike stupor.

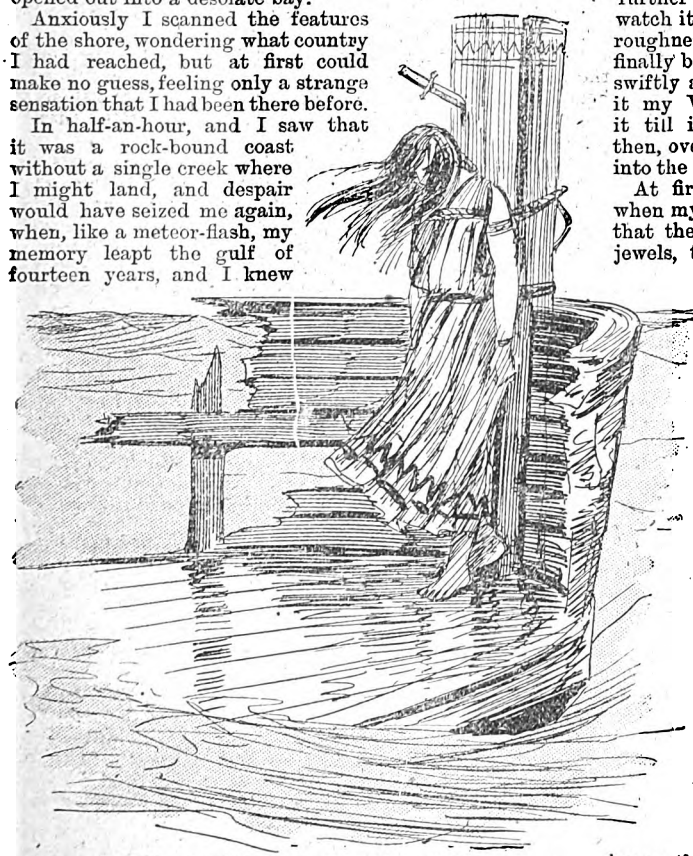
CHAPTER XII.

The Princess of Aidè.

I woke from the stupor to find the noonday sun blazing down upon me with maddening fierceness, and the dark outlines of a coast of some sort looming up out of the waters right ahead. Hope, which had left me, now returned, and looking not at that which lay on the raft beside me, I pulled with all my strength towards the land, which, as I neared, opened out into a desolate bay.

Anxiously I scanned the features of the shore, wondering what country I had reached, but at first could make no guess, feeling only a strange sensation that I had been there before.

In half-an-hour, and I saw that it was a rock-bound coast without a single creek where I might land, and despair would have seized me again, when, like a meteor-flash, my memory leapt the gulf of fourteen years, and I knew that I was in the solitary bay where the pirate's secret treasure cave was!



Vesta standing where I had bound her.

Well enough, then, I remembered those curving rocks, stretching out into the sea on either hand in sullen greyness, well I knew those frowning crags, and well recalled those rough-hewn stairs on the steep cliff-face! Here, after many years of wandering, I was cast up by the sea, finding, now I sought it not, the object of a fruitless quest.

Nearer and nearer drew the raft, and then I saw what made me rub my eyes and stare again with sheer amazement. The tide was just on the turn at that instant, and instead of merely washing the lowest step, as it had used when I knew it last, now covered the topmost stair but two, and I could reach the cave floor from the flat craft on which I stood!

Wondering, and for the moment forgetting all else in my curiosity, I pulled myself into the cool cavern and looked round. Truly, the sea had risen or the land sunk, for the two outstretching arms of that deserted bay were scarcely half their former length, and even when the tide was at its lowest ebb the waves must have dashed, not upon the narrow strip of sand that had once been there, but against the rugged stones above.

Glancing down I saw to my dismay that the raft, being unfastened, was slowly sheering off the rock and tossing perilously near the current, which, as of old, swept into and out of the bay in a mighty curve under the beetling crags.

I made a great effort to reach it with my foot, in vain! I let down a cord with hook attached, which I found in the cave, but by then the raft had veered round still further out of my grasp, and I was forced to stand and watch it drifting slowly away, now nearing some projecting roughness in the cliff, now recoiling with the shock, and finally being caught in the outgoing current and carried swiftly away into the vastness beyond my ken, bearing with it my Vesta, sleeping her last, long sleep. I watched it till it faded into the indistinguishable distance, and then, overcome by the pangs of thirst and hunger, turned into the cave.

At first I saw only the glitter of precious stones, but when my eyes grew accustomed to the dimness, I perceived that the wooden shelves, the earthern jars, the boxes of jewels, the bars of solid gold, the bales of costly drapery, were all there, undisturbed by aught save the hand of time, since I had last seen them.

Eagerly I searched the earthern jars for water, but found none, so was forced to grope my way to the inmost recesses of that gloomy retreat, to drink out of the slimy little pool in the lowest part where the rain that percolated through the rocky roof collected.

This I drank with infinite relish, thereafter making a scanty meal of such of the stored nuts as were not dried to dust, then falling into a long, sound sleep, to wake invigorated, refreshed, hopeful, and ready for whatever fortune the future might hold for me.

I was not at all concerned regarding my means of exit from the cave; it was only needful to dig a slanting tunnel upwards at the back, with some of the implements ready to my hand, for at one point, judging from the position of the cave and the trend of the cliff-top, the thickness of the roof could not be more than the height of a man.

There I attacked the rock when my strength had somewhat returned, and after a spell of arm-aching labour, dragged myself into the outer air through the narrow hole I made.

A single glance sufficed to show that the tunnel emerged upon a wind-swept, treeless plateau, covered with a kind of low-growing brush, thick upon the ground. Not a human dwelling was in sight, not a sign of human presence or existence was visible on that far-stretching waste, and I felt sure, now, of keeping the entrance to my treasure-hoard unknown.

I was rich now, with wealth untold, and the world was before me to enjoy my good fortune to its full extent.

"Away with bitter memories and sad reflections!" I cried aloud to the winds as I stood on that solitary plain. "Away with care and sorrow! I will press out the juice of this World-Grape and drink it with pleasure unalloyed!"

Digitized by Google

Then I crept back down the tunnel and prepared to set forth. I donned a military costume—one of many that were stowed snugly away in the recesses, finding it a perfect fit, from leathern helm and doublet to wooded sandals—girded on the sword "Sunderer," a keen, short dagger, and a stout sling with a pouch of leaden bullets, secreted about my attire as many of the jewels and coins as I could conveniently carry, and, taking a last glimpse of the heaving sea with a sigh of half regret, scrambled out of the cave, concealed the place of egress with some of the thick-growing shrubs, and turned my footsteps inland.

Dragged myself into the outer air.

A day's journey brought me to the verge of the uninhabited region, and at nightfall I stole past the first hamlet, picking my way well among the shadows of the broad-leaved cactus trees and helping myself to fruit as I went, for I did not wish it to be known from what direction I had come.

I held on my way northward, thus, for three days, and then, resolving to secrete myself no longer, stalked boldly into the next village, and sat down in the drinking room of the little house of rest, where weary travellers are refreshed at their own cost. The house seemed deserted when I entered, for no one came to attend my wants, not even when I called for food, and tapped the floor impatiently with my foot.

Enraged at this scurvy treatment, and hungry as a ravening wolf withal, I drew "Sunderer" from its sheath, and struck three thunderous, resounding blows with the flat of it upon the empty board.

At this, some slight stir was perceptible in the house, and presently a little, fat, greasy man with a scared face, came into the room, bowing and making a profusion of eloquent apologies, rubbing his rounded hands t gether the while in nervous excitement.

"Bring me a meal for three! and let it be a sumptuous one," I demanded, in a tone that struck terror to his weakling heart, showing him at the same time the colour of a gold piece to increase his alacrity. In a trice he was gone, putting the whole place into an uproar with his bustling and fidgeting haste. I smiled to myself as I sat back on the wooden bench, thinking that it must have been some time since the little man had seen the glint of a traveller's gold.

After a while, the viands not forthcoming, I set to work polishing the brightened parts of my "Sunderer's" sheath, rubbing the jewels with which it was inlaid till it sparkled like a shaft of light, and while thus occupied noticed the doorway darken, and a soldier, travel-worn, step in, taking a seat just opposite to mine.

"Greeting, comrade!" I said, looking up from my work.

"Greeting!" he answered, looking at me curiously.

I looked at him again; there was something peculiar about him that I could not define at first. Ah! I saw it now. One ear was missing!

"Vichri!" I cried. "By all the spirits!"

"And you are Arnon the Pirate, if I mistake not," said he, no less surprised.

"'Tis some time since we two met," I remarked, smiling grimly at the remembrance.

"Yes, much has happened in the meantime," he returned, leaning forward and speaking confidentially; "much that you had better know before you stir far in this stricken land."

"Pray tell me this needful and ill news," I asked, "for I would fain make a comrade of you, who are so worthy of my steel; that is, if you can pardon me for slicing off your ear. 'Twas done in the heat of strife."

"Freely," answered Vichri, to all appearance with sincerity, "freely. What do you first wish to know?"

"How fares it with your cousin Briseis, whose perfidy has exiled me these many years?"

"Exceedingly well," said he, with nevertheless a shade of hesitation in his tone; "exceedingly well as for herself, but badly as for the realm she rules and the people she governs."

"Governs!" I repeated, interrupting him. "Of what province is she the head, then?"

Vichri looked at me strangely. "Is it news to you," he asked in surprise, "that Dulo X. is dead, and that Queen Briseis reigns in his stead?"

It was news to me, to whom Atlantis and all its doings had been blank for a dozen years and more. "Yes," I replied, "but what has this to do with me?"

"Everything, methinks," said one-eared Vichri; "the story of your adventures and exploits as a pirate, of your escape from Miropis, of your love for the Princess Briseis, of your search for treasure, and subsequent capture and condemnation to the slave-galley, was in all men's mouths when I returned to Court a short time after the deed was done."

"Then you had no hand in my degradation?" I cried, starting forward, my fingers clutching "Sunderer's" hilt. "Swear it!"

He did so instantly. "I was no party to that despicable trick," he said, "nor wished to be." I sank back upon the bench. He went on: "But when my cousin took the throne, after Dulo died, by advice of the priests and at the cost of severe struggles with other claimants, she issued a proclamation of great harshness against all pirates and all who aided or sheltered them, particularly one Arnon, the son of Didron, otherwise known as Phrena, the Iron-fingered. A great reward was, and is still offered for your capture, alive or dead, if you set foot on the shores of Atlantis. You see now why I have warned you. It will be well if you take another name before showing yourself in or near any of the great cities."

"It will, indeed, be well," said I thoughtfully, "and for this service, Vichri, I am indebted to you."

My tardy host now brought in the repast for which I longed, and I fell to forthwith. My comrade seemed to have no appetite—a strange thing for a soldier on a journey—and so I had to demolish the victuals myself, which proved an easy task in my famished condition.

By the Athor! it was enough to make a sphinx smile to see the look of consternation on the face of the little innkeeper as dish after dish was emptied, and vessel after vessel was drained into my unsatiated interior!

At last, when the board was nearly as bare as when I first sat down, when his look of dismay had deepened into unutterable terror at my capacity, and Vichri himself was moved to ejaculations, I pushed the seat away, sitting awhile to rest.

"Now, tell me," I asked my one-eared comrade, when our host was gone, "how it is that the land is stricken, as you said."

"It is cursed alike by its own folly and by the hands of the spirits," he replied. "The first trouble has been stayed after much bloodshed, for the people in general have rallied round their Queen and her priests, enabling her to defeat all her enemies, but the spirits are still pressing hardly upon us. The sea has overflowed its coasts, and much of the land is now lost beneath its rising waves. So Briseis has but poor fortune with her kingdom."

Digitized by Google

Something of this I expected, remembering the height of the water in the bay where the cave was, but the thought of the continued hatred of the Queen, who had once thrown her arms about my neck in love's abandon, rendered me careless of other things than her incomprehensible inconstancy.

"And what is your counsel for myself?" I asked. He thought a moment, then said:

"If you want active service, I would ask you to come with me. I am on my way to take arms under Quitzaal, the governor of Ulmeca, our colony in the western land. He is on no friendly terms with the Queen; indeed, 'twould need little to set them at the sword-point, and so revive the flame of civil war." ("Surely," thought I, "Vichri is on no very civil terms with his cousin.") "Either in that case, or against the Red Barbarians, I can promise you good work for your weapons."

I shook my head. "I shall not fight against the Queen," I answered, "come what may."

His face fell at this, but, recovering, he went on: "There is another chance, for you, then. The Princess of Aidè, of Thinæ, the province next to this to the north, is raising a regiment of soldiers to clear the hill country of the bands of robbers that infest it, and needs good officers for her force sadly. Methinks you would make her a right man. And if you say that I have sent you, your acceptance will be assured."

"Agreed!" I cried, longing once more to be a leader of men and drown my sadness in the stir of battle; "I will set out for Thinæ this very day."

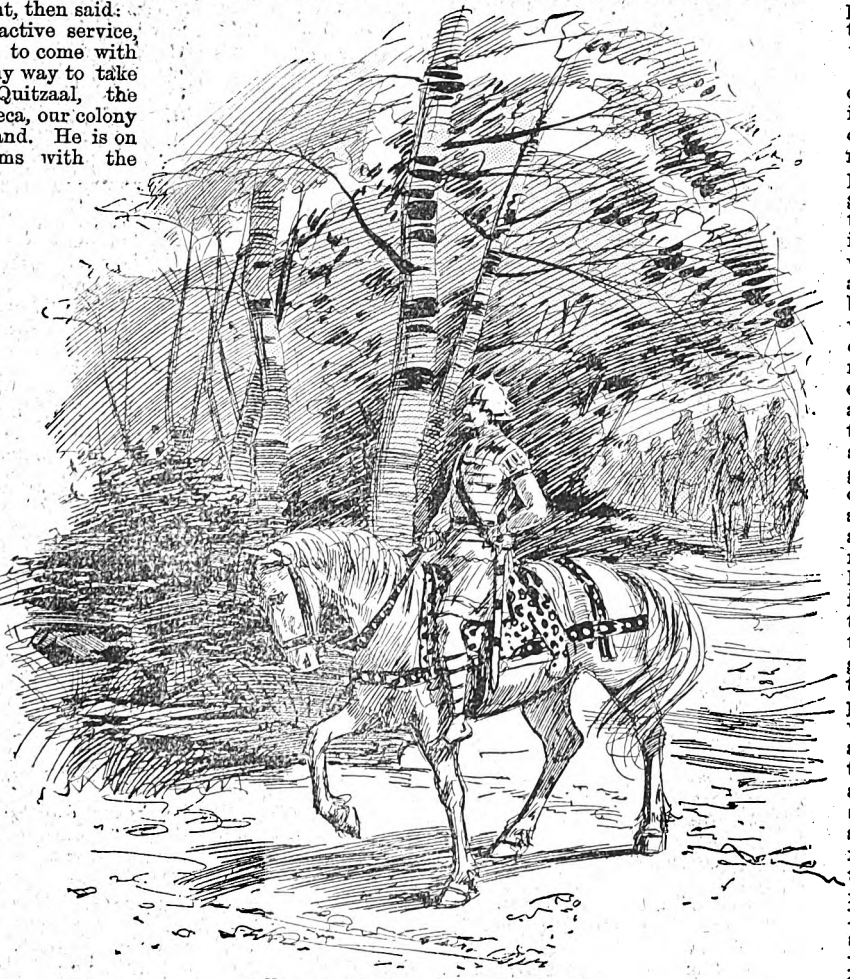
Awhile longer we talked, I skilfully eluding and baffling all his questions regarding my own vicissitudes, and drawing him out on all the great events that had taken place in my absence, and then, mightily refreshed, prepared to leave.

Throwing the innkeeper the gold coin I had shown him and a dozen more as well, which nearly took away the agitated little fellow's breath, and eyesight too, we left the house and journeyed a short distance together. At a place where the road forked my companion stopped.

"That is your way; this is mine," he said. "Farewell."

"Farewell!" I retorted, taken aback by his sudden curtness; "and if you value your remaining ear, take care you meet me not in battle, as is possible in these strange times."

"That is as it may be," he said shortly, and then we parted, going our separate ways. Little did I suspect, even then, the cool, calculating craftiness of his evil mind! You were tricked, duped, fooled; blind, witless Arnon, unsuspecting bungler that you always were!



Lulled me into deep engrossing thought.

Alone I wandered on, passing into the province of Aidè before nightfall, and putting up in great state at the first large inn I came to. I was rich now, and men bowed before me as I went, sparing no effort to make my quarters easy. I stopped at that inn across the border several days, gathering a band of followers, stout, well-armed, well-mounted, lusty knaves, ready to follow me through anything for the gold I offered them and the prowess I showed with the sword and sling. I then went on again, having secured a trusty steed, more confidently now, through that fair northern land, where the sun, more tempered than in the region I had left, shed ever a genial glow o'er hill and dale. Never before had I seen so fair a country.

It was, indeed, a lovely land that I now traversed, affording, as I went, gladsome glimpses and pleasing peeps of rural glades, mossy hollows, and ferny dingles, where the trees stood in lakes of a delicate blue, where the wild hyacinth tinged the ground.

Anon we journeyed by the banks of a swift-flowing river, now broadening out into a deep, pellucid pool, and now curling and foaming down a dainty rapid, white-sprayed, that seemed like an ivory circlet on the arm of a beautiful girl.

Then further on would be an old stone bridge over the gleaming current, with old huts and quaint gardens clustered near it, while around rose craggy heights, soaring to the sky, all symphonies in dark, dull grey, and darker green and dullish purple.

Digitized by Google

As we neared Thinæ, the chief town of the province of Aidè, the villages became more frequent, and the woodland recesses by contrast more delightful, more solitary, more soothing still.

Here I welcomed more earnestly than before the enchantment of the encompassing woods, the green, sunny slopes, the wilful little waterfalls, the hum and whirr of insect life, the songs of birds, the rich perfume of the many flowers, and the great masses of white, fragrant bloom that clothed the low trees. Still we followed the sparkling river, limpid and luminous as the eyes of a gazelle, mirroring on its pure surface frond of fern, branch of tree, and grass-like rush, and reflecting in its depths the subtle, silent changing of the clouds in the arch above.

Small wonder is it that my followers found me a dull leader, leaving them much to their own devices. I was in no mood to laugh and jest with them then, though I felt that after all it was good to live in that fair land.

The quiet grandeur of the sun's arising over those fertile hills, the aroma and solemnity of the wooded avenues through which we passed, the creeping on of the silent eve, the lengthening of the cool shadows, the unsurpassed restfulness of the day's departure, so much sweeter, purer, peace-giving, than the sudden fall of the tropic night—all lulled me into deep, engrossing thought and long, abstracted silences, at which my men marvelled.

Once I overheard the fragment of a conversation between the two whom I had appointed chiefs of the band under myself. It was when we were riding down a pleasant, winding path contiguous to the stream I have mentioned. Said the first:

"Our master seemeth wrapped in thought."

"And none too pleasant ones, methinks," said number two.

"What is't he's turning over in his mind? Canst guess, Valdo?" asked the first speaker.

"Wealth or women I'll warrant me," said the second, "and more likely the last than the first, for he pays with no niggard hand."

"An that be so," said the other, "I'll wager thee a hundred tecs that he is smitten with our flighty Princess, and little need for surprise at that, for she turns the heads of most men who come to her near presence."

"'Twere too risky a wager for me to take," laughed Valdo; "but if it be as thou say'st, I imagine she'll rouse him from his reverie when we get to her mimic Court. But whilst taking counsel, Atris, hast heard aught of Quitzaal's doings of late?"

"Not I," said Atris. "Though he is so still that one must needs expect some mischief to be hatching."

They fell back a few paces then, and I heard no more, though I had heard sufficient to set me thinking anew. I became curious to see this charming semi-sovereign, and test for myself whether her near presence was so captivating as report had it.

Since the two fair ones who had loved me truly were dead, since the only one I loved with a quenchless flame was false to me, since all whom I had known and trusted were lost or slain, and I stood alone in the world, why should I not seek what solace I could in the giddy whirl of a dissipated life, enjoying myself to the full, now that the wealth was ready to my hand?

The words that the Spirit of Isis had spoken came into my mind for a moment, only to be banished with a scornful laugh, for was it likely that I should ever mate with one who had put a price on my head?

And that being so, what temptation had power to harm me more? Away with such dream-fancies, sent only to mock and delude, and welcome a life of instant pleasure, where the wine flows round the board and bright eyes speak to bright eyes, telling of present love in every longing glance! Thus I thought, now that the weight of sorrow had broken down the barriers of rectitude, and thus I acted, and suffered in consequence, as you will see.

In due time we entered the city of Thinæ, and marching through its tree-lined streets with great pomp and intentive clangour, came to the palace of the Princess, a very dream-land of material splendour and obtrusive opulence.

Here I sent word by the seneschal of my coming, and that I offered myself as a soldier in the Princess's army. For a name I gave Macis, after the mate of the luckless Seamew, and by that name was known to my men. A bravely-decked functionary, with many bows and unnecessary speeches, informed me in answer that to-morrow the Princess herself would see the stranger who appeared so opportunely, and that meanwhile, myself and followers would be entertained in the palace as honoured guests.

The remainder of that day and the following morning I busied myself in learning all I could regarding my fair hostess, discovering, amongst other things, that her husband, the Prince of Aidè, was at that time on foreign service, being in the pay of Quitzaal, and had not seen his province for now ten years.

The Governor and his wife had quarrelled, it was reported, and were not likely to live together again; indeed, from the way men talked of the Princess over the confidential wine at night, there was small need for surprise thereat. But in my reckless mood I cared little for such circumstances.

I felt as though all stay and guide and hope in life were gone for me, and I drifted alone on the world's wide ocean, at the mercy of the first fierce passion-storm that should arise.

Towards nightfall, when the Princess had tired of the company of her last favourite, one Dison by name, a rich noble, proud alike of his descent and his martial prowess, she sent the seneschal to take me before her.

Already consumed with curiosity, I followed where the chattering old man led, through massive portals, down spacious corridors, up broad and easy stairways, in and out of gilded rooms thronged with gay assemblies, who regarded me with undisguised indifference, past dainty little alcoves and windows looking out on pillared balconies, till he stopped before a purple curtain drawn across a doorway.

"Here, my son," said he, "we shall find the Princess. Follow my footsteps as I enter, and if I may advise thee, I would say, do not ape humility in her presence. My mistress loves a self-assertive bearing above all things."

I thanked my guide for the timely hint, slipping a gold piece in his hand as a guerdon, and said: "Pass on!"

He pulled aside the heavy drapery and stepped in with wonderful agility for so old a man, I hard on his heels, agog with expectancy and surmise.

It was a sumptuous, ease-breathing, sense-lulling apartment where the Princess Listra received me; a room redolent of sweet perfume and merry with the warbling of scores of singing birds; a chamber that reflected the wealth, the voluptuousness, and the graceful tastiness of its fair mistress in every part.

Enchanting oriel windows gave glimpses of the spacious palace grounds, luxurious couches invited the weary guest to revel in their downy depths, choice and priceless trinkets, gathered from many lands, bedecked the walls and polished tables, and at the further end of the lofty chamber, behind the seat where the Princess sat, towered three marvellously-wrought marble figures, dwarfing to insignificance the dozen statuettes that ornamented the high carved niches in the wall.

The outer figures of the three were presentments of the spirits of Life and Truth, the middle one, larger than they, and presumably the spirit most worshipped there, was the image of the Spirit of Love, not over-chaste in its design, nor sparing of detail in the exquisite execution of its finely-chiselled lines.

But chief among the many beauteous things within that room, more lovely, more fascinating, more enthralling than them all, was the Princess Listra herself, as reclining indolently on a couch of ivory, inlaid with gold, she waved her dainty hand to her maids, bidding them leave her presence while she talked with the stranger. The old seneschal, also, having discharged his duty, withdrew, leaving me alone with his mistress.

Digitized by Google

"And thou wouldst be an officer in my army, stranger?" she said, when I explained my wishes.

"For that, as I have told thee, I came," said I, "but now I would sooner be thy slave than go away untaken."

"Brave words!" cried the Princess, though not displeased, "such as I have heard too oft to value greatly. What canst do if I make you my general?"

"I would sooner be thy slave than go away untaken."

"Anything thou mayst wish me to," I answered boldly, "for at sword-play, or slinging, or archery, or even bare-handed, I'll warrant I excel any soldier within thy province."

"Art not blind to thy own merits, Macis!" said the languishing beauty, with a bright eyeflash that betokened arising interest. "Thinkest that thou can overcome any whom I put against thee in the palace yard to-morrow noon?"

"Aye, or any two!" I replied, carried away by a consuming desire to exhibit my strength before this lovely being's gaze, "or any three for a kindly gleam from she under whom I shall soon serve!"

"An thy arms are brawny as thy speech is honeyed, I doubt it not!" said Listra, passing her fingers across her forehead as if to shade her eyes, but really to take a peep at me unnoticed, exposing, in the action, a white rounded arm, the picture of perfect health, beneath the purple robe that fell around her in its rich and ample folds, and which was gathered in upon her breast and fastened upon her creamy throat by a clasp of purest gold.

"Nor needst thou doubt it," responded I, bewildered by her sensuous beauty and bewitching grace. "I only long for to-morrow's sun to prove my words true before all thy guests and servants. If I succeed thou wilt accept my services; if I fail, thou canst send me away as a weakling—a craven. But I think Vichri would tell thee, were he here, that I am not the last, for 'twas he sent me to thee."

"Then this trial I proposed in jest need not be held," said the Princess, "for Vichri is a brave soldier and knows a strong arm when he sees one. Rest content, Macis, thou art appointed, and when thy men are ready root me out these lawless robbers that infest our northern hills."

"That I will, and glad to do the work set by so fair a taskmistress," I answered. This time she did not reject the flattery, but replied with mock severity:

"Do so, then, and mind thou seekest not my presence till the country roads are safe. Then I will think what reward will best suit so useful a soldier."

A while longer we talked, of the mysterious encroachment of the sea amongst other things, and then the Princess dismissed me, having by that time set my blood aflame with the witchery of her alluring loveliness.

(To be continued.)

Digitized by Google

A NIGHT ADVENTURE IN BENARES.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

HAD I known what was going to befall me when I took steamer passage from Ceylon to India I should have probably continued my journey eastward round the world without stopping at the "Land of the Rajahs." In blissful ignorance, however, I landed at Calcutta. The time of year was that when the climate most favours up-country travelling, and so, after a brief visit to friends, I started north by rail. I was the richer by half-a-dozen introductory letters to men of more or less prominence in the chief cities of the empire.

I went first to Benares—the sacred city on the mighty Ganges—and sought the house of Sita Ram, to whom one of my letters was addressed. Sita Ram was a wealthy and cultured Hindoo banker, and my friends had pictured in glowing colours the hospitality that I would receive.

Before my ride through the city was over I felt that hospitality of any sort from anyone would be doubly welcome. To my surprise, most of the bazaars and business places were closed, though it was nearly afternoon. Groups of evil-faced natives stood about in the squares and the streets, while police and soldiers appeared to be unusually plentiful. I was made a target for sullen glances from all sides, and I could not help recalling the stirring times of the great Mutiny, more than thirty years back.

I found Sita Ram's house to be a palatial cream-coloured building, not far from the river. Its owner proved to be absent, but his private secretary received me and opened the letter of introduction.

Baboo Das was a sleek, mahogany-faced gentleman who spoke English perfectly, and wore garments of faultless cut.

"My honoured master is in Allahabad on a matter of business," he explained. "He will return in a day or two, and meanwhile the house and servants are at your disposal."

I thanked Baboo Das, and inquired the meaning of the strange sights I had witnessed in the city.

"There has been danger of a riot during the last twenty-four hours," he replied gravely; "but it is believed to be past now. The most ignorant of the Hindoo population are angry because the municipality have acquired the Ramjee temple for the purpose of erecting new water-works on its site. The Mohammedans have taken part in the disturbance because of the dearness of provisions, for which the municipality is also responsible. My honoured master belongs to the board of government and helped to purchase the temple."

I suspected that Sita Ram's departure might be more in the order of a flight than of a business trip.

"Are you sure that the danger is over?" I asked, for I had some notion of going to a hotel.

"Yes," replied Baboo Das; "the rioters are cowed and submissive. My master's house was under the protection of the police, but they withdrew this morning."

His manner was so calm and decided that I quite forgot my fears. I was shown a luxurious bed-chamber, and a little later I dined in solitude off dishes of gold and silver. The entire house was furnished in a costly and sumptuous style that showed its bachelor owner to possess a sense of European taste as well as of barbaric splendour.

During the evening I was left pretty much to myself, and as I did not care to venture into the street I passed the time with a cigar and a magazine, and when I signified my wish to retire Baboo Das preceded me upstairs.

Squatted on a rug in the hall, just outside my room, was a bright-faced Hindoo lad, about twelve years old. A cord dangled by his side, and, passing through the door, communicated with the fans that were attached to the ceiling of the apartment. The lad was evidently the "punky wallah," or fan puller. His name was Gunpat, Baboo Das informed me, and his duty was to keep me cool during the sultry hours of the night.

I chatted with the boy for a few moments, and found him to be intelligent and fairly conversant with English. Then I entered my room and lowered the square of rice matting that was furled above the doorway. There was also a door of heavy teak-wood, but I did not think it necessary to close it. The apartment had two windows overlooking a small court-yard that contained shrubs and a fountain. After riding most of the day in a stuffy and jolting railway carriage I was weary. It did not take me long to undress and fall asleep. The last thing I remember was the soft whirling of the fans and their refreshing current of air.

I was awakened by a hand tugging at the bed-clothes. "Rouse, Sahib, there is danger," was poured into my ears by a shrill, childish voice.

I sprang out of bed in a trice and struck a light. It revealed the half-naked figure of little Gunpat. His expression was one of indignation, rather than of terror.

"What is it?" I demanded.

"Those pigs of rioters, Sahib," he replied. "They have broken loose at last."

Then, for the first time, I became aware of the tumult in the streets surrounding the house. Brawling voices and the restless patter of feet rose hoarsely on the night air. I could distinguish the shrill "Din! Din!" of the Mohammedans—their rallying cry to battle. From afar I heard the faint pealing of bells and the rattle of musketry. A lively commotion was going on downstairs, banging of doors, and shoving of furniture, interlarded with husky voices.

Gunpat slipped away for a moment and I hurried on my shirt and trousers. I felt decidedly uncomfortable, to say the least. I could not forget the black looks that had greeted me on the previous afternoon. Europeans were in bad odour at Benares just then. I glanced at the clock. The hands pointed to an hour past midnight. I began to consider what I had better do. I was puzzled to account for the non-appearance of Baboo Das.

Meanwhile the tumult had swelled to a frightful din. The streets without seemed to be choked with rioters. "Kill Sita Ram!" they yelled. "Slay the heretic! Loot his house. Down with the destroyers of the faith!"

Digitized by Google

I was fully alive to the situation now, and the thought of my peril sickened me. A moment later a succession of heavy thuds, followed by a tremendous crash and a burst of cheers, told that the main entrance of the house had been beaten in. Cries of rage and terror and the sounds of deadly conflict floated up the staircase.

I determined to escape, if such a thing were possible. There was no time to put on shoes or coat. I seized my money and papers, and jammed them into the pockets of my trousers.

I ran to the window and looked out. Alas! The court-yard swarmed with dusky figures. The only avenue of escape was cut off.

I turned back into the room, resolved to sell my life dearly. I had no weapons, but on the wall hung a Tibetan shield and spear, trimmed with yaks' tails. I dragged them down and rushed for the door. Before I could close it entirely, a figure slipped through the crack, and I very nearly impaled Gunpat on the spear.

"The Sahib must fight," he exclaimed. "Baboo Das has fled, and the rioters are downstairs and everywhere. They have killed some of the servants, and now they will search for my master, whom they hate. They believe he is in the house. They will kill you, too, Sahib, if they find you."

"What shall we do?" I demanded. "Is there a way to escape?"

"None, Sahib. We must push furniture against the door and fight. The police and the soldiers will be here presently."

"But surely the mob won't hurt a little chap like you?" I replied, filled with admiration at the lad's bravery. "Go while you can, Gunpat."

"No," he answered calmly; "my duty is with the Sahib. I will stay here."

There was no time to argue, for already the blood-thirsty miscreants were pattering up the staircase with shouts and yells. The door had only a frail bolt on the inside, but luckily the furniture was massive. Gunpat seemed to know just what was wanted. He helped me to the best of his strength, and hardly was the barricade in place when the mob surged through the hall.

"The heretic is trapped," they cried, at sight of the closed door. "Come out, Sita Ram, and meet your fate."

Crash! crash! crash! The door trembled under the rain of heavy blows. A table that was on the summit of the barricade toppled to the floor, and burst asunder. The mob heard the fall, and yelled exultantly.

Gunpat twirled his spear between his supple fingers. "The end will be soon, Sahib," he said quite calmly. The next instant he gave an eager cry and pointed overhead. There I saw for the first time a small circular trap-door.

"Where does it lead?" I demanded.

"To the roof," replied Gunpat. "My master sits there on hot evenings. But there is no ladder. We must take from the barricade, Sahib."

No sooner said than done. Hardly as they could be spared we removed a table, a chest of drawers, and two chairs. We piled them one upon another. I plainly saw the door quiver from top to bottom as I mounted the shaky structure. I was directly below the trap now, and a blow from my fist drove it upward. I grasped the edge of the opening and drew myself to the roof. Gunpat passed up the two spears and the shield. Then I caught the lad's hands and drew him to my side.

That instant the mob broke into the room below, where they expected to find Sita Ram. They howled with rage at the empty room. Then we saw their dark faces glaring at the pile in the middle of the room, and up at the opening in the ceiling above. We slammed down the trap door but there was no way to fasten it on the outside.

We knew the mob would follow us in a moment, so we ran across the flat roof, mounted the parapet, and sprang to the top of an adjoining house. Thus we hurried on from roof to roof till we were some distance from the house of Sita Ram.

"Faster, Sahib! they are coming!" panted Gunpat.

Then husky yells rang out behind us and I turned and saw half a score of turbaned figures at our very heels. The space of but a single roof intervened. A spear whizzed between us. A pistol ball shrieked overhead.

Faster and faster we sped, till suddenly a gap six feet wide yawned before us. "Jump, Sahib," yelled Gunpat. Without hesitation we sprang together, and landed safely on the next roof. One of our pursuers was close behind—a burly Mohammedan with a sword. Gunpat snatched the brazen shield from my hand; turned, and threw it with all his might. It struck the fellow as he was in the act of jumping. Without a cry, he plunged down between the houses. His companions paused only an instant. Then they leaped the gap, and came on with frightful yells.

This advantage, brief as it was, proved our salvation. We ran on as before, climbing headlong over the parapets from roof to roof, neither gaining or losing. The end house of the block abutted on the Ganges, and all at once, over the last parapet, we saw the water below us.

"You can swim, Sahib?" asked Gunpat.

"Yes, come on," I replied.

We dropped through twenty feet of air and shot far under water. When we came to the surface we dived again instantly. The next time we rose we were well out in the current. Side by side we swam out, while a shower of spears fell harmlessly in our wake.

Anchored in mid-stream, we spied the ark-shaped roof of a trader's boat, and a short swim brought us to it. The friendly natives gave us a shelter, and there we remained until morning, listening to the sounds of strife in the city.

When day broke the riot was quelled, but the mob had wrecked the telegraph office and railway station, plundered the treasury, and destroyed the engine and boiler of the new water-works.

Sita Ram returned that afternoon, and I found him a most polished and agreeable gentleman. He was apparently unconcerned over the looting of his house. His first act was to discharge Baboo Das. His next, after hearing my story, was to promote brave little Gunpat to an honoured position among the household servants. Nor did I forget to honour the lad in my own way.

HARRY ROGERS.

The November number of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE, as well as that of MELODY, is Now on Sale.

Digitized by Google

AN ESCAPADE.

In days gone by it was the custom in France for those daughters of noble families who could not find a husband to enter a convent. That many took the veil very much against their will goes without saying, but obedience to parents was imperative.

In 1787 there was a large number of these poor birds caged in the great convent of Arles, the antique royal abbey of St. Cesaire; but the youngest and prettiest of them all was undoubtedly Sister Rose.

Rose de X—— belonged to a family that was a great deal richer in ancestors than hard cash. When her father had bled himself dry to purchase a commission for his eldest son in the Bussy Regiment, there remained to him not a sou wherewith to dot his daughter. He therefore decided that she should become a nun.

In the opinion of the parents it was far better for their daughters to pass their lives under the veil in some rich convent than to espouse a penniless noble. Rose probably failed to take this wise view of the matter, but the parental fiat had gone forth; it only remained for her to obey. Therefore, sad at heart, and with her pretty eyes brimming over with tears, she entered the convent. The Archbishop gave her the veil, and all the nobility of Provence assisted at her investiture.

Being young and of a cheerful disposition, she soon accommodated herself to her forced seclusion, and no doubt would ere long have become reconciled to the extremely easy existence enjoyed by the inmates of the convent, had not her unlucky star placed in her way a dashing chevalier, who turned her head. This chevalier was the brother of Rose's particular friend, a nun like herself, and they first saw each other one visiting day in the reception room with the result that the chevalier promptly fell head over ears in love.

The chevalier was a hot-headed youth of twenty, full of ardour and daring. He determined to make his passion known to the pretty nun. This was easily accomplished by means of a billet doux, a complaisant gardener, and a piece of gold. Had Rose done her duty she would have refused the missive with indignation, or have thrown it in the fire without reading it. But she was young, she was curious—and maybe she was in love. She was weak enough to take the fatal note, to read it, and, for ought I know, answer it.

However this may be, on the night of Shrove Tuesday, when all the convent had retired to rest, Rose issued barefooted and on tip-toe from her cell, and flew like a frightened bird to the end of the garden. She was probably not overcome by surprise to find there a gallant chevalier, who threw his mantle around her and in a trice whisked her up a ladder—and over the garden wall.

An hour later the chevalier appeared at the masked ball in progress at the Jeu de Paume, and clinging to his arm was the prettiest and timidest domino that ever was seen.

When Rose found herself amid the gay throng of maskers, she was so frightened she could not put one foot before the other. She thought she was in the infernal regions. But the chevalier held her so tenderly, and breathed nothings so softly into her little ears, that she soon became reassured, and thought she was in paradise.

They danced together, and everybody admired them. They were, in fact, too much admired, for a presumptuous officer—somewhat heated by wine, which maketh glad the heart of man, and likewise maketh him quarrelsome, according to his temperament and the quantity he imbibeth—also wanted to dance with the pretty domino. But the chevalier failed to see the fun of it. Facetious compliments were exchanged, and in two shakes of a lamb's tail two swords were flashing from their scabbards, and probing for the soft spots in the respective anatomies of the rivals, while the whole ball was in an uproar.

Rose, left by her chevalier, and wild with terror, flitted out of the ballroom into the dark labyrinth of streets like a will-o'-the-wisp, without anybody taking any notice of her.

When she began to recognise her surroundings, she found herself in the narrow Rue des Petres, opposite the porch of the cloister of Saint Trophime. Just then two o'clock struck in the town hall tower. Half dead with fright at finding herself alone in the streets at that hour, she sat down on the steps of the cloister, and wept until her heart was like to break.

What was to be come of her? Return home to her father? She trembled at the mere thought: he would probably kill her should she dare to show her face before him! Return to the convent? Absolutely out of the question!

While she was lamenting her terrible plight the bell of the Carmelites du Marche Neuf began to ring matins. Its clear sonorous clang summoning the nuns to the chapel recalled the convent to her mind. What excitement there would be at five o'clock, when the sisters rose and discovered her absence! How she envied them now, peacefully reposing in their white cells! What would she not have given to be in their place! What she had suffered for having listened to the temptation of the Evil One!

In her anguish her thoughts dwelt upon the great saints whose relics in the shrine near Arles perform so many miracles. She knelt upon the hard, cold stones and prayed to them with all her heart to save her. And the great saints, always full of compassion for us poor mortals, sent her a happy inspiration.

Digitized by Google

Mgr. du Lau, the Archbishop of Arles, was the kindest of men, and when he visited the convent, he always advised and encouraged her. Why not go to him? He alone had the power to save her.

A few minutes later she was pulling the bell at the door of the Archbishop's palace. She had to ring for a long time, for the porter was not accustomed to be called up at such an hour, and when at length he opened the door, he would not push his condescension to the point of admitting a lady who declined to give her name. But the pretty unknown pleaded so earnestly and persuasively that he at last relented and grumblingly went upstairs to wake his Lordship the Archbishop.

The good prelate did not make so much fuss about it. When he learned that a lady wished to see him on serious and urgent business, he had her shown up to the waiting-room without more ado.

Rose awaited him in fear and trembling, and when he made his appearance she pulled her hood over her face and fell at his feet. The holy man was considerably surprised to recognise in the mysterious supplicant a nun whom he believed to be safely confined in her convent, and even more so when the girl he had always regarded as a model of saintliness confessed her awful fault.

At first he had a good mind to shake her, but seeing her in tears he could not help pitying the poor lamb who had wandered from the fold and appealed to him, the good shepherd, to lead her back again; so, placing his hand on her head, he said:

"My daughter, your fault is great. However, swear to me that you will never again listen to the counsels of the devil, and that you will henceforward be the example of piety you ought to be, and I will see what can be done."

Rose promised fervently all that was required of her.

"'Tis well!" exclaimed his Lordship, raising her to her feet. "Courage! Cover up your face so that no one can recognise you. In one hour from this you will be back in your cell, and you can believe me when I say that no one in the convent will ever know you left it."

This said, his lordship summoned his valet and ordered that his carriage be got ready without delay. A few minutes later the last of the revellers from the masked ball at the Jeu de Paume were surprised to meet the Archbishop's carriage rumbling along towards the convent. What would they have said could they have seen, ensconced in a corner of the old coach, the pretty domino who had excited their curiosity?

The sister who acted as doorkeeper of the convent, awakened by the noise of the wheels as the carriage drew up at the gate, popped her head out of the window of her turret and thought she was dreaming when she beheld his Grace the Archbishop.

His Lordship ordered her to open the gate. She hastened to comply and to call the Abbess, whom he wished to see immediately. The Abbess jumped out of bed and hurriedly donned her robe, putting her veil on all awry in her precipitation, and forgetting her golden crucifix.

The Archbishop was waiting for her in the reception-room.

"Madame," he exclaimed sternly, as she entered, "it appears that scandalous things are taking place in your convent. I am told that some of your nuns gad about the street at night."

"Oh! Monsignor, it is impossible!" ejaculated the Abbess, clasping her hands and raising her eyes in horror.

"A truce to talking," continued the Archbishop. "I am here to see for myself, as is my duty, whether all is in order. Let every nun lock herself in her cell, and you, madame, set the example by withdrawing to your apartment. I will go the round of the cloisters and see whether everybody responds to the roll call."

As the Archbishop ordered, so was it done. Every nun, from the Abbess to the doorkeeper, locked herself in her cell. His Lordship then fetched Rose, who was huddling in the carriage, and led her through the deserted corridors to her cell, where she noiselessly locked herself in. Then the Archbishop went the round of the convent, knocking at every door.

"Benedicamus domina!"

And every nun responded:

"Deo gratias!"

Monsignor finished with the Abbess, whom he wished to assure that no one was missing. Then, filled with glee at the success of his pious manœuvre, he re-entered his carriage and returned to his palace.

From that day Rose was the model member of the community, and practised mortifications, vigils, and orisons to such an extent that she fell into a decline and died.

No one knew for certain what became of the chevalier. He had unfortunately killed his adversary, and had had to fly from the law.

Some declare that he became a monk. Others assert that he was taken at Quiberon, and that when the Republicans shot him he was found to be wearing as a sash across his breast the white veil of a nun. Anyhow, he was never seen at Arles again.

As to Mgr. du Lau, everybody knows that he was killed by a mob in 1792.

HONOR LUCELLE.

Jumbled Story Competition.—19.

ON page 604 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 November 9th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the first of the readers living in Ireland who succeeds in forwarding the correct, or most nearly correct, solution.

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY No. 19.] [SEE PAGE 603.

AH, FRIEND CADI, WE AWAIT.

Kitty was arranging her skirts.
It was the most delicious moment of my life.
As I came up the drive, I saw this sight: Kitty, yonder is standing up dressed all in white. A man bent down, and kissed her on the cheek.
"Don't," I said, "you will kill yourself," and you are not going to marry"—I took a step nearer—because of what old Martha said to you? It is," I Count, who's not worthy——"
"Harry—dear." Her cheeks were covered with Martha's cottage.
The words took terrible effect. Kitty rose to her conversation concerns no one.
I crept round behind Kitty and behind the Count, and said very sternly: "Downright wicked, I repeat. The Count, in irreproachable knickerbockers, was insignificant little whippersnapper of an Italian subject.
Then I was no longer silent.
But she was too quick for me, and head in air, standing behind. I have often thought, in after life, my coat-tails, and thoroughly considered the lap.
"Don't breathe," I hissed, "or I'll murder you."
The words, I own, were strong ones; they had, interrupted her:
"Henry, how dare you."
I then gave her the minutest instructions, sprang into the saddle, and we sped away.
Then I took my hat, and struck out across the the Count's mouth, and with the other gripped his his brothers yonder."
The road outside the gates runs for two miles back her head.
"Are you ready?" asked Kitty.
Then I sprang back and pedalled furiously.
Kitty threw her feet on the foot-rests, and tossed stealthily, until my face was level with hers; then I wanted, "I see a great church, and my lady expression changed—"fair, a soldier, ah! and see that what I now did was the most successful action down a steep hill. We started at a great pace.
"Kitty," I said presently, as we sped madly down among the villagers as a fortune-teller. As a witch unwieldly man-killer" (I am a soldier) "you are old witch has looked at your hand, and said that fortune told again.
"I will," cried Kitty furiously, "and we will soon giving him a final admonition to keep silence, I feet her eyes flashed, her hands clenched together.
"It is absolutely preposterous."
"It isn't," she replied lamely, hastily rearranging her position on the front seat of a tandem bicycle. I ever accomplished.
I stooped forward on my handles, far forward, pedalled harder than ever.
I slackened speed, and silently we rode round to where the old witch had taken up her residence.
"When you have learnt manners," she said, "I very carefully, very stealthily, so that neither of see whom I am destined to marry."
Kitty put her tea-cup down with a bang.
The witch was standing over a cauldron, and two Italians were grinding a barrel-organ.
This shrivelled-up little woman, Martha, as she was called, had built up a reputation for herself marched to the door.
I emptied out my pockets into the old hag's arm in an iron grip.
"I see," she said, when we had told her what we in the neatest of cycling costumes, was taking up her hand, "it will be a man you have known ever known since you were a baby in arms, for an absurd, but it is downright wicked."
"Yes," said I, imitating the Count's voice, while peering into the contents.
"Martha," I said, as I pushed open her door, "I will speak to you again. In the meanwhile," went on, without allowing her time to answer. told."
"And if you do it satisfactorily, there's gold for once, you horrid wretch! Stop! I shall jump the power of making a scathing answer.
"Oh!" screamed Kitty, "how dare you! Stop at turning at the door, "you may digest this: "Well, this is the condition on which I shall stop; You go and throw me up, me whom you have very much mistaken," and with that she left me.
It was a pretty trick!
"Henry, how dare you!" she began, but I am going to bring a lady to have her fortune off!"
I did not answer.
"Henry," she repeated.
I pedalled in silence.
"Henry," said Kitty presently, when we found that you come with me to the witch, and have your blushes. "Before, you know, I was only in fun. Of you—pots of it."
I spread myself out before the fire, turned up fields (we were staying in the country) to the house since you were a baby."
And I maintain that the remainder of our course, Harry, I never really cared for the Count."
I was quick to follow up my advantage.
I paused for a suitable comparison. Outside homewards.
"It is not only preposterous," said I, "and however, this good effect; they deprived Kitty of them heard me, and then I clapped one hand over and leaving her to digest them, proceeded ourselves riding away.
I rose to my feet, threw out my chest, frowned, the hill, "why won't you love me? Is it merely here," she cried, taking Kitty's little pink palm in the tea-cups.
"And for why? Merely because a shrivelled up "not going to marry, Kitty, the man you love."
"Who's not worthy so much as to act monkey to at me—"a tall man," went on Martha—Kitty's is holding her hand"—Kitty threw a defiant glance if you imagine I have any care for a great, she was held in respect by everyone; even Kitty, as has been seen, was under her spell.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

CHAPTER XLI.

MURRAY SPEAKS TRUTH.

"BROMPTON."

She had not read the word, but she divined it, and with a pitiful moaning cry, as all that awful past came back. He was ill there then. Was she to go and humble herself once again?

"Oh—oh—oh—oh!" that one continued moan, so full of misery and despair, as she covered her pain-distorted face with her hands, and sank back in her chair.

"Olive! For God's sake don't—don't!" he cried wildly. "You know how I have fought all that down. I cannot bear to see you suffer like this. It is too much. In Heaven's name, send me away!"

But she did not seem to hear his words, and the low, piteous moan went on, as, in spite of self, Murray took a step nearer to her, drawn by a power he could not for the moment master.

He took her hands in his, and drew them from her face, and she lifted her eyes to his with such a look of appeal and despair that, drawing his breath with a sob, he bent down, and kissed her fingers tenderly. That look had disarmed him.

"For Heaven's sake, control yourself!" he cried huskily. "Be a woman. You must not go there again. I'll go to him at once and you shall hear everything."

"I beg your pardon! I did not know you were engaged. One of your headaches, Olive?"

Lady Braetoun started from her seat and Murray turned fiercely upon him, white as ashes.

Braetoun, who also looked very white, had come in silently. The cab-wheels had made no sound, and he had let himself in with his latch-key.

"Roderick!" cried Olive, rushing to him to throw herself in his arms.

"Don't be a fool!" he said hoarsely. "Go to your room."

"But the telegram! We thought you were dangerously ill."

"So I am," he said, "or I shouldn't have sent. Enough to make me. He didn't lose any time. There, go!"

"No," she said firmly. "You are ill, and I must stay."

"What for?" he cried with a ghastly smile. "Are you afraid?"

"Yes, horribly! Roderick, dear, let me stay."

"You need not be alarmed, Lady Braetoun," said Murray quietly. "Perhaps it would be as well if you went to your room for a while."

She gazed at him with her eyes dilating, and in his read nothing but pity and a something which seemed to enforce obedience, as he went to the door and opened it for her to pass out, shivering with a horrible dread.

Murray stood looking after her till she had passed out of sight, and then closed the door and turned to cross to where Braetoun had thrown himself upon a couch, groaning with pain.

"I'm sorry I interrupted you," he said, with a ghastly, cynical grin.

"What do you mean?"

"Mean? Oh, curse this pain! You didn't lose a chance of finding me out."

"Out? I came expecting to find you here. Brute! Cowardly, callous brute, to insult your wife like that."

"Insult her! Ha-ha-ha!"

"By sending a telegram from the house of your mistress.

"Who did?"

"You. There is the post-mark on it—Brompton."

"How was she to know?"

"I came on at once, expecting to see you prostrate here, and, not finding you, of course she read the telegram with me."

"Well, what of it? She knows."

"Knows!" said Murray bitterly. "Yes; she knows."

"Ah," cried Braetoun, as he ground his teeth and writhed in his agony, "and what if she does? What does it matter to me? Curse her white face and sickening ways. She knows how to comfort herself with her handsome doctor."

"You villain!" cried Murray, bending over him, and catching him by the throat. "Dare to insult her again like that and I'll crush out your miserable life."

"You dare not," sneered Braetoun. "Bah! do you think I am blind?" and, struggling against the bodily agony he felt, he went on. "I've known it from the first. Hasn't it driven me away from home to get what consolation I could yonder? Villain, am I? Allan Murray, dear companion of my boyhood, when did you find me a fool?"

"Always. Never greater than you are now. Coward, too, idiot!"

"What! When I came back here, half dying, to find you two like that!"

"To find her broken-hearted, half fainting in her anxiety for you."

"Bah! Be honest. I am. Villain yourself!"

"Silence, sir. You married an angel of truth. You have done everything man could do to kill her love, but her heart has never beaten with a throb that was not for you."

"It's a lie. Always for you—the doctor—the clever, thoughtful doctor. I'm not a fool, I tell you. Do you dare to tell me here, face to face, that you have not loved her from the first?"

"There is no dare," said Murray, gazing down at the miserable, writhing being on the couch. "I do tell you, her husband, that I have loved her from the first day we met—before you ever set eyes upon her, and came like a blight

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.

Digitized by Google

—miserable, despicable creature that you are—to blast her young life."

"And what about you?" said Braetoun, whose face was more ghastly now.

"I am a man, a weak, helpless man, Roderick Braetoun, who has gone through so cruel a fire that I pray God it may fall to the lot of few. These things are beyond me. I cannot grasp why they should be so—how it should have fallen to one who loved Olive Emsworth to pass hours of misery, toil, and despair, to fight for the life of the man who robbed me of my love, to give him the power to keep on cursing her with his presence here."

"Go on—go on!" groaned Braetoun; and then mockingly: "You have both consoled yourselves pretty well!"

"Don't tempt me," cried Murray fiercely. "There are limits to what I can bear. You shall not insult her by your vile charges."

"Go on! You'll never make me believe."

"Then," said Murray, "you had better die."

"No: you daren't kill me, Murray," sneered Braetoun. "You daren't do that."

"No. But I tell you this: if ever poor mortal wretch was tempted by the devil to end a brother's life, I have been that man."

"I know. A few drops more. But there would be the inquest, and the fashionable physician hounded down, and the scaffold. No; you dared not do that, Murray, and you took your revenge another way."

"Repeat that foul, lying charge, and I leave you to your fate," cried Murray, with so fierce a look that Braetoun quailed. "Are you in a position to die? Better you should, and let her suffer and mourn for you, her wretched husband, than have you live to curse her still. You fool! To cast away from you happiness such as might have been yours. Love me! Why, she would not tolerate my presence if it were not for your sake. She knows what you know, that your chances of life would be nil in another's hands. It is no empty boast—only from the experience I have had of you. What! poison you? The end would come more surely—would have come a dozen times if I had stayed away—would come now if I go, and you know it."

"Yes, I know it, curse you!" groaned Braetoun. "But you've got to save me again, and you will. I'm not afraid, only of this cursed pain!"

"Yes," said Murray, "I have to save you again for her sake, if my poor knowledge will help me."

"Yes, and——"

"Stop!" said Murray fiercely. "I can bear no more, either now or in the future. Let this be the last time you ever send to me for help. Some other doctor may grasp your case. You have now broken the last link. I can do no more."

CHAPTER XLII.

The Slaying of Love.

There were no complications caused by drink, no violent delirium to recur for days, and before many hours had elapsed Braetoun was about once more.

But to Olive's misery and despair there was some other great trouble or loss which kept her husband in a constant state of irritation, while his manner to her was agonising, and she lived in dread of some terrible scene, trembling the while as if she were guilty of some sin.

He was always receiving letters and telegrams, and various little things pointed to the fact that he was now approaching some crisis in his career. What it was more exactly she was soon to know.

It was one afternoon: Braetoun had come down very late after a sleepless night, looking irritable and strange, when the first letter he opened made him break out with a loud curse.

Olive sprang to her feet and hurried to his chair, to lay her hand upon his brow.

"Roderick, dear," she cried, "be calm."

"Calm!" he cried: "calm!"

"You are hot and feverish, and you frighten me. You will be ill again."

"Well," he said sneeringly, "isn't that what you want?"

"Roderick!"

"Another good fit of illness and insensibility, so that we may have the doctor again, and nice long nursing tête-à-têtes."

"Roderick!" she cried in agony; "how can you be so cruel? What is the matter?"

"Matter? What has always been the matter? You know well enough: money."

"Ah!" she sighed.

"Yes, money, beggarly money. Here am I, supposed to be a nobleman with a rich wife, and treated by everybody as if I were wealthy, and all the time worse off than a city clerk."

"Is it—another debt?" she faltered.

"Debt? It's a dozen; and money I must have from somewhere. I'm not going to be sold up, and so I tell them."

He leaped up, and went to a tall cabinet that stood between the windows, took out his keys, opened it, pulled out a drawer, and stood with his back to her, doing something which made a clicking sound, and then turned sharply round, holding a revolver in his hand, and thrusting some cartridges in his pocket.

"Roderick!" she cried, with a horrified look, and she sprang at him to try and take the weapon from his hand.

"Idiot! Don't be a fool, woman," he said harshly, as he wrested his hand away. "You'll have the thing go off. Oh, don't be alarmed. I'm not going to blow out your brains, nor my own either. This is for those cursed city hounds. Put in men in possession, will they? Law or no law, I'll shoot the first man who dares to show his face. A set of thieves! Two hundred pounds interest at least for every fifty I have had."

"Money—you have borrowed?" faltered Olive.

"That's it. Curse 'em, let 'em come; that's all."

"Oh, Roderick, you must not do anything rash."

"Oh, I won't, but I'm afraid they will if they come here," he cried, with a curious laugh. "The scum! It would be a benefit to humanity to polish off two or three of the scoundrels. Don't let them come in and interfere with me, that's all."

He thrust the revolver into his breast-pocket, and buttoned his coat over it. "But now, look here. I've been hard hit lately, after a pretty good run of luck, and I'm regularly in Queer Street. They are going to put in an execution——"

"What does that mean?" said Olive, trying to be firm.

"How sweet and innocent we are!" he cried mockingly. "Seizing and selling up the house and furniture, horses, carriages, and everything."

"Oh!" sighed Olive, as she thought of the household gods she had worshipped when she was a girl about to be married, so short a time back, but which seemed so long ago. Then, recovering herself: "Well, dear," she sighed, "let them take them and pay your debts. We shall be so much happier then."

"Oh, indeed! And you can go to your father, and use his carriage, and there will be nothing to mind. No, it isn't coming to that, my sweet wife," and he tapped his breast.

"Roderick, for pity's sake, don't talk to me in that cruel, mocking way."

"Very well, then, I'll put it straight I shall do someone a mischief if they use force, so you had better try and stop it."

"Yes, dear, I will," she cried. "There are all my jewels. I know they are worth a great deal. Let's take them and sell them."

"Pish! They'd sell for a song. No; you must go a different way to work. I'm not going to be disgraced like this. I haven't troubled the old man lately, and he hasn't troubled me. But he can't sit still and see you sold up. Go to him, and don't ask a favour of him; tell him he must help us, and then he will."

Digitized by Google

Olive's brow wrinkled, and she shook her head.

"I cannot," she said.

"But you must. This is no time for squeamishness. I let you off when you went to him at other times, and he refused—a miserable old miser!—but there must be no nonsense now. Tell him he must come down and save us from this disgrace."

"He will not, dear," cried Olive wildly. "It will only make him violently angry against you."

"What does that matter? He hates me as it is. He must and shall help us. Now then, go at once."

"I cannot, I cannot, dear."

"But you shall."

"I would if I could, Roderick; but it will only make matters worse. He said last time——"

Olive stopped short, and turned scarlet, then pale, and the tears rose to her eyes.

"Well, what did he say?"

She was silent, and shook her head.

"Tell me what he said," cried Braetoun savagely, and he caught her wrist.

"Don't, dear. You hurt me," she cried.

"And I'll hurt you more if you trifle with me. Now, then, what did he say?"

"Don't, pray, don't make me tell you, dear."

"Say it at once," cried Braetoun fiercely. "What was it?"

He was pressing her arm so cruelly that the pain awoke resentment, and she said quickly:

"That if you wanted money so badly you might sell ——"

"The Brompton house," cried Braetoun, for she stopped with her face scarlet. "Yes, of course. Never mind; I'm not going to sell that, nor this either, so go and tell him he must."

"I cannot, Roderick."

"You go."

"No, I cannot," she said sadly.

"What? Out with it, then," he cried. "Say you will not at once."

"I will not——" She stopped short.

"What?"

"I will not insult my father by going and asking him again," said Olive firmly. "It is too painful and degrading. You cannot be so cruel as to force me to do such a thing as this."

Braetoun turned pale with rage and passion.

"Degrading, is it? Well, what if it is? Who are you to talk of degradation, after what has passed? Now, look here, I've put up with too much, and I won't suffer for nothing. Will you go to your father for help?"

"No, Roderick, I cannot," she said coldly. "You must go and ask him yourself."

"I would if I could get it," said Braetoun with a laugh. "Then you will not go?"

She made no answer, and there was a look in her eyes that he had not seen there before, one which reminded him of her father; but he was half mad with disappointment and rage at finding the timid, quiet girl no longer patient and plastic in his hands.

"Very well, then," he said, "it is no time to be nice; I must have the money from somebody. It's rather degrading for me," he laughed mockingly, "but the debts must be paid. Ring and order the carriage."

She rose, and crossed the room slowly to touch the bell, after which they both waited till it had been answered, and the door was once more closed.

"Now put on your things," he said, taking her by the wrist, and speaking through his teeth, with his eyes half closed; "drive to Wimpole Street, and tell Murray he must let me have five thousand pounds at once, or sign his name to bills for that amount."

Olive sprang to her feet, wrested her wrist away, and stood gazing at her husband with flashing eyes.

"Ah! that bites, does it?" he said, in a low husky voice. "I understand: don't reproach me again for being a little weak. He has plenty of money, makes no end, and saves it. Tell him it must be done directly, as I want it. Do you understand?"

"How dare you ask me to do such a thing as this?" she cried, with her cheeks flaming.

"Because he is the man who can refuse you nothing."

"Refuse me—nothing! Roderick, are you mad?"

"Pretty nearly, and I shall be quite if you don't go soon. Now, no nonsense—five thousand in cash or bills at once."

"But you cannot ask him."

"No, but you can."

"Why?" cried Olive excitedly.

"Because in this miserable extremity I am compelled to stoop and ask it of my wife's lover."

"Roderick!"

"Well, do you think I'm blind, that I haven't known what has been going on all this time?"

"This from my husband!" she moaned.

"This from your husband. Haven't I borne with it long enough—been obliged to bear with it—curse him! Do you think I did not know? Such a good, patient wife as you have been, nursing me through all my long illness. Such a faithful friend and clever doctor!" he went on in a low, fierce tone, completely beside himself with passion, but never once raising his voice. "Good wife! So admired by everyone for her devotion to her husband—and the doctor."

"Roderick, what are you saying?" she cried passionately.

"The truth," he cried savagely. "I've borne it all too long; now I'm forced by my misfortunes to speak. I am the culprit, of course—the fast man about town, and everyone has a kick at me, while you go on in your smug respectability, playing the model wife, and everyone is full of praise."

"Roderick, you do not know what you are saying? It is not true."

"Not true! When even the paid nurse has protested to me about my lady's goings on with the doctor, and I, poor helpless invalid, have seen her sneer as she spoke in a pitying way to me."

"Oh! That woman! Nurse Jennett?"

"Yes, that woman—Nurse Jennett."

"Roderick, my husband, don't, don't believe it," she cried.

"Even my mother warned me about what she felt sure was going on."

"Your mother! Oh, impossible!"

"Indeed! I was blind and foolish. I said you were too good and true a girl to deceive, and she said she hoped you were, but that it was my duty to keep my eyes open, for she believed that with all his smoothness Allan Murray was a dangerous man."

"I cannot believe it."

"Ask her, then. She said she had seen several little passages between you, which showed a gross familiarity."

"Roderick, I swear it is not true."

"Why, he owned to it—to me."

"Dr. Murray!"

"Yes; our dear Allan, the grave, quiet, thoughtful, clever physician, curse him! Told me he loved you, and always had loved you—told me to my face."

"Oh!" groaned Olive, and she sank back and covered her ghastly face.

"There," he cried, raising his voice; "deny it now. Tell me it is false, and then I won't believe you. But are you beginning to see why you are to go to him and tell him I must have this money? Are you too shamefaced to ask it of him now?"

"Oh, Roderick! That you could believe this!"

"You made me when I vowed that it was not possible. That nurse opened my eyes."

Digitized by Google

Olive's hands dropped from her pallid features, and she looked Braetoun in the eyes unflinchingly, while his wavered and fell.

"Look at me, Roderick," she said in a low, pained voice—and her breath seemed to come short. "I am your wife—the woman you swore to love and protect."

"And I the man to whom you swore faith."

"Yes, and I have kept my oath, dear. Look me in the eyes and tell me you do not believe this cruel slander."

"I do believe it," he cried.

"Then all is over," she said, with a low, sobbing cry, "and I must go."

"Yes, and tell him there must be no shilly-shallying. I must have the money at once."

"I am going home, dear," she said wearily, "to one who will not believe this infamy of his child."

"What, run away?" cried Braetoun savagely. "Not you. You shall go and get this money off Murray."

"No," said Olive firmly, as she saw his hand go to his breast and half draw the pistol, "not if you kill me."

"It is of no use for you to fight against it. You have ceased to care for me long enough, but I'm not going to complain, and you are to blame for anything I have done. Just understand this: we must keep up appearances, I suppose, so get me the money, and I will take no further notice. I can't afford to have my health wrecked for the sake of a woman; and besides," he added, with a sneer, "the doctor is useful to me."

Olive stood before him with her hands clasped, gazing in horror.

"Oh," she cried at last, in a voice he did not know. "Is this my husband speaking?"

"Yes, your fooled and deluded husband. Don't trouble yourself to lie any more, but be content that I do not take some savage revenge on you both. We must have no more scenes, my money troubles are enough. I'm not going to be jealous, I tell you—you are not worth it. I ought to have known better, for it is what I might have expected from a woman of your birth and breeding."

"And this is my husband!" she cried at last, with a passionate outburst of grief—"the man who swore to love and protect me. Heaven help me, then—I must protect myself."

Her indignant womanhood thoroughly roused, she faced him, and for the moment he was cowed by the beautiful woman whom he seemed to know thoroughly now for the first time.

"Yes," she said, "it is true, then—that which my heart has whispered a hundred times. Lord Braetoun, the nobleman, my husband, is really a man utterly devoid of honour—oh, that I should have lived to say it—utterly cruel and base. Yes, I will go—not to Allan Murray, but to my father—not as your miserable mendicant, to beg for money, that you may waste it, but to seek refuge from your cruelty—and from this shame."

"What!" he roared, as he started up and advanced threateningly; "you dare to leave here or to do other than what I have said, and I'll kill you."

"Kill me?" she said with a bitter laugh: "my poor body. Why, you have already killed my love and girlish trust, made me a despairing, reckless woman, crushed out every hope. Well, kill me. Finish your cruel work I am ready. What have I to live for now?"

"Allan Murray!" he cried, but his eyes fell before her indignant gaze as he said the words. "Pish! Heroics! Stage. Once more, will you go?"

"I would sooner die."

"If you do not get it there is nothing left for me to do but blow out my brains."

She retorted with a contemptuous laugh:

"'Heroics! Stage!'"

He gazed at her now in wonder.

"You don't believe me?"

"No: you have proved to me by your words that you are too great a coward. Fresh from what was almost a school, what did I know of the world and its ways? I had no mother to whom I could fly for help and counsel, and, longing as I did for a woman's help in such a strait, I gladly clung to Lady Braetoun, and believed her praises of her noble son."

"Have you nearly done?" he sneered.

"Yes," she said coldly, but her words cut him as if they had been some weapon forcing a way to his heart. "I believed in her gross flattery, her blessings, and miserable adulation. She told me that her one hope, her one desire, was to see her noble boy happily married to some true, innocent girl who would give her heart's love—and—a hundred thousand pounds. True, noble, society mother, counsellor of the innocent girl. Oh, great Heaven! How easy it was! How soon I was snared! I listened—I drank it all in as the truth—her words—your words—and I believed. I did not love you, but I was attracted by all this, and I said it is the beginning of the love a woman should bear a man, the rest—the long clinging attachment of which I had read—would come. I became your wife in a dream, and ever since I would not awaken from it. 'The love will come,' I said. I prayed for it nightly on my knees, and I went on in my wretched dream, knowing all, seeing all, but refusing to believe till now that with cruel hands you have awakened me, and I cannot dream again."

"Have you quite done now?" he said sneeringly. "Then it is my turn. I am not too great a coward to use the pistol on myself—to make my exit, and leave him the charming young widow as soon as decency allows, and the fresh married settlements can be drawn out to satisfy your father."

She stood with her eyes withering him in their contempt, and he blazed out more fiercely now.

"Curse you! Confess it before I go. He was your lover before we were married?"

"I have degraded myself enough by my defence already," she said coldly.

"Once more—I give you another chance to save me—to save him. Will you go?"

"Yes. Home. Never to return."

"Then, by G—d! I'll go myself, and make him disgorge."

"Roderick!" she cried wildly, as he dashed towards the door; and she caught him by the arm, mad now with terror, but the struggle was short. He swung her here and there for a few moments, and then as he tore himself free, and rushed out, she tottered toward the door, which was flung back heavily in her face.

(To be continued.)

Result of Jumbled Story.

No. 16.

£5 has been sent to Mr. H. P. Wright, 72, Evelina Road, Nunhead, S.E., and each of the following readers has received £1: Mrs. Fitz-Gerald, 17, Christchurch Road, Folkestone; Mr. T. W. Rawlins, 8, Barketon Mansions, South Kensington, S.W.; Mrs. E. A. Hallam, 46, Clifton Road, Peckham, S.E.; Mr. A. R. Conder, Monte House, The Avenue, Southampton; and Mr. E. Cockburn, 8, South Niddry Street, Edinburgh.

POSTAL RATES.

SHORT STORIES will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

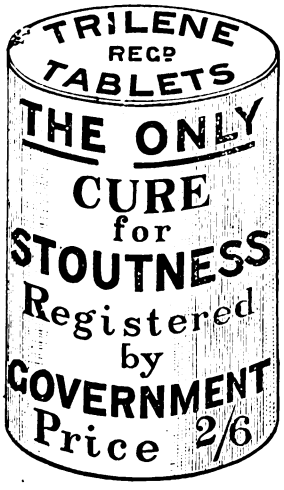
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87, Alexandra Road, Norwich.

"GENTLEMEN,—I have had some boxes of your Tablets for my wife, and she has derived great benefit from them.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Illustrated Family Novelist, November 30th, 1895, says: "A great many women who are plump by nature worry about their stoutness. However, there are some perfectly safe remedies for embonpoint, among them being the Trilene Tablets, which are not only safe, but absolutely beneficial to the general health, and speedily produce the desired effect."

MR. TAYLOR, Church Farm, St. James, Halesworth, says: "I have lost quite 2 stone since taking your Tablets."

"6, Brighton Terrace, Hull.

"MRS. JOHNSON has much pleasure in saying she has derived great benefit from your Tablets."

"3, Castle Road, Deal.

"MRS. J. PEARSON is glad to say she is much thinner."

Convalescent Home, New Brighton, Cheshire.

MISS S. J. PRITCHARD says: "They have done me good. I am 21lb. lighter already."

"Bretton West, near Wakefield.

"MISS L. LANGFIELD has taken a box of Tablets, and is already 7lb. lighter."

MRS. HUTCHINSON, 46, Irwell Street, Widnes, Lancashire, writes: "I have taken three boxes and am reduced a stone."

A. D. BILLINGS, Bell Inn, Aldershot, writes: "Have derived great benefit already. Less in size and weight, and breathing greatly improved."

25, Windsor Terrace, Penarth, Cardiff.

MISS M. FLAVELL says: "I have lost 2 stone, and am much better in health."

Extract from Bury and Suffolk Times, June 15th, 1894: "Miss Atherton sings and dances as piquantly as ever, and is a marvel of agility, considering how much flesh she has put on of late. Her friends should induce her to take a course of Trilene Tablets, about which I hear wonderful things. One portly acquaintance of my own by merely a few weeks' use of these little Tablets, has reduced his bulk perceptibly. I am assured the Tablets are harmless and tasteless, and that the Trilene Company in Finsbury Pavement, London, are doing an enormous and ever-increasing trade."

MR. GILLESPIE, 50, Chancer Road, Forest Gate, Essex, says: "I have lost just 3 stone."

2, Chariot Street, Hull.

MR. JUDD, Chemist, says: "My customers speak highly of your Tablets."

Windsor Hotel, Merthyr Vale, South Wales.

MR. J. THOMAS writes: "When I started the Tablets I weighed 17½ stone, and have got down to 14st. 9lb."

West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

MR. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17 stone, was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15 stone."

Aspern, 29, King's Hall Road, Beckenham.

MISS S. WOODHOUSE writes: "I have much pleasure in stating that your Tablets are really a safe cure for stoutness; they have cured me, and I am a perfect figure now."

MRS. GIBBON, of Radford Cottage, Bitterne, says: "I have derived great benefit from your Tablets, especially abdominal."

131, Victoria Street, London, S.W.

MRS. ARTHUR WEGUELIN (the "Society" celebrity) writes: "By simply taking the Trilene regularly, and without change of diet, I have lost 1st. 4lb. in four weeks."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 70, FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

J. THEOBALD & CO.'S SPECIALITIES.

OUR GRAND CHRISTMAS BOX PARCEL.

DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE PRIZES.

A CHANCE SELDOM MET WITH.

GIVEN AWAY Free of Charge to our Customers, 100 Golden Sovereigns, 100 Half-Sovereigns, 100 Five-Shilling Pieces, 100 Real Silver Watches, 500 Framed Oil Paintings, 500 Clocks, 500 Keyless Watches, 500 Real Gold Brooches, 500 Real Gold Rings 500 Silver Brooches, 500 Silver Rings, 500 Silver Pins.

We guarantee at least One Prize to every ten persons entering into our grand Bonus Parcel scheme.

Each Parcel contains a pair of very handsomely carved Wall Brackets, one representing a blacksmith at work shoeing, and the other in the form of a magnificent stag; a beautiful Miniature Photograph, mounted in Ivorine frame, representing Old Father Christmas, with powerful magnifying glass complete; Glass Mirror in frame; large carved-out model of a Tramcar, made to take to pieces and put together again, and which moves along the ground; Yacht Race Game, consisting of a coloured board representing the sea, some little movable model yachts, and either dice or revolving pointer for playing; a large size figure of a Mechanical Clown; Nanky Po, the real Japanese Doll, from Yokohama; splendid coloured figure One of England's Brave Defenders, standing 15-in. high, and which sells at 6d.; six of Raphael Tuck's Christmas Cards; large Scrap Book in colours, with a variety of Scraps included; coloured Story Book of the Ten Little Nigger Boys; the popular game of Blizzard, with board, revolving disc, and balls complete; packet of Black Peter, a card game for any number of players; beautifully colored packet of cards for Snap; 100 Japanese Fairy Fire Stars; The Magicians' Album, which can be shown full of blank leaves, and at word of command changes to animals, then is found full of letters of the alphabet, these change to butterflies and again to plain leaves—about 12 different transformations; real Japanese Fish Game, containing 12 Japanese Fish and two double-jointed fishing rods; complete game of Lotto; Marvellous Swimming Frog, which, when placed in water, goes along; also a packet of Fortune-telling Cards, Grand Family Card Game of Robinson Crusoe, The Flutina Bagpipe (the New Japanese Musical Instrument), The Magic Maze, The Square Card Puzzle, The Maltese Cross Puzzle, The Magic Scissors Trick, The Performing Egg Trick, and the curious Optical Illusion of the Coster and the Obstinate Donkey.

2/6 each, or two Parcels for 4/6.

In each parcel is a Prize Coupon, which entitles you to a chance of obtaining one of the valuable prizes which we give away at the end of this year.

NIGGER WIGS, 1/3, 2/6; Beards, any colour but blue, 1/3, 1/9; Whiskers, 1/-; Moustachios, 6d.; Boxes Theatrical Make-up, 2/9, 5/6; Nigger Collars, 1/3, 1/9; Cuffs, 1/3, 2/6; Front and Collar, 2/6; Nigger Suit, 12/6; Clown's Suit, 15/-; Black for faces, 8d., 1/2; Nigger Dialogue Books, 1/2; Secret of Ventriloquism, 1/2; Magic and Mysteries, 1/2; Thought Reading, 1/2; Wigs, Masks, and Costumes of every description. Father Xmas Mask and Beard, 1/6, 2/6; Clown's Hats, 1/6, 2/6, 4/6.

CHRISTMAS TREE ORNAMENTS—Boxes containing assortment of candles, reflectors, glass balls, fancy boxes, candlesticks, fancy lanterns, &c., carriage free, 1/3 and 2/10½. Specially recommended ditto, splendid value, 5/6, 10/6, 21/-, and 42/-. Artificial Frost, 8d., 1/2 and 2/6 per box. Artificial Moss, 8d. per bundle. Father Christmas Mask and Beard, 1/3, 1/9 and 2/6. Nigger Theatricals, Wigs, Suits, &c. Boxes of Theatrical Make-up, Powders, Paints, &c., 2/10, 5/6, 10/6, and 21/-; with full instructions, Spangles, 8d., 1/2, and 2/6. Illustrated Catalogue, 500 Illustrations, 1d.

PUZZLE TRICKS, &c.—The Magic Purse (no one can get money out but owner), 1/2. Puzzle Match Box, best puzzle out, 1/2; in Metal, 2/6. Trick Finger Fusee Case, 1/3 Boxes of good Conjuring Tricks, 1/3, 2/10, 5/4, 10/6. Magic Egg Bag Trick, 1/2. Shower of Sweets Trick, 8d. Packs of Conjuring Cards, 1/2 and 2/8. Puzzles, Games, &c., of every description. X.Y.Z. Rays Camera, shows bones in hand, 1/3.

DOROTHY DENE—The Lady Dollie, 18-ins. high, with clothes to take on and off, well made, over 100 different changes of garments, every one removable, the delight of any child, the most astounding value ever offered, 1/6 carriage free. Sets of materials ready marked out for cutting up into 3 costumes for a doll 18 inches high, 1/2; for 5 costumes, 1/6; an immense novelty, Musical Boxes, 1/3, 2/6, 5/6 up to £10. 10s. 250 Colored Scraps, 1/3; 600 ditto, 9/6; Scrap Albums, 8d. and 1/3.

GRAND ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF NOVELTIES. 500 Illustrations. 1d. Every Novelty up-to-date; goods of every description.

J. THEOBALD & CO., 19, Farringdon Road, London, E.C.

ESTABLISHED 60 YEARS.

CAN YOU WRITE?

Of course you can! Why not then emboss your Notepaper, etc., with a pretty Monogram? using the

Patent Pocket Monopresse

Every Initial and Monogram of two letters kept in stock. Monogram of two letters, 1/1; Initials, 10d. each, post free. Apply—

CHAS. ROMPLER, 7, New Basinghall St., London, E.C. Agents wanted.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair

FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE,

and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.

VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A.D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work.

39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO. 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

CORPULENCY CURED

By a simple inexpensive self-treatment, effecting a rapid and permanent reduction without change in diet. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. G. A. BOYD, 14, York Buildings, Charing Cross, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, MRS. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

Digitized by Google

"DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND": The Story of a Clever Amateur Detective. (See page 609.)

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 411. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 14TH, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

SUCH AS

Sick Headache, Constipation,
Weak Stomach, Impaired Digestion,
Disordered Liver & Female Ailments.

ANNUAL SALE SIX MILLION BOXES.

In Boxes, 9½d., 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

MACK'S DOUBLE STARCH — Sample Box Post Free, Two Stamps.
Produces beautiful, white, glossy linen. Saves time and labour. In 1d., 3d., & 6d. Boxes. Name this Publication.

BROMLEY'S COFFEE ESSENCE — Sample, 2d. to cover Postage.
Delicious Coffee at One Farthing per cup, prepared in two seconds. In 6d., 1/-, 2/-, 3/6, or 5/- Bottles. 6d. Bottle, Nine Stamps, Post Free.

RISIN' SUN METAL POLISH — Sample Bottle Post Free, Two Stamps
Gives to all metals a beautiful, soft, brilliant polish. In 1d., 3d., 6d. & 1/- Bottles.

C. CHANCELLOR & CO., LONDON, E.C.

MASON'S

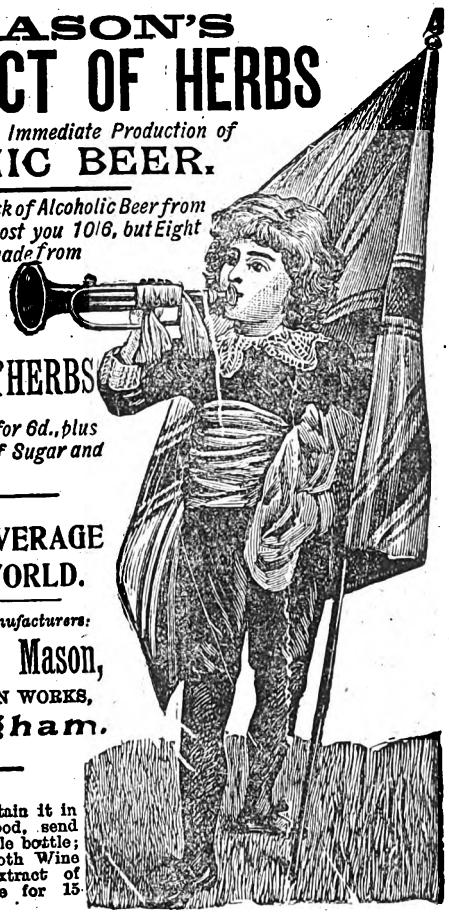
EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS



Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

THE "SURPRISE" WHISTLE.

A Piercing, Penetrating, Nerve-Racking, Ear-Splitter

The rubber bulb on the end makes it capable of producing 1,000 different effects, from purling or muffled tones up to a great swelling, booming, two-mile piercing note, that will equal a steamboat or locomotive whistle. A PERFECT DOG OR QUAIL CALL. Cyclists will find the "Surprise" a magnificent road clearer. Post free 13 stamps.—MILLARD BROS., Dept. 9,123, HOUNDSDITCH, LONDON, E.C.

THE "ENGLISH ORGANETTE."

WITH EXPRESSION STOP
EASY PAYMENTS, 4/- Monthly.

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Polkas, Reels, Hornpipes. Any tune can be played with artistic effect by anyone. No musical knowledge required. A mere child can play it.

Most Marvellous Musical Instrument in the World. Price 30/. Terms: 4/- deposit & 4/- monthly. Organette delivered when first 4/- is paid. Write for list of music and full particulars. (Mention this paper.)
J. M. DRAPER, Organette Works, BLACKBURN.

TOOTH-ACHE
CURED INSTANTLY BY
BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay. Saves Extraction, Sleepless Nights Prevented. Neuralgic Headache and all Nerve Pains Removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Chemists, 1s. 1½d.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Works by hand or treadle. Guaranteed 4 years. Equal in quality and size to any machine. To ensure satisfaction, we will send machine on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL. Balance can be paid 5/- Monthly. Call or write for designs and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 188B, High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63, Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14, High Rd., Kilburn.

ARE YOU LITTLE?

If so, wear the "A D" Invisible Elevators (Regd.). Will increase your height up to four inches; the only approved means; detection impossible; simple, inexpensive. Send stamped envelope for particulars to the ORIENTAL TOILET CO. (B 5 Dept.), 87, Strand, London.

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue 250 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 43
Nov. 14, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. B. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

XMAS FOR 1s. 3d.

CHRISTMAS PANTOMIME INCLUDED!

"THE IDEA! WHO'D HAVE THOUGHT IT?"

"Why, No One but 'PAIN BROTHERS OF HASTINGS.'" "THE IDEA STRUCK US" that we should like to make the readers of this paper a MARVELLOUS PARCEL of CHRISTMAS CARDS, to give you SOMETHING WORTH REMEMBERING, and we have indeed accomplished it, as you will see below. Simply write on a piece of paper your name and full address, and the words "Short Stories MARVELLOUS XMAS PARCEL," and post it, together with Postal Order for 1/3 or 16 stamps (a Shilling Postal Order and Three Stamps much preferred), any day before Xmas, and you will receive all the following by return POST FREE "ON APPROVAL" (we repeat, "ON APPROVAL") the CHOICEST AND PRETTIEST COLLECTION OF ART NOVELTIES ever seen for the money, surpassing in beauty anything before offered, a selection to suit all, sufficient to post to friends and to decorate the mantelpiece, &c., to make the home bright and cheerful for Xmas. All Cards have good and seasonable wishes, and some also have verses and spaces for autographs.

Remember, all Parcels are sent on approval. Have one sent to look at; if you like it, keep it; if not return it, and we will return your money in full. Can we say anything fairer than this?"

The first three Cards are worth the small amount charged for the whole parcel. A novel and amusing clever mechanical "PANORAMIC STANDING CARD" of the ever popular "Little Red Riding Hood," "Robinson Crusoe," "Sleeping Beauty," "Beauty and the Beast," or "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves." A Complete "CHRISTMAS PANTOMIME AT HOME." This ingeniously invented card stands up, pulls out from front to back, something like the concertina principle, and when fully extended, three good scenes appear, showing cut-out figures, beautiful scenery, &c., "Little Red Riding Hood," "Her Mother," "The Wolf," &c., or three equally as good scenes in the other favourite and popular pantomimes named; forming a remarkably good representation of a Pantomime Performance, value 6d. A LOVELY CHOICE "JEWELLED" FOLDING CARD of Beautiful Flowers. HIGHLY JEWELLED in bright sparkling gold or silver (a Real Gem), value 8d. A Pretty Floral Folding Autograph Card, artistic Centre, fancy Border, &c., 6d. An Elegant Folding Card, Pretty Chrysanthemums, two Beautifully Coloured Butterflies, giving the card a striking effect; or a lovely Card with Coloured embossed Wild Rose, &c., 6d. A good and taking Comic Folding Card, Comically Dressed Cat or Kitten and Puppy at Play, 3d. A Charming Trifold Card, marguerites or violets, art tinted and fancy cut-out borders, 4d. A PRETTY "JEWELLED" BOOKLET CARD, tied with delicate PINK OR BLUE SILK CORD & TASSELS, lovely Forget-me-nots, Violets, &c., two dainty leaves inside with wish, verse, and autograph space, 6d. A very Choice Threefold Card, artistic cut-out Centre or Border in gilt, &c., 6d. A Sweetly Pretty Floral Autograph Card of the now favourite "BLACK AND WHITE" Series, gilt wish, &c., 3d. A good laughable Card of Cyclists or Oarsmen, inevitable collision of Cycles or Boats averted by an ingenious fold in the card, very amusing, 3d. Unique "JEWELLED" Threefold Card, an ORIENTAL SCENE, prettily illuminated with CHINESE LANTERNS, &c., 4d. Another good striking card, the favourite old-fashioned Fuchsia or Corn Flower, very natural, and pretty open-work gilt borders, 4d. Besides all the above are given six more Cards, value from 1d. to 4d. each, taken from a large stock of Folding, Jewelled, Fancy-shaped, &c., Cards. The whole Contents for 1s. 3d. only, POST FREE, and we ask you to write as early as possible, and thus help to avoid a rush nearer Xmas for this "MARVELLOUS PARCEL." Our Mottoes: "'FORWARD,' WITH CHOICE ARTISTIC DESIGNS AND GREAT VALUE"; and, "A BIG TRADE, NOT A BIG PROFIT." (Established 1889.) Address:

MESSRS. PAIN BROTHERS, Publishers and Wholesale "Art Traders," HASTINGS.

Dr. Mackenzie's ARSENICAL TOILET SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

NOSE

A RADICAL PERMANENT CURE. Medically approved for Red Noses. 3/9, post free, under cover. Pamphlet, "Red Noses, Cause and Prevention," 1/-; Machines for Ugly Noses, particulars for stamp.—LEES RAY, Specialist, Wavertree, Liverpool.

WANTED

12 STAMPS for Seventy Songs (words and music), Piano and Dance pieces, or 10/- worth New Copyright Music (state kind preferred). Packet of Exquisite Scent free to purchasers.—Turner's Piano and Music Depot, London Road, Preston.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

A SUPERIOR PRINTING OUTFIT FOR 1/6.

Consisting of 74 letters, points, and ornaments, a type-holder, supply of ink, pad, and tweezers. Any name, &c., can be made at pleasure for stamping books, papers, and printing cards. POSTAGE 3D. EXTRA.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE.

N.B.—Larger outfits can be supplied at 2/6, 3/6, and 6/6 each.

E. E. LINDNER, 170, Fleet Street, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 411.] [One Penny

For the Week ending November 14th, 1896.

DIAMOND ✣ CUT ✣ DIAMOND.

SIR EUSTACE MARSTON was the soul of hospitality but he was not always discreet in his choice of guests. There were none who would refuse an invitation to Marston Manor; there were plenty who came away with their noses in the air, wondering "where Sir Eustace manages to pick up the people he asks to meet one, don't you know." The fact was, that Sir Eustace, a genial, florid old giant of sixty, had one weak point—hunting. Let a casual acquaintance introduce a total stranger to the baronet with the remark added, "First-rate across country, Sir Eustace," and it was odds that the Squire would invite the two to Marston Manor to try their luck in his own famous country. This fact was so notorious that many who wanted a few days' hunting, or who wished to see the glories of Marston Manor, got themselves introduced to Sir Eustace and fished for an invitation on the strength of a reputation that was not always justified. The Squire, good easy man, scarcely troubled himself about the social consideration of his guests—though, of course, he knew where and when to draw the line—and so it came about that not a few whom nobody knew, and whom it would not have harmed anybody to know, were admitted to the Manor. As were, occasionally, certain others.

November was gone, December was half over, and all the time guests had been coming and going; but to-day the house was empty, and Miss Marston and her friend, Lucy Fulton, were spending a quiet afternoon together, discussing friends who had departed and those whose arrival was still expected.

"So Everard Hood is coming to-night," said Lucy, with a sidelong look at Miss Marston. "How many times will this make, Gertrude?"

Gertrude rose quickly and lifted a heap of Liberty silks from the sofa to the table. "I don't think I understand." she said in some confusion.

"Don't you, dear?" mocked Lucy. "Then I'll explain. He is coming down to propose to you for the third time. Have you made up your mind what answer you will give him?"

"Mr. Hood has just returned from Siberia," said Gertrude, frowning slightly and ignoring the question.

"I know, and I suppose he will be off to the South Pole if you refuse him again. That seems to me to be the only place on the globe he has not visited. Well, you need not answer unless you choose. Of course, you will refuse him? What attraction can he possibly have for a girl like you?"

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"There is a very great deal more in him than in the men you delight to honour with your preference, my dear Luce," answered Gertrude rather tartly.

Lucy burst out laughing. "You have risen to the bait," she cried, clapping her hands. "Now I shall watch the issue of this visit with all the more interest."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Gertrude, sweeping the silks together in a heap. "I hope I am able to do justice to a man's good points without necessarily being in love with him." She flushed again as she spoke.

"Oh, certainly," acquiesced Lucy with a little moue. "But I am quite sure Everard Hood is not your ideal. He is not mine, at all events. What is your ideal, Gertrude?"

A smile twitched at the corners of Gertrude's mouth. "How fast you go, Luce," she said. "My ideal! Well, now, really, it is so nebulous—I——"

"Then I'll materialise it, or, rather, him, into definite shape," cried the irrepressible Lucy joyously. "Listen, now. He has the face of a Viking and the manners of a—of a—Chesterfield."

Gertrude burst out laughing. "Oh, spare me, Luce," she cried. "What a combination!"

"Wait until I have finished," went on Lucy. "He is tall and broad-shouldered, with well-chiselled features and keen blue eyes—rather a soldierly type, you know—fair hair and a moustache, of course. Handsome all over and—why, good gracious!" she broke off, looking out of the window, "if here isn't the very identical ideal driving up to the house at the precise moment when I am describing him."

"What do you mean?" asked Gertrude, peeping over her friend's shoulder. "Ah!" she exclaimed, drawing back quickly. "It is Mr. Hood; and he must have seen us looking at him. How very annoying!"

"What does it matter?" said Lucy, gaily waving her hand to Hood. "Being a man, he will flatter himself that you were watching for his arrival; being a lover, he will not dare to believe it. But never mind him. Did you notice the other man? What a face! What a figure! What a voice! How he rolled out his directions to the groom about the portmanteau that had been left behind! There is your Chesterfieldian Viking, all ready to your hand. You have only to show yourself, my dear, and he is yours. Who can he be?"

"Love laughs at locksmiths."

"You'll exhaust your notes of admiration if you don't stop," said Gertrude impatiently. "I'm sure I wish you would—stop, I mean. We've done nothing but talk man for the last half hour. Do come and look at these silks."

"There was one note of interrogation, if you remember," persisted Lucy. "Who is he?"

"Colonel Dubois, I presume. He is the only other guest expected to-day."

"A soldier! Then that makes up the tale. Is he French? He can't be with a face like that. Have you known him long? I never heard you speak of him. Come now, tell me all about him."

"I never heard of him myself until yesterday," replied Gertrude. "I understand from my father that he speaks both French and English perfectly, that he holds a commission in the French army, and that he is very fond of hunting." They both laughed a little. "Sir Eustace met him in town, liked him, and asked him down here. Voilà tout! There's the dressing bell."

"Gertrude," whispered Lucy mischievously, as they went upstairs, "I materialised this beautiful ideal for you, and, of course, he's yours if you want him; but if you don't—oh, my dear, would you mind letting me try my powers of fascination?"

"I think you are an absolutely horrid girl, Luce," laughed Gertrude. "I have a great mind to write to your mother, and ask her to lock you up."

"Do, by all means," retorted Lucy saucily, as she ran off to her room. "Love laughs at locksmiths."

When, later on, Gertrude descended to the drawing-room, a tall man, who had been staring out of the window, turned to greet her with a low bow.

"Colonel Dubois?" said the girl, smiling a welcome.

"The same," he replied, bowing still lower over her outstretched hand. "And you, no doubt, are the renowned Miss Marston, whose praises are in everyone's mouth."

The strongly marked roll of the "r," and an occasional transposition of his words from the English to the French order, suggested a prolonged residence abroad, rather than a foreign origin, and with his wavy, yellow hair, and steel-blue eyes, there was nothing French about him. He might have sat for the portrait of Lucy's Viking.

Nevertheless, and notwithstanding his handsome presence, Gertrude recoiled from him instinctively. His very first words, and the glance which accompanied them, roused an antagonistic spirit within her, though, if pressed for reasons for such an attitude she would probably have taken refuge in the declaration of her conviction that Colonel Dubois was not, in feminine parlance, "nice."

Withdrawing her hand from his somewhat too fervent clasp, she answered rather distantly:

"I am Miss Marston, though I do not know that I possess any title to renown."

"Are you so deaf then to the noise of fame?" said the Colonel gallantly. "It is not usually so with beautiful women."

"What an embarrassing person," thought Gertrude, and in her relief at the entrance of the others, she greeted Hood much more warmly than she had intended to do.

Digitized by Google

"You must go in alone to-night, Hood," said Sir Eustace. "Never mind, we shall find a companion for you before you leave us, I hope."

The words were spoken without intention; but Hood

Hood stooped and kissed her.

could not help raising his eyes to Gertrude's face. He was still smiling from the warmth of her welcome, and she, seeing his joy, found herself equally unable to resist smiling back at him as she took the Colonel's arm.

"We shall have a full house to-morrow," said Sir Eustace, as they entered the dining-room; "but to-night we must just make the most of one another."

"I could contemplate with equanimity a reduction of the present company by three," murmured the Colonel under cover of the rustling they made in taking their places.

Gertrude flushed hotly. She resented the impertinence of the implication, but in her own house she felt powerless. The glance she gave the Colonel, however, boded ill for that gallant warrior's chances of sitting at her end of the table on the following night.

Hood saw the blush and immediately became possessed of an insane desire to kick the Colonel. The impulse overcame him so far that he actually raised his foot beneath the table and brought it rather violently down again.

"Oh!" screamed Lucy, dropping her soup-spoon. "Whatever is the matter with you, Mr. Hood? Do you know that is my foot? If you are subject to fits I shall move to the other side of the table."

The picture of confusion, Hood stretched out his hand to his glass, but the slender stem, unable to withstand the pressure of his nervous fingers, snapped in two, and a lake of sherry flowed over the spotless damask.

Lucy shot a mischievous glance at Gertrude and broke into a merry laugh, while Sir Eustace cried in his loud, jovial voice: "Don't look so glum, man; there's no harm done."

"You have been in some strange places since last we saw you, Mr. Hood," said Gertrude; and her smile steadied him at once.

"Yes," he answered, "and among stranger peoples. The manners and customs of the Tibetans are a trifle more singular than our own, curious though the latter sometimes be."

"Tibet," exclaimed Lucy. "That is the country where the inhabitants fire off electric sparks from their sheepskin coats on the slightest provocation, is it not?"

Hood smiled and was proceeding to explain, when the Colonel interrupted, "I've been there. What did you think of them? A lot of rascally savages and thieves. Eh?"

"Savages and thieves are to be found everywhere," said Hood quietly. "One need not go as far as Tibet to look for them."

"Your powers of observation are profound, sir," remarked the Colonel drily.

"But as to Tibet?" Gertrude hastened to ask, feeling vaguely that there was tension somewhere.

"Personally I found the Tibetans pleasant fellows enough; and as for thieves—why, I have seen bigger rascals in, let us say, Europe, than I ever encountered in the land of the Lamas."

The words were addressed to Gertrude, but as he finished speaking, Hood shifted his eyes to the Colonel's face and held them there for a second. And again Gertrude thrilled with an unpleasant sense of coming trouble.

"Your experience of the Tibetans was fortunate," said Colonel Dubois. "Myself, I was once left with nothing but the clothes I lay down in, for the beggars stole my baggage while I was asleep."

"Were they caught?" inquired Lucy.

"They were," answered the Colonel grimly. "Mounting a swift horse, I set off instantly in pursuit. I came up with them at length, six stalwart desperadoes, each armed to the teeth." He paused.

"Well?" cried Lucy breathlessly. "Don't keep us in such suspense."

"I cut them down to a man," finished the Colonel with a ferocious twist of his moustache, and, it seemed to Gertrude, a significant glance at Hood.

"Can these two have met before?" she wondered within herself. "I understood not. They don't love one another, it is evident. Surely Everard is not silly enough to be jealous of a creature like this." If Hood had but heard that thought expressed in words!

"A swift retribution," Hood was saying as Gertrude's wandering mind strayed back to the conversation; "yet no doubt preferred by them to the life of bondage that falls to the lot of the European criminal."

"Oh, I don't agree with you," said Gertrude. "Life is sweet, and one may come out of prison some day, you know."

"Certainly," assented Everard. "Prisons are rather comfortable places than otherwise, I should imagine—in this country, at all events. But picture what existence must be in a chain gang at Portland or Cayenne. I expect you could draw us a lively picture of that, Colonel!"

Digitized by Google

"I, sir!" exclaimed the Colonel, glaring at him. "What do you mean by that?"

"I naturally thought you would be acquainted with

"Please tell me, there's a dear."

the French convict system," said Hood apologetically, as Gertrude, with something like terror in her face, signalled swiftly to Lucy and rose to withdraw.

But if the Colonel suspected Hood of any covert impertinence, the latter certainly did his best to remove the impression, for he laid himself out to be agreeable with such success that when the two men joined the ladies in the drawing-room they were chatting together in the most amicable fashion. The Colonel had Everard by the arm and was laughing boisterously at something the other had said, his large bulk seeming to dwarf his companion's small, though wiry frame. Gertrude glanced anxiously at them, but something in Hood's eyes reassured her, and taking up a piece of music she sat down at the piano.

"You seem to be getting on capitally with Colonel Dubois," she remarked when a few minutes later she found herself alone with Hood.

"Ah, yes," he answered. "A lively person, very."

"You have never met before?"

"Well, perhaps, once. But I can't be sure. One meets so many people here and there about the world."

"It was not, I presume, in Tibet."

"No; it certainly was not there," said Hood with a quiet smile. "He would be a terrible person to encounter in the wilds."

They both laughed as their eyes met, and in that moment Hood took comfort from something he read in his companion's face. He was about to speak, when Gertrude said, somewhat hurriedly: "I hope your horses are none the worse for their journey down."

"No," answered Hood, taking his cue from her; "I paid them a visit before dinner, and they were looking very fit."

"What are the Colonel's mounts like?" pursued the girl, who had a passion for horses.

"I can't tell you, for he has brought no horses with him. I think he expects Sir Eustace to mount him."

"Really!" exclaimed Gertrude, much surprised. "I understood my father to say that Colonel Dubois was bringing three hunters with him. I must have been mistaken. You will have a good day to-morrow, I think," she continued. "There is no appearance of a frost."

"I hope so," said Hood, "for I expect it will be the last run I shall have for some time."

"Why?" inquired Gertrude.

"I think of sailing for Australia early in the year. I have heard that an exploring party is to start from Melbourne, and I should like to join it."

A shade of trouble came into Gertrude's eyes, and though she strove to speak lightly, there was a note of anxiety in her voice as she answered: "How insatiable you are, Mr. Hood. One would think you must have grown tired of wandering over the face of the earth. Do you never intend to settle down in your own beautiful home?"

"Yes," answered Hood quickly; "the very moment I can persuade someone to share it with me. Gertrude!" He took her hand and looked into her eyes.

"Gertrude!" he said again.

Gertrude blushed hotly. Whether she had lowered her guard by accident or design she alone knew; but she met his glance bravely and left her hand in his.

Everard held it as one in a dream. The swiftness of his own assault and the sudden capitulation of the citadel he had so long besieged in vain, bewildered him. He could not believe in his good fortune. He had nothing to say.

Gertrude understood and felt sorry for him. "Well," she whispered, "are you going to Australia—Everard?"

Hood stooped and kissed her. "No," he said with a poetry very unusual in him; "to Elysium."

Lucy looked keenly at them when she entered the drawing-room a few minutes afterwards. She learnt nothing from their faces, but her keen eyes noted that a rose which Gertrude had been wearing had found its way to the buttonhole of Hood's coat, and she drew her own conclusions. "I'll have it out with her by-and-bye," she thought, while aloud she said: "Come here, Gertrude. You are wanted to settle a point."

"What is it?" asked Gertrude, moving across the room to where Lucy and Colonel Dubois were seated upon a couch. Hood followed her and took up his position behind the couch, so that he could feast his eyes upon Gertrude unobserved. In a chair by the fire Sir Eustace slumbered serenely.

Digitized by Google

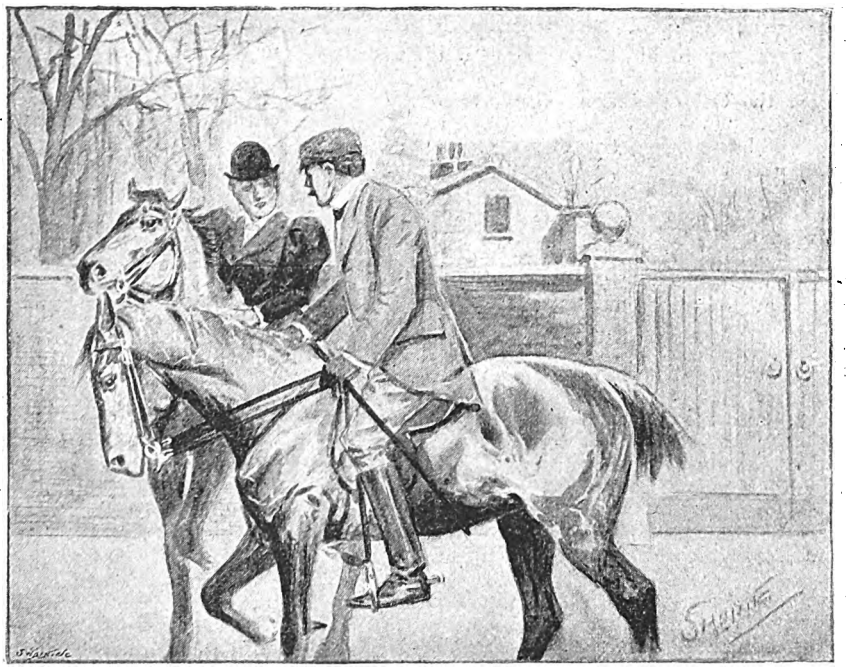
"Colonel Dubois has been entertaining me with some of his adventures," said Lucy. "And very amusing they are, some of them." She laughed—a little derisively, Gertrude thought.

"And I suppose you have been arguing with your usual freedom," her hostess smiled at her.

"No," said Lucy demurely. "I have listened meekly, as a woman should do to the words of a hero. It was only just now that I ventured for the first time to differ with Colonel Dubois."

"And am I to support you?" asked Gertrude.

"We were speaking of jewels just before you came in," went on Lucy, "and Colonel Dubois asserted that the finest rubies he had ever seen were set in the hilt of the scimitar of some Eastern potentate with a name I won't venture to try and pronounce. I suggested that the famous Marston rubies were probably finer. The Colonel doubts the possibility of this, and as I feel sure he will agree with me when once he has seen your rubies, I want you to show them to him and convince him."



"Where do you keep the key of your jewel-safe?"

Gertrude had never yet worn these wonderful gems, and as Lucy spoke the thought crossed her mind that before many months were over she would deck herself in them for somebody's benefit, and she smiled up at Everard. The expression with which he was regarding the Colonel almost startled her, but his face cleared as their eyes met, and he smiled back at her.

"Perhaps it is out of Miss Marston's power to show us the jewels," said the Colonel. "I have no doubt that gems of such value are bestowed elsewhere for safe custody."

"No," answered Gertrude; "they are here. It is a whim of my father's to have them in the house. He argues that if they are not secure here, they cannot be so anywhere else. So they are deposited in a wall safe in my boudoir and I keep the key. I do not like the responsibility, I can assure you."

"Well, no harm has come of it so far," observed Lucy, "and, if the pretty things belonged to me, I confess I should dearly love to have them where I could take an occasional peep at them I am passionately fond of all sorts of gems—particularly rubies."

"They must be a great temptation to the servants, I should think," said the Colonel.

"We have every confidence in them, most of them being old retainers," replied Gertrude coldly.

"You probably owe your immunity from attempts at robbery to the fact that it must be generally supposed that the jewels are not kept here," said Everard. "If the truth were known generally, matters might be different."

"True," agreed the Colonel. "There are some precious clever fellows among the house-breaking fraternity nowadays. I must say I should be inclined to put them in a safer place."

"We are getting no nearer to the point," cried Lucy impatiently. "I want to have it settled that your rubies are finer than any the Colonel has seen."

"They must be very fine indeed to eclipse my friend the Rajah's," said the Colonel. "Perhaps," with one of his killing glances, "you will not object to letting me see and compare them, Miss Marston. I set up to be rather a connoisseur in these things. But if it is too much trouble——"

"Not at all," answered Gertrude, turning away. "I will go and get them."

"Eh! What's that?" said Sir Eustace, who had been awake for a few minutes and, as his habit was, listened to the conversation to gather an idea of what was going on, in the fond belief that it would appear that he had not been to sleep at all. "No, no; it is too late. You shall see the jewels to-morrow. Come, Hood, let us go to the tower. Colonel, you will smoke a cigar before turning in? Be off to bed, girls. The meet is an early one."

"Gertrude," announced Lucy, as she reached her bed-room door, "I'm coming in presently for a good long chat."

"Not to-night," pleaded Gertrude. "I'm so tired, and we have to be up early, you know."

"You can't deceive me, my dear," nodded Lucy. "What did Everard say to you when we were out of the room?"

Gertrude's face was in the shadow, but she laughed as she answered: "Do you want to know very much?"

"I do, indeed. Please tell me, there's a dear."

"He declared most emphatically," said Gertrude slowly, "that—he was going to Australia immediately. Good-night. I'm going to lock my door."

Digitized by Google

What would Sir Eustace Marston have thought if he had seen, some two hours later, a man steal through the dark galleries, revolver in hand, make for the door of Gertrude's boudoir, open it and glide softly in? What would Gertrude have thought had she known that the man who thus entered and who, after localising the safe that held the precious treasure, drew softly behind the window curtains, was Everard Hood?

* * * * *

"Couldn't have a better hunting morning," said Sir Eustace, when they met again at the breakfast table. "Look at the sky. Where's the Colonel? If he doesn't look sharp we must start without him. I thought he was so keen about hunting. Ah, here he comes."

The door opened, and Colonel Dubois appeared, limping laboriously and with an expression of pain upon his handsome face.

"Good gracious! What is the matter, Colonel?" cried Sir Eustace, springing to his feet. "Have you met with an accident?"

"No, no," answered the Colonel, sinking slowly into a chair beside Gertrude. "It is merely an old wound I got in the knee when fighting the Arabs. It troubles me much at times, and I fear the cold journey of yesterday has affected it badly."

"But you can't sit a horse in that condition," said Sir Eustace plaintively.

"I fear not," replied the Colonel deprecatingly. "However, never mind about me. I will try and make myself happy by the smoking-room fire while you are away."

"So very annoying," grumbled Sir Eustace. "Really I think you two girls ought to stay at home and keep the poor fellow company."

"Not for the world," said the Colonel earnestly. "It would give me far more pain than I now suffer were I to be the means of spoiling your sport. Pray do not think of such a thing for a moment."

"After all, you will not be left so very long alone," said Sir Eustace. "Half-a-dozen people will arrive after luncheon, and I expect we shall be back between four and five."

"That will do famously," agreed the Colonel, glancing at Everard, who just then rose and left the room.

"Send my man to me in the library, please, Jenkins," Hood asked the butler, whom he met in the hall.

"Yes, sir."

"I have something to say to you, Williams," began Hood when his man joined him. "Attend carefully and carry out all I say to the letter. A great deal depends upon your doing so."

Williams was an old campaigner upon whom Hood could thoroughly rely, for they had been together in many an out-of-the-way place, and though the nature of the instructions he now received was sufficiently surprising, he made no comment, asked no questions, but simply promised obedience. Whereupon Hood left him and hastened to the front door, where the party, minus the disabled warrior, were preparing to mount their hacks.

Hood assisted Gertrude into her saddle, and swung into his own. Then, after waiting until Lucy and Sir Eustace had ridden some little distance ahead, he said: "I shall ride as far as the meet with you, Gertrude, and then I must leave you, as I have some very important business to attend to. You will not mind, I hope."

"I shall mind very much indeed, sir," answered Gertrude, with a little pout. "Can you not lay aside your business on this particular morning?"

"No," said Hood, with a smile; "not even on this particular morning. My business refuses to wait. Do not draw attention to my absence, though. In fact, Gertrude, I may as well tell you I am preparing a little surprise for you."

"A surprise for me!" echoed Gertrude. "Is it a pleasant one?"

"In a way, yes," answered Hood. "It has its disagreeable side; but that may be discounted if the—the surprise comes off as I expect it to. Don't ask me any more."

"Oh, you are too tantalising, Everard. I would rather you had told me nothing, dear, than so little."

"Where do you keep the key of your jewel-safe?" asked Hood suddenly, with apparent irrelevance.

"Upon this." She touched a fine gold chain that wound like bangles round her wrist. "It is very small, you see, and it never leaves me, though I do not always wear it here."

"Will you lend it to me for a few hours?"

"Everard!"

"I admit the request is an extraordinary one. But will you humour my whim?"

Something in his face checked Gertrude as she was about to speak, and, without another word, she unwound the chain from her wrist and handed it to him. In another moment they came in sight of the meet.

As the groom led up his hunter, Hood changed mounts to avoid exciting observation and comment and mingled for a few moments with the crowd. But as soon as the cheery "Gone away!" pealed through the crisp air, he pulled his horse back and, leaving the field to find their way after the cracks who were already sailing over the first fence, wheeled round and rode towards the groom, whom he mightily astonished by dismounting.

"I shall not follow to-day, Tom," he explained; "so lead Brown Man home again. I am going down into the village to do a little business and then I shall return. Look out for me at the stables, not at the front. And, Tom"—he slipped a sovereign into the groom's hand—"if you should see anybody—Colonel Dubois, for instance—don't mention my return."

"Very good, sir," answered Tom, and Hood, remounting his cob, trotted rapidly off to the village, which lay, with its tiny railway station, some two miles from Marston Manor.

He alighted at the post office, where he wrote out a lengthy telegram, which he handed to the post-mistress, who started with surprise and looked inquisitively at him as she read it over.

Hood noted the start. "It would be a great pity," he said gravely, "a very great pity, indeed, if it were to leak out that anything exceptional in the way of a telegram had been sent from here this morning."

The post-mistress, a fat, florid person of middle age, notorious for her love of gossip, flushed deeply, but received the hint in silence, and Hood, pocketing his change, left, and rode back to the Manor House, where he found Tom awaiting him at the stables.

Assured that all was quiet, Hood entered the house by the back door, ascended the servants' stairs and reached his own room unobserved by anyone but a solitary chambermaid, who stared at him in some astonishment. Williams, who was sitting in a chair by the door, started up as his master entered.

"Well, have you anything to report?" asked Hood.

Digitized by Google

"Not much, sir," answered Williams. "The maids were busy about the bed-rooms until some twenty minutes since; but he must have been on the watch, for shortly after they had gone away he came downstairs very quietly and made for the young lady's room. He was almost at the door when I came out of this room into the corridor with your coat in one hand, and a clothes-brush in the other. At sight of me he pulls up short. 'Oh!' says he, sharp and sudden, as if he couldn't help himself. With that, he claps his hand to his leg and limps downstairs to the hall. But he hadn't much of a limp when first I caught sight of him, sir."

Seated .... by the fire, reading the TIMES.

"You are sure he has not come up again and gone to his room?"

"Quite, sir. His room is just above your own. Besides, I must have seen him if he had come up. I took a peep over the well of the staircase after he had gone down, and he was steering for the tower. I expect he's in the smoking-room now."

"Well, we must not lose time," said Hood. "Have you got what I told you to get?"

"Yes, sir," replied Williams with a subdued grin. He opened a wardrobe and brought out something which he handed to Hood. "Hold it carefully, sir," he warned. "There's no mistake about it."

Hood took the thing gingerly enough, and walked out of the room. "Go to the well of the staircase and look over, Williams," he ordered. "He will not come up if he sees you there."

Williams took up his position, while Hood made his way to Gertrude's boudoir, the door of which he softly closed and locked behind him.

He soon had the safe open, and, rummaging among its contents, lifted out a square, brass-bound box, which he set upon a chair beside him. Then with a good deal of care, he placed the thing he carried in his hand on the floor of the safe and covered it lightly with papers. He then closed the safe, leaving the key, with the chain attached to it, in the lock, took up the box, and returned to his own room, where he placed his precious burden under lock and key once more.

"All right, Williams," he said to his man. "Go back to your post of observation and keep carefully out of sight. As soon as he comes upstairs, no matter when, lock the door leading to the servants' stairs and bring me the key."

He went downstairs and entered the smoking-room, where he found Colonel Dubois seated in a chair by the fire, reading the Times.

At sight of him the Colonel dropped his paper with an exclamation of surprise. "Back again already, Mr. Hood," he said. "The run must have been very short."

"I am alone," explained Hood. "I did not start, as my horse cast a shoe. How is your leg?"

"Rather better, thanks; but very painful still." He rose as Hood filled his pipe and took up an illustrated paper. "Excuse me, I must go upstairs and get a handkerchief."

"Let me ring," said Hood, springing towards the bell. "The less you move about the better, I should say."

The Colonel sat down again. "You are very kind," he said. "Don't trouble, please; I find I have one here. Do you know by what train Sir Eustace's guests are expected?"

"They will be here shortly after three, I believe." They chatted in a desultory fashion for half-an-hour or so, when the butler appeared and announced luncheon.

Hood rose at once. "Are you coming?" he asked. "Or would you like something sent in here?"

"I'll come with you," said the Colonel, rising, after a moment's hesitation, and hobbling to the door.

The meal was not a very lively one, though Hood ate with a good appetite. But the Colonel seemed abstracted and merely trifled with his food.

"Your leg appears to pain you a good deal," remarked Hood as they finished. "Come back into the smoking-room and forget your troubles in tobacco. I can offer you a very excellent weed."

The Colonel hesitated again, but finally accepted the offer and they returned to the tower.

"Confoundedly sleepy sort of day," observed Hood, blowing rings of smoke into the air. He looked at his watch. "Half-past two. They will be here in an hour or so."

"If you will excuse me, I will go to my room and lie down," said the Colonel. "This pain is becoming intolerable."

"A good idea," acquiesced Hood, "I shall curl up here and take forty winks myself. Au revoir." He threw himself back in his chair with a yawn. But the moment the door closed behind the Colonel his languor vanished and he sat up with an expectant look upon his face.

Ten minutes later Williams entered. "Here's the key of the back stairs, sir," he said, handing it over. "He's in the young lady's room now, sir."

"Off you go then," returned Hood, pocketing the key. "Let me know when he comes out again."

Williams was back again almost immediately. "He's out now, sir," he grinned, "and gone up to his own room.

Digitized by Google

He's got it hot, sir, for his hand was under his coat and he was swearing hard to himself."

Hood raced upstairs to his own room, fetched the jewel-box, and replaced it in the safe, which he re-locked, and, descending once more, sat down very contentedly in front of the great fire that blazed in the hall.

Presently Williams reappeared. "He came down, sir," he explained to Hood, "and tried the backstairs. Finding the door locked he went back to his room."

"Leave him there, then," said Hood. "It is unlikely that he will try this way before it grows dark. But keep within touch, for we must detain him by force, if necessary."

Four o'clock struck, and the short December day had already grown dark enough to justify the butler's query whether Mr. Hood would like the lamps lit.

"Not yet," answered Hood. "Wait till the people come."

He waited with some impatience until the clock chimed the half-hour. Then, as the noise of wheels and clatter of hoofs on the gravel announced that the house party and the sportsmen had arrived together, he sprang to his feet and hurried to the front door, where in the bustle of dismounting and greeting he managed to whisper to Gertrude: "Here is the key. Get the rubies when I ask for them."

He went airily out.

He had left her side before she could express her surprise at these singular instructions, and made his way to the dog-cart, from which two stalwart, well set-up men were descending. They were quietly dressed and there was nothing about them to indicate that they were not a couple of guests whom Sir Eustace had invited to the house.

He led the way into the library, where, after a short conversation, he left the two men and rejoined the party in the hall, which was now a blaze of light.

"What did you desert us for, Hood?" queried Sir Eustace, interrupting. "We had a splendid run. Where is Colonel Dubois?"

"In his room, I believe. He complained a good deal of the pain his leg gave him."

"Who is Colonel Dubois?" asked Lady Oliver. "I don't remember to have met him."

"Oh, a very good fellow indeed," said Sir Eustace. "I forget who introduced him to me. It was at—I forget where just now. But a good fellow—a capital fellow. Has travelled all over the world—fought his way through most of it, I believe. Very good company—tells a story better than anyone I ever heard, and——"

"Hush!" interposed Gertrude. "He is coming downstairs."

The Colonel seemed rather surprised to see so many people in the hall and half turned upon the first landing as though to re-ascend. He altered his mind, however, and continued his limping descent as Sir Eustace came forward to meet him with a cheery, "Well, Colonel, how is the leg?"

"So bad, I am sorry to say," was the answer, "that I was just coming in search of you to ask you to be good enough to let me have a carriage over to Great Marston. There is a train from there at a quarter to six, which I can catch and return to town."

"Don't go because you are afraid of giving trouble," urged Sir Eustace kindly. "We will make you as comfortable as we possibly can."

"You are most kind," murmured the Colonel. "But I know the symptoms too well. I am in for a regular bout of it and shall probably be laid up for a week or ten days. I should prefer to go. I should, indeed."

"Well, if you insist upon it," agreed his host, turning away, rather disappointed, to give the necessary order.

While the Colonel and Sir Eustace were conversing, Hood had slipped quietly upstairs. He now rejoined the group and addressed Dubois.

"Come and sit down, Colonel, till the carriage is ready," he urged. "You must not tire your leg." He drew the Colonel towards a chair, the back of which was immediately opposite to the library door.

The Colonel took the cup of tea with his left hand and set it upon his knees. His right hand was thrust deeply into the pocket of his coat.

"What is the matter with your hand, Colonel?" asked Hood. "I can see the end of a bandage. Have you an old wound there as well?"

The Colonel forced a laugh. "No," he answered; "a new one. I—the fact is—my wretched leg. I had a tumbler in my hand. I slipped to the floor. It broke and cut my fingers rather badly."

"What an unfortunate fellow you are, Dubois," said Sir Eustace. "Upon my word I'm sorry for you."

Somehow the Colonel looked very sorry for himself, nor did his face grow less sombre when Gertrude, who had slipped away for a moment in response to a whisper from Hood, returned with the jewel-box.

"You must see these before you go away, Colonel," she said, opening the box. "Confess, now, that you have never seen anything finer in the way of rubies."

"No," admitted Dubois, with something like a sigh, as the chorus of admiration arose. "Nothing, nothing—Ah! I am sure I hear the carriage."

"You are in a terrible hurry," said Sir Eustace. "You will have a long time to wait at the station if you start so soon. What did you say, Hood?"

"If the Colonel has time to listen to it," began Hood, "I can tell him a story about these particular gems which will interest him, since he has a partiality for gems in general. It so happened," he went on quickly, "that I had an uneasy feeling regarding the safety of the Marston rubies, so took it into my head to keep watch all last night in Miss Marston's boudoir. Nothing came of that watch, and this morning I asked Miss Marston for the key of the safe in which the gems were kept. I was still uneasy about them and I had a notion that there were rats in the house. Now, as everyone knows, rats have a terrible partiality for precious stones—sit down, Colonel, I shall soon have finished—therefore, I opened the safe, took out the casket, and substituted this." He drew one hand from behind his back, and held up before the eyes of the astonished company a steel rat trap, along the toothed grasp of which ran an ugly, dark stain.

There was an ominous pause. Gertrude, pale with terror, fastened her gaze upon Dubois, who had risen to his feet, and with his body bent slightly forward, glared ferociously at Hood, while his left hand crept slowly up to the breast of his coat.

Digitized by Google

"I caught something, as you see," continued Hood, keeping a wary eye upon the creeping hand. "And it must have been a large rat, too, for it walked off with the trap, and laid it in Colonel Dubois' room. I hope you are not badly hurt, Colonel!"

At the cue, for cue it was, there was a sudden rush from the library, the Colonel's dangerous left hand was struck swiftly down to his side, his wounded right wrenched with little ceremony from his pocket. Something gleamed in the firelight, there was a sharp click, and Lucy's Viking stood a handcuffed prisoner between Hood's two mysterious friends.

"Thank you, gentlemen," said Hood. "That was well and neatly done. Now, Anatole Baptiste, alias Colonel Dubois, alias I don't know how many more high-sounding names and titles, I think you will admit that your very pretty plot to carry off the Marston rubies has been foiled."

"God bless me!" exclaimed Sir Eustace. "Hood, what are you thinking of? Colonel, what does this mean? Dear me, a gentleman whom I met at—Where was it I met you, Colonel? and who was introduced by no less a person than—Who was it? I can't for the life of me remember. But—but—there must be a mistake somewhere. Colonel Dubois, why don't you speak? Can't you explain?"

Dubois had recovered his sangfroid. "I am as much at a loss as you can be, Sir Eustace," he said. "I see that I am indebted to Mr. Hood for my present uncomfortable position; but what is his charge? Am I supposed to have stolen gems, which at present lie upon the table? Mr. Hood must be out of his senses to suggest such a thing. Be kind enough to remove these handcuffs," he added to the detectives at his side. But they only smiled knowingly.

"You had better catch the train," said Everard, "or you will have to spend the night here; but first——" He made a sign, and while one of the men rapidly "went through" the Colonel, the other ransacked his portmanteau, which stood upon a chair hard by.

"Nothing but this, sir," said the man who had searched the Colonel, and handed a small ring case to Hood, who passed it on to Gertrude.

"My mother's ring!" she exclaimed. "Oh, Everard, and but for you I should have lost everything!"

"Bless me!" gasped Sir Eustace again as the second detective produced from the portmanteau several jewel-cases and a choice selection of the family plate. "You rascal!" he cried, turning upon the Colonel. "You rascally thief! I—I—oh! if only I could remember the name of the other rascal who foisted you upon me, I'd —I'd——"

Dubois laughed. "You've had no reason to regret the introduction, Sir Eustace," he said coolly. "You have got the best of me so far, Mr. Hood. That was a scurvy trick to play though, and I own I did not give you credit for so much ingenuity. I attributed this little accident to Miss Marston's cleverness." He held up his hands with a bow and a smile towards Gertrude. "Well, no matter, I shall not be in for ever on account of a trifle like this, and when I come out again, look to yourself, Mr. Hood." He laughed in a rather ugly fashion.

"You will have plenty of time for deliberation, Monsieur Baptiste," answered Hood; "for when we have done with you on this side, I expect the French police will present you with a little account for settlement. Indeed, I should not be surprised if they urged a prior claim." Then to the detectives: "You had better be off. You will only just do it."

"Good-bye!" cried the Colonel as he moved off between the two men. "A merry Christmas to you all when it comes. Drink my health at dinner to-night, Sir Eustace, will you? Miss Lucy, I am sure we should have become good friends but for this untoward accident. Miss Marston, I feel almost repaid for my ill luck by the knowledge that I was not the means of inflicting pain upon so charming a lady as yourself. Good-night! Good-night!" And he went airily out.

"The smooth-tongued rascal!" said Sir Eustace, as the door closed behind Dubois and his guards. "How could I have been such a fool! Hood, I don't know what I owe you. How did you discover the fellow's game?"

"Mr. Hood will demand payment in full before long, or I am much mistaken," whispered Lucy to Lady Oliver, with a roguish glance at Gertrude.

"Well," replied Hood, "I happened to be in Paris three years ago when Anatole Baptiste, or Colonel Dubois as he called himself here, was sentenced to deportation for a cleverly executed jewel robbery. I was present at the trial when the sentence was passed and was much struck with the appearance and cultured style of the prisoner. I learnt later that he was a man of good education and respectable parentage, though, evidently, his talents had been perverted. The man's personality was so marked that it impressed itself on my memory, and though I never heard of his escape, and though he had dyed his hair and moustache"—"Oh, my Viking," sighed Lucy in Gertrude's ear—"I knew him at once when we met at the railway station yesterday. You may have noticed his irritation at my reference to Cayenne last night. That, and the way in which he brought the conversation round to the rubies after dinner, made me doubly sure, and I determined to watch him. I gave him no opportunity to play any tricks during my absence from the house this morning, and I kept him in play till it was almost time for the detectives to arrive, having made matters easy for him by leaving the key in the safe."

"What amazes me is that, knowing you were in the house, he ventured to make the attempt at all," said Lady Oliver.

"I imagine he merely intended to spy out the land and lay his plans," answered Hood; "but the temptation of an open safe was too much for him, as I thought."

The company dispersed, some upstairs, some to the smoking-room, and Gertrude, with a backward glance at Everard, entered the library. Before he could follow her, Lucy sped after her friend.

"Gertrude," she whispered, "are you not an arrant humbug? Confess, now, it is all settled."

"Well, I suppose I may as well admit that it is," said Gertrude with a blush.

Lucy shook a merry finger at her. "Oh, my poor Viking!" she cried. "I can't help feeling sorry for him; he looked so splendid. And you told me, Gertrude, that Mr. Hood was not your ideal."

"I don't believe I did," returned Gertrude, smiling at Everard, who just then entered the room; "but at all events, you will admit that I have found an excellent substitute for yours."

REGINALD HORSLEY.

Digitized by Google

Impedimenta.

In the chaos of trunks upon the steamship dock, the portmanteau and the Saratoga trunk found themselves side by side. Under the circumstances it was awkward; but the portmanteau belonged to a man of the world, and difficult positions were his forte.

The ice must be broken; and the portmanteau made the first plunge.

"I believe we have met before, mademoiselle?" he remarked to the trunk.

"I should not have thought," rather coldly replied the Saratoga, "that you would care to recall the circumstances. They were, at the least, distinctly painful."

"You allude, mademoiselle, to the episode of our two proprietors? That was undoubtedly painful: but I cannot see why it should affect our relations."

The Saratoga trunk was silent for a moment, and then answered in mollified tones: "You are right, monsieur. Our owners' love quarrel need not extend to us. We are not in love."

"Mademoiselle must speak for herself," said the portmanteau gallantly. "By-the-way, the first scene of that unhappy drama occurred——"

"At Waterloo Station. You remember, he intended crossing with her to New York, and settling their difficulties en route. But she cut him dead at the station."

"I remember," cried the portmanteau. "She was superintending your transfer to the luggage-van at the time. I lay on the platform ready and labelled: but after her cruel behaviour he had me sent back to the hotel. Two days after we left London for the East."

"Ah, the dear East! It was there we met first, was it not?"

"Yes; at Shepheard's Hotel. My master was coming back from India, and of course he had to see Cairo."

"And we belonged to a party of globe-trotting Americans on a Nile voyage. I remember being placed next you on the verandah at Shepheard's. My mistress stole a look at your labels; and I heard her say to her married sister: 'This valise belongs to a Captain Richard Assheton. I wonder what he is like, and why he spells his name with a double "s."'"

"The idea of calling me a valise! So American?" interjected the portmanteau. "Still your mistress was a very charming young woman, and deliciously sprightly."

"She is charming still, though scarcely so sprightly. Do you knew, mon cher, I actually believe that she felt that episode sadly."

The portmanteau sniffed impatiently. "Then why did she act so?" he exclaimed. "It was all her fault."

"Nothing of the kind," the Saratoga retorted. "It was the fault of your Captain Assheton"

There was another silence, broken by the portmanteau. "Well," he said, "we need not quarrel about it. I remember when my master saw your mistress first. He asked a servant her name; and I heard him repeating several times: 'By Jove! This Miss Carrie Dunham is a deucedly pretty girl!'"

"It certainly showed his good taste. She noticed him, too; because I heard her talking about him to her sister. Then they met on the excursion to the Grand Pyramid."

"So I heard. And the acquaintance ripened into his joining the party."

The Saratoga tittered. "I can recall the tender fashion in which he looked after me at Port Said," she murmured. "You were quite neglected, mon ami."

"Oh, but Miss Dunham kept me in mind. I can still hear her begging the Captain not to 'forget his dear old portmanteau.'"

"The first proposal occurred at Malta. She came down to the state room and told the whole story to her sister. She was sitting on me at the time."

"She had put him on probation. I heard him tell his friend McClean. He was to meet her in London and receive her final answer. Ah, that answer! How can you females act so cruelly?"

"Cruelly, monsieur? Nonsense! My dear mistress had no alternative but to act so after the conduct of Captain Assheton."

The portmanteau was astounded, and said so. "I cannot penetrate your meaning," he cried.

"Your nation, monsieur, is proverbially slow of comprehension. But it is surely hypocritical on your part to pretend a lack of knowledge of your master's frailties. You must be well aware that in Paris he so far forgot his alleged love for my mistress as to pay court to Mdlle. Fanny Patte-en-haut at the Folies Bergères. Nay, did he not present that notorious creature with a gorgeous diamond tiara in full view of the audience. My mistress's brother-in-law was in the audience, and saw him do it."

The portmanteau uttered a sharp exclamation. "And such," he said, "was the reason why Miss Dunham rejected my master when he came to London, refusing all explanation; and why she subsequently cut him dead at Waterloo Station?"

"Such was the reason," tartly answered the Saratoga; "and a very sound reason, too, so far as I can see."

The portmanteau burst into a fit of laughter, much to his companion's disgust. Long and vigorously he laughed, ceasing at last only from sheer exhaustion.

"And now," said the trunk, "perhaps, monsieur, you will be good enough to explain the cause of your—your cachinnatory hysteria."

"What a clever trunk you must be, mademoiselle, to use such long words! Anyone can see that you came from Boston. The cause of my merriment, eh? Well, I was laughing over the very ridiculous mistake made by your mistress and her donkey of a brother-in-law."

"Mistake, monsieur?"

"Certainly. The superb tiara which my master gave to poor little Fanny Patte-en-haut did not belong to him at all. He was merely an instrument in the presentation. The tiara was a gift from the Rajah of Bundleapore, who had seen Fanny the previous summer in Paris. He sent the diamonds to her from India in the care of his friend, Captain Assheton; I ought to know because they were stowed away inside me all the way from Madras. The whole story was in the Parisian papers at the time; and if your mistress's brother-in-law had taken the trouble to read them——"

Digitized by Google

"He does not speak or read French, poor fellow."

"Ah, that explains it. And so, because of his ignorance, two young hearts are to be severed and two happy lives blighted in their prime!"

"It is very sad!" sighed the Saratoga sympathetically.

"Sad? By Jove! mademoiselle. It is criminal. But let us consider. Is there no way by which things may be set right? Here we are about to enter the United States together. I am labelled for Newport."

"And so am I. Dear me, Monsieur Portmanteau, I never wished that I had the power of human speech so fervently as I do now! I should lose no time in apprising my dear mistress of that hideous mistake about Fanny Patte-en-haut."

"Human speech is out of the question," said the portmanteau. "We must hit upon some other scheme. Ah, I have it!"

"Monsieur, you are a genius."

"You flatter me, mademoiselle. And yet the plan is not a bad one. This morning, as Banks was packing me, he wrapped some novels in an old newspaper and placed them right under my lid, on top of everything else. I can feel them there now. What, think you, was the newspaper used?"

"Indeed, I cannot guess," said the Saratoga.

"It was a copy of the Gaulois, containing a full account of the presentation of Fanny Patte-en-haut on behalf of the Rajah of Bundleapore. I am sure, because Banks read it over with a reminiscent chuckle before he wrapped it round the novels."

"But how about your plan?"

"Is it possible that you have not surmised my plan? In a few minutes the Customs House people will come along. I shall simply slip when they open me, and cause those novels and the Gaulois in which they are wrapped to fall in your direction. You can roll over slightly and possess yourself of the newspaper. When your mistress, or that perky French maid of hers, comes along, take care that she notices the Gaulois; and leave the rest to fortune."

"A good plan, monsieur; but too much is left to fortune, I fear. And here come the Customs House officials, with Mr. Banks to open you. Now for it!"

The portmanteau strained himself with excitement, until his straps creaked again.

II.

THE Customs House inspection was in progress. Miss Dunham and Capt. Richard Assheton stood near their respective heaps of luggage, while the latter's valet and the former's maid attended more directly to the matters in hand.

As Clarisse, the maid in question, was about to unlock the Saratoga trunk, her quick eyes caught sight of a newspaper lying on the dock floor.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, "Le Gaulois! It is a good omen, this message from la patrie."

She raised the paper and, glancing at the year-old headings, was about to throw it away again, when an article in the centre column arrested her attention. She read it carefully to the end with an astonished little "Mon Dieu!" and "Ma foi!" at every sentence. Finally, forgetting all about the Customs officials she tripped towards her mistress, newspaper in hand.

"Oh, mademoiselle! What an occurrence! What a providence!" she exclaimed, pointing to the article in the Gaulois. It was a long article, and it described in truly Gallic fashion the presentation to Mdlle. Patte-en-haut from H.S.H. the Rajah of Bundleapore, through the medium of the Rajah's obliging friend, Capt. Richard Assheton.

Miss Dunham gasped when she read this revelation. Then her fine eyes filled with tears and she turned sadly to her maid.

"Oh, Clarisse!" she whispered. "And I refused him for that, and cut him so cruelly at Waterloo last year, and—and travelled all the way over in the same ship without speaking to him once. And all the time I have loved him. What shall I do, Clarisse?"

Here Miss Dunham sank back upon the dock railing.

Clarisse's eyes brightened. "Mon Dieu!" she cried, "I have a scheme. If mademoiselle will only consent to a little innocent deception—a little private theatricals, as it were—all will be well."

"I will do anything in reason," sobbed Miss Dunham.

"Eh bien! Does mademoiselle observe her Saratoga trunk yonder. Good; mademoiselle must pretend to faint, and fall back upon the trunk. It will not hurt, as I can catch mademoiselle as she falls. Naturally M. le Capitaine will see, and, being a gallant gentleman, he will come to the rescue. Leave the rest to me."

Miss Dunham bit her lip. She did not like the scheme.

"It is the only way," whispered Clarisse, the tempter. "Otherwise the last chance is gone."

Miss Dunham yielded; and a few minutes later the bustle of that section of the dock was interrupted by the fainting of a young and beautiful lady.

As fast as his legs could carry him, Captain Assheton reached the Saratoga trunk and its precious burden. Clarisse gazed at him tearfully.

"Ah, M. le Capitaine!" she murmured. "It is all about you."

"About me!" said Assheton gruffly. "Can't see why my presence should make her faint, considering we came over together without exchanging a word."

Clarisse held out the newspaper, "Voila!" she exclaimed. "It is only this minute that mademoiselle learnt the true story of that affair at the Folies Bergères."

Then, while eagerly chafing her mistress's face and hands, she poured into Assheton's ears the whole story of the mistaken brother-in-law and the natural error of Miss Dunham.

Just as the narrative ended, Miss Dunham opened her eyes. They met those of Capt. Assheton.

"Carrie!" said the Captain. "Is this true? This about the mistake?"

"Oh, Dick!" cried Miss Dunham, "it is quite true. How can you ever forgive me?"

It was at this point that Capt. Richard Assheton relieved Mdlle. Clarisse, and assisted Miss Dunham to a cab.

* * * * *

"Well?" said the portmanteau to the Saratoga trunk, as they were being hoisted into the same waggon. "How did my little plan come off?"

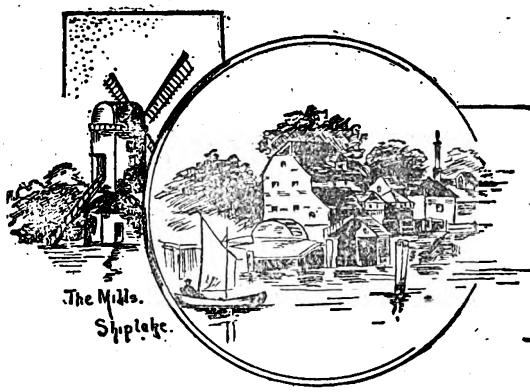
"Ah, mon cher!" cried the trunk ecstatically. "It was admirable. There will be a wedding before Advent."

"And then we shall always travel together, you and I?"

But the Saratoga trunk was coy, and answered not.

GERALD BRENAN.

Digitized by Google



NONA LE MAQUET.

SOME years ago I passed several weeks at a fishing village on the coast of Brittany. What a hole it was! But how picturesque! A miserable anchorage, for ten boats at the most; a single stony street, which I can compare to nothing better than a mountain torrent. On top of the hill, a church, a veritable gothic toy, which stood in the middle of a cemetery from which a magnificent view of the ocean was obtained. Finding myself in the vein for work, I lingered in this out-of-the-way corner until the end of the month of September, which by a rare chance in rainy Finisterre was, that year, exceptionally mild and clear.

But one cannot always compose verses and write, and a walk was my hygiene and my distraction. My most frequent promenade was along the beach, having on my right the bleak and rocky cliffs, and on my left the uncovered stretches of sand—an immense desert of sand, left bare by the out-going tide.

Two or three times I had exchanged civilities with some Custom House officer going his rounds, his gun slung over his shoulder. I was so regular and peaceful a promenader that the sea swallows were no longer afraid of me, and hopped in front of me, leaving the print of their star-shaped feet in the wet sand. I walked six or eight kilometres a day, and returned home with my pockets filled with those dainty shells which are found by burying the hand deep down in the damp pebbles.

This was my favourite excursion. However, on the days when a strong breeze was blowing, and the tide was very high, I abandoned the sea-shore, and, climbing the village street, I strolled along the sandy moor, or else I settled myself with a book on a bench in a corner of the cemetery, which was sheltered by the church tower from the west end.

It was a lovely spot, conducive to sadness and reverie. The church tower stood out against the autumn sky, over which dark clouds were scurrying. Crows, whose nests were in the steeple, flew out with their hoarse cawing, and the shadow of their large wings glided over the scattered tombstones, almost hidden in the grass.

In the evening more than at any other time, the last rays of the setting sun, bathing the sea as though with blood, the ragged branches of the skeleton of an old apple tree, silhouetted against the crimson sky, and the deep, intense stillness of the wild home of the dead flooded my soul with melancholy.

It was on such an evening as I have just described, that wandering among the tombs, many of which bore under the sailor's name this mournful legend, "Died at Sea," that I read on a new cross the following words, which astonished and puzzled me:

HERE REPOSES
NONA LE MAQUET.
Died at sea, October 26th, 1873, at the age of nineteen.

Died at sea. A young girl! Women hardly ever go out in the fishing boats. How did this happen?

"Well, monsieur," said a gruff voice behind me suddenly. "You are looking at poor Nona's tomb?"

I turned round and recognised an old sailor, with a wooden leg, whose good graces I had acquired by the aid of a few glasses of brandy, which I had given him in the tap-room at the inn.

"Yes," I replied. "But I thought that you fishermen never permitted women to go out with you? I have even been told that they bring you misfortune."

"And that is the truth," responded the good man. "Besides, Nona never went into a boat. Would you like to know how the poor little one died? Well, I will relate the story to you.

"First of all, I must tell you that Pierre, her father, was a top-man, like myself, and an old comrade. At Bourget, when Admiral La Ronciere raised his golden helmet on the point of his sword, and we flung ourselves, hatchet in hand, on the embattled houses, we marched elbow to elbow, Pierre and I, and it was he who received me in his arms when those cursed Prussians put a ball in my thigh.

"That same evening, in the ambulance at the fort, Pierre held my hand to give me courage while the surgeon amputated my limb; and he was there at my bed-side when the Admiral brought me my medal. But those rascally Prussians got the best of us, and we were sent home. I, with my wooden leg, was practically helpless. But Pierre, who was uninjured, went on board a fishing smack. Very soon afterwards his wife died from an intermittent fever, leaving him the care of little Nona, who was getting on for ten years of age.

"Naturally, while the widower was at sea, it was I, his comrade, I, the old bachelor, who cared for the little one. She was a good and pretty child, monsieur; courageous and sweet-tempered. We very often went to the rocks at low tide to gather mussels, shrimps, prawns, and sometimes we were fortunate enough to find a lobster. Ah! but we were good friends.

"This went on for about two years. Nona had made her first communion, grown and shot up like a thistle in the sand. But one day, the Amelia, le Maquet's boat, was overtaken in a storm and wrecked. The skipper did not haul in his sail soon enough, and the boat struck on that reef you can see over there; just a little more to the starboard. There were four men in the crew—the skipper, two sailors, and my poor Pierre. But the sea only gave up three of the drowned men, and retained my comrade. Nona became an orphan. It goes without saying that I did my best to replace her father.

Digitized by Google

"But the child, even after the first sorrow passed away, did not seem to console herself. And, do you know why, monsieur? Because of an idea all the women around here have. They believe that a soul must remain in pain unto the Judgment Day unless it reposes in consecrated ground. We men do not believe in all this nonsense when we know what happens when there is a death on board ship. But Nona could not be forced to believe other than the women had taught her, and continued to burn candles at all the Bardons in the neighbouring towns for the repose of her father's soul.

"However, in spite of everything, Time is a famous merchant of forgetfulness, and Nona, after a few years, appeared to me to become somewhat reconciled. Besides, her grief had not prevented her from growing handsomer and taking a pride in herself, and it is not because I loved her like a father, but, upon my honour, she was the freshest and prettiest young girl in the parish. We lived so happily together. We were not rich, to be sure, but we lived and we enjoyed ourselves all the same. I had my pension and my medal, and then we used to go together to hunt for lobsters in the rocks. The trade is a paying one, and there is only one danger, that of being overtaken by the tide. Ah, unfortunately that was how she met her death, poor little one!

"One day, when my rheumatism confined me to the house, she went fishing alone. It was just such a day as to-day, the sky clear, the wind high. When the rock searchers gathered together with full baskets, they perceived that Nona failed to respond to their calls. There was no possible doubt. Great God! she had been delayed and surrounded by the rising tide. She had been drowned! Ah! what a night I passed, monsieur! At my age, yes, a hard-hearted man like me, I sobbed like a woman. And the remembrance came to me of the poor child's belief that to go to heaven she must be interred in consecrated ground. Therefore, as soon as the tide went down, I went to the shore, and with others searched for the body.

"And we found my poor Nona," continued the old sailor, in a trembling voice. "We found her on a rock covered with seaweed, where knowing that she was going to die the poor little one had prepared herself for death. Yes, monsieur, she had tied her skirts below her knees with her fichu, through modesty, and, with her old idea uppermost, had attached herself to the seaweed by her hair, her beautiful black hair, certain that she would be found and interred in consecrated ground. And I can say, I, who know what bravery is, that there is, perhaps, not a man brave enough to do likewise."

FRANÇOIS COPPÉE.

THE TAIL OF A KITE.

OLD Pierre Bernard was hammering away on the sole of a shoe. He was a cobbler and occupied a small shop on the outskirts of a city. His family consisted of himself and grandson, little Pierre, who was ten years of age. Behind the shop was a room which served as a parlour, bed-room, and kitchen. The cooking was done by Bernard himself, who possessed some knowledge of the culinary art.

Old Pierre's reputation was not of the best; though he had never been detected in a really dishonest act, he was known to be tricky. But he had a genial manner, was always ready to talk, and his shop became a rendezvous for male gossips who liked to chat about the affairs of the day. On this particular morning two of the fraternity sauntered in.

"Good-morning, Pierre," said Caleb Gibson. "How's business?"

"Bad," answered Bernard, shaking his head. "I can't compete with store prices, and it is a hard matter to keep body and soul together."

"Body and soul, eh?" said Caleb, chuckling at his attempt at wit. "You must see that the soul keeps the body while it lasts."

Pierre laughed as he gave the shoe a resounding blow with his hammer. He always laughed at other men's jokes, however poor they might be; this was one of the secrets of his popularity. Presently Silas Parker remarked:

"Odd about the robbery, isn't it?"

"What robbery?"

"Haven't you read of it in the papers?" Silas asked in surprise.

"I have no time to read papers."

"Well, it happened last night up at the Hall. Madame Benton's pearl necklace was stolen. They say it was very valuable, and so long that it could be wound several times about her neck. The detectives are working up the case."

"Have they any clue to the thief?" Pierre asked carelessly.

"Well a slight one. They found a bit of cloth—what is the matter?" he broke off in alarm, as a cry escaped Bernard.

"Oh, I pounded my finger a little, that's all."

"You must have hurt it badly, you are quite pale."

"No, no!" Pierre answered quickly. "It is nothing. Go on with your story. You were saying that they found a bit of cloth."

Digitized by Google

"Yes—a small zigzag piece, evidently torn from a coat. It was hanging on a nail."

"Well," said Pierre deliberately, "I hope the robber will escape."

"Why?" exclaimed Silas, in amazement. "For my part I hope he will be brought to justice."

"Justice!" said Bernard testily. "Is there such a thing?"

"There is law, anyway, and if we commit a crime we must suffer for it."

"If we are poor—yes. But the rich contrive to escape the punishment, whatever they may do."

"I don't know," murmured Silas dubiously, while Caleb shook his head.

"Well, I do," said Pierre vehemently. "A rich man obtains money dishonestly; the transaction is called by a polite name People shrug their shoulders and pass on; but let a beggar steal a loaf of bread to keep him from starving, and he is thrust into prison without much ado. Bah! It is a strange world."

He tossed his hammer down, and it fell with a crash.

"Oh, I've heard about the beggar and his loaf before," said Silas. "But I never believed in him. We have hands to work with, and can always earn our bread by honest toil. You're out of humour to-day, Bernard. Come, Caleb, we must be off. Good-day, Pierre."

"Good-day," answered Bernard, without looking at them.

That night he took a bundle from his cupboard and went stealthily into his small garden. Digging a hole in the yielding ground he deposited the bundle in it then filled it up, packing the earth so tightly down that it was impossible to discover it had been recently disturbed. Little Pierre lay sleeping in the inner room, but some noise awakening him he crept from his bed and peeped into the shop just as his grandfather returned.

"Go to bed!" Bernard commanded sharply, as he closed the outer door. "What are you doing here?"

"I thought I heard a noise," answered the child.

"So did I, and I went to see what caused it. It was nothing. Go to bed again, and I will make you a kite, a marvellous kite, which you may fly to-morrow."

"Oh, will you, grandfather? Jolly! Now I'll go at once," cried the delighted boy.

A smile curved Bernard's lips as he gathered together the materials for the kite. It took several hours to complete it, but when finished it was indeed a thing of beauty. It was full four feet in height, and there were many coloured papers used in its construction; a fringe adorned the outer edge. But the tail was the most wonderful of all. A long string formed the foundation, and upon it were fastened pieces of cloth of graduating lengths, the longest being at the top, and tapering down to a mere shred at the end. Each was twisted in the centre, the ends being allowed to fly, but so closely were they put on the string that scarcely any part of it was visible.

Little Pierre rose early the next morning. His impatience was so great that he could scarcely contain himself until his grandfather should give him the kite; but he dare not express his wish as Bernard seemed excited and nervous, an unusual thing with him. The boy wondered why he stood at the door so long, gazing anxiously about, returning to his work only to repeat the performance a few minutes later. At last he turned to the expectant child:

"Come," he said, "you shall fly the kite."

"Oh, is it not beautiful?" Pierre cried, clasping his hands in admiration when the wonderful thing was held up for his inspection.

This Pretty Girl is a Reader of ☞ "HOME NOTES."

He was wild to touch it, but Bernard would not permit him to do so, and bade him hold the cord while he held the kite aloft himself. Soon it floated upward, the tail resembling a flock of birds as it straightened in the breeze.

"You are Pierre Bernard, I believe," said someone.

As Bernard moved quickly, he came face to face with two men.

"That is my name," he answered. "What is your business with me?"

One of the detectives, for such they were, eyed him sharply, as he said:

"We have orders to search your house, Bernard."

"For what?"

"We are looking for a necklace which was stolen from Madame Benton."

"And do you suppose I have it?" demanded Pierre, with a great show of anger. "How dare you accuse me of stealing? But go—search the house—and if you find it——"

He finished with a harsh laugh.

"The old fellow takes it coolly," said one of the men. "But come—let us get the business over." And they went to work, searching every nook and corner of the house for some signs of the missing property.

Meanwhile, Bernard was apparently absorbed in the kite, and laughed loudly as it rose higher and higher, the long tail curving and twitching like a snake. Presently it began to descend, and a shade of excitement was visible on his face, while little Pierre cried out in dismay:

"Oh, grandfather, it is coming down and will get caught in those trees."

"We will prevent that," said Bernard, with a furtive glance at the house; and he loosened the cord to its fullest extent. But the kite steadily descended. It hovered over a tree for a few seconds, then fell, the tail becoming entangled in the branches. Bernard gave the cord a sharp pull, and the kite dropped at his feet.

Little Pierre ran and picked it up, dragging the kite back to where the old man stood.

"The tail is broken, grandfather," he exclaimed. "Oh, why did you hide these pretty beads? See——"

He spoke no further, for Bernard with an oath sprang forward and snatched the kite from his hand. At the same instant one of the detectives, who had approached unnoticed, tore it from him.

"Ah! we are not mistaken after all," he said, holding up the tail for his companion's inspection.

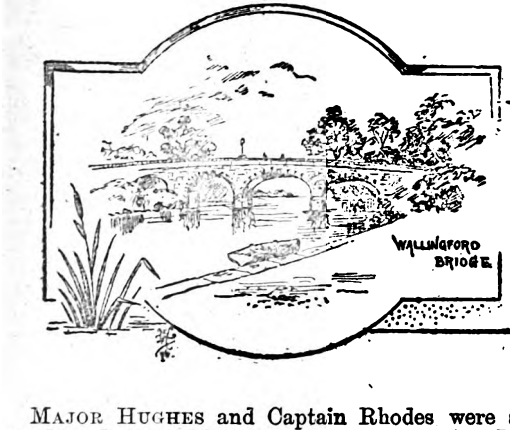
Beneath each of the twisted rags was a small cluster of pearls.

HONOR LUCELLE.

"HOME NOTES" BOUQUET.

This elegant and refined Perfume is now on sale. No. 1, 6s. 6d., No. 2, 4s., No. 3, 2s. Post free, 3d. each. Sample Bottles forwarded post free for 1s. 2d.

Digitized by Google



ALMOST A MONOLOGUE.

MAJOR HUGHES and Captain Rhodes were sitting smoking before a blazing open fire in Major Hughes' cosy library. Between them was a small table that held a few books and a box of choice cigars. Major Hughes was dark, tall and lean, slightly bald, with a stoop in his shoulders and an expression as of lately conquered querulousness on his face. Captain Rhodes was rather short, decidedly rotund, very bald, very erect, and looked as if he had been in the best of good humours all his life.

"Well," said Major Hughes, with a satisfied air, "I believe that I have already said that I was glad to see you."

"Yes," said Captain Rhodes, beaming on Major Hughes. "Once or twice; but it's one of those things that you can't hear too often. You're looking well—better than I ever saw you—and so is your house. I didn't know you had much taste in that line. You certainly kept it under a bushel when we kept bachelor's hall at Fort Reno. You must have a good housekeeper."

"I have," said Major Hughes, with a suppressed smile. "So good that I have got almost rid of dyspepsia. That was the curse of my life."

"That's good," said Captain Rhodes heartily. "Now tell me all about yourself. I haven't heard a word from you since I left the army."

"No," said Major Hughes, "I'm not much of a correspondent; but a man who falls heir to a fortune and resigns, and goes to Egypt for five years, doesn't deserve to hear from his friends. Aren't you afraid you will scorch, sitting so close to the fire? Do you think it's cold?"

"Not in here," said Captain Rhodes, pushing his chair back a little, "but it's only twelve degrees above zero out of doors."

"Speaking of cold," said Major Hughes musingly, "reminds me of an experience I had at Fort Keogh when I was on duty in Canada. You know I went there the year after you resigned, when I got my promotion."

"No, I didn't know it," said Captain Rhodes, "but go on."

"Well, you probably remember that I didn't like women?"

"Yes," said Captain Rhodes, smiling, "and that, with the inconsistency of all eccentrics, you read novels all the time—novels wherein heroes were of no importance, but that abounded in a varied assortment of the most remarkable heroines."

"Yes, I got enough of women that way. The real thing always bored me, or embarrassed me, I don't know which; and you can imagine what a brilliant prospect there was for me when I got to my new station and found that there wasn't a single unmarried officer there, with the exception of five or six youngsters, and they didn't want a rusty, fusty old major poking round with them. To make bad enough worse, there were dozens of little children about. The place fairly resounded with baby talk—the one thing that I abominated above all others.

"If I had had a controlling voice in army regulations, I wouldn't have allowed officers to marry. I hung about by myself for a month or so, getting more and more morose all the time. Of course I returned visits, but I selected times when I knew the wives were out. One night, though, I got caught. I had heard that there was to be a ladies' card party, so I trotted round to see Wilhelm—we were room-mates once, and I had always liked him. He opened the door himself, and I shouted out at the top of my voice: 'Hello, old man, I've come to spend the evening with you,' and then I stepped into the hall and saw Mrs. Wilhelm sitting in the parlour.

"I was utterly taken aback, but it was too late to beat a retreat, so I shuffled in and shook hands with her. She received me cordially, not appearing to notice my embarrassment, and, to my surprise, I soon found myself at ease, and having a very pleasant time. After that I got into the habit of going there. Mrs. Wilhelm was clever and bright, but she wasn't always doing the fire-work act, the way most clever women do, trying to dazzle people. She talked sensibly, and when she saw that Wilhelm and I were interested in some topic that she didn't care to discuss with us, she wouldn't try to make us switch off—she would just sit down at the piano and play something soft that didn't thrust itself on our notice, but that, somehow, always had the effect of making us feel in charity with all men.

"But it was all changed when their daughter came home from school. Great Scott! what a whirlwild that girl was!—and spoiled!—She was spoiled to the verge of disintegration. She was only about so high"—holding his hand five feet from the floor—"and her hair and eyes were as black as coal, and she was fairly insolently healthy and full of life. She ruined the Wilhelm's house for me. In the first place, all the youngsters in the garrison swarmed about her—the house was always full of them—and if she happened to be by herself, and came in and found Wilhelm and me absorbed in some discussion, she would say: 'Oh, you're talking some stupid man talk!' and she would rush to the piano—she rushed at everything she did—and bang some horrible brass band piece, or sing a college song at the top of her voice, with the loud pedals on.

Digitized by Google

"It was awful. And the Wilhelms thought she was perfect.

"One day, early in November, I had one of my attacks of the blues. I ordered my horse in hopes of riding it down. It was lovely when I started—warm enough to make my overcoat entirely superfluous, but my striker, who had served in that country for years, begged me to let him put it on behind the saddle. He said that he knew that a change was coming on, and that I would need it if I stayed out long. I let him do it just to humour him. I rode along over the lowlands, with those dreary buttes all around me, and away off to the right the narrow belt of cotton-wood trees that edged the river.

"I had gone about twelve miles, getting bluer and bluer each step, when suddenly an icy wind slapped me in the face. It felt just as if a frozen sheet had struck me and wrapped around me. I looked up, and the sky was like ink, but on the horizon was a white wall that reached from earth to heaven, and that was moving towards me at the rate of a mile a minute. I turned round and started for home at a gallop, but before I had gone half a mile the blinding snow had caught up with me, and it was so thick that I couldn't see three feet ahead. The wind seemed to be coming from every direction at once. It almost swept me from the saddle.

"I saw that I was in for it, so I dismounted and put on my overcoat. My horse was frightened and jumped about, tugging at the reins, and when I was ready to mount, I couldn't tell to save my life which way to turn. It seemed suicidal to stand still in that piercing wind, that was growing colder every instant, yet it was folly to go on, for I realised that I was probably increasing the distance between myself and the garrison at every step. However, I pushed on, hoping that I was going in the right direction, and trying to make myself believe that the storm would soon be over, and that I could find my way home before dark. After half-an-hour or so of this struggle against the storm, I became aware of a dark object that loomed up suddenly through the snow. I stood still and waited. As it came nearer I saw that it was someone on a big horse. You can imagine my sensations when I discovered that it was Wilhelm's daughter.

"'What on earth are you doing here?' I said, going up to her. She started violently when I spoke, for she had had her head bent almost to the horse's neck, and had not seen me, then she said: 'Oh, Major Hughes, is it you? I never thought I could be so glad to see—anyone.' She had evidently meant to say 'you,' and changed it for politeness' sake at the last minute. 'But what are you doing so far from the post alone?' I said. 'Does your father know about it?'

"She said: 'No, I didn't tell him where I was going.'

"'I have often heard him tell you not to go more than a mile away from home,' I said severely; 'this is twelve, if it's an inch.'

"'Well, and does it concern you?' she said snappishly.

"I did not answer her, and we rode on in silence a short distance. Then she said in a conciliatory tone, 'I'm awfully glad that I met you. I was lost. I hadn't an idea of which way to go.'

"'Neither have I,' I said.

"'Oh!' she said, looking at me with big, scared eyes; and she pressed her horse close to mine.

"'We might as well dismount,' I said, after a while 'we will wear our horses out to no purpose ranging about in this way.' I got down and reached up my hands to help her out of the saddle.

"'Oh. I'm so stiff,' she said, 'really I can't jump.'

"I had to lift her down. I could feel her shaking and shivering. She was very small, but my arms were absolutely brittle from cold, and I felt that her weight would break them. I unsaddled the horses and then told her to hold them—for there was nothing to tie them to—while I built her a snow house.

"She took the reins mechanically, her eyes fastened on my face.

"'Won't we be able to find the way home?' she said in a moment, her voice trembling.

"'I'm afraid not,' I said.

"Just then a blast even fiercer than the rest struck us. The horses plunged, broke away from her, and in an instant were out of sight. She leaped after them—then, realising the hopelessness of such a chase, she stopped and turned towards me.

"'We—will—freeze—to—death,' she said slowly, utter despair in her voice. Then she began to cry out loud.

"I didn't know what to do. In those confounded novels the women always held their heads high in times of danger, and said: 'I fear naught,' or some such lofty thing.

"'Oh, stop!' I said crossly. I hadn't an idea of how to deal with her.

"'I won't!' she said, and went on worse than ever. I felt that I would go crazy if she kept it up. Then I remembered a ruse that always worked successfully with my little nieces and nephews, and I said grimly; 'You'd better stop—the wolves will hear you.'

"She uttered the most awful shriek that I ever heard in my life, and before I knew what had happened, her arms were around me, so tight that I was almost cut in two, and she was crying: 'Oh, save me! save me! Don't let them eat me up!'

"I wished that I had let her cry in peace. I wriggled and twisted, but I couldn't get loose.

"'Let go!' I shouted at last. 'How can I keep you from being killed if you hold me in this way?'

"I finally persuaded her to sit down on my saddle blanket, while I heaped snow round her to break the wind. She looked so little, and so blue with cold, that it occurred to me at last that she had no wrap on. I reluctantly took off my overcoat—yes—I was a brute, but I didn't like her, and I begrudged it to her—and wrapped her up in it. She thanked me, with her teeth chattering, and shivered down into it, and I went on piling snow. I thought every minute that I would freeze solid and fall down dead. I never suffered so in my life. After a while she raised her face and said: 'Major Hughes, aren't you cold without your coat?'

"It exasperated me beyond endurance.

"'Oh, no, I feel as though I were in a bake-house,' I said, with a brutal laugh.

"She jumped up like a flash, tore off the coat, and threw it at my feet.

"'Take your old coat!' she cried. 'You horrible—you horrible—oh, you coward!' and then she flung herself down on the snow, and writhed and screamed and sobbed.

"I was furious, but humiliated to the ground.

"I felt like a cross between a wild boar and an angle worm. I wanted to tear her to pieces, and I wanted to grovel on the ground before her, and beg her to put on the coat again.

"After about a minute, I picked the coat up, and said humbly: 'I beg your pardon, Miss Gertrude, won't you please take it back? I didn't mean to be rude.' My voice sounded so meek that I didn't know myself, but she did not deign to notice me in the least. She just kept on sobbing.

Digitized by Google

"'Well,' I said, after waiting a minute, 'if you won't take it, I'll have to put it on you.'

"'Don't touch me!' she cried.

"But I seized her. She fought like a little tigress! Strong!—I never saw anything like it! —but of course she couldn't hold out against me.

"I wrapped her up by main force, and told her that I would tie her with saddle girths if she tried to take the coat off again. She glared unutterable rage and hatred at me with her great black eyes. Then she turned her head away, and wouldn't move or speak.

"The cold was growing more and more intense. It nipped, slapped, pinched, all at once. I had to keep charging up and down to keep from freezing.

"Without saying anything, she moved off the saddle blanket and tossed it towards me. I wrapped it round me, but it didn't seem to make me any warmer.

"'If I could find some wood I could make a fire,' I said, fingering the matches in my pocket.

"'The saddle trees are wood,' she said, without looking at me.

"I lost no time in putting her suggestion in operation. I piled up the saddles and put some old letters that I happened to have with me under them, and soon we had a sickly, smoky little blaze. She crept up to it. Her face was swollen from crying, her eyes were red—all the rest of her was blue with cold. No, she didn't look pretty—an angel couldn't have under those circumstances —but I pitied her (for the first time), poor, pampered child, doomed to die out there in that wicked night—for it was almost six o'clock, and there was no sign of the storm abating.

"The saddles smouldered along. They could not last much longer.

"At half-past six there was a sudden, almost alarming lull. The wind gave one wild shriek, and died down. The snow stopped falling, the clouds parted, and there, within twenty feet of us, I saw the belt of cotton-wood trees that bounded the creek.

"'We are saved!' I exclaimed.

"She turned her face towards the woods, started up and fell back again.

"'I can't walk!' she said in a frightened whisper. I carried her bodily into the woods, and propped her up by a tree. Then I broke off branches, and in a little while had a big fire blazing right in front of her. That fire was the most beautiful thing I ever saw in my life.

"'Major Hughes,' she said in a few minutes, her voice trembling, 'I think my feet have fallen off—will you look and see?—I can't bear to—and if they have, let me die!—I beg of you to let me die!' She was too much exhausted to cry any more. I laid her down and drew her feet from under her, and took off her boots; she had on regular, long-topped boots, something like a man's, only softer. Her stockings were black silk. Her feet felt like little sticks. They were as cold as ice, but they were not really frozen.

"'They are all right,' I said; 'I'll rub them for you.' So I did. I was horribly afraid they would break. In about fifteen minutes she said that they felt better, and I was just about to propose that we start towards the garrison, walking a mile or so at a time, and stopping and building a fire, when I heard afar off a faint baying. It came nearer and nearer. I jumped up, and in furious haste added great branches to our fire. She watched me a moment, a startled look in her eyes, her head bent, listening—she heard the baying, too—then she knew.

"'The wolves!' she said, in a ghastly, blood-curdling whisper.

"My threat had come true.

"She crouched down beside the fire, holding her ears and gasping from terror. That fire was our only hope. The lean, furious beasts pressed about us, howling, their wicked eyes glaring in the light, their cruel teeth gleaming. Fortunately there was plenty of wood at hand. I extended the fire until it almost surrounded us, just leaving a passage for myself to go through, and I kept the murderous, hungry fiends off with burning branches.

"At three o'clock in the morning we faintly heard a bugle-call, then far-off shouts and whistles. Searching parties had been sent out for us, and one of them, seeing our fire, was heading towards it. The wolves did not give up all hope of their supper until the soldiers fired into them. As for Miss Gertrude, I hadn't time to look at her from the moment my fight with the wolves began until, surrounded by our rescuers, I saw her fall fainting into her father's arms. Her hat was pushed back, my coat, that had completely covered her face and head, slipped from round her, and, by the full light of the fire, I saw, just above her left temple, a broad streak of white in her black hair."

Just as Major Hughes finished his story, there was a clicking, as of high heels, in the hall, and a patter, as of little, soft-shod feet—a voice said dotingly: "Oh, oo is oo mover's darling!"

"What!—baby talk here?" said Captain Rhodes, looking at Major Hughes in astonishment.

The portière was drawn back, and a handsome little boy, about three years old, ran in, followed by a charmingly pretty young woman. She was very small, her eyes were as black as coal, and just above the left temple there was a broad streak of white in her black hair.

Captain Rhodes stared at her wonderingly.

"Why—it's——" he said—then stopped abruptly.

"Yes, it's," said Major Hughes, laughing, "and isn't it a good thing for me that five years ago I hadn't a controlling voice in army regulations?"

ELIZABETH HERMAN.

Keep your eye open for the Christmas Number of "Pearson's Weekly," which will be published Next Tuesday, Nov. 18th. It is good.

Digitized by Google

By GEO. C. WALLIS, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

CHAPTER XIII.

PASSION'S PLAYTHING.

FOR all my eagerness and energetic urging, some months elapsed before the raw levy of men that Listra's gold had gathered was ready to take the field against such sturdy foes as I knew those bandit hordes, ensconced in their rocky retreats, would prove, and during this time there was not a wealthy young blood, or a dissolute, tottering old noble, within that gay city, more wildly dissipated, more uproariously fond of wine, more careless of his coin, more sleepless through the balmy nights, than Macis the officer. Yet with prurient prudence, I took pains not to go too far, lest I should find ill-favour in the eyes of the Princess. In all else I outstripped every rival in my reckless revelry, and none were so welcome, none were greeted with such admiring homage as myself at deepest carouse, at wildest carnival, at most daring mischief plot, at most abandoned drunken brawl. To my shame I write this.

So free was I, indeed, with money that before long I had to make a secret journey to my treasure cave, to re-enrich myself with gold and jewels. All was as I had left it, unmolested, save that the sea, at highest tide, washed another step of the rough and rocky stairway outside.

On my return I stayed again at the little inn, astonishing that greasy, timid, tardy host still more than before by the liberal largess I bestowed upon him.

Soon afterwards I set out from Thinæ at the head of nearly a thousand men-at-arms, and, proceeding northward by swift marches, had the good fortune to surprise and utterly defeat a band of the robbers on one of their marauding sallies—a band at least 300 strong. This sent up the spirits of my followers at a bound, and, flushed with success, and imbued with confidence in themselves and in my leadership, they pressed forward with ungrudging speed, unflagging zeal.

From haunt to haunt, from lowland to upland, from stockades upon the plain to fortified ledges upon the hills, from battlemented ridges to almost inaccessible caves, we forced those brigands, step by step, cubit by cubit, league by league, until at last, surprised out of their usual caution, and dumfounded at our persistent following up of every slight advantage, they met and gave us battle in a narrow pass, fought their hardest, strove like very fiends in their furious despair, and in the end were forced to seek temporary safety in flight. But the victory was dearly bought, leaving me only five hundred sound warriors to complete my task.

Still I kept on, ably seconded in my efforts by that indefatigable couple of worthies, Valdo and Atris, and at length pinned the vagrants in their last retreat—a rocky defile near the top of a mountain-range, whose northern side sloped into the sea beyond. Their vantago point was the only place where a large body of men could cross the range, and as it was useless to attempt to starve them out, as they were supplied by the pirates, I determined to bring matters to an issue then and there, having now four hundred men to oppose to their grim, gaunt band of seventy, entrenched in their formidable stronghold.

So formidable it was, truly, that any leader less reckless would have hesitated before it. The narrow path wound up the hill between tall, precipitous cliffs, unscaleable by human cunning, wound round the edge of a towering column of rock that rose sheer in the middle of the gorge, and, a few paces further on, crossed a deep ravine that ran transverse to it, by means of a rude, wooden bridge.

On the column of rock, and on both sides of the bridge, the brigands took their final stand. They could easily have stayed our progress by destroying the frail structure that spanned the abyss, but only at the cost of making themselves prisoners, unable to pursue their forays, since a few men left by me would have served to prevent them recrossing the critical point.

Up the narrow pass, dim already with the darkening shades of eve, in strange contrast to the glowing light on the peaks above, I led my sturdy band, higher and higher, till we reached the column of rock I have mentioned. Here we met the first fragment of the enemy's small force, perched high on the stony cliff, and lost many men in circumventing and clearing them out, and that done, pressed on with fresh zeal, and streaming along the curving ledge, re-entered the gorge and came to where our fifty remaining foes took stand to guard the bridge on which their lives depended. From this high point, looking northward, I caught a glimpse of the cold, grey sea, unbroken by a sail, washing restlessly upon a rugged shore.

"If we leave here victorious," I said to Valdo in the momentary hesitation before the conflict, "our work will be done, and there will only be yonder implacable, invincible foe to deal with," and I pointed to the distant waters.

"That is true, Macis," said he, "therefore, let us rid ourselves of all the enemies that we can."

He was ever sternly practical, was Valdo, and even the shadow of the great calamity that threatened the low-lying districts, and perhaps the whole of Atlantis, failed to turn his mind from its present purpose. A worthy soldier, truly.

So I turned and gave the order to advance and seize the bridge—an order more easily given than carried out, for here the ravine narrowed so that scarcely four men could pass abreast, and men fighting as the bandits fought, in their last hold and for their very lives, would be able to dispute the passage while strength remained to them to draw bow or swing sword. At them, pell-mell, in one great dashing charge we went, crowding through the narrow neck regardless of the death-dealing shower of arrows and bullets that the archers and slingers poured into our compact mass with terrible effect.

Digitized by Google

Twice, thrice, we charged thus, each time surging back with diminished numbers, not a few stumbling forward in their mad impetuosity into the gulf below. I soon saw that this would only decimate my force to no purpose, and that it were wiser to let my marksmen pick our foes off one by one, and having withdrawn ourselves behind the shelter of a jutting rock, we set to work thinning that desperate little band from our place of safety, and with such ease, that in rage and disgust they separated, hiding themselves by twos and threes, to let the storm of missiles pass them by.

Now I saw my chance, and taking my two officers and calling on the rest to follow, I dashed down the gorge and bounded on to the bridge before the astonished foe could intercept me. Then we turned back to back, and fought as I have seldom fought before or since. Sword clashed on sword with fiercest stroke, dagger on shield, and arrow on helm, and high above all, the ringing blows of the robber chief's great axe resounded mightily on every skull that came within his reach. Soon the foemen between us and our main body were all cut down, and pouring over the bridge, we pressed the last score of stubborn dogs down to the very water's edge. Then they turned their backs to the sea as we formed in a semicircle before them, and drawing ever in, we slew them one by one and two by two, though slowly and with great loss to ourselves. Nearer and nearer to the flowing waves we forced the few who still strove on, till only the giant chief remained, swinging his great axe in hissing curves before him, as he stood there defiant, his feet already washed by the curling water.

Bounded on to the bridge.

"How many dogs does it need to pull down the solitary bear?" he shouted tauntingly. "How many cowards to slay a brave man?"

"I know not," I cried in answer, stung to fury by the insult, "but this I know, that one brave man alone is needed to despatch a braggart!" and signing to my men to draw back and hold their hands, I sprang forward and met the boaster in single combat.

With a roar of delight at what he thought an easy prey, the giant whirled his axe in a swinging circle round his head, and brought it down—but only upon the unresponsive sand. Again he whirled it, having parried my stroke, and again, thanks to my nimbleness of foot, missed his aim. Again the great axe whirled, and as it came, measuring my distance and watching my time, I leapt upwards and forwards, striking at the hardwood shaft with all my strength, and so well that Sunderer's blade passed slantwise through it, and, smiting downward with unabated force, was buried in the bandit's head.

My men gave a mighty shout when they saw the deed, making the rocks re-echo with their cries of jubilation, for now the work was done, and a handsome reward awaited all who were left alive to receive it, the greater, too, because out of the thousand men who had started out with me on this perilous mission, only 150 remained to share the spoil. So desperate had been that last, stern struggle.

As it was then near sunset we stayed by the shore till morning, then re-ascended the mountain to the ravine, breaking down the bridge when we had passed over, and retraced our steps with light hearts to the city of Thinæ, to receive and endure the plaudits, and feastings, and irrepressible attentions of the populace. I made report of our triumph with all due formality before the Princess, and, to Dison's unmistakable chagrin, was nominated her chief soldier, and commanded to take up my abode in the palace. As I bent low to acknowledge the favour, I seized her dainty hand and pressed it to my lips with feverish impulse, holding it, perhaps, longer than was needful, but unresistingly, nevertheless; and as I turned away our eyes met for a moment in a swift glance—a fiery, passionate message of love on my part, a half-responsive look on hers that seemed to say, "Wait and hope."

Elated by such promise of success, I was stalking from the room, scarce heeding how I went or against whom I jostled, when someone roughly seized my shoulder and hurled me a dozen paces from my path, and a voice rang angrily in my ear as I reeled:

"Take heed, interloping wretch, how you tread on the toes of better men than yourself!"

In an instant "Sunderer" was out of its sheath, and flashing in the air. Nor had I far to seek the cause of the sudden interruption. 'Twas the Lord Dison himself, with drawn sword, coolly regarding me with quiet jealousy, who had spoken.

"An you account not for such villainous language," I said to him, "and that speedily, be on your guard."

"I render no account to such adventurers as you," he made reply lunging at me with his blade.

Digitized by Google

"Then take your deserts!" I cried, forthwith engaging him, slashing, thrusting, crossing, and recrossing with feint and counter-feint, parry, and ward. Immediately the great chamber was in an uproar, the ladies screamed, and clung to their husbands or lovers, men crowded round us to watch the strife, and Atris and Valdo reached my side but just in time to strike down a couple of Dison's paid varlets, who were about to plunge their daggers in my back, thinking to escape unnoticed in the general confusion.

I was too busy to see this at the time, being fully occupied with the irate noble, who proved a good match for me at first, but lost his ground when he grew frantic at his inability to break through my defence; and I grew calmer as the duel went on, till at last, with "Sunderer's" razor edge, I shivered his blade in twain and bore him to the floor, holding the blue steel against his throat in case he strove to rise.

Then I spoke him, asking with a mocking smile if he would that I forgave the insult or no, telling him that, if no, the blade should sever his ill-natured neck as swiftly as the lightning splits a stricken tree.

"If the Princess wills it, I crave pardon," muttered my fallen enemy; "not otherwise." I turned to Listra, who now stood near, not in the least disconcerted at the struggle, and asked if it was her will that the disgraced noble should humble himself before me.

"Nay," she answered, "I would see no man humbled to save his life, but you have done enough without. As my servant, Macis, I command you to sheath that wondrous blade of yours, and let the Lord Dison go about his business. To which I will add that I dismiss him, as a beaten warrior, from my town and province," and with that the dictatorial beauty turned on her heel in supercilious disdain of her former favourite.

"When my mistress orders, I must obey—at least, at present," I said to Dison, taking care that none of the sting in my remarks should be unfelt, "and, therefore, you are free to leave with a sound skin. But cross not my path again, or a dozen fair ones' pitying words shall not save you. Begone!"

His face almost hideous with the concentrated malice and suppressed mortification showing in it, the swordless soldier strode hastily away amid the jeers of the company, nor did I see him again till after many years.

Now my lot fell in pleasant lines, and I became the most noted man in all the province; nay, the repute of my skill and good fortune and the fame of my matchless sword spread far beyond its borders, and Macis the officer, the gayest of the gay, the favourite of Listra, the iron-handed champion of her little army, was a household word in many of the wonder-loving districts round about. Yet not all at once, nor of my own open seeking, did I become the acknowledged lover of the Princess. It happened in this wise:

For some time after the discomfiture of Dison I held aloof from her ladyship. At this the Princess was piqued, and flouted me whenever we met in the banquet or the guest rooms, so that I held aloof still more. This game of sullen distancy we kept up, till, as I expected, my lady, who was so used to flattery and homage, grew tired of it, and strove in many ways, and with the many arts she knew so well, to lure me from my seeming apathy.

Once, in a brilliant assembly, where she moved resplendent in her beauty, like the Spirit of Love incarnate, she turned her lustrous eyes full on me as I chanced to approach where she sat, surrounded by a bevy of her ardent admirers, and greeted me thus:

"Am I not fair, Macis, that you deem not my company worthy of your lordly presence?"

The men gazed curiously at me, so pointedly favoured, and the women whispered to each other quietly. For the benefit of the latter I answered:

"Fair you are, indeed, Princess—as a bright gem 'mid sparkling jewels, rare and beautiful as any."

Pouting, the spoiled and petted creature turned away, while I bit my lip in vexation, wishing now to recall the words so lightly spoken, wishing that it were possible to throw myself upon my knees before her then and there, for I could not hold out against her charms and wayward grace much longer. Reviling myself for my contrariness, I retired to my quarters and paced the room fretting and fuming in impotent chagrin.

By now my Princess had had enough of it, and sent a messenger to command the officer Macis to attend upon her in her audience chamber without delay. Thither, heavy-hearted, I proceeded forthwith, expecting nothing less than a contemptuous dismissal, and perchance a passionate outburst of invective from her ruby lips.

I found her alone, reclining on the self-same ivory couch where I first feasted my eyes on her bold, dark beauty, her raven hair this time flowing in loose rich tresses upon her cream-white shoulders; her rounded arms bare from the elbow, save for the circlets of solid gold that nestled on her wrists; her purple robe exchanged for one of a dark, shimmering silk, that fitted her lithe form to a marvellous perfection, showing every graceful curve with clearness, and contrasting well with the fair skin and white embroidered edgings of the neck and sleeves; and her dainty feet tapped the polished floor impatiently when I entered, revealing most coquettishly a pair of neatest ankles beneath the falling folds of silk. Upon her head gleamed a clustering coronal of purest diamonds, which sparkled dazzlingly in the lamp-light when she raised her eyes to mine on hearing the sound of my footfall.

"Then you deign to come at my command, my proud soldier?" said she, with a tinge of irony.

"Your word is law to me, Princess," I said, chilled by her reception, "as it is to all your servants."

"Now you speak as a servant should. Know you, then, that I am minded to send you away, as I sent the noble Dison, whom you so cruelly ill-used?"

"I feared as much," said I in answer, "and if so I have no choice but to suffer and obey, though as to ill-treating Dison, I will do the same again an he crosses my path."

"Still haughty and self-willed, I see," returned the Princess, "though you are more amenable to reason than you were an hour ago. Before I send you away I must have an explanation of your curtness, and wherefore you slighted me in presence of my guests and vassals. But pray sit down—you look so gainless standing there like a prisoner on trial!—here, at my side—there is room enough and to spare on this couch, an it be not too hard to suit your Majesty."

Wondering, I complied, nothing loath, though the ivory seat was scarcely large enough for the two of us, and our forms must needs touch. Her hand fell on mine, it seemed by chance, and burned upon my flesh as a thing of fire.

"Now tell me, Macis," said Listra, looking full into my face with her melting orbs, that took all the stubbornness and anger out of me, "now tell me, I pray, wherefore you spoke lightly of my beauty before all men?"

"'Tis hard to tell," I answered, returning her gaze with an ardent look that no daughter of Atlantis could misread, "but methinks it was because I thought you looked on me in no other light than as a servant, paid for his duty," and while I spoke the vision of Briseis came into my mind, and I remembered how I had once so talked with her.

"And in what light would you that I looked on you?" asked my lady.

"As an equal," I responded boldly, "equal both in rank and riches."

"Then why came you here to join my soldiers?"

"Because," said I, "I love an active life, and Vichri commended your province as one where I should have such a life as I desired."

"Is that all?" she asked, in a low voice.

"All," I answered, my tongue still refusing to say the words that were burning for utterance. For a little time the Princess sat regarding me with a curious expression,

Digitized by Google

"Oh, Macis!" she cried.

part angry, part sad, part hungry—as only a woman in love can look—and then, without a word of warning, she slipped off the couch, and was clinging to my knees in passionate entreaty.

"Oh, Macis!" she cried beseechingly, seizing my hands convulsively in hers, while the crystal tears stood in her eyes, "Oh, Macis! if thou art human, and can read a woman's heart, and are moved by a woman's suffering, breathe one word of love to me! Nay!" (as I strove to raise her from the floor) "Nay! I will not rise until thou sayest thou dost think me the dearest of women! Deep down in thy heart thou must do, Macis, my beloved, for e'en an iceberg melts when floating into warmer waters, and I have loved thee, thou proud, strong soldier, since the day thou first wast brought to me, and spoke a flattering speech into my willing ear. Now, own that thou hast felt the same, and dared not say it—for so 'tis, my Macis, is it not?" and the soft, pleading voice rang almost stern in its last questioning.

Before that wild appeal from one so fair and young and so encharmed with my unworthy self, all sense of right and wrong, the image of Briseis, the warning of Isis, and all things I had once minded, were forgotten and went down into viewless chaos, and, marvelling how 'twas that I had held back so long, I bent down and seized my sweet, pleading Princess in my rough, scarred arms, lifting her from the floor to the couch beside me, myself now all aglow with passionate longing, and took unstinted measure of bliss from her responsive lips before I answered:

"It is as thou thought, my Listra, for I also have loved thee since our eyes first met."

"Then I am content, for of all men thou art the noblest and the best," she whispered, nestling to my arms, and giving back kiss for kiss and caress for caress.

Now it seemed to me as though the Gate of the Garden of Pleasure—that lies beyond the Shadowland—was opened before us, and we walked therein, alone with our sweet restrainless passion; that through the waking vision I saw the Spirit of Love smile softly on us, as a mother smiles upon a favoured child; and in that first fierce fever-flush of delirious delight, with those soft, warm arms about me, that velvety cheek pressed close to mine, the nectar of those willing lips upon my own, I ceased to care for aught on land or sea besides the radiant creature who thus caused my eyes to darken to all else besides her own supreme, enchanting loveliness.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Waking of the Sleeper.

Now all things went well with me for a space, intoxicated as I was with the love of Listra, and for nearly a year I lorded it over the province of Aidè, and strutted proudly about the streets of Thinæ, idolised of the soldiers, envied of the nobles—and hated of some, who sought my position—caring little for the news which reached us from time to time of the ceaseless rising of the sea and the inward flight of the frightened dwellers on the shore, heeding little the many rumours of disaster to our forces in Western Ulmeca, in conflict with the Red Barbarians, and still less heeding the stories of the Queen's indomitable zeal in organising her armies and fleets, and storing munitions of war.

All this passed indifferently to me, who was bound up in my Princess, and had no eyes or ears for other things for long together. Fresh bands of robbers appeared on the hills once or twice, but I sent my two trusty followers against these, not caring to leave my mistress for so long a time as would be needful to expel them; and Valdo and Atris, I make no doubt, were quite as willing to earn the glory and share the spoil unaided. Also I fought once with a blustering lord who made some jesting insult regarding myself and my Princess when in his cups, and though he was a notable swordsman, it availed him nothing against the sharpness of my magic blade; and to Listra's inexpressible delight I wounded him so grievously that he died before a week had passed.

All this I am telling to my shame, even though it savours of self-abasement in the telling to you who read; but in setting down the doings of my life it were ill to keep back the evil days, recording only the good, and portraying myself as that which I was not—and thus must I account for the fulness of my story. It has ever been a heavy task with me to dissemble, saving in the matter of my name, in which deceit I think I have excelled.

At last came word by mounted messengers that Quitzaal, the governor of Ulmeca, had risen in revolt with the aid of the Red Barbarians, and had put to the sword all who were faithful to the Queen, as Ethiop had done in Nubia years agone; that many of the soldiers under his command had acknowledged him as King of Ulmeca, and had seized a goodly number of warships in the harbours; that Vichri, who was with him, had proclaimed himself King of Atlantis, and with the help of Quitzaal was making preparation to invade his coveted country; and that the pirates, far and wide, had made common cause with the rebels, and were mustering their vessels from oversea.

Following hard on the heels of the bearers of these tidings came one with the Royal Seal, commanding the Princess, as governor of the province, to send an armed force as strong as she could spare, under a trusty captain, to the plain outside the city of Kronos, there to join the army that was gathering to repel the imminent invasion of the two rebel leaders. To this last message and command, the Princess paid no attention further than to bid the courier return and tell his sovereign that the province of Aidè was able to defend itself, and expected others to do the same, but that no soldier should cross her borders except in direst need.

This answer angered me somewhat, for I began to get ambitious, and to long for further glories on the field of war, but when I made attempt to reason with my wayward mistress, she at first said that she was not so sure, as her lord the Prince was in Ulmeca, that she ought not to lead her men against the Queen; and then she urged that if I went to battle I might never return, and what would she do then? And when I persisted, she gave way to a flood of petulant tears with which all my arguments were swept away, and I had to make pretence to come to her mind before she was appeased.

Digitized by Google

But others were not so blinded by her sophistries as I, and many, deeply offended, deserted in secret, and found their way to Court, bearing tales of their Princess's humour and spirit, and of her amour with myself. Valdo and Atris, in particular, were enraged at her decision, and but that I entreated them to remain in my service, would also have gone, and to console them somewhat I took to going hunting and fishing raids with them, bringing myself at last to leave my love on occasions.

I grew tired of for ever dangling in her wake, and, moreover, her temper was intensely passionate and jealous, so that I was in contant fear lest a stray smile from any lady should rouse her slumbering fire, and perhaps lead her to do the unoffending victim a mortal injury. Yet, when after a temporary quarrel we were reconciled again, it was like sunshine after storm, so bewitchingly lovable was she, so prettily attentive to my wants, so joyously merry all day long.

Another thing that came to my knowledge, and disquieted my mind considerably, was the fact that Queen Briseis had never issued a decree of special sternness against pirates, as Vichri had made me believe at that roadside inn; had never put a price upon my head, or so much as made mention of me since her accession to the throne. If so much was false, how knew I that what he said regarding his own share in my seizure and sentence fifteen years ago was true?

"Vichri shall tell the truth next time we meet!" I said to myself ominously.

One day, whilst fishing with baited lines from the shore where I had slain the bandit chief, my two followers alone being with me, I descried a white sail on the horizon line, at first no larger than a seamew's wing, but coming in swiftly towards the land under a strong north-west wind. Nearer and nearer it came, till I saw that it was a full-sized warship, well manned and worked, flying a strange flag—a red cross, outlined with white, upon a field of blue—and evidently steering for the creek just below the rock from whence we cast our lines. Seeing this, we drew them in and hastened down to the sand to await the stranger's coming, for I had seen enough by this time to know that it was no pirate we had here.

When within some hundred paces of the shore the strange sail hove to, and a boat shot out from her side, breasting the creaming surges of the inlet, and running her keel high up on the sand. A tall, soldierly man, still young, but well-set as one who had seen rough service, sprang out upon the beach, followed by a score of armed men, and, marching up to us, demanded authoritatively who we were and what was our business there?

My answer to this short, sharp summons was equally as sharp and short, for I was not used to being addressed so roughly by strangers.

"Who I am," I said curtly, "you had better inquire of someone else, and my business is my business."

"Think yourself of importance, doubtless," the tall man answered, with a queer smile, "but perhaps you may not be above knowing my name?"

"By no means," said I, "and, that forthcoming, may enlighten you as respects myself and these my followers."

"Good!" the stranger replied. "Know, then, that I am the Prince of this province of Aidè, and am come to take up my residence and duties here after a long absence; so that if you live within my jurisdiction I can demand your name, and your object in being on this deserted coast."

Momentarily I was taken aback at the sudden knowledge that I stood in the presence of my love's rightful lord, and Valdo and Atris stared open-mouthed and wide-eyed as the tall man uttered so startling a piece of news. Recovering my complacency, however, and reflecting that here was stern necessity for the exercise of that dissemblance which I so detested, I returned:

"As to our object, Prince, 'tis simple enough; one must have sport, and fishing, I believe, is called by that name amongst its votaries. As to myself, I am known at Thinæ as an officer of the palace guard, by name Valdo. Aught more I can tell thee?"

"Much," he answered shortly. "You can say whether my soldiers have gone to the war on behalf of the Queen, or no."

"I had not been here, in idleness," I replied, "if a chance had offered of active service, but the Princess forbade us to take part in the war, much to the chagrin of many. Some have deserted of their own will, but a good force remains."

"Then my Princess had that sound sense," mused my questioner thoughtfully. "And whilst talking canst tell me any news of my lady? Nay, out with it! no matter what it may be; I can partly guess its purport!"

"I can best tell you," I began, with every appearance of reluctancy, "by advising you to march on Thinæ fully armed and prepared to do battle with the holder of the keenest blade in the world. There is much talk in the city concerning the Princess and one Macis, her chief officer, and rumour has it that he is the Prince of Aidè in all but name."

To this the tall soldier made no response save a most expressive firm-setting of the lips, but went on to say:

"Would you care to do me a service? You shall not be unrewarded when I come into my own again."

"Ay, and glad of the chance," I cried, feigning enthusiasm at the prospect, "for 'tis tiring work to be at a woman's beck and call, and to sit fishing while others revel in the shock of arms."

"Then seemeth to me, Calasis," said the Prince, addressing one of his troop, "that here we have the very man we seek?" The other nodded. "Then," he went on, turning to me, "what I desire is a trusty man to hasten to Thinæ with the news that a large force of the enemy are landing near the southern confines of Aidè. That will draw off the fighting men from the city, so that I and my band can make entry and seize the palace and its false mistress before the alarm can spread. Then I will answer for my success. Canst do this?"

"Readily, and enjoy the trick," I answered. "I will start without delay."

"Go then and prosper," said the Prince. "Stay!" he added, "Calasis and a score of my men shall go with you as far as the wooden bridge, and remain to guard it till I have got my men over. Now hasten."

I smothered my anger at being thus baulked as well as I could—for I had meant to throw down the new bridge that I had erected—and together we rode up the hill side, crossed the wooden span, and there leaving the score of soldiers, struck spurs into our horses and clattered down the rocky ravine with re-echoing tread. As soon as we debouched upon the plain, I drew up, and consulted with my two followers.

"You heard what passed between me and the Prince?" I asked.

"All," said Atris solemnly.

"And see that 'tis folly for me to return to Thinæ?"

"Utter folly," said Atris, again solemnly.

"Then," I said, "this is what I will do. You two are free to go with me, or back to Thinæ to make the best of your chances, but I shall seek refuge in the southern districts of the country. Make your choice now, and let us say farewell."

"Not so fast, captain!" said Valdo, smiling, "let us make our choice before you say farewell! For my part, I go with you anywhere on land or overseas. I have had enough of courtier life."

Digitized by Google

"And so say I," assented Atris, "for our captain will need us to guard his back as we have done before an he goes far alone in this disturbed country."

"Your faithfulness shall not be unremembered," I said, deeply moved, "for I think I can show you a hoard of treasure that will make your mouths water, and we will be sharers of it. Now will you go or not?"

"We go," they reiterated.

"Then away!" I cried; and the three of us let out at full gallop along the silent road, directing our course to the westward of Thinæ, and towards the village where I had first entered the province. Our horses were still fresh, the night was warm, and the stars shone brightly, so we raced on till the rosy dawn illumined the hill-tops, and the world of life awoke to another day of activeness. Then we rested at a wayside house, then on again, and thus, avoiding the larger towns and ever keeping forward, we reached the outskirts of the hamlet where I had engaged my two attendants, and, passing round it, crossed the border-line into the next province.

Well do I remember my last glimpse of Aidè. We were riding gently down a winding valley, hemmed in by a chain of undulating eminences, letting our steeds have their bridles, and proceeding silently, each engrossed with his own thoughts. To our right the wooded ridge, rich with its age-old trees and rife with timorous game, rose grandly above us, the great red blossoms of the autcylus flaming across its darkest places, intersprinkled with the whitish hemlock; to the left a hidden brook made sweet melody adown the lovely slope as it hurried to the river; behind, rose green hills melting away into the cloudy sky; in front, the vale curved sharply, so that we appeared to be riding at a great dead wall. The day was drowsily hot, every leaf and pebble gleaming with that surface sheen that pleases so well the man in strong and healthy vigour and so dejects the sorrowing, solitary traveller, out of tune with man and nature too.

Taking a last look at the lovely prospect we rounded the jutting rock at the foot of the valley, and were then riding in the province of Yand.

We kept on, staying a night to rest at the inn of mine host with the fat form and greasy face, being none too sparing in our remarks anent his tardiness, and then struck out for the wind-swept plateau where the entrance to my cave was hidden.

Dismounting at the edge of this thick-grown plain, hearing even then the splash of the waves on its seaward face, we made our way to the tunnel mouth, and one by one struggled into the cavern. Here an exclamation of surprise and delight burst from both my comrades. The vast wealth dazzled their eyes, and roused the avarice that is in every human soul—even though it be dormant.

"Now," said Atris, speaking a longer sentence than was his wont, "we shall be rich as princes, and well paid for leaving her ladyship."

"Now," said Valdo, ever practical, "we shall be able to pay a troop of men large enough to take to the war under a separate flag."

"Which is my intention," I remarked; "but first we must get this gold into convenient shape for carriage. 'Twere idle to try to take away these great bars as they are, and I have spent most of the coins and jewels already."

Having made provision for a short stay, we set to work breaking up the heavy ingots of the costly yellow metal into sizes suitable for transport, and then, taking as many as we could carry, loaded our horses and ourselves with it and with the few remaining gems and money pieces, still leaving behind some dozen unbroken bars of gold and several great reels of rich, thick-woven cloth, worth a king's ransom. One thing I noticed was that the sea, at highest flow, was just awash with the cave floor.

Thus, loaded down with wealth, off we went again, shaping our way for Kronos, and for all the pelf I had about me, and for all the lively songs and well-meant quips and jokes of my two companions, I was for the most time sunk in moody reverie. It is true that the pangs of parting from Listra were not so very keen—were rather a relief from irksome dalliance, indeed; but the thought of seeing Briseis again and the danger of being recognised—if it was a danger any more—was material in plenty for worrying uneasiness. The future loomed up black even as the past did, saving only that short and blessed time, like the far-off gleam of a brilliant star, when I lived in the house of Briseis as her favoured guest, and dark treachery had not thrown its withering blight upon my chequered path.

At length, having travelled many weeks, and being tolerably ignorant of passing events, we found ourselves within an hour's ride of the town of Miropis, which I had such good cause to recollect, the pointed cone of the Sacred Grotto jutting up out of the plain directly before us. At sight of it a thought flashed into my mind.

"An you would like to see the Sacred Sleeper," I said to my comrades, "now is our time. We can tether our horses in the cactus groves in perfect safety."

"Lead on, then, Captain," cried Atris, his curiosity aroused, and Valdo agreed.

So we went forward towards the conical, hollow hill, penetrating the belt of forest that surround it, and threading reverently through the dildo maze, in which we secured our animals, until we reached the entrance.

"Now follow me," I said, "and do not speak until I give the word." Therewith, bending low, I scrambled through the orifice in the black rock, closely succeeded by the two soldiers, and we stood upright within the vasty hall, gazing, awestricken, at the immensity of void that lay around us. Valdo and his comrade were too overcome by the sight to say much; but their faces, dim as was the light, showed me that they felt much as I had done on my former visit. The thin, bright ray that pierced the murky middle of the two-coned vault still glowed on its straight down-pouring course into the gulf below. As we gazed, the rope rattled loosely at my side, and the door which closed the entrance fell, leaving us in darkness save for the solitary ray of light, and I had but time to whisper to my friends "stir not for your lives!" when a voice rang out, though modulated as by coming from a distance, the words that I recalled so well.

"Enter, and fear not, O, Arnon, for the place where the Sleeper sleeps is holy ground!"

I answered that I would enter when I saw a safe way. The voice replied, as of old:

"Take three paces to the right, you and your comrades, and all shall be plain before your feet."

We followed this instruction, and then, as I expected, the thousand lights around the rocky vault flashed forth into a flood of brilliancy, showing us the steps that led from our little stone platform in a curving path to the earthward apex of the inverted pyramid. Down this winding stair we crept, I leading, the others still dumfoundered, until we reached the lowest point and stood beside the couch of gold on which the Sleeper lay, the brazen shield still resting on him and reflecting the great sun-ray from its polished surface. As before, the two watchers, who seemed as little changed by the hand of Time as the sleeping body they guarded, spoke, one saying softly, "Wait!" and the other, pointing upwards, "Look!"

Then, amid the silence, the hundred doors on the stairway opened, and the hundred Priests of Truth came marching down the steps, formed in a double ring round us and round the Sacred Sleeper, singing the self-same chant whose notes had haunted me ever since I first heard it. Into a mighty volume of soaring sound it rose, majestically echoing round the lamp-lit vault, then falling in wild weird melody from the sloping slides and meeting in a focus overhead; nor this time, any more than of old, did the sleeping figure make slightest sign of life!

Now I waited to see the white-robed company reascend to their hundred cells as before, but they moved not, standing as they stood to sing, mute, still, and dreadfully unnerving with their stolid stare. Then Unim, the elder of the watchers, turning, spoke:

Digitized by Google

"It is both well and ill for thee, my son, that thou hast sought this holy spot. But first tell me, thou who went from here with curses on thy lips and hast doubted my word full oft since then, have not my prophesyings proved true?"

"Even so," I answered, "though I doubted long."

"Then thou hast learned, and see thou forgettest not the lesson, that what the Spirit of Truth utters by the mouth of Unim can never fail. This, then, I further say to thee, though it is forbidden for me to lift the veil too far, lest mortal eyes should shrivel up at the awful prospect. Thou hast come for counsel, as I foretold, and my counsel is to seek the presence of the Queen as soon as may be, and so be restored to thy former favour, for the treachery thou chargest her with was not of her doing, but another's. Then thou shalt become great in Atlantis, greater than all men, though not without strife and coming near to death full often in the service of thy country. Nay, even these with thee have no common lot, and each shall find a warrior's grave, their names being known as long as Atlantis lasts. As to thyself, O, Arnon, son of Didron, whom men know now as Macis, it is told of thee that, after many dangers, thou shalt die in the arms of the sea that thou lovest so well, though many shall have gone that way before thee.

"And more than this it is not good for thee to know, save that the land is doomed and its glory fast departing. So hath the Spirit of Truth moved me to speak."

"Something I would tell thee, Unim," I said, "and ask thy answer to it. When I dwelt in that foreign land as a priest I had a vision from one of their gods, the Spirit of Isis, and I would know whether it was a true one or not."

"First tell me the vision," said the priest.

So I repeated the substance of it and the prophesy of the shadowy shape regarding my re-union with Briseis and the great temptation I was warned against, my hundred and three listeners hearing me in perfect silence to the end.

"It was a true foretelling," said Unim, when I had finished my story, "and showeth that the Spirit of Truth is worshipped in other lands than here, though it be under another name and with other rites. It shall come to pass as the Shape said, but I fear me, Arnon, my son, that thou hast already fallen before the temptation there foreshadowed. Art not now travelling from the province where a lawful bride of a distant lord bewails thy absence?

"But what is done, is done, my son, and as only the spirits know the heaviness of our trial, so they only can condemn, and in condemning, temper the punishment to the doer's guilt; so they only can be truly merciful. Let that pass, and meet what the future may hold for thee with an undaunted heart, for till thou hast been here a third time, fear not death."

He ceased, and the younger of the watchers turned to me, saying in a softer voice than Unim's:

"Look upon the Sleeper, Arnon, and call him from his slumber; for haply he may hear thee, who art so favoured of the gods in other ways."

I stooped and looked intently at the features of the sleeping warrior, for such I took it that he had been, by his shield and spear and martial dress, though the weapons were strange-shaped, sadly ancient then, and all of bronze instead of iron. His face, I saw, now that I observed it closely, was that of a man of middle-age, his form was well-knit but rather large-boned, he was no taller than myself, and seemed to all appearance as a healthy man who had fallen quietly asleep and was sleeping undisturbed.

"O, Sleeper!" I cried, obeying the priest's injunction, "awake, arise, and live! I, Arnon, the son of Didron, call upon you."

"Methought I heard a voice calling."

The recumbent figure moved not so much as a finger. I called again, and still no visible response.

"You must take his right hand in yours, and command him in the name of the Spirit of Life," said the priest. I did so, taking the right hand in mine, and saying:

"Sleeper of the Grotto, awake, arise, and live! I, Arnon, the son of Didron, call upon you in the name of the Eternal Spirit of Life, for the hour has come for your eyes to be unsealed!"

A quiver ran down the sinewy frame that had been so long without a stir, a deep-drawn breath escaped the parting lips, the eyes unclosed, lighting with the light of reason, and he who had last seen the sun a thousand years agone sat up, gazing wonderingly, confusedly, first at the ray that poured down the awesome place, and then at us who stood around in silent surprise, in bewilderment no smaller than his own.

"Methought I heard a voice calling," said the wakened man; "a strange voice, speaking of the hour that has come. Where is Mattoni, and where Olasin, and where am I?"

"In the Grotto sacred to the Spirit of Truth," Unim answered composedly, as though he conversed with a well-known friend, "in which thou hast slept a thousand years, because the gods so willed it."

"Merciful Spirits!" exclaimed the risen one, evidently but half believing the monstrous tale; "tell me, then, who reigns in Atlantis now?"

"The Queen Briseis," replied Unim.

"And who before her?" asked the Sleeper.

"King Dulo the Tenth," said I.

"Then I am near accepting this awful story," said the questioner, with the air of one who yet has doubts; "but take me into the daylight that I may be sure the land is Atlantis, and that things are not as they were."

"Willingly, if thou canst walk," said Unim.

Digitized by Google

"Walk! ay, and run too," cried the other, "as though I but woke from a night's slumber, and was waiting for Mattoni and Olasin to go with me down to the sea to set sail in our argosy for the Isle of Olives."

"Then follow me," said Unim, as, preceded by the hundred white-robed priests, he led the way up the spiral stair, the clatter of our feet vibrating strangely in the hollow space. One by one the priests stepped back into their cells as we wound higher and higher, till only Unim and the Sleeper, with myself and two comrades, stood upon the platform before the entrance, which, being opened by the watcher who remained below, by means of the trailing rope, gave us passage into the open air. And how fresh and free it seemed to us after the gruesome spell of that cavernous grotto!

In coming out the Sleeper turned and recognised the conical hill. "It, at least," he said, "is unchanged outwardly."

Nearly to its summit we now climbed, by a stair so cunningly contrived that it was invisible to the casual eye, and stood near the apex, looking out upon the picture of land and sea and sky spread before us in the full glow of the even's sun. There was the plain over which we had ridden, there were the vast cane brakes, intersected by their narrow irrigation canals, there was the hated town of Miropis, and beyond was the dark blue sea, its tide now ebbing from the shore. Marenso (as the Sleeper was named) gazed silently upon the scene for a while, his face wearing an inscrutable expression; then sighed, and spoke:

"It is enough," he said; "you tell me true indeed. It must indeed be a thousand years since I stood upon this pyramid, and, gazing out to where is now the ocean, saw waving fields of corn, with hamlets here and there, stretching right to the sky. This town was not so large as 'tis now, nor was the sea nearer than a day's journey. Also this grotto was but half cut out when I remember it, and the people that I knew wore different dress to yours. It is enough. Now leave me, I pray, to silence and solitude, that I may grow used to the awful knowledge. Leave me, I say, in silence and solitude, here or otherwhere."

"In the Grotto alone thou wilt find peace," said Unim, and led him therein, returning to us shortly.

"Priest of Truth," I asked him, pointing to the town, "canst tell me why yon fleet of warships is gathered in the bay, why the town is all astir with soldiery and fenced about with barricades, and why these fields around are filled with a beleaguering force?"

"That can I easily," answered Unim. "Miropis has been seized by a sudden raid of the invaders, the Governor of the garrison, Sothi, having treacherously surrendered and gone over to the enemy, and now holding the place for them. The vessels yonder, four score in number, are their ships, and the besieging force is a detachment of the Queen's army under one Nayrahn, a brave soldier, but over slow in his doings. It would be well if you were to go down and hasten his movements; fearing not to be known by your rightful name."

I needed no further news, already smelling the battle from afar, longing to mingle in it, and so to drown the sadness that was fast benumbing my intelligence.

"To horse!" I cried to my dazed followers, suiting the action to the word, leaping down the cone, and springing into my saddle in hot haste. "We will burn this hated town above the heads of its inhabitants, and hang its traitor-governor on the deck of his allies' flag-ship. When last I looked on this wine-sodden hole I swore by the Eternal Spirits to re-enter it only as a conqueror, and that I will."

"Remember the words of Unim!" said the grave old man whom we left standing near the black pyramid's apex, "and enter not the Grotto again until you bring the body of the Sleeper here, dead. In life you shall next see him at the Court of the Queen."

Impatient of delay, scarce heeding his words, and even ceasing to wonder at the waking of Marenso from his age-long slumber, in my revengeful fury I dashed down the groves at sacrilegious pace, Valdo and Atris coming hard behind, and on we tore from the forest belt, across the waving fields, recklessly trampling down the grain and the bright, brittle stalks of cane, leaping waterways, flying over thick bushy hedges, charging unceremoniously through the lines of sentries round the Queen's men, riding uninvited past the camping troops of soldiers and the serried ranks of the mounted guard, and slacking not our pace for all the cries of the surprised sentinels till we reached the General's tent, where, bidding my comrades remain on guard, I dismounted, lifted the door-flap, and stalked in with unblushing effrontery.

(To be continued.)

RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY. No. 17.

First prize of £5: Mrs. Harris, 4, South Road, West Kirby, Cheshire; £1 each to Mr. Thos. Woolner, 63, Beaufort Road, St. Ann's Road, Green Lanes, N.; Mrs. Peirse, Northover Cottage, Charlton, Shepton Mallet; Mrs. Jane Hudson, 8, Bettridge Road, Hurlingham, S.W.; Miss Jessie F. Dulley, Lindens, Wellingborough; Mr. M. F. Musson, 21, Sutherland Avenue, W.

KEY.

11	59	80	51	9	62	60	86	35
47	89	16	29	44	63	39	73	67
14	10	18	26	5	8	77	84	23
6	22	19	49	56	57	32	69	87
85	68	27	30	70	43	33	15	1
92	7	55	31	21	78	3	82	71
48	42	52	12	66	4	64	54	65
74	17	50	93	46	41	72	58	96
83	79	13	76	38	61	37	40
75	2	91	45	94	36	24	88
34	28	20	25	95	90	81	53

DON'T BE ALARMED

If you receive a visit from a burglar. All you need do is to see the conditions of the

Burglary Insurance Scheme

in P.W. fulfilled. Then you can pull the clothes over your head and rest in peace.

Digitized by Google

A MUTUAL SURPRISE.

"AND is that really all?"

"All?"—and Mrs. Jardyne's big brown eyes glanced up at her visitor with an expression of pathetic reproach.

"Yes, all," continued Captain Mathurin, drawing a chair near his hostess. "Your note led me to expect all sorts of awkward complications. Why, the thing is as simple as can be."

Mrs. Jardyne shook her head dolefully.

"I cannot see that. Oh, if you knew what a dreadful night I have passed!"

"Poor little girl! But where does the difficulty come in?"

"Why, I have told you. I dare not advertise for them, because I should have to say how and when I lost them, and Gerald gave them to me when we were married, and I nearly always wear them."

"Well, but there are other pearls in the world, I suppose?"

Mrs. Jardyne looked up quickly.

"The only thing to do," continued the Captain smoothly, "is to match them as nearly as possible; and, unless Jardyne knows a good deal more about such things than I do, he'll be none the wiser."

"But he would know eventually."

"Why?"

Mrs. Jardyne grew pink, and as her complexion was of the delicate, transparent sort, the pause before she answered was very agreeable to Captain Mathurin's sense of the beautiful.

"Why?" he repeated, after a second.

"Because"—and Mrs. Jardyne's small, jewelled hands twisted nervously—"because Gerald pays all my bills."

The confession was a humiliating one, and Captain Mathurin would have hated himself for forcing it, if his companion had not looked so absolutely bewitching upon the moral rack.

"But this matter of the pearls does not concern you at all, Mrs. Jardyne. You were in my charge. It was through some carelessness of mine that the necklace was lost; therefore, in common fairness, it is my business to replace it—don't you see?"

"Oh!" But the first exclamation of relief was quickly followed by a very mournful shake of the head. "Oh, no! I could not possibly allow you, Captain Mathurin."

"Nonsense! Why not?"

"Oh, because—because I could not; it would be so dreadful."

"More dreadful than to tell your husband how you lost the pearls?"

"Oh, I shall never dare do that. I know Gerald would never forgive me. Oh, how wrong—how mad it was to go!"

"Come, Mrs. Jardyne, don't be so terrified about it. When all is said and done, there is nothing so very dreadful in going to the Empire with one of your husband's friends."

Gladys Jardyne was a very fragile-looking creature, with soft, fluffy, yellow hair, and an innocent childlike expression, which irritated her own and charmed the other sex; but for all her irresponsible expression and infantile ways, she was a passibly shrewd little person, and had a very distinct idea that to go to the Empire with Captain Mathurin while Gerald was away was distinctly one of those things she ought not to have done, and that to accept this suggested present of a pearl necklet was by no means the simple, irreproachable transaction her companion wished to imply—but—but——

"Don't look so wretched! I shall never forgive myself for having made you sad. Let me run straight off to Ryder, and see what I can do."

Captain Mathurin saw that the golden curls shook with less decision than before.

"But——"

"You will see that I have excellent taste. I may go, may I not?"

"I know it is very wrong," faltered Mrs Jardyne; "but it would be so dreadful to explain: and you—you are very kind!"

Captain Mathurin would have liked to express his feelings in somewhat warmer fashion than by pressing the little fingers; but he had served his apprenticeship in Cupid's Court, and knew that a precipitate move is often ruinous to the brightest prospects.

"When do you expect Jardyne back?" asked the Captain as he rose to go.

"He is coming by the Club train. I suppose he will be here almost directly."

"You will not be expected to wear the pearls to-night?"

"No, but I shall on the 20th at Lady Vipere's."

"And to-day is only the 18th. You need not be anxious. You shall have them to-morrow."

"Oh, how can I ever thank you, dear Captain Mathurin!"

"Nonsense! If you will sometimes remember our evening at the Empire—and me—I shan't want any more thanks."

Digitized by Google

"I shall never forget either," said the little woman fervently. "The 17th of June will always be a red letter day to me!"

"And to me!" echoed Captain Mathurin, with such significance that, even after the hall-door had closed upon him, Mrs. Jardyne felt herself blushing from crown to chin.

"He is very nice," she murmured, as she turned away from the window, "and there is really no harm in it; and—oh! I do hope he'll get a pretty clasp; the other was such a perfect thing!"

* * * * *

Mr. Jardyne was in great spirits on his return from Paris! The "legal business connected with the estate of a maternal uncle," as he explained to his not too-curious better half, had been arranged in a most satisfactory manner. It was delightful to be home again, and, by Jove! his little Gladys was the prettiest woman in Europe, etc., etc., all of which should have been gall and wormwood to Mrs. Jardyne had her conscience been of the stiff, unyielding sort; as it was, however, the golden-haired little lady allowed herself to be petted and made much of without any very serious moral qualms.

A sin is only a sin when found out, and if the little escapade with Captain Mathurin might, by the hypercritical, be ranged as one, nobody knew or would know anything about it, and what did it matter?

It must be confessed that Gladys was agitated by no stern self-communings as she sat dreaming in her room half hidden in a capacious wicker-chair, on the evening of Lady Vipere's dance. On the contrary, the gown she was to wear was a dream—and what more could woman covet? Besides which, this fortunate little mortal reflected that Gerald was really quite delightfully attentive, and Captain Mathurin was certainly most—interesting! And, then, last, but not least, there was the blissful consciousness that over there, in her jewel-case, nestling in a violet velvet écrin, bearing her monogram and the date of her marriage, was a beautiful string of pearls, their exquisite gleaming purity set off by a shimmering, myriad-lighted clasp, which Gladys knew in her secret soul to be far more valuable than its predecessor.

She heaved a sigh of profound content as she turned to ring for her maid, but at that very moment the door opened softly, and, to her unbounded surprise, Gerald entered!

Her exclamation of surprise died on her lips as she saw him advance quickly and silently to the Japanese cabinet on which stood her jewel-case.

What was he going to do? It was evident that he had not seen her!

Vague uneasiness changed quickly to a very definite horror as she saw him turn the key of the leather case. Could he know anything of the pearls? Did he suspect?

She watched him eagerly; he was evidently looking for something. Yes, it was the necklet! He had the velvet case in his hands; he was going to the window with it!

A hundred terrible possibilities rushed through her brain—wild recollections of eagerly read reports of "criminal proceedings." Her conscience revenged itself in a few seconds for its long torpor. Everything was against her—the Empire, the tête-à-tête supper, the frantic letter she had written, the pearls! In agony of terror she started to her feet as Jardyne pressed the spring of the case.

"Gerald!"

Case and pearls fell to the ground with a crash as he turned on her a face as white as her own.

"What are you doing?" she stammered.

"I—Great Heavens! Gladys, don't look like that! What's the matter?"

"Nothing. You frightened me!"

"Poor little girl! Sit down. You are not going to faint, are you?"

"No. I am better, only——"

"That's right. Shall I ring for Celeste, or can I get you anything?"

"No; only what were you doing, Gerald——"

"You really must have some wine, darling!" broke in Gerald quickly. But, as Mrs. Jardyne's agitation subsided, she noted with surprise that her husband's agitation seemed to increase; his manner was nervously fidgety, and altogether more suggestive of the sinning than the sinned against. What could it mean?

She interrupted his flow of words with a question:

"I am quite well now. Tell me what you wanted with my pearls?"

Jardyne gave a nervous laugh: "Your pearls, dearest?"

"Yes; what are you going to do with them?" reiterated Mrs Jardyne, her tone becoming proportionately authoritative as Gerald's expression grew mendacious and shifty. "Why did you steal into my room in that way?"

The big man looked supremely unhappy. Gladys' soft brown eyes were fixed upon him with anything but a childlike expression as he began some blundering, hopelessly lame explanation, but he broke off suddenly:

"It's no use, Gladys: I'd better tell you the truth. The fact is, I did want to look at your pearls; I wanted to see if anyone could tell the difference."

"The difference!" gasped Gladys.

"Yes, you'll understand directly; but it's awfully hard to tell you, Gladys. You don't know, but I lost a pot of money over the St. Crispin, and, after my promise to you about the Oaks, I did not dare to tell you, and so—so—dash it, Gladys, you might help a fellow out!"

But Gladys sat motionless.

"So—so," pursued her husband desperately, "I took your pearls and sold them, and got a string at Faulkner's to put in their place until I was in funds again and could buy you some more, and—Good Heavens, Gladys! what's the matter?"

For Mrs. Jardyne had burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter—the situation was too absurd.

"It's awfully good of you to take it like this, Gladys!" resumed Gerald when his wife's hilarity had subsided, and she had expressed her gracious pardon for his heinous offence; "but you can't think how miserable I've felt when I've seen you wearing that gimcrack thing. However, I'm in funds now, and I'll get you a necklet ten times finer than the old one; while, as for this," he added contemptuously jerking the lovely string of pearls, "it may go to the——"

"Let me look at it," interrupted Gladys; "it is really very pretty," she continued with demure condescension, "and no one would ever tell the difference. I—I almost think I'll keep this, Gerald, and you shall give me something else as a peace-offering and a pledge of good behaviour!"

"Anything!" exclaimed Gerald, with rash enthusiasm.

"I saw a lovely set of emeralds at Hancock's; I have always coveted emeralds."

"You shall have them, my darling; you shall have them to-night! I'll rush round to Bond Street at once. You are the sweetest and most forgiving little angel on earth," he murmured ecstatically as he kissed his wife's pretty, childlike face!

WILLARD HOLCOMBE.

Digitized by Google

JUMBLED STORY No. 20.] [SEE PAGE 640.

NETTIE LITHILL GOT HER PIANO.

The clock on my bedroom mantel struck four. London, that foggy, miserable, November day, as I seemed to grow lighter.

I struck a match, but I did not light my cigar.

For I was extravagant in those days, and said to myself, as I drew out a cigar, and turned to the little figure that stood at my side.

"Will he be blind, doctor?"

"Yes, he will be blind. We can do nothing."

Then this incident happened.

I heard a girl's voice, which sounded far away from Grosvenor Square. Among other things it thanked me very graciously for my services, and seemed to fall to pieces, and rolled over on the daughter, Sylvia, beautiful Sylvia, as cold and earnest, of my adventure of the morning.

A sob came from the girl.

She was dressed all in heliotrope, this quaint colour in my mind's eye.

A little thing in heliotrope—how well I knew the street. Heliotrope! How clearly I can picture the horses.

Next a cool hand was laid on my forehead.

I put up my arms and drew down a tear-stained Victoria Street, and waited for a cab.

"Let me marry you," said a silver voice. "You are not going to walk there? It's a long way."

A man's voice answered:

"Oh, no. I shall take a 'bus. But I have never saw her safely to her office.

She was annoyed, there could be no question for all that we did not love each other.

Then came the end; terrific, sickening. For a heartless as marble. It had all been arranged for the wheels creaked.

"It is so confoundedly early," I muttered to remember how you helped me in the fog? It is my voice, "which is the way to the Bank?"

I told them over the tea, half in fun and half in face and tried to kiss it. Then I dropped back on the pillows and fell asleep.

Nevertheless, the following morning, at half-past eight in the morning.

I laughed at the words, and lit another match, The subdued noise of the afternoon traffic below Fleet Street they shied at a boy who happened to reached my ears.

When I awoke I felt quite strong and well, except in Grosvenor Square. I was engaged to her proudly that I had no option but to consent.

* * * * *

That afternoon I called on my aunt, Lady Clarke, and looked anxiously up the street for a 'bus.

I forgot that I intended to go to Victoria.

"You naughty boy," said my aunt. "Aren't you about that. So I did not say anything more.

"All I can say," said Sylvia coldly, "is that if whispered into her ear, I put her in it, and followed ashamed of yourself?"

For several days after that I was at my post, and stood on the pavement outside my rooms in the girl's arm, "through fear of the traffic," as I flourish a morning paper. One horse swung round us long ago, and we were resigned to our fate. But you prefer the company of that sort of girl to mine, and was yet familiar, say in a whisper:

"Can you tell me, sir," said a little, quavering little girl, that sat back in her corner, and looked up to me and laid a hand on my arm. The match loomed out from the fog. I hailed it, and taking on to the pavement, the 'bus knocked against a door to light a match.

In those days I was not often out by half-past eight, I found myself in the street. The sun was unconscious.

At that moment an omnibus, dark and indistinct, threw out a circle of light, and fell on a mass of heliotrope tripped down the road opposite my door, swaying from side to side; the windows rattled; and bolted. The 'bus came lumbering after them, shining very brightly, as a certain little figure in golden, wavy hair and an upturned, anxious face.

Something struck me over the eyes; the iron-shod lamp-post, crashing in a window. The driver lost hoof of a horse, possibly and I fell back on the forehead.

"The way to the Bank?" I repeated, "surely you are blind, it is quite impossible for us to marry."

The conductor stood before us, and asked for the her penny before I could find a coin.

"You must let me pay my fare." She said it so got down at the Bank, and I showed her the way to the office where she had found an employment. She went in, trembling and nervous.

I felt glad enough that I was going away from myself: "Life is a jolly thing if you think of no one for a dull pain behind my eyes. I inquired if there had been harnessed to the 'bus. The driver had all his nerve, and chaos loomed ahead.

Two new horses, great, fiery, untrained brutes, ground, a medley of glass and wheels and struggling rustle of the dress—came forward, and kissed me contained this passage: "Of course, now that you drink and are merry."

For out of the fog came a little figure, that tripped but yourself, and spend enough money and eat, and held it above my head, and looked down on the turn now."

Well, we came to the end of our journey. We must have someone to look after you. You been there before, and I don't know where I am, you had better continue it."

Mad with fright, they took the bits in their teeth, out with her big, frightened eyes into the black fares. I fumbled in my pocket, but she held out he could do to keep them in hand. At the top of moment we remained motionless; then the 'bus were any letters. There was one, as I expected, her.

And the black darkness that surrounded me and—and, I am so afraid of this darkness."

I know better now.

Digitized by Google

BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

CHAPTER XLIII.

DRIVEN TO EXTREMITIES.

As Olive knelt, pressing her hair back from her brows, the front door closed with a heavy echoing sound, and a quick step told that Braetoun had passed the window.

She staggered slightly, and caught at the back of one of the chairs, as she stood up, holding her left hand to her throbbing heart.

For a few minutes she felt helpless and bewildered, her brain reeled, and she closed her eyes, but the giddiness passed off, and with teeth set she stood thinking of the scene that had passed.

A shudder ran through her, and a weary painful sigh tore its way from her breast, as, forgetful for the moment of Braetoun's threats, her mind was filled with her own, and giving one long look round at the room to which so short a time back she had returned from her honeymoon, a low tremulous cry escaped her lips.

But the weakness passed away, and she was firm. There was the old look of her father once more dawning in her face, and, gazing straight before her, she walked slowly to the door, passed out and upstairs to her bedroom, where she winced on finding her maid busy there.

The girl looked at her curiously, but Olive's face was inscrutable.

"My bonnet and mantle," she said.

"Which will your ladyship wear?"

"Any—the plainest."

The girl glanced at her as she went to a wardrobe, and then turned quickly round with the tears in her eyes.

"Oh, my lady," she cried quickly, "don't think me impertinent, but I can't help seeing and knowing. It hurts me when you are in such trouble."

The stern, hard look passed from Olive's face, and her eyes beamed upon the speaker, her lips quivering a little the while.

"Thank you, Melson," she said softly. "You have always been very, very kind to me."

"Oh, my lady, my lady," cried the girl, beginning to sob, "who wouldn't be kind to you?"

"Hush, pray!" said Olive, in a low, pained voice. "Don't speak to me, please. I cannot bear it. My bonnet and mantle, quick!"

The girl obeyed, and helped, gazing at her the while.

"My gloves," said Olive quietly, and as the girl turned her back she hurriedly took her watch and little chain from her waist, and then as the girl returned pressed both into her hands.

"As a keepsake, Melson," she said, with a piteous smile. "Thank you very much for what you have done for me. Good-bye!"

All rights reserved by George Manville Fenn.]

"Oh, my lady! What is it? You are not—surely you are not——"

"Don't speak to me, Melson. Yes: I am going home."

She passed out of the room, leaving the girl sobbing violently.

Olive went slowly down the stairs, putting on her gloves as she went, her eyes lowered, and her face calm and stern, but as she reached the hall a change came over her and her eyes dilated with horror, for with crushing violence, as if out of some black cloud, the thoughts which had been dulled by her mental agony came back, and she seemed to hear again her husband's words.

In an instant the import of his threat came upon her in its fullest force, and, horrified now, she hurried out into the Square.

The giddy feeling came back and she shivered at the idea of being too late, and asked herself why it was that she had not followed at once.

Excuse—palliation—everything was swept away now, and she told herself that she had been guilty of criminal indifference and would be doubly blameworthy if anything had happened through her.

Home and flight to her father passed from her mind as the horror increased, and the desire to try and check her husband if he should attempt some insane act of violence.

A cab was passing and she entered it, telling the man to drive to Wimpole Street. Sinking back in the seat she grew half wild with excitement, and could hardly restrain the insane desire to bid the man gallop all the way.

"I shall be too late," she murmured; "I shall be too late." And she shuddered as she pictured what might have happened. What could follow when a weak, sickly man attacked one whose nerves and muscles were of iron? "He would kill him," she said with a shiver as the thought asserted itself that Braetoun was armed.

For a few minutes Olive felt that she was going mad, and she sat with her hands covering her face and pressed upon her lips firmly to keep back the hysterical cries ready to burst forth; and again she wildly asked herself why she had not followed Braetoun at once, instead of sinking into that half-stunned, helpless condition in which she had been ready to mock at his threat, treating it with contempt.

"The pistol—the pistol," she muttered, and the cold perspiration gathered on her brow and in her hands.

Once the thought intruded that she ought not to go to Murray's alone, and after what had passed; but the idea seemed as nothing then in the presence of such a horror, while the horse seemed to her as if it literally crawled.

"I shall be too late!" she moaned. "Oh, faster—faster, for Heaven's sake!" she cried to the man, who opened the trap and asked her the number.

Digitized by Google

A maid opened the door, but not until Olive had rung twice, for Rancer was out, the doctor having ceased seeing patients for the day and sent him with a message.

To the maid's surprise, the visitor stepped in at once,

"Quick, Dr. Murray!" she said; "I am Lady Braetoun."

The maid was startled, and, feeling that it was evidently some case of emergency, she led the way to a baize door on the left, opened it, tapped at the inner door, opened that, and before she could utter a word Olive rushed by her into the room.

CHAPTER XLIV.

At a Crisis.

It had been a busy morning, and, after a light lunch, Murray had sought the calm of his library, not to read, but to sit back in the gloom and ask himself whether such a life as his was worth living.

He had brought bottle and glass from his consulting-room, and, utterly exhausted, taken them up to pour out the portion he was accustomed to take as a sedative, and without which he told himself his life would have been unbearable.

"A little more, only such a little more, and the rest would be for ever. No waking to agonising thoughts, no more misery—others' and my own."

He poured out the customary dose.

"Shall I?" he said, with the weary look intensifying in his eyes; "I am so tired: how welcome it would be! Conscience has made no coward of me. No one to feel one regret; many perhaps to be glad. I dare!"

He doubled the quantity, set down the bottle carefully, replaced the stopper, and held the glass in his hand.

"And about my worldly affairs—not set in order. What import we attach to these worldly affairs—the dross that we have treasured up—to leave to others. What are they to a man who has seen the vanity and worthlessness of them all? Let them go. What are they to me? What a miserable mistaken life it has been—not one to regret me when I am gone. Well, I have been a gambler with the good things of life—staked all, and lost. There is nothing left to do but pay."

He sat forward in his easy chair, gazing down at the contents of the glass, with his arms resting upon his knees.

"But what a coward, after all! Too great to even bear my daily misery—fleeing to this relief—that of Braetoun—the miserable drunkard who pours down spirit to drown his woes. And now willing, ready, to take the great step of all—to drown mine for ever.

"Yes, coward, coward," he muttered with a laugh. "Well, I own it; but I have fought bravely. I did fight bravely till that cruel night, and then—ah, what a fall! from a tender love—the genuine sisterly love of a pure, true woman, to her contempt. Enough, this, to drive a strong man to seek his end."

He sat thinking, as he made the liquid sparkle in the glass he slowly turned round and round.

"She will know," he said softly; "she will be sure to know, and she will see the reason; but it can give her no pang now, unless she suffers because I am not at hand to save him. Well, there must come an end to it all, even for him, and I can bear it no longer. Good-bye to all my hopes and ambitions; good-bye to the love that never really lived. Olive, to you!"

There was a weary despairing look in his eyes as he raised the glass to his lips, and in another moment the contents would have been drained, but the door was opened suddenly, and the glass fell to the carpet as he started from his seat.

"Lady Braetoun!" he gasped. "Olive!"

The door closed, and she tottered toward him with her hands extended, her eyes wild and strange, as they darted a swift glance round. Then, with a piteous cry, she yielded to the overstrain, and would have fallen, but he clasped her in his arms, and bore her fainting to the couch.

"At last—at last! Olive, look up," he whispered passionately, as he went down upon one knee by her side, and drew her pale face close to his. "Sanctuary—sanctuary! Let the world say what it will, you shall be safe with me. Look up, dearest; I have loved you so long and so well. All the cruel past shall be like some feverish dream, to be forgotten in our future joys, for I love you, my own. You do not speak. Can you not hear me? Come, forget the past, and let us go at once. Far, far off, where all the many cares will die away, for you are mine—mine only now, at last—at last."

In the mad excitement of his joy at finding that she had fled to him, he could not realise that she heard no single word he uttered, and he went on whispering to her, telling her how he knew that she had borne her terrible lot till the mental strain gave way, and she had fled.

Then reason began to assert itself, and the fond idea that she could hear his words gave way, as he realised that this was no partly assumed swoon, but sheer insensibility.

"What she must have suffered first!" he muttered, as he rose from his knees to obtain water from the carafe, but in his mad joy forgetful of everything but the one fact that the woman he had loved so long was there, he bent down to press his lips to her brow, and then started round, for with a cry of rage Braetoun was upon him and seized him by the throat.

CHAPTER XLV.

Braetoun Gets a Check.

When Braetoun rushed out of his house, raging with fury, he leaped into the first cab and bade the man drive to Wimpole Street, but, altering his mind before he was half way there, he thrust open the little trap and shouted: "Eaton Place!"

"All right, sir," said the driver, and then, as the trap fell back: "drive you anywhere you like, captain, as long as the 'oss'll keep on his legs. My word, he's been having a pretty good soaking, and it hasn't done him good."

"I'll have it out with the old man first. It's a card to play. Curse him! I'll threaten to blow the whole affair and set the lawyers to work. He'll do anything, the old idiot, sooner than have her exposed, and he shall, too. I'll make him pay up now, and smart as I've smarted. Yes, it's a chance, and I can face him now. Won't believe me? He must—he shall."

He sat back trying hard to nerve himself for the encounter, and keep his courage screwed up to the sticking-point, but it was hard work. He kept on telling himself that with such a wife there was every excuse for all his own infidelity; but somehow in his heart of hearts he could not bring himself to believe that the charges against Olive were true; and as he drew near to Eaton Place the thought of facing Emsworth after he had goaded him by his charges into a rage, in which he would turn upon him lion-like in his wrath, was too much for him.

"I can't do it," he groaned. "I've got the spirit, but that cursed doctor has drained the strength out of me. Here, hi! cabby!"

"Yes, sir."

"Turn your horse. Wimpole Street."

"Right you are, sir," said the man; and again, as the trap closed and he turned his horse, he chuckled.

"I knowed it. He turned funky before. Going to see a doctor up in Physic Market, and he's scared. My word! he's got 'em coming on. Well, it ain't my business. Anything's better than them blessed shilling fares—unfairs, I calls 'em.—Hullo! Don't have a fit in my cab!"

For the handle of Braetoun's Malacca cane darted through the trap as it was thrown up.

"Yes, sir."

"Stop! Drive to——"

Digitized by Google

"The devil, sir?" muttered the man.

"Drive to—to—here, stop at the first tavern."

"Which, sir?"

"Public-house, then, you confounded fool!"

"Right, sir.—I knowed it. Drop to steady him first—'fore he goes to old Bolus's. Seeh is life. We're all alike, from dooks and lords, down to dustmen. Ain't I seen him before, somewhere? Reg'lar swell. Now, where was it? I know: Kempton Park. To be sure. I know. He keeps 'osses. I see him the day I drove a little thin gent down. Why, of course. Well, he's been losing, that what's the matter with him, and applying lotion."

He drew up at a tavern in Knightsbridge, and Braetoun made as if to spring out, but altered his mind.

"Here, can you leave your horse?"

"If you hold the reins, sir."

"Give me hold," cried Braetoun, handing the man half-a-crown. "Go in and fetch me a soda and brandy, small soda and a double quantity of brandy. Get yourself a glass."

"Thankye, sir," cried the cabman. "Now that's what I call a real gentleman. First decent fare I've had for a month."

"Now back to Eaton Place," said Braetoun, as he returned the glass, and the next minute the man was in his place, flicking his horse into a canter, making it look as if the refreshment imbibed by its master were being conveyed to it per whip.

"I can talk to him now," muttered Braetoun, "it's my turn to take the bat. He's had a long enough innings, and I'll let him see."

"Wait," he said, as the man drew up, and then walked up to the door in a manner which excited the driver's admiration.

"Pulled him together fine. Won't want to go to the doctor's now."

Emsworth was at home, and his son-in-law was ushered into his gloomy-looking library at once.

"Morning, Braetoun," he said, as the door closed, and the visitor glanced at the chair to which the old man pointed, but did not sit down. He was agitated, in spite of the fillip he had given himself, by the question how to begin, a matter which seemed easy enough in the cab, but hedged in with difficulties there in face of the enemy.

Emsworth knew that no pleasant mission had brought his son-in-law, and he read at a glance that it was something personal, and as there was only one thing personal—to wit, money—that could have brought him, he quietly prepared himself for the encounter.

"Excuse me one moment," he said, taking a stout, crutch-handled cane from where it stood in a tall waste-paper basket, and limping to the bell, which he rang, and then limping back directed and fastened down the flap of an envelope.

"Take that yourself to the House of Commons Committee rooms," he said to the servant who entered. "You can have a cab."

The man took the letter, and the door was closed.

"Gout's a bit tiresome this morning. How's your wife?"

The way to begin offered and Braetoun seized it.

"Curse my wife!" he cried, facing the old man savagely.

"What!" cried Emsworth, scowling. "Humph! you ought to curse her for saving your life over and over again when you'd have been far better dead. What is it? Won't she come begging for you, and you're obliged to come yourself?"

"Yes, that's it," said Braetoun fiercely. "I'm obliged to come myself."

"Might have saved yourself the trouble, my lad. NO. Is that plain enough?"

"It's plain enough," said Braetoun half seating himself on the edge of the table; "but it won't do this time. Things have gone badly with me lately; I am heavily hit, and people are going to put an execution in the house."

"I'm not surprised," said Emsworth coldly. "May bring you to your senses. Sickness won't, and you've another fit coming on."

"What do you mean?" cried Braetoun, startled by the old man's manner.

"What I say. You look deadly, and you've been making it worse by drinking. I can smell it here."

"And enough to make a man drink—enough to give any man a fit."

"What, losing the money? Shouldn't have risked it."

"Then by your manner you mean that you won't help me now that I'm in this hole."

"That's it, my lad; not even if they clear the house, and take the roof off. I've plenty of room for my child here."

"Then have the room got ready, for unless you come down with what I want, you'll very soon have her."

"Indeed!" said Emsworth coolly, as he watched his son-in-law narrowly. "Well, I'm not surprised, and I'm not sorry. You see, Braetoun, I thought you were a gentleman, and I made a mistake."

"What? No: it was I thought your daughter a lady, and I made a mistake."

"No mistake, sir, I never pretended she was anything but Isaac Emsworth's daughter, well educated, and with a handsome dowry."

"Out of which," said Braetoun, trying hard to restrain himself from playing what he looked upon as his trump card at once, "out of which, as it is by right mine, you will immediately arrange that I have a sufficiency for my present needs."

"Because you have gambled away every shilling you have, and more to, and want to send my poor girl's bit of money after it."

"It's my wife's money, and I want some of it now."

"Because again you've proved that you are unfit to take charge of it—because you have proved that you are a man without a spark of honour in you, and want to go on breaking my poor girl's heart while you amuse yourself with your mistresses and drink yourself into a state of d.t's."

"And what if I do?" cried Braetoun fiercely. "Am I to tie myself down to a woman like that?"

A curious change come over the old man's countenance, but Braetoun did not see it.

"You'd better go now, Braetoun, and keep away," growled Emsworth. "I promised Olive I would not quarrel with you, so be off. My leg makes me hot-tempered."

"D——n your hot temper, sir; what is it to me? I've come here as I have come to let you know the truth. Will you pay my debts out of that woman's money?"

"No, sir, I will not pay your debts 'out of that woman's money.' If you're sold up, let her come home, and if she does she doesn't come back to you."

"Then curse you; you shall have it, and you shall pay the money too. You talk to me of making a mistake, and your thinking me a man of honour. Why, confound you! you miserable old money-hunting schemer, do you suppose that a gentleman in my position is going to tie himself down to all the petty little notions of you narrow-minded people? No, it was not you who made a mistake; it was I. I thought that I was going to marry an honest woman, instead of a miserable——"

"Stop! Mind what you are saying, sir."

"I will mind what I'm saying, but you shall have it straight from the shoulder this time. I say you've got to give me full control of that money—my wife's money."

"And I've told you that you shan't have a penny," said the old man, who was very pale now.

"Then I'll drive it out of you another way, and from him too."

Emsworth started.

"Ah, that hits you, does it?" cried Braetoun, who was

Digitized by Google

now beside himself with rage. "I tell you this, that unless matters are made up, the whole thing shall come out. I'll place it in a sharp lawyer's hands, and I don't care now: people will pity, not blame me. I'll have the whole thing in the court: 'Divorce in High Life,' on the newspaper bills, and drag out all the cursed rotten business into the broad daylight for the public to revel on. You old scoundrel: you've known it from the first. There, you shrink and cower before me, you old villain."

He was quite right: Emsworth was shrinking and cowering. He placed his hand upon the table and leant forward, looking ghastly, as he glared at the frantic man before him.

"Mistake? Yes, and you conniving at it all through. Curse her for a miserable baggage. You were all in it for the sake of the title. I believe she was Murray's mistress from the first."

There was a meaning in Emsworth's cowering, for his right hand had been stealing slowly down behind the library table towards the waste-paper basket, till he grasped his stout cane, and then with a roar like that of a roused lion, he sprang at Braetoun. With one vigorous cut across the shoulder he made him stagger back, and before he could recover himself, he had him on his knees, waling him across back and shoulders, everywhere that he could bring the cane down, till, breathless with rage and excitement, he threw all his power into a last cut, and hurled him back, and all in spite of the feeble struggle with which his onslaught was met.

"You dog! You lying, cowardly dog!" he cried, now speaking for the first time, as he stood with one foot resting on the utterly prostrated man's breast. "You mean, despicable hound! You have pretty well broken my poor girl's heart, you whose every touch has defiled her, and now to bully and frighten me into letting you have money, you dare to bring that vile, infamous charge against her, and the noblest, truest gentleman that ever breathed. You dare to threaten to make it known—to publish the lie, the blasphemous lie, against my sweet angel of a girl—why, d——n you, if I haven't killed you by what I've done now, you miserable, pitiful wretch, I'll finish my work and rid the British aristocracy of a hanger-on to its disgrace."

"It's true—it's true!" shrieked Braetoun, as he lay writhing and literally foaming at the mouth. "Kill me and hang for it; but I will publish it now. Your innocent angel! Curse you, you old idiot! There isn't a worse——"

Emsworth literally dropped upon him and caught him by the throat, but he had, big strong man as he was, already overtaxed his strength, and feeble as were Braetoun's efforts to free himself, they were sufficient, and he struggled to his feet panting and holding his hands to his left breast, where there was a sensation as if his ribs had been crushed in.

Then an ugly look came over his face as he realised the cause, and he thrust one hand into his pocket and kept it there with his fingers closing over the butt and chambers of the short, thick revolver he had placed there that morning.

For a few moments, as he stood panting and quivering with rage and pain, he felt ready to draw the weapon and revenge himself upon the man who had beaten him till he could hardly stand; but as he saw Emsworth now supporting himself against the low table, ghastly white and trembling too, a malignant joy made his heart throb, for he felt that he had the means at hand to stab him with a weapon that would pain the old man far more, and better gratify his thirst for revenge.

"You old ruffian!" he gasped out as he saw he had nothing more to fear; and he began arranging his collar and tie and brushing imaginary specks from his coat. "You shall suffer for this. It's true! It has been going on all through my worst illnesses. Lie? Ask Nurse Jennett. Go to your dear friend, Allan Murray—my dear old trusty friend—and charge him with it. What is my little bit of gallantry to that? Yes, go to him, but not yet. Let me settle my business with him first, and after all London has rung with the wretched case—the Fashionable Physician and the Millionaire's Child—make him marry her to hide her shame."

"Stop!" cried Emsworth hoarsely, as he raised his hands, but clutched at the table to save himself from falling. "Braetoun, stop!"

For a moment the young man hesitated, in the half belief that he could make his infamous bargain for silence now; but the pain of the blows he had received sent such a thrill of passion through him that he rushed from the room.

"Better than a bullet," he muttered, and, passing out, he hurried into his cab, unconscious of the fact that the old man had half blindly felt his way to the bell, dragged at it, and then, as he tried to reach a chair, fallen heavily in a fit.

(To be continued.)

Jumbled Story Competition.—20.

On page 636 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 November 16th, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the first of the readers living in Ireland who succeeds in forwarding the correct, or most nearly correct, solution.

POST-CARD COMPETITION, NO. 20.

A guinea is offered to the first person living within 100 miles of London who sends in on a post-card the longest single word contained in this issue of Short Stories, not including advertisement pages. A similar offer is made to those living a greater distance than 100 miles from London.

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION, NO. 18.

London guinea: Mr. W. Davis, 56, Fitzalan Street, Kennington Road, S.E. Provincial guinea: Mr. A. E. Ellison, Havensido House, Heden, near Hull.

POSTAL RATES.

Short Stories will be sent direct from these offices, post free, to any country within the Postal Union, at the following rates, prepaid:

One Year	6s. 6d.
Half Year	3s. 3d.
Three Months	1s. 8d.

Printed and Published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., at "Pearson's Weekly" Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

CORPULENCY.

INCREASING POPULARITY OF AN EFFECTUAL CURE.

MANY of our readers are, doubtless, familiar with the nature of the extraordinary revolution in the cure of obesity which, within recent years, has been wrought by the original researches of that now eminent expert, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, of Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. It is evident that the certainty, the rapidity, and the agreeable surroundings of his curative process have been recognised, in a very large degree, among ladies and gentlemen belonging to the highest social circles. Keen observers who have an opportunity of judging inform us, through the pages of society papers and otherwise, that owing to the general employment of Mr. Russell's treatment extreme obesity is becoming as much a thing of the past, at fashionable gatherings, as intoxication; and, no doubt, it will soon be regarded as nearly as disgraceful. The issue of an eighteenth edition of the author's singularly convincing little text-book, "Corpulency, and the Cure," however, serves to remind us that the popularity of the system has now reached spheres far remote from those of West-end fashion. The book of 256 pages may be had (post free) by sending two penny stamps to Mr. Russell's offices, as above; and it is worth the careful attention of those who wish to free themselves of a burden of fat—not merely because it is unseemly and adds enormously to the apparent age of the sufferer—but because extreme obesity terribly interferes with the energy necessary in these days of competition to make one's way in the world, or even to earn a very modest competency. A large proportion of the letters of Mr. Russell's grateful correspondents refer to their delight at being enabled—within a very brief period, and without any irksome conditions implying semi-starvation—to attack their accustomed tasks with pleasure instead of wearied disgust, through being reduced to their normal weight. The popularity of the system is also largely due, doubtless, to the English hatred of mystery, which is utterly swept aside by Mr. Russell. He fully explains his modus operandi, and supplies the receipt for his preparation.—Bicester Herald, March 13th, 1896.

A LOVELY FIGURE

with full, perfect, natural Bust, obtained by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Success guaranteed. Highly approved and recommended by the Medical Profession. For testimonials, press opinions, and free particulars, send stamped envelope in confidence to Madame "B. J.," Oriental Toilet Co., 87, Strand, London.

All Wool Underclothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.

Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

NEW HARRISON Swift Gold Medal KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

TOO THIN IN THE BUST.

Ladies desiring any improvement in this direction should send me stamp for free particulars of a simple, inexpensive, harmless self-treatment, whereby a full natural bust can be obtained. Address, in confidence, Mrs. B. K. NORRIS, 7, Addington Crescent, York Road, London, S.E.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A lady who has permanently destroyed Superfluous Hairs on herself, will be happy to forward free, to all similarly afflicted, full particulars of a simple, inexpensive and harmless self-treatment. Send stamped addressed envelope in confidence to Mrs. "T. D.," 87, Strand, London.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, AND WILLIAMS.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1895.

Jan. 2, £8 per cent., Feb. 1, £6, Mar. 1, £5, April 1, £8, May 1, £7, June 2, £10, July 1, £9, Aug. 1, £9, Sept. 2, £8, Oct. 1, £8, Nov. 1, £7, Dec. 2, £7.

Total for 12 months £92 per cent., an average of nearly £8 PER CENT. PER MONTH.

PROFITS PAID DURING 1896.

Jan. 2, £6 per cent., Feb. 1, £7, Mar. 2, £6, April 1, £6, May 1, £6, June 1, £5, July 1, £5, Aug. 1, £5, Sept. 1, £5, Oct. 1, £5, Nov. 2, £6.

OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED MANUAL mailed free upon request, showing how these profits may be made WITHOUT SPECULATION. Cheques for profits mailed promptly 1st of each month, and for withdrawals of capital on 2nd and 16th of each month. Trial investments of £5 and upwards may be made.

We have not a dissatisfied Client.

DOUGLAS, HUNGERFORD, & WILLIAMS, 5, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C., and 11, Place de la Bourse, Paris.

THE GREAT COUGH REMEDY, BRONCHONIA.

A Marvellous Remedy for Coughs, whether arising from Consumption, Bronchitis, or Asthma. Its efficacy is testified to by Eminent Physicians. Of all Chemists, 2s. 6d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. per bottle. Post free, 2s. 9d., 4s. 9d., and 11s. 6d.—J. HOWARD & Co., 20 and 21, Queenhithe, LONDON, E.C. One Trial will prove its Efficacy.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

HAIR DESTROYED permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

DEAFNESS

And Head Noises Relieved by Using Wilson's Common-Sense Ear Drums. A new scientific invention, entirely different in construction from all other devices. Assist the deaf when all other devices fail, and where medical skill has given no relief. They are safe, comfortable, and invisible; have no wire or string attachment. Write for Pamphlet. Mention this Paper.

Wilson Ear Drum Co. Agent: D. H. WILSON, Drum in position. 7, Newington Road, Edinburgh.

Send 4 Stamps and receive pair FOLDING SCISSORS, PATENT PENKNIFE, and Amusing Novelty Catalogue, post paid.

VARIETY COMPANY, DALSTON, LONDON.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 5lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation; successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

MR. STEVENSON EXCEPTED.

RULES are illustrated by exceptions. One of the exceptions was the late Robert Louis Stevenson. (Alas! that we should have to speak of him as "the late.")

Afflicted with a disease which was sure to kill him, and right well he knew it, he was seldom in the dumps. His body was ill, but he was not. What a rare spirit he had! Most of us are put together differently. When an ailment, like a burglar, breaks into our house of dust, we talk, as this woman talks: "I felt languid, weak, and dejected." Dejected because languid and weak. Unlike Mr. Stevenson's, our spirits go down with our physical condition.

Describing her own case, Mrs. Lloyd further tells us that her trouble began in October, 1887, with what she styles a "slight stroke." Probably one of those hints of paralysis that Nature gives sometimes, meaning nothing more serious in that line at present. Yet wise people, thus warned, will try to find out the reason, and be guided by it.

"After this," continues the lady, "I felt languid, weak, and dejected. I had a poor appetite, and after eating suffered from a sense of pain and weight at the chest. I was constantly spitting up a sour fluid, and wind from the stomach rushed into my throat as though it must choke me. I soon grew so weak as to be scarcely able to walk about, and was obliged to lie on the couch a considerable part of the day.

"I consulted doctors, as any one would in my place, and took their medicines, but they had only a small measure of success in relieving me. I might have felt better for a day or two, but always relapsed into my habitual state. I have to thank my malady for nine years of bodily and mental misery, for I never saw a well day during the whole time.

"In September, 1893, I read in a little book about the cures Mother Seigel's Syrup had effected in cases like mine. I got a bottle from Mr. W. Colley, the chemist, in Wrentham Street, and after taking it found myself better. Another bottle or two restored my appetite and digestion, and with it my strength. Lightness and brightness took the place of depression and melancholy. Since then I have had good health, thanks to Mother Seigel's Syrup. You may publish this statement if you wish. (Signed) (Mrs.) Sarah Lloyd, No. 1 House, 13 Court, Lower Essex Street, Birmingham, September 18th, 1895."

"In May, 1892," writes another, "I had a severe attack of inflammation of the bowels, and was under medical treatment. On recovering from the acute stage of this disorder, I found myself completely exhausted. My appetite was feeble and fickle, and what little I ate gave me pain at the chest and sides. I seemed to be full of wind, and frequently belched up a sour fluid. I also suffered from continual pain in the head just over the eyes. I was so low and despondent that I took no real pleasure in anything.

"After suffering for six months in this way, I read of Mother Seigel's Syrup, and procured a bottle from the Provident Co-operative Stores, Whitehall branch. Taking it for a few days I felt wonderfully better. My appetite came back and food agreed with me. I continued with the Syrup, and was soon as strong as ever. But you may depend upon it that I have since then always kept a bottle of Mother Seigel's Syrup in the house, and if I need medicine a few doses always set me right. I have told relatives and friends about this remedy, and am willing you should publish what I have said. (Signed) (Mrs.) Sarah Ann Wright, 35, Duxbury Street, Darwen, Lancs, February 27th, 1895."

As I have remarked, very few of us can be cheerful while the body is for any reason weak and in pain. And of all diseases to depress the spirits and to saturate the very soul of man with gloom I will back indigestion or dyspepsia against the field. It sends more people to the lunatic asylums than all the other complaints combined. A man like Mr. Stevenson may be chick and chipper with consumption, but indigestion would have turned even him into a misanthrope. Stop it at the outset with the remedy that cured our correspondents.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON (OF PEARSON'S WEEKLY)

No. 412. FOR WEEK ENDING NOVEMBER 21ST, 1896. [ONE PENNY.

AH! AH! THE MILDNESS OF THE SEASON HAS DONE THIS.

100,000 LADIES' LUXURIOUSLY HANDSOME, RICH DARK BROWN

OPOSSUM FUR NECKLETS.

The SHORT STORIES SPECIAL NECKLET COUPON. 21/11/96. On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above (carriage free this week only) to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

Sale Price 4/6 each. Worth Double.

With Life Imitation Natural Head combined; a most elegant and soft fur, quite equalling in style anything offered at 15s. 6d. each, and for durability not to be surpassed. Similar to illustration.

All Orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, Woodsley Road, LEEDS.

Telegraphic Address—"Eclipse, Leeds." Telephone No. 948.

1896 PROCLAMATION.

"OH, YES, REVENUES FROM ECONOMY ARE ENORMOUS."

The richest provision in knowledge made absolutely easy for the accumulation of this income. Write to Messrs. F. HODGSON & SON, Carpet Manufacturers of the City of Leeds, who will provide you with full information, posting you free (if, when writing you mention this paper) a large, amazingly interesting, valuable, instructive, and detailed illustrated "Pioneer" Reduction Catalogue, showing you what you can save, what to buy, and where to buy Carpets, Mats, and Hearthrugs of every manufacture, including Wilton, Plush, Brussels, Velvet, Antique, Foreign, and Furs, also QUEEN'S ROYAL HOUSEHOLD, PRUDENTIAL, ECLIPSE, and ALARM CARPETS and HEARTHRUGS (REGD.). Also Blankets, Curtains, Sheetings, &c., and a thousand other articles wanted in every household. (Copyright.)

REMARKS.—A lady customer writes complaining that we send out too large a Carpet for the money. Be this so or not, we send out no Carpet measuring less than 6ft. by 9ft.—even for 2s. 11d. TEST THEM. THEY WILL SURPRISE YOU.

EXTRAORDINARY REDUCTIONS.

100,000 "ALARM" CARPETS

(Registered). GUARANTEED GENUINE BARGAINS.

Sale Price 2/11 EACH.

This Gigantic Offer is a Special Contract, made with readers of Short Stories only. WE WILL FORWARD DIRECT FROM THE LOOMS TO ANY ADDRESS ON RECEIPT OF AMOUNT, A GENUINE WOVEN, SEAMLESS, REVERSIBLE CARPET, THE LARGEST EVER SOLD AT THE PRICE.

Suitable for Sitting-room or Bedroom, Bordered and Woven in Art Colours, large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room, as an advertisement for our goods, thus saving any Middle Profits. Remember these are Woven, not printed, and are made of a material almost equal to Wool. Thousands of these Carpets and Rugs have already been sold at almost double above prices. A Rug sent with Carpet, 10d. extra.

SPECIAL OFFER { 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs ... ... 7s. 3d. / 4 Carpets and 4 Rugs ... 14s. 3d.

Value unequalled in the Annals of Advertising. As a favour, kindly Examine and Compare these Carpets.

"SHORT STORIES" CARPET COUPON. 21/11/96

On receipt of this Coupon and P.O.O. or Stamps for amount, we guarantee to send goods as above to your address in any part of the United Kingdom. Cash returned in full if not satisfied. (Signed) F. HODGSON & SON.

All orders dispatched same day in rotation as they arrive by post.

F. HODGSON & SON, Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

MASON'S

EXTRACT OF HERBS

For the Immediate Production of

BOTANIC BEER.

A Nine-gallon Cask of Alcoholic Beer from a Brewery will cost you 10/6, but Eight Gallons of Beer made from

Mason's EXTRACT of HERBS

Can be obtained for 6d., plus a pound or two of Sugar and a little Yeast.

THE FINEST BEVERAGE IN THE WORLD.

Inventors and Manufacturers:

Newball & Mason,

HYSON GREEN WORKS,

Nottingham.

If unable to obtain it in your neighbourhood, send 9 stamps for sample bottle; or samples of both Wine Essence and Extract of Herbs, post free for 15 stamps.

PALATABLE SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM.

(REALLY GENUINE.)

In Patent Air-tight Tins, ½lb., 1s. 4d.; 1lb., 2s. 4d.; 2lb., 4s. 4d., including Tin and Postage.

MRS. CONYERS, KILKHAMPTON, STRATTON, N. DEVON.

Digitized by Google

T STORIES" best suit the mood of this eager, restless age, so

THE JOHN NOBLE HALF-GUINEA COSTUMES,

Ready-made and to measure, may be briefly and simply set down as

"ABSOLUTELY the BEST VALUE in the WORLD."

10/6.

MODEL 583 is one of the latest up-to-date designs made in that ideal fabric, The John Noble Cheviot Serge. It has a smart well-cut Bodice, with the back shaped to the figure and the front pleated at the waist. There is a pretty Yoke Collar, and the whole is very daintily trimmed. The Skirt is a full, wide, tailor-made design. Price, for complete Costume, only 10/6; safely packed and sent carriage paid for 9d. extra.

SKIRT ONLY, as sketched, 5/6; carriage 6d. extra.

SIZES IN STOCK fit figures 34in., 36in., and 38in. round bust, under arms; skirts being 38in., 40in. and 42in. long in front. Larger or special sizes made to measure, 1/6 extra.

COLOURS. — Black, Brown, Navy, Myrtle, Bronze-Green, Ruby, Cinnamon, Electric Blue, Fawn, Grey, and Petunia.

John Noble's Knockabout Frocks,

With long full sleeves, saddle top, and pocket.

Sizes	21	24	27	30	33	36	39	42	45in.
Prices	1/6	2/-	2/6	3/-	3/6	4/-	4/6	5/-	5/6

Sent Carriage Paid 4½d. extra.

"AN IDEAL SCHOOL OR HOLIDAY GARMENT FOR GIRLS."

AN UP-TO-DATE FASHION VOLUME, containing numerous choice designs of Ladies' and Children's Costumes, sent, together with Patterns, post free on application. PLEASE MENTION "SHORT STORIES."

JOHN NOBLE LTD., Brook St. Mills, MANCHESTER.

FRILLED BUTTER MUSLIN.

FOR ARTISTIC HOME DECORATION.

White, Cream, Ecru, and 12 Art Shades. CURTAINS, frilled two sides and bottom, 3yd. long, 58in. wide, 6/9 per pair; 3½yd., 7/9 per pair. May also be had by the yard, 58in. wide, frilled both sides, 11½d. per yard. Sample Book of Plain & Figured Muslins sent on approval. ROLLER-BLINDS, edged with Lace or Fringe, from 5/6. Sample Book of Materials on approval. CRETONNES, TAPESTRIES, PLUSHETTES, ART SERGES, etc. Patterns on approval. Table Covers, Cushion Squares and Mantel Borders. Picture Book of Lace Curtains, Lace Blinds, Post Free.

H. GORRINGE & CO., 20A DEPT., NOTTINGHAM.

A SUM of from 10s. to 20s. per week offered for spare time to either sex, everywhere; work can be done evenings.—Send addressed envelope to Box 60, Eclipse Works, 92A, Aldersgate Street, London.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS COCOA.

EPPS'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

COCOA

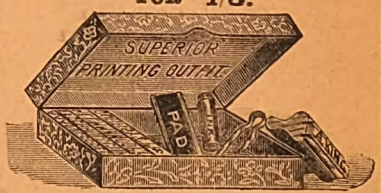
WITH FULL NATURAL FLAVOUR.

ORGANETTES 4/ MONTHLY

Plays Hymns, Popular Airs, Quadrilles, Waltzes, Hornpipes, &c. A mere child can play it. Cash or easy payments. List of tunes and full particulars free.

DRAPER, ORGANETTE WORKS, BLACKBURN.

A SUPERIOR PRINTING OUTFIT FOR 1/6.



Consisting of 74 letters, points, and ornaments, a type-holder, supply of ink, pad, and tweezers. Any name, &c., can be made at pleasure for stamping books, papers, and printing cards. Postage 3d. extra.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE.

N.B.—Larger outfits can be supplied at 2/6, 3/6, and 6/6 each.

E. E. LINDNER, 170, Fleet Street, LONDON. E.C.

All Wool Under-clothing.

HAWICK HOSIERY is the BEST.

Lamb's Wool Shirts and Pants, 3/6 each.
Men's Socks, 1/6 each.
Ladies' Stockings, 1/6 and 2/- each.
CARRIAGE PAID.

THE TEVIOT TWEED CO., HAWICK, N.B.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

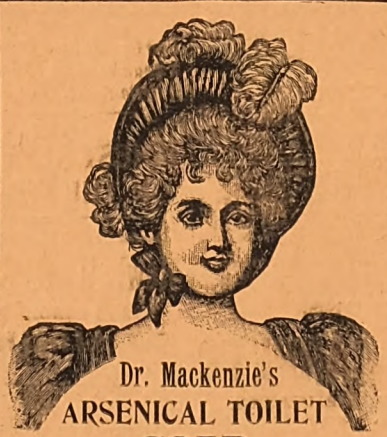
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

THE "SURPRISE" WHISTLE.

A Piercing, Penetrating, Nerve-Racking, Ear-Splitter

The rubber bulb on the end makes it capable of producing 1,000 different effects, from purling or muffled tones up to a great swelling, booming, two-mile piercing note, that will equal a steamboat or locomotive whistle. A PERFECT DOG OR QUAIL CALL. Cyclists will find the "Surprise" a magnificent road clearer. Post free 13 stamps. MILLARD BROS., Dept. 9, 123, HOUNDSDITCH, LONDON, E.C.



Dr. Mackenzie's
ARSENICAL TOILET
SOAP.

The greatest beautifier in the World. Produces a lovely skin and complexion, and cures spots, pimples, redness, and freckles. The finest and purest soap made. For Eczema and all irritations it is the most emollient and soothing. Absolutely harmless. But beware of the many worthless imitations. Have Dr. Mackenzie's or none. At all Chemists and Stores, 6d. and 1s. a tablet.

Madame Adelina Patti writes from Craig-y-Nos Castle: "I find Dr. Mackenzie's Arsenical Toilet Soap most excellent."

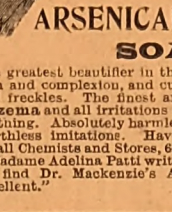
S.S. S.S.
PEARSON'S
£100
COUPON.
No. 47
Nov. 21, 1896.
S.S. S.S.

HAIR DESTROYED.

A doctor's widow knows of a simple, inexpensive remedy that permanently destroys the roots, and will forward particulars free to all those afflicted sending stamped envelope. Address Mrs. B. D. WOOD, 4, DUKE STREET, VILLIERS STREET, LONDON, W.

BLUSHING

Permanently cured. A Pamphlet giving sound practical advice and particulars of a successful treatment for a rapid, simple, and inexpensive home cure, forwarded free to all upon receipt of stamped addressed envelope.—Prof. F. L. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.



Swift Gold Medal
KNITTER.

KNITS Stockings ribbed or plain, Gloves and Clothing in Wool, Silk, or Cotton. Instructions Free. Lists free per post. 25 Triumphant Awards, including 7 Gold Medals, for the "Harrison" and "Sun" Machines.

Harrison Knitting Machine Co., Ltd. Works: 48, Upper Brook St., Manchester.

RED NOSES

Permanently cured in a few days by a simple, inexpensive self-treatment. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope to Dr. A. M. CURTIS, York Chambers, Adelphi, London, W.C.

WHY SUFFER FROM CORNS, BUNIONS, OR ENLARGED TOE-JOINTS, when a packet of Thompson's Celebrated French Corn Plasters will cure you? It is thin as silk, and can be worn with tightest boot. Post free for 14 stamps from M. F. THOMPSON, Homœopathic Chemist, 17, Gordon St., Glasgow. Thompson's Guide to Health post free permanently and absolutely by an entirely new and harmless self-treatment, total destruction guaranteed. Particulars free on receipt of stamped addressed envelope. Prof. F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

HAIR DESTROYED

TO TOBACCONISTS COMMENCING.

£20 See Illus. Guide and Catalogue 239 pages), 3d. "How to Open a Cigar Stores, from £20 to £2,000." TOBACCONISTS' OUTFITTING CO., 186, Euston Road, London. (Over 50 years' reputation.) Manager, H. MYERS.

TOO STOUT

If you require a reliable remedy for the relief of superfluous fat, send for a box of my "H.D." Pills. No starvation required; you may eat and drink what you like, yet I guarantee to either sex a permanent reduction of 3lb. to 7lb. weekly. They are a harmless vegetable preparation, successful in the most stubborn cases, and improve health and figure. Their action is rapid, certain, safe, tasteless, and highly recommended. Prices, 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s., post free, plain wrapper. PROFESSOR F. T. HOLT, Argyll Chambers, West Strand, London.

SHORT STORIES.

EDITED BY C. ARTHUR PEARSON.

No. 412.] For the Week ending November 21st, 1896. [1d.

Through a Glass Darkly.

THE size of the cottage was perfectly ridiculous. The occupants of more pretentious cottages round about spoke of it as the "Doll's House;" the villagers knew it as the "Gladstone Bag," and their humourist had hoped he would be able to master the almost irresistible propensity which seized him on Saturday nights after sojourning in The Ship Hotel, which was, to put a satchel strap round the house and carry it home to his wife.

But cottagers and villagers alike were really consumed with a curiosity concerning the man who was immured in this little, sombre shell of a house, stuck so bleak on an isolated dune. The visitors who came to Selsey during the summer months only occasionally saw him towards nightfall striding away from them down the deserted beach. They saw that he was tall and bearded, and of strong build; and that was all. The villagers saw even less, and knew no more of him, though they had tried hard enough to pump his one servant, the affable "Mooseer" Donc, who went daily on "Meester" Trappe's errands. He was seen occasionally, however, by the life-saving men at the station, and mostly on stormy winter nights.

On one such wintry night, the inhabitant of the "Bag," or the "Doll's House," was, for a wonder to the admirable Donc, not abroad. He sat in a room which was also the hall, before a pine table, the light of a hanging oil lamp above it mingling with the hot blaze of a fire in a wide-mouthed chimney. The little house shivered and shook in the grip of the seaward gale. Trappe's face, though tanned by much exposure, looked sickly in the double glare. On the table was a bottle of brandy and a glass, an ink-stand and a pad of paper. He was writing this:

A LITTLE STORY OF A LITTLE SOUL.

By Louis Trappe.

God save us from all cant and hypocrisy; the pretension of love for "antiques," for "symbolism," for daubs in "yellow" or "green," for abortions in black and white; for all the nastiness of degeneration. Make us honestly grateful for the high privilege of seeing the dawn of spring and smelling the sweet breath of the awakened grass and feeling the jubilant sting of the salt spray. Lead us to know that the life of the drawing-room is the death of the best spirit in us; and that to cling to the skirts of society is to be dragged in the dust. Save us from contact with the woman whose touch is leprous, because her heart is flint.

All rights reserved.] Digitized by Google

This is such a little story because it must be made to square with the central fact in it, the soul of a woman, and central circumstance in it, the breaking of a man's heart, which, as everybody knows, is the merest fragile trifle. This man and woman met on board ship, and by the time they came to Havre he was very hard hit. So he followed on to Paris, and one Sunday, when the fountains were gushing at Versailles, he walked into the woods with her, and on the edge of the Bosquet d'Amou he made a fool of himself. But he was quite in earnest, mind you. She saw he was. She let him kiss her. She even trembled all over. And he has wondered since whether it was all suppressed laughter or whether he had really stirred up her feelings for the moment—he was so much in earnest.

Well, he stood an accepted lover; a joyous, unquestioning one; a blind, idolatrous fool. Now, at last, he had laid hold of life; the secret of its highest gift was his! His trust was so great that he could read into her eyes a full response to his own splendid joy. Her past was nothing to him—then. He told her to lock it up and put it away (as though she would really have surrendered the key, as she had offered to do!)

His childish confidence was pleasing to her; and certainly it was complete. When she put aside all talk of immediate marriage, and said: "Oh, no, not that. You must not, must not mention that to me again. Not till I tell you." He took her at her word, and she kissed his hand and said: "You are very, very good to me. How can I ever repay you?"

As though she did not know the only way to do it! As though she had ever had it in her mind to do it!

He stayed her dupe for three months—the most delightfully willing dupe in all the world. It's a preposterous thing to say, but the ecstasy of those months stands out in such radiant contrast against the dull background of a hard, loveless life, that, despite their cost, he would even wish to live them over again. He paid out his heart for three months' residence in Eden; not such an expensive rental after all.

The end of the lease came one day in September. She had coaxed tears into her eyes the day before. She had taken him by the hands and said: "Maybe—maybe—mind I don't promise for sure—maybe I'll have news for you soon. Don't come to me again until I send for you. Now, not another word, dear. Good-night." And he had obediently left her, wondering what was in store for him, and hoping the best.

So he bided his time as patiently as a patient man could, which meant that for three days he never strayed beyond the portals of his hotel, lest he should delay by a second the receipt of the expected summons. By noon of the fourth day he could stand it no longer. The suspense had kept him walking his rooms all night. His imagination warned him; his heart beat so, it hurt him. He rushed to her lodgings. The maid held open the door and he felt so silly and confused upon seeing her so coolly smiling at him that he could not stammer a question. "Will you come in?" she said. "Madame has gone out with Monsieur."

"Monsieur!"

He stared at his feet. "Monsieur? When did Monsieur come?" he asked in another man's voice.

"Oh, pardon. Yes, on Monday."

Monday. That was three days ago.

He leant against the centre table, and the maid went out of the room.

How long he stood there he will never know, nor can he recall the jumble of his thoughts, until his half-closed eyes opened upon an envelope, directed to her in a dashing manly hand.

No thought of the meanness of the act came to him then, and he is not sensible of it to this day. He opened the letter deliberately and read:

London, September —, '93.

MY DARLING LITTLE GIRL,—Here I am in London. I've just got word that all is well. I'll join you in Paris, I hope, by Monday, and then we can lay out plans for a good long picnic. Shall it be Italy or Spain? Algiers or Cairo? Who is this amiable L—— you mention? (Here he read his own name mentioned, with emotions not to be named). Prenez garde, my little girl. Beware of Charybdis. However, he's an unknown quantity to me, and I leave him in your hands, only stipulating that, now we're out of the woods, you mustn't do anything to get us back there again.—A toi toujours, BOB.

* * * * *

It's only a little story this, and it is told simply because of its littleness. Here is a woman with a little soul, but big with power of causing pain, who goes out of her way to break a heart that was fairly big and fresh and certainly true. Why did she do this wanton thing? Because, being a woman, she could not help it? Can it be possible that the sleep of this woman has been made all the sweeter for her little act of vandalism?

God save us all from contact with the woman whose touch is leprous, because her heart is flint.

Selsey, May 7th, '95.

Having written this inartistic tale, Trappe wisely refrained from reading it and took some brandy instead. Then casting his eye over some magazines on the table he noted one, and putting the manuscript in an envelope, addressed it and summoned Donc. "Please post this to-morrow, will you?" he said.

* * * * *

Late one spring day the village humourist, who was also the village postman, handed "Mooseer" Donc a letter and a periodical, the wrapper of which bore certain suspicious signs, to which the casual remark of the humourist that he "didn't know Trappe was a writin' man," may or may not had reference. When Donc delivered them, his master glanced at the periodical and threw it unread into the fire. Then he opened the letter and took out of it a little bit of a cheque, such as befitted such a little bit of a story; and he held it awhile in his hands and laughed at it, and said, "Donc, this is blood money and I can't accept it. But you may with a perfectly free conscience." Whereupon he signed it, and Monsieur Donc, after handling it gingerly, with one eye upon his master, shook his head, and pocketed it.

Then the days ran on and the weather at Selsey steadily improved, bringing the annual contingent of visitors. This was the most trying period of the year to Trappe. Shut up in his "Gladstone Bag" he had no companionship until nightfall but his bottle and Donc, and in proportion as he uncorked the one he was sure to uncork the other, which sorely smote his self-respect.

Thus matters stood on a fine bluish-grey morning early in September. Trappe stood at the eastern window of his "Bag" looking out to sea. He was tired of it all; he wondered whether the two years had really made a new man of him, or whether the effect of the last bottle had brought him for a moment to a sense of his enormous waste of time. The sun fell on the tumbling surf; the gulls lazily soared and suddenly dipped; the soft air, moist with the mystery of the sea, stirred his greyish hair and left a salt kiss on his lips. He turned about, restless and feverish. It was that last bottle. On his cheap dressing table lay his powerful marine glass, aluminium finish. His hand closed upon it involuntarily, as he eyed himself in the mirror. The face was all right. Evidently broken-hearted men didn't die of heart-disease after all; they could even tan like less romantic folk. Perhaps they might even die of delirium-tremens like the most vulgar of gutter people, which reminded him that his linen was none of the cleanest, or his beard well-trimmed, or—— The effigy before him was not that of the gentleman he had seen in Paris. He wondered whether Donc had remarked it.

Digitized by Google

He swept the sea with his glass. A steamer with no signs of life on it but its belching funnel; and a small fishing boat. He brought the glass round until it rested on the life-saving station. His friends there were cooking their breakfast. Then the cottage between filled the glass, and he rested his vision there in idle curiosity. Green and yellow paint, roomy and ugly verandahs; starved and scorched grass. On the front porch a nurse and several children. Who were these people? He must ask Donc. Then——

Aluminium is as strong as steel, else Trappe's sudden grip on his glass would have bent it. From a window on the second floor of the cottage facing the "Gladstone Bag," a woman was gazing at him through a pair of opera glasses. Trappe was not the sort of man to stand there and flirt with an unknown woman à la lorgnette. Why, then, didn't he retire into his "Bag," and pull down the lid, or rather the blind? Above all, why did he suddenly go all a-tremble, and grab the window-frame and drop his expensive glasses and sob like a little child:

"Oh, my dear! my dear!"

* * * * *

"Donc," said Trappe, "come here."

This was an hour later.

"Donc, who lives over there?"

"There, Monsieur? Why——" and Donc went through the most absurd pretension at wool-gathering, crying, of a sudden: "Oh, yes, Monsieur, Monsieur Wilson."

"What!"

It wasn't Trappe's tone or manner which startled the estimable Donc, it was his unwonted vehemence. Trappe looked like a maniac. Then he said, quietly enough: "How long have you known this, Donc?"

"Eh, Monsieur? The Monsieur Wilson? I have not ze plaisure."

"No, no. How long have you known that he has been here?"

"Why, Monsieur, he has been here all summer. He and madame."

Trappe gasped. "And the children?"

"Oui, Monsieur."

Trappe's head fell forward into his hands. Then the merciful Donc said gently:

"I could not speak to Monsieur, until Monsieur spoke to me. Is it not so? Eh, bien. When Fidele—Monsieur remembers Fidele?—who had the honour of attending Miss Wilson, when I had the honour of attending Monsieur——"

Trappe's hand went into his hair as though to pluck his wits together.

"When Fidele wrote me that she was to come with her mistress to visit here at the pavilion of Miss Wilson's brother——"

Trappe stood up on his only two legs.

"Could I tell Monsieur that she was here? Did I not ask Fidele, and did——"

"Donc!" said Trappe in the voice of a child of four afflicted with weak lungs. "You said Miss Wilson, did you not, Donc?" as he sank into his chair.

"Yes, Monsieur."

"Donc, I'm very tired. 'Pon my word you'll have to help me up—up—Oh, I say, Donc. Just you run over to the what-you-may-call-em's and say that Mr. Trappe—you'll remember the name, won't you?—that Mr. Louis Trappe is down with heart-disease and that somebody—Donc, remember!—somebody's got to look after him."

Then Trappe went to pieces.

* * * * *

The delight of coming out of dense blackness into the splendour of warm sunlight. That is one and a delicious thing. But to do that and at the same time come unexpectedly from the depths of despair out into the clear light of hope; to revive after many days of apathetic suffering, one's sense of the joy of living—that is a rarer and finer thing—giving adequate compensation, indeed, for much torture.

When Trappe first opened his eyes after some days of lunacy, and knew what he was about, he turned to the very polite and patient Donc, and said: "Where on earth am I?"

"At Monsieur Wilson's," said Donc.

"Oh," said Trappe, closing his eyes. Then Donc glided from the room.

Presently Trappe raised his lids again. And he had cause to. On his lips were lips he had never known; but he was gazing into eyes he knew so well. The lips did not move from his, but they murmured something like this: "Sh-h-h-h, my dear. The doctor won't have it—Ah, Louis, Louis! will you men never know? Why couldn't you trust me? You did until that day. Fidele told me you had been there; I saw you had opened the letter (was it nice of you, Louis?); but even then my brother (he was my brother, my dear) would have gone to you and told you all about it—all about my divorce, a shameful story. Yet you did not wait. Oh, you men! Can you fancy how I felt? Can you understand, my dear, dear Louis, what my brother—look at me—meant? But there, there! It's over now."

Trappe looked up at her with eyes that would have warmed the North Pole.

"Ah, no," she whispered. "You mustn't. Do you think I don't know that you have suffered, too?"

His rapturous look made her blush.

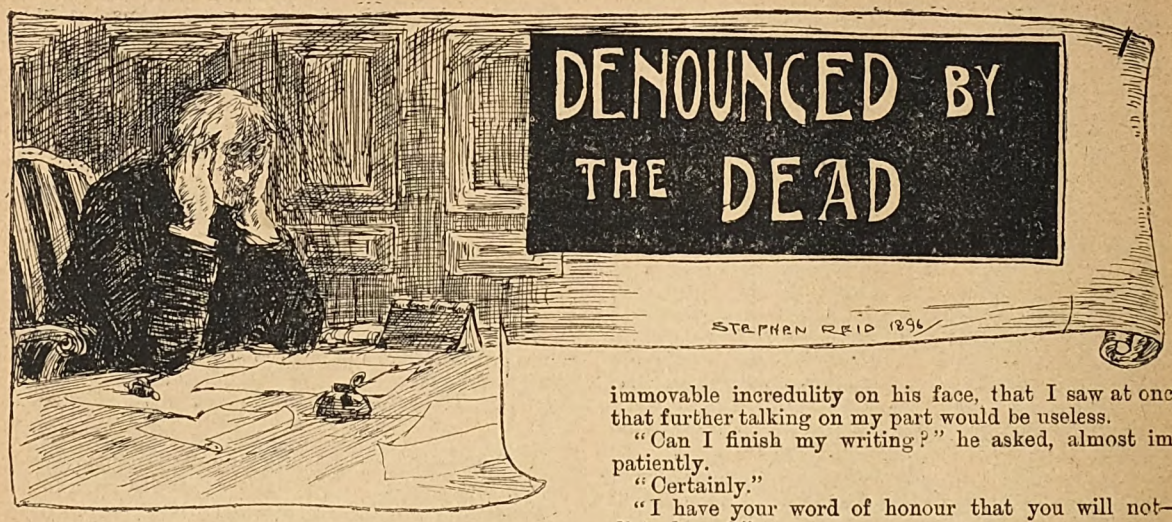
"You're so helpless, Louis, I feel like a coward when I say provoking things to you. But I must. You silly, silly little grey-haired boy. 'A Story of a Little Soul.' Signed Louis Trappe. Dated Selsey. Oh, Louis!"

He lifted himself right out of the sheets and, quivering like a willow bough in a light breeze, held out his arms (they were too weak to clasp her), and said: "If you only knew, my dear, if you only knew!"

As she laid him back upon the pillow, his head upon her breast like that of a little child, she whispered: "Oh, but I do, my dear. Indeed I do."

MELVILLE PHILLIPS.

Digitized by Google



"SCOUNDREL! You have come to kill me!"

My cousin, Sir Richard Terral, started up from his sleep, and stared as if fascinated at the revolver in my hand.

On stealing up to his study I had found him asleep, his arms stretched forward on the desk at which he sat, and his head on his arms. Drowsiness had overcome him apparently in the midst of his writing, for a quill-pen remained between his fingers, and the writing-table was strewn with manuscript.

"One of the old man's interminable essays for the COUNTY GENTLEMAN'S REVIEW," I said to myself. "Enough to send anybody to sleep."

But what attracted my attention most as I quietly entered the room was a six-barrelled revolver lying close to my cousin's arm. The position was a most dangerous one if the weapon were loaded. I took it up gingerly to examine it, and in the moment of my doing so, the old man awakened, and stared at me with terrified eyes.

It was only for a moment, however, while he uttered his exclamation. The next, as I laid the revolver on the mantel-shelf, behind me, the Baronet had resumed his ordinary air of cold, emotionless calm.

"Your visit does not surprise me," he said, in his usual dry tones. "It does not surprise me at all. I expected it, and am aware of your object in stealing into my room in this clandestine manner."

I simply bowed in reply. There was no denying the way in which I had reached my cousin's presence. He continued speaking:

"Perhaps you will grant one favour before proceeding to carry out your purpose, and murder me. There is no need for haste, as you are doubtless aware. Perhaps you will allow me to finish some writing which is of the greatest importance to me. It will not take me many moments."

"But, my dear Sir Richard," I began, unable to refrain from smiling.

My cousin interrupted me.

"You may save yourself the trouble of attempting any disguise," he said quietly. "We understand one another perfectly."

"Excuse me," I said. But the Baronet interrupted me once more, with an expression of such perfect and immovable incredulity on his face, that I saw at once that further talking on my part would be useless.

"Can I finish my writing?" he asked, almost impatiently.

"Certainly."

"I have your word of honour that you will not—disturb me?"

"Certainly."

"Thank you."

Sir Richard consulted his watch, then turned to his desk, and dipped his pen in the ink.

"I rely on your honour," he said.

And as I nodded to humour him, the room became silent, except for the busy scratching of his pen.

In four or five minutes this sound ceased, and the old man looked up.

"I should like to go into the library one moment—alone. You will remember that there is no bell there, nor any means of my calling assistance, even if we were not alone in the house."

"I am entirely your servant, Sir Richard. It is quite unnecessary for you to consult me."

"You are very kind," returned the Baronet, with ironical politeness, and he disappeared into the little book-lined room which opened from the study where I was standing.

"Now," he said, as he returned, drawing a long breath, "let us understand one another, John Terral."

He sat down again in his chair, and faced me as I stood leaning against the mantel-shelf.

"Let us state the case quite plainly," he said, drawing it up into invisible heads with his pen on the table as he spoke. "It is quite natural that you should want to kill me, provided you can do so without detection. You would inherit the estate at once, and be left free to win Mary's heart, as you shall never win it while I live. I do not deny the advantages of the step you contemplate, nor the arguments in favour of your success. As you are aware, my daughter and the servants will all be absent for some hours. I am an old, weak man—you are young and strong. You have obtained possession of the revolver—my only hope of defending myself. So much for your side of the question. Now listen for a moment to mine."

"Pardon me, Sir Richard," I interrupted; "but it is quite unnecessary. I assure you that I have not contemplated for a single moment the crime of which you seem to think me capable. That I came here clandestinely I will admit, but only because you have given your servants orders to prevent my entrance—by force, if required. My one object in forcing my presence upon you——"

Digitized by Google

My cousin waved his hand, and smiled with chilling incredulity.

"Kindly allow me to state the case completely," he said. "If you are good enough to do so without interruption, we shall understand one another better, and I shall then be happy to listen to anything you have to say. May I proceed with the arguments against your killing me?"

I remained silent, the only course when a man is so obstinate, and the old man went on in his quiet judicial way.

"I said arguments: but there is only one; it consists of a small sheet of fine India paper, on which I have just written the following words:

"'The study, Terral Court, seven minutes to three p.m., Friday. My cousin, John Terral, has just entered the room by stealth, and is about to kill me.'

"I have added a few words to my daughter, solemnly exhorting her, in case I am found murdered, to see that my death is avenged. In the little while you have been acquainted with her, you will have seen sufficient of my daughter's character, I trust, to be assured that this exhortation from her father will not be neglected. Allow me to proceed, however. You will admit that if that paper is found after your crime, as sooner or later it must be, that it will be a damning piece of evidence against you—sufficient, indeed, to bring you to the gallows. I have hidden it carefully between the pages of a certain book in the library."

"Yes, Sir Richard, the piece of paper is a conclusive

"Let us state the case quite plainly."

argument against murder: I could not dream of killing you now," I said, with a laugh.

I was impatient to say what I had come to say, before I was interrupted. The Baronet insisted on finishing, however. He was evidently proud of his elaborate precautions against me.

"One moment," he said, "and I shall have finished, and will place myself at your disposal. It may occur to you that after killing me you can destroy the denunciation which sooner or later will bring the crime home to you. Allow me to state the arguments against your being able to do so. I have hidden the paper in a book, as I said. I have taken great care that nothing should give you a clue as to which book I have used. There are, roughly speaking, seven hundred in the library. The probabilities are that you would have to examine a quarter of those before selecting the one I have chosen for my purpose. As the denunciation is written on this paper, and carefully placed between the leaves, you would be obliged to spend a considerable time over each book, if you intended to find the manuscript. Let us say that each book takes only five minutes. Then your search will take you, if you are moderately lucky, twenty-seven hours."

The old man paused to work out the calculation on the blotting-pad on his desk.

"Allow me to proceed. Although you can gain no clue to the book I have selected, still, there are reasons why it will be opened by my daughter within a few hours. I think she would open it even if I were killed, because she must consult the book in order to finish for me work of the utmost importance. Of course, there is a chance that she might not do so, and that you might possess yourself of the document before it is seen by any other eye; but you will admit, I think, that the balance of probability tends the other way. I believe I have stated the case clearly and impartially. How it will affect your decision depends, of course, upon yourself."

He paused for a moment, throwing himself back in his chair with the satisfied air of a man who has conscientiously performed a somewhat difficult task. Then, before I had time to think out the best way of answering him, the old man continued:

"There is only one thing more. You are surprised, no doubt, to find me so fully prepared for your sinister visit. I owe it to a dream which has come to me three times with great vividness. I am not a superstitious man, as you probably know, but in the present case I will admit that I have been strongly influenced by a vision. Twice last night I dreamt that a man—I admit I could not tell who; but I guessed that it was you—came to murder me as I sat at this desk. I would not permit the fact to influence me, however, and allowed myself to be left alone in the house, taking the precaution only of keeping a revolver by my side. I must have fallen asleep, however, for I dreamt the whole dream over again as I sat here, and I woke to find you standing over me, with the revolver in your hand. Use it, if you think it a wise thing to do, considering the little witness in the library. I promise you I will make no resistance."

The Baronet regarded me calmly. There was no doubt that he was quite in earnest, yet his lined old face never showed a tremor. I met his steady gaze as unflinchingly.

"I have heard you out patiently," I said. "Perhaps you will allow me to speak, at last. In the first place, here is your revolver, Sir Richard. Perhaps you will feel happier while you listen if you have the means of defending yourself against my homicidal intentions."

I handed the weapon to him as I spoke, and the old man took it without the slightest change of expression.

Digitized by Google

"I came here," I went on, "to make a last appeal to you to treat me fairly. When I came to Terral Court, six weeks ago, I came as a kinsman, expecting a kinsman's welcome. You were pleased to imagine that I was eager

It fell from my startled fingers for the estate which will be mine when you die, and that I wanted to spy on you. You hated me accordingly, and tried to prejudice your daughter Mary against me. Thank Heaven! she was built in a less suspicious mould than you, and treated me with a frank friendliness. As I told you a week ago, I learnt to love her; but before speaking a word to her of love, I was fool enough to ask your permission. You ordered me out of the house where I had been staying as your guest. Since then I have been unable to obtain a moment's interview. To-day I came determined to see you, and argue my cause, at all odds. Finding the door ajar, and nobody about, I slipped up here, and found you asleep, with the revolver by your side. It was simply a regard for your safety which made me take it from the desk at the moment you awakened."

My cousin's face remained unreadable, and I went on:

"Now that you have kindly allowed me to explain my presence here, I will tell you what I came to say. It is this: With your will or without it, Sir Richard, I mean to win your daughter's heart, and make her my wife. Why, it seems a marriage made by Heaven!—when I shall inherit Terral Court—and should be expected to turn her out of her home when you die, if I cannot make her its mistress. Why you object to a match that ought to delight you—you'll excuse me talking bluntly, sir—I cannot imagine. What I came here for to-day is to give you another chance of acting like a friend and a kinsman. Whether you do or not, I shall marry Mary. Why shouldn't you give me your approval in my wooing? I am not a poor man. Thank Heaven! I don't depend upon your death for the means of giving the woman I marry a home. My father used to tell me that he was looked down upon by the rest of the family, before he emigrated to the States—a sort of fool; but he managed to make a good pile out there, and has left me sufficient to buy a dozen Terral Courts, if fate and the entail didn't make me heir without."

I paused, but my cousin made no reply. He sat in an attitude of studious and unimpressionable attention. After looking in vain for some evidence that my words were taking effect, I went on:

"You can easily be satisfied about my character, if considerations of that sort affect you. It is true that you have not concerned yourself much with my history while I was abroad, but I am sufficiently well known in Sydney for you to learn all about me by making inquiries there. When I spoke to you first about your daughter, sir, I said as much, and gave you names and addresses. I don't see why you should be prejudiced against me; I can't help being next heir to Terral Court. I am not eager for it, although, if I survive you, as in the ordinary course of nature I shall do, I shall be proud and happy to have the old mansion of our family. I came here simply because I am a kinsman. Why don't you act like one?"

I stopped then, determined that the old man should say something—good or bad.

"Have you finished?" he asked, after a minute's dead silence.

"Yes, Sir Richard."

"You have determined not to try murder, then? I thought the piece of paper in the library would dissuade you."

"You still choose to be unjust in your estimate of my motives."

The Baronet shrugged his shoulder.

"We will not quarrel about your motives," he replied coldly. "The practical question is, do you intend to kill me?"

"Of course not."

"Then there is no need for us to prolong the interview."

I kept my temper with difficulty.

"Am I to understand that you still object to me as a suitor for your daughter's hand?"

"Pardon me," said my cousin; "but that question was fully discussed at our last interview. Need we go over it again?"

"If you are determined to be deaf, sir, to the voice of reason and of justice," I replied hotly, "it will be idle to talk any more. I will bid you good-day, Sir Richard Terral."

The old Baronet rose and opened the door without speaking. His face wore under its solemnity a ghost of a smile, and I knew well enough as I left the room that my cousin was congratulating himself on the ingenious manner in which he had frustrated the designs of a would-be murderer.

I was boiling with rage, as well I might be. It was bad enough to be given the cold shoulder by my relative, with no other reason than that I had been born out of England, son of the only member of the family plucky enough to make money in trade, instead of waiting for dead men's shoes. To be coolly treated as a criminal was beyond endurance. I determined never to set foot in the house again till Sir Richard Terral's death left me owner of it.

Digitized by Google

In the hall, however, was something which made me cool down quickly, and reconsider my decision. It was only a little pink-ribboned sun-bonnet, thrown carelessly on the oak table, but it conjured up the sweetest picture in the world for me, for it belonged to Mary Terral, whose sweet, womanly welcome had more than compensated for her father's cold unfriendliness.

I took the dainty arrangement of straw and ribbon in my hand, and was raising it to my lips, when it fell from my startled fingers, and went out of my mind utterly.

For I had heard in the house above me, so silent till that moment, the sharp crack of a revolver, and a short and terrible cry.

II.

It was a shocking thing to enter the room, where I had a few moments before left Sir Richard Terral alive and well, to find the difference that those few moments had made. He lay on the floor, a huddled-up heap, from under which a dark mark, like a shadow, was spreading itself silently over the carpet. He was quite dead.

I had rushed upstairs, after the first momentary paralysis of will and thought, straight to Sir Richard's study. A dim idea was in my mind that the Baronet had accidentally shot himself with the revolver I had seen in his room. But when I bent over his inanimate body, trying to staunch the blood which came from a wound in the old man's side, I noticed that no revolver was to be seen. Then it dawned upon me that the window which I had left closed was standing wide open. The draught between it and the open door ruffled the pages of manuscript on the dead man's desk, and two or three sheets fluttered down to the floor, as if eager to hide that dark shadow which crept steadily across the carpet.

It was the manuscript, perhaps, which brought suddenly into my mind the thought of that other paper which Sir Richard Terral had written and hidden in the next room.

The window, as I said, was wide open; beneath it was the roof of the verandah, which ran along the front of the house. It would be quite possible for an agile person to climb up the verandah and so gain the study. He might have escaped that way also, after shooting Sir Richard, while I was running upstairs to the room. I looked out into the garden below, but the murderer, if he had gone that way, must have been long out of sight. That a murder had been committed was clear from the fact that the revolver was gone. The old man's treble dream had come true, after all.

Yes, there was no doubt that my cousin's death pointed to foul play, and lying in the little room beside me was the paper on which Sir Richard had denounced me, with his last written words, as his murderer. If it were found who would believe my explanation of its existence?

Realising how much the fact menaced my safety, I hurried into the library and looked round anxiously for any clue that might guide me to the book in which the murdered Baronet's denunciation was hidden. But as he himself had said, Sir Richard had been careful that nothing should be left to guide me in any search. The room was a small square one, with shelves on three sides. On the fourth were glass cases containing animals which my grandfather had collected. One of them, a hideous blue ape, had been mounted elaborately, with one forepaw grasping the branch of a tree. The other stretched out as if pointing.

With a half-superstitious hope, I followed the direction of the extended finger, and took out the book on the opposite shelf towards which it pointed, but I could find no sheet of manuscript. In the midst of my feverish search through the printed pages, the thought seized me that I was acting madly. Every moment that I delayed making public Sir Richard Terral's death I was adding to my chances of being saddled with the responsibility of it.

Suppose I were found rummaging my cousin's books, while his dead body lay in the next room, how could I avoid suspicion? With this idea in my mind, I put back the book I had taken in its place on the shelves, trembling now with anxiety lest the murder should be discovered before I had given notice of it.

I hurried out of the room and through the study, without stopping to take another glance at the inanimate heap by the writing-desk, and hurried out of the house and along the avenue which led to the high road, afraid to run, lest I might be taken for a fugitive leaving the scene of his crime, and unable to walk quietly in my anxiety to give the first news of Sir Richard Terral's death.

Fortune favoured me. Walking along the high road, not twenty yards from the avenue gates, was Constable Quiner, the Terralcombe policeman.

He turned as he heard my hurrying footsteps and touched his helmet.

"You are the very man I was looking for!" I exclaimed

He lay on the floor.

breathlessly; "my cousin, Sir Richard Terral, has been murdered!"

I wondered, while I said it, whether my manner would appear to him that of an innocent person.

He stared at me for a full moment, his green eyes wide open, and as round as his rubicund face.

"Great Heavens! murdered!" he said; and then a smile of professional satisfaction spread over his whole visage, and he rubbed his hands together cheerfully.

Digitized by Google

"This is a big business, sir," he said briskly. "It is a good job you met me."

"Yes," I said. "Now I must go for a doctor, I suppose, although no doctor can do any good. He is shot through the heart."

"Yes, a doctor; I was just going to suggest it," said Quiper solemnly.

"You will go on to the house. Sir Richard is lying in the study. There is nobody at home."

"Yes—yes," said the constable. "I will go and make an examination. I will take your evidence when you come back with Dr. Hugh Smith, if you don't mind, sir."

Dr. Hugh Smith was not at home—a country practitioner never is—so I left a message for him, and hurried back to Terral Court.

Constable Quiper received me in the hall, where he was sitting at the oak table, with his handcuffs laid out before him, laboriously making notes in his pocket-book with a pencil stump. He had evidently been undisturbed in his examination.

"Well; have you discovered anything?" I asked, moving Mary's sun-bonnet further from his arm.

"Yes, sir; I've put down a good many important facts here."

He patted his pocket-book affectionately, closed it, and put it in his pocket.

"Have you a clue to the murder?" I asked, glancing at the handcuffs on the table.

"Possibly."

The man's face was full of unsearchable wisdom.

"Well; are you going to do anything?" I asked. I was anxious to know whether there was a chance of the murderer being caught. It would relieve my own anxiety so much.

Quiper rose solemnly and stood between me and the open door.

"I am afraid I shall have to arrest you, sir," he said stolidly. I felt my colour change. Was it possible that the dead man's denunciation had been found already?

"Arrest me? It is absurd!" I said keeping calm with an effort.

"Possibly, sir; but I think it is the course I ought to take. If it was found afterwards that you'd done it, the British Press would be down on me like a hundred of bricks; I may tell you and me, sir, it looks more professional to make an arrest; and besides, you had a good reason to shoot the old gentleman."

"This is nonsense," I said impatiently. The idea of an arrest was unbearable. Just the little time I had to search in Sir Richard's library for the incriminating paper would be lost while I went through the formality of proving my innocence.

"Look here, Quiper," I said insinuatingly, "it would be very inconvenient for me to be locked up just now, when I am anxious to investigate the horrible death of my cousin. You must think of some other means of gaining public approval."

But, rather to my surprise, the man was inexorable. Even the undignified offer of a five-pound note would not melt him.

"No, sir," he said firmly, but regretfully, "now I've got the chance of distinguishing myself, I couldn't play with it, not if you made it guineas."

I did make it guineas, but only to prove that Constable Quiper meant what he said; and as force was out of the question, I walked out of Terral Court a prisoner.

III.

EIGHT days after the death of Sir Richard Terral, I emerged from the Town Hall of Doveton, our neighbouring market town—a free man. After a week's imprisonment, and considerable inquiry, which elicited nothing, the magistrates decided to acquit me, as, in spite of the interest I had in Sir Richard's death there was no evidence forthcoming to connect me with it.

Laboriously making notes.

The eminent barrister I had engaged to represent me made a stirring speech on my behalf, which induced the county magistrates to add to their decision the opinion that no suspicion could possibly attach itself to me.

The inhabitants of Doveton seemed to be of the same mind, for they cheered me enthusiastically when I left the building. I had no taste for public sympathy just then, however. I was burning with impatience to get back to Terral Court, not to enter into possession of the estate, which was now mine, or even to see Mary Terral. I had only one purpose in my head, to ransack the library in which the late baronet had hidden his denunciation of me, to find the paper, at all costs, before it fell into the hands of others, above all, those of the girl I loved.

If I had known that Mary Terral loved me in return, I should not have feared so much. I should have told her everything confidently, expecting her to trust my assertion against her father's last written words. But I did not believe in my heart of hearts that my fair half-cousin did love me. She was interested in me, I knew, and sorry that I was treated by her father so unkindly, and she loved nobody else—all facts that made me hopeful in my desire to win her; but none of them likely to make her believe my word in spite of appearances. Would it be possible, if she once imagined me guilty of her father's death, to consider me with anything but horror?

Outside the Town Hall I pushed my way through the cheering crowd, and was driven off to Terral Court. It was a ride of ten miles; but the Doveton jehu did it very creditably, considering the animal he had between the shafts.

In less than an hour I was inquiring at the door for Miss Terral. It was with a feeling almost of relief that I heard she was away.

"She went away immediately after the funeral, sir," said the girl, "to friends in London."

I inquired their name, and the girl went to fetch the address which Miss Terral had left for her letters to be forwarded, while I waited in the hall, where Constable

Digitized by Google

Quiper had arrested me. I had been worrying so much over the hidden paper, and whether Mary would find it, that it actually never occurred to me that I was now master of the house in which I stood. I was soon reminded of it by the old housekeeper, who came back, instead of the maid, with Miss Terral's address.

She curtsied so frequently and so elaborately that I was filled with wonder, till she commenced a politic and complimentary congratulation on my return to freedom, which reminded me that she was my own servant. I copied down the address she gave me: "Miss Lewin-Brown, Eaton Square," and then I said I would run up and see the room where my cousin was killed.

The old lady curtsied lower than ever—perhaps to give me more confidence; for I was feeling nervous and excited, and possibly showed it. I resisted, with difficulty, her offer of refreshments, and walked up alone to the room where I had last seen my unfortunate cousin. There was little change in it, that I glanced behind the writing-desk with a sort of half-idea that I might see that strange huddled heap still lying there, the sight of which had frozen my blood eight days before.

I did not linger in the study, however, but walked straight through to the little library, with a half-superstitious certainty that I should find something there—I knew not what—to tell me how matters stood.

It was there, surely enough, in the form of an empty space on one of the shelves, from which a book had been removed. I had taken only a cursory glance round, while my cousin's dead body was lying in the outer room, but I was quite sure that no books had been missing then.

I called up the old housekeeper, who came in curtsying as though she had never left off.

"Can you tell me who has taken a book away?" I asked, pointing at the empty space; and the old lady bobbed down to the ground.

"Yes, Sir John—Miss Terral, please Sir John. She was correcting an article which poor Sir Richard had written for the papers, and took it to London with her, Sir John. She left word with Mr. Reynolds, the lawyer, that she would return it, please Sir John, as soon as possible. I heard her telling the old gentleman, poor dear."

It was not quite clear whether the epithet applied to Miss Terral or the lawyer, but I was in no mood for wondering. For this book must be the one to which the murdered Baronet had referred—a book to which his daughter would refer for his sake, even if he were dead. My heart seemed to stop beating at the thought.

It was still possible, however, if the fatal paper was well hidden between the printed pages, that it might have escaped her noticed. If such good fortune was possible, I must not lose a moment. I expected I startled the old housekeeper by the abruptness with which I ended my inquiries and hurried down to the carriage, which had waited for me. She actually forgot to curtsy.

I was rather surprised, on leaving the house, to find two vehicles outside. The latest arrival was a private brougham, which appeared to be in the act of stopping in front of the house; an old gentleman got out as I ran down the front steps, and came towards me with a smile on his rotund face.

"Ah, Sir John! I thought I should meet you here," he said. "I was waiting for you in the Town Hall, but you got away so quickly that I was unfortunate enough to miss you. I am Mr. Reynolds of Reynolds and Fox."

I recognised the name as that of the family lawyer.

"Miss Terral wished me to assure you that Terral Court is quite ready for your occupation. She has removed all her own belongings, and is staying at present with friends till she decides where to take up her residence."

He was proceeding to launch into business matters with regard to the estate, when I interrupted him. It seemed a mockery listening to an account of my property when my very life and freedom were in jeopardy. I explained that I was anxious to catch a train at Doveton if he would excuse me.

"Certainly; any time, of course, will do for our business, which is purely formal," he said, and he bade me good-day.

But as I was entering my cab, the old gentleman hurried back from the brougham to me with a parcel in his hand.

"Miss Terral asked me to deliver this to you with apologies for borrowing it. I received it from her this morning by post, and thought I would bring it on myself, as she seemed anxious about it. It is a book out of your library, I believe; perhaps you would rather I left it at the house."

I surprised him by saying I would take it with me; and as soon as the vehicle started on its return journey, and I found myself alone, I tore off the paper wrappings feverishly and began turning over the pages. The book was a pretty large one—a "History of the Devonshire County Families"; to look between every two pages was a work of some magnitude, but I had achieved it by the time my driver drew up at Doveton railway station.

Then I spent the time in the train, while I was travelling to London, going through again and again, but always with the same miserable result. Not a trace of the dead man's denunciation was to be found. If this was, indeed, the book in which he had hidden the paper, there was little doubt that it had already fallen into other hands—Mary Terral's most likely. It was quite probable that the return of the "History" was simply meant as an announcement that the paper was found.

At any rate, I must find out whether Mary had seen it or not. The earliest moment that it was possible for a man to reach Eaton Square, after the arrival of the train at Waterloo, found me knocking at the door of the Lewin-Browns and asking for Miss Terral.

When the footman returned, I knew that the worst had happened.

"Miss Terral was engaged, and sorry she could not see me."

IV.

SINCE Mary must know that I had come from Doveton entirely for the purpose of my visit, her reply could have but one meaning. I turned away from the house in Eaton Square with a mist before my eyes. "What would Mary do?" I asked myself, and the still more important question: "What ought I to do?"

On my quickness of thought might depend both my life and honour.

If it had not been for the thought of Mary Terral, I should probably have made good my escape to a foreign country, rather than risk the necessity of proving my innocence in the face of my cousin's declaration.

But the love of Mary Terral had become already greater than the love of life with me, and the thought that she considered me a murderer lessened by contrast the fear of danger from the law. The thought of Mary spurred me on to a hazardous resolve. I would not wait quietly for the dead man's accusation to hound me down. I would face it boldly, and of my own free will publish the whole true story to the world, before I was obliged to do so feebly, as a defence, when nobody would be likely to believe it.

Digitized by Google

The magistrate who had discharged me in Doveton Town Hall from complicity in Sir Richard Terral's death had struck me during my examination as a kind and broad-minded gentleman. As I had no friends in England, I decided to go to him with the tale of my cousin's unjust suspicion and accusation, and leave my fate in his hands.

If the world accepted my explanation, surely the woman I loved would accept it also! If they did not, well! what was life to me without her friendship and approbation? One thing I felt was impossible: to ask Mary Terral to believe that I was guiltless before I had proved it publicly. She should accept my innocence as the verdict of my fellow men, or not accept it at all. That alone could save her from the life-long agony of wondering whether she had allowed her friendship to bias her judgment.

I thought it all out on my way back to Doveton. There was no doubt that a full confession, so I called it to myself, because I had begun to feel like a criminal awaiting detection, a full confession to Mr. Fitz-Henry, the magistrate, was the best move under the circumstances.

My only fear was that I might be too late. Mary Terral was not the girl, if she thought me guilty of her father's death, to let any feeling of her own, or any fear of family disgrace, stand in the way and prevent her denouncing me. What if I were already a marked man?

I got so nervous by the time I reached Doveton, thinking of the probability of my arrest, that when I saw Constable Quiper standing on the platform, I turned quite cold, and had to wipe the sweat off my forehead and face.

"I must avoid him at all hazards," I said to myself, and luck favoured me.

When the train stopped, the policeman was standing by the little gateway where tickets were collected, looking towards the other end of the train. My compartment happened to stop opposite a great doorway which was not used for passengers, and at the moment we drew up at the platform, a porter was unlocking the door to take through a big truck-load of empty milk-cans.

My short residence in England had already given me an unlimited faith in the power of the shilling. I slipped out of the carriage, tendered the coin and my ticket, and in another moment was out in the street, where fortune favoured me again. One of the three ancient growlers which Doveton boasted was within call.

"Drive me quickly to Mr. Fitz-Henry's," I said, springing in—"Doveton House!"

The driver nodded and shook the reins. As the vehicle began to move, I lay back with a sigh of relief—one danger was past. But the next moment I started up, and thrust my head out of the window farthest from the station front.

"What, in Heaven's name, are you stopping for?" I shouted. "Drive on!"

The man went through an acrobatic performance in order to bring himself within speaking distance.

"There's somebody calling, sir," he exclaimed, in a conciliatory tone.

"Never mind—drive on!" I shouted again.

But it was too late. Constable Quiper, who had caught sight of me, and run out to stop the cab, was already at the window. It was all up with me.

"Well!" I said, forcing myself with a great effort to be calm, "what is it?"

"It is about the murder, sir," said Quiper, with an urbane smile on his round face. "I have been looking out for you in the station, sir."

"And for what, pray?" I felt that I had grown pale in spite of myself.

The policeman smiled more urbanely than ever.

"To tell you the news, sir. We've got the man who did it."

"What! You have arrested the murderer of Sir Richard Terral?"

The man's answer had been so unexpected that I could scarcely believe my ears.

"Yes, sir. I thought you would like to hear the news, seeing that you were a little mixed up in the affair—if we may call it so. Being in Doveton about it, and hearing there that you'd gone up to London without luggage, I thought I'd wait about a bit, having nothing else to do, on the chance of seeing you, and being the first to let you know. I'm told that you were thinking of offering a reward, sir, for the murderer's apprehension?"

"Certainly. Who is the man?"

"A poacher, sir, named Dave Ilack. You may have seen him, sir, idling about the village—a slouching, ne'er-do-weel, always in mischief. I suspected him from the first. You see, Sir John, he owed your cousin, the late baronet, a grudge."

"What for?"

"A pretty heavy sentence for poaching. Sir Richard happened to try him, as Justice of the Peace, you know, and dropped on him heavily. When the man came out he went round the place swearing he'd have his revenge. It seems he's had it. He got in at the window of the study, and shot the poor gentleman with his own pistol."

The cabman must have wondered at my sudden change of mood. The policeman stood talking at the cab-window, and I had not the least desire to hurry him or drive on.

"How did you find it out?" I asked, with an interest that must have rejoiced the constable's heart.

"Well, sir," he began, with an air of impenetrable wisdom, "there were two or three little things I found out when I took the case in hand. The pistol, for instance, was found in the shrubbery——"

"By the cook, I believe?"

"Yes, sir, by the Terral Court cook. Then, again, there were marks of boots with nails on the garden-bed beneath the verandah. That, I may say, removed a good deal of suspicion from your shoulders, sir, although personally I never suspected you in the least from the first."

"But you arrested me?"

"Police tactics, sir—tactics," said Quiper, shaking his head gravely. And he kept repeating the word as though it pleased him.

I asked him to proceed.

"Well," he said, "we—that is, I—set about searching for a man with nails in his boots. You see, sir, we police have to put one and one together and make four of it."

"You have to make a good deal out of a little," I said. "Yes; how did you manage to get from the nailed boots, which everybody in the village wears, to this particular poacher? I hope you have quite proved that he is the right man?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh! yes, sir. We—that is, I—have got it all clear."

"What makes you sure? Has he confessed?"

"No, sir; but the woman he lives with has. He was fool enough to tell her about it, and then vex her over another woman. That is really what finally led us—that is to say, me—to arrest the man."

I could not help laughing at the superfluity of the deductions about boots and pistol on which Quiper so evidently prided himself.

"Well, constable," I said, "I won't forget the reward when my cousin's murderer is convicted, though I am afraid the woman has most claim to it. Meanwhile," I felt in my pocket for a sovereign, "you refused five guineas last time very properly, but I don't think you'll refuse this as a slight token of the appreciation I have of your astuteness and skill."

Dave Ilack.

The cabman was looking down to see when he was to start.

"All right, driver," I said; "I won't go to Councillor Fitz-Henry's to-night. Can you drive me as far as Templecome Inn?"

V.

"VERY nice, the way Mr. Fitz-Henry alluded to me at the magistrate's inquiry, wasn't it, sir?" said Constable Quiper to me. "I suppose it would hardly be in a judge's line to allude to my success, eh, sir?"

We were in the Shire Hall at Doveton, where the assizes were held, awaiting, in the seat allotted to witnesses, the trial of David Ilack for murder. The trial had a tremendous interest for me, for his guilt was still unproved.

At the magistrate's inquiry, less than a month before, the man had stubbornly stuck to one reiterated assertion. He was the innocent victim of a woman's spite. It was true enough, he said frankly, that he bore no goodwill to the murdered man; but he had never thought of killing him, and Liz Smith was lying, if she said he had owned to doing it, drunk or sober.

He stood in the dock, now pale and stern-looking, while the judge took his seat, and the accusation was read out.

"A man who will be resolute to the end," I said to myself; and I wondered whether the crime would be brought home to him. It was selfish of me, no doubt, but I could not help hoping that the case against the arrested man might be proved to the hilt, that no possibility of doubting his guilt might remain; for I felt that if David Ilack left the dock uncondemned, I must enter it.

As the accusation was being read out there was some sensation at the back of the court; a lady had fainted. I could not see from my position who it was; but Quiper, who had slipped out noiselessly, came back with the news that it was Mary Terral. I had not seen or heard from her since the murder. After the publication of Ilack's arrest I had made another attempt to see her, but with the same result as before. Upon which I determined to make no effort to arrive at an understanding until the actual murderer was convicted.

I had been straining my eyes, trying to catch sight of her in the court. I felt that she would be there; but not until the policeman told me she had been carried out in a swoon did I know for a certainty that Mary had put in her appearance at the trial.

I had not much time for thinking about it, however, for before the sensation caused by Miss Terral's illness had subsided, it was succeeded by a fresh and more startling one:

To everybody's surprise, David Ilack pleaded guilty.

The judge was so surprised that he made the man repeat the word which condemned him to death. The eminent counsel who had been engaged—Heaven knows how!—by his friends, to defend the accused man, sprang to his feet with a face full of surprise and consternation, trying to save the man in spite of himself. But the man would not let him speak.

"Shut up," he said roughly. "I did it, and everybody knows I did. What is the good waiting to have it badgered out of me. I don't want playing with, I only hope Liz Smith will like to feel she's hanged me!"

Everybody seemed disappointed. People who had obtained good seats, and brought sandwiches to enable them to sit out a long day's trial, were wondering what they should do with their afternoon. Constable Quiper turned crimson with disappointment and indignation.

"Why, they won't want any evidence," he exclaimed, with a fond look at his note-book. "What is the good of collecting evidence against a man like that?"

Not much good, certainly. The trial that everybody had looked forward to as such an interesting one was over in less than fifteen minutes, and David Ilack left the dock condemned to death.

His departure was followed by a rare hubbub, everybody praising or blaming his conduct. Then people rose, unwilling to relinquish the seats they had fought for a little earlier in the day, and tried to hide the needless sandwiches.

But suddenly everybody started and stood still, for a woman's voice, clear but trembling, sounded through the court.

"Your lordship has made a terrible mistake!" said the voice, and the words were followed by a dead silence.

"That is Liz Smith," said a man near me.

But I knew better. The voice was one which I recognised instantly, and I held my breath, wondering what Mary Terral would say.

People were making a way for her towards the bench, and I caught sight of her at last as she moved nearer the judge, whom she addressed. I was startled by the terrible change in her since I had seen her last; her face was thin and deathly pale, her steps seemed weak and tottering as she moved slowly through the people in the body of the court.

Digitized by Google

The judge had been whispering with those beside him on the bench. Now he addressed the girl who had spoken to him. Did she wish to make a statement! If so, she was at liberty to do so.

Then Mary's clear, thrilling voice was heard again in the silent court.

"They tell me, sir," she said, "that you have just condemned a man to death for the murder of my father. That man is innocent. The real murderer is another. His name is on this paper in my hand."

Then everybody looking saw that she was holding up a small piece of India paper, which trembled in her fingers.

"And who is it you accuse?" asked the judge.

The lovely girl gazed slowly round the court and her eyes met mine.

"The murderer sits there!" she said slowly, pointing at me. "It is Sir John Terral!"

All eyes were directed at me.

"I think I must have loved you all through it, dearest."

The denunciation had come at last. It was too late to affect me, however. Mr. Fitz-Henry explained that I had made a full avowal of the affair to him before the trial, and had left it in his hands whether I should place myself under arrest or no.

It was quite a trial in an informal way, and I think the verdict of all acquitted me.

At any rate—which was the most important thing to me—Mary Terral begged me to forgive her when we were alone, after it, in the little waiting-room beside the public court.

I told her frankly she had nothing to forgive.

"But why did you wait so long, Mary," I asked, "before denouncing me?"

"Oh, I could not bear to do it!" clasping her slender hands. "Nothing but the thought that you were allowing an innocent man to suffer would have made me speak."

"Because I am one of the family?" I asked quietly; and the girl flushed hotly. "Or because you like me—a little, Mary?" I went on, encouraged by the flush.

She did not answer then. It was not till days after that she told me.

"I think I must have loved you all through it, dearest, or it could not have been so terrible!"

"Nor could it have been so terrible for me!" I answered.

GEOFFREY SULLIVAN.

Jumbled Story Competition.—21.

ON page 653 appears a story, each line of which is numbered. The lines are all in their wrong position, and the prizes mentioned below are offered to those who write on a sheet of paper the numbers of the lines in the order most nearly correct. The title is jumbled up, and should be correctly given and pasted on the paper containing the effort.

The conditions are jumbled in the following paragraph as an example. The correct order of the lines is given in line 10.

1 SHORT STORIES on or before Monday,
2 awarded to the readers whose solutions first
3 JUMBLED STORY.
4 Four Prizes—one of £5 and three of £1 each—are
5 November 23rd, and envelopes must be marked
6 correct. In the event of a tie, the prizes will be
7 reach this office.
8 All attempts to be delivered at the offices of 9 offered to the readers whose keys are most nearly 10 4—9—6—2—7—8—1—5—3—12—11—13—10.
11 a sheet of paper the figures in the order they
12 Competitors in doing the story should write on
13 believe to be correct, thus:

£2 is offered to the first of the readers living in Ireland who succeeds in forwarding the correct, or most nearly correct, solution.

HAVE YOU S(C)ENT

For a sample bottle of HOME NOTES BOUQUET? If not, forward 1s. 2d. without delay, which sum includes postage. This perfume is of the most elegant and refined kind. Like many another good thing, it is, however, put up "in small parcels," or rather, let it be said, is sold double-distilled. Its virtues must, therefore, not be judged by its bulk for, owing to its extra strength, it is very lasting, so but a few drops are required.

ANY CHRISTMAS GIFTS

you wish to present to lady friends might well take this form, so it has been arranged to supply this beautiful scent in three sizes. No. 1 is to be had for 6s. 6d., No. 2 for 4s., and No. 3 at 2s. If you wish to receive the HOME NOTES BOUQUET per post, kindly inclose 3d. extra for that purpose.

MOST LADIES ARE VERY PARTICULAR

as to what perfume they use, so take the advice of one who knows when you are assured that this scent is not of the cheap, overpowering kind. It is, moreover, sold in handsome cut-glass bottles, an ornament in themselves to any toilet-table.

Digitized by Google

SEE PAGE 652.

PARDON—MR. FEREURAFUL

Jumbled Story No 21.

The two men faced each other. One lay back in an easy chair before the fire, and closed his eyes.

He rose from his chair, and from a cabinet drew Lord Eskdale."

Paul Arnoff's chambers in Piccadilly were the essence of luxury and refinement. His furniture, his innumerable curios were the envy of all who were approaching the door. He looked hurriedly out a little phial, marked "Poison."

A grand piano nearly filled up one side of the mantelpiece was covered with invitation cards. Then I shall be rich—rich."

He was tall, olive complexioned, with rough black work to do yet.

Paul Arnoff himself looked handsome enough as stronger will than he had thought. He sank down in a chair, weak and ill. The other stood before him, I am tired of living My property and money will die."

A heavy tread was coming up the stairs. Arnoff knew him.

With a fierce curse of mingled anger and fear, he curled up in his basket. The mirror over the picture over the piano. A paroxysm of anger came obedient, sprang on to his knee. He shook out a little heap of ashes that lay in the fender.

Such was Paul Arnoff.

"Now," said Paul Arnoff, "you will take that room. In a corner beside it a little white dog lay on to the ground.

"He shall die," he cried. "Why should he live? Come and see me."

A door banged.

A letter lying on the table, addressed in his his priceless inlaid cabinets, his pictures, his silver, breathed heavily, and gradually dropped asleep.

"Why didn't he die?" he cried. "Why does he live?"

A coal dropped with a click to the grate.

An oil painting of a pale, weak man hung over and shivered. When his master went over to him a moment later a little mass of ashes was all that go to my brother, Paul Arnoff.'"

He called his dog to him, and the little animal, will kill him—stay.

Arnoff did not hear it. His head nodded, he paralyse you, and you are at the man's mercy, and blunder."

A moment later his body fell with a crash.

How warm it was there! How comfortable! He rattled. He upset his chair, and glanced underneath. The door opened. Then his eyes fell on a woman looked down from their frames.

Someone opened the door, and closed it again, as he swaggered past them.

Arnoff uttered a fierce curse.

"Fool! Fool, that I am," he hissed. "I have heard the sound and started to his feet. The steps worked, and turning out the lights, went to bed.

He dwelt lovingly over the word.

He would move in a moment.

The wretched man did so.

* * * * *

And Paul Arnoff was cruel and diabolical.

Arnoff took the confession in his hand and read the piano. This was Lord Eskdale, Arnoff's brother, one of the richest peers in the kingdom.

"Now go to your basket, and let me see if you free will—that is—my will."

"To-morrow, I will go and see him. My mind whom people avoided instinctively when they met few grains of powder from the phial into his palm.

He drew off his gloves, and threw them savagely round for his brother's confession. The handle though his black brows were drawn together in a hair, which sparkled and glistened like a cat's when he does what he likes with you."

"Write this: 'I am going to kill myself of my gambled away everything—everything.

The confession of the dead man that was to clear shall master his. My will shall be his will. Then I would like to go sleep. But he must not. He had he fell into a hypnotic sleep.

He leant his elbow on the mantelpiece, and gazed it through. He was exhausted. The man had a teeth in a cruel, sneering expression.

Arnoff took a phial from his pocket, and shaking him in the street, and then turned and gazed after my hunting accident now, but as weak as a baby. Below this, photographs of more than one beautiful pen in your hand, and write as I tell you. It will gave it to the other. He drank it off eagerly.

He laughed when he saw how well the poison brother's handwriting, caught his eye.

The dog crept to his corner, curled himself round, out some powder mixed a little water with it, and the strong arm of a policeman upheld him.

"First I must test it," he said. "I must not not be long," he added to himself, "before I am right through you, and get into your brain and fierce scowl, and his lips came back over his white moment later he was stiff and stark.

"Thanks for inquiries," it ran. "I am almost over strong, masterful, his mind taking control over passes. Presently the weak man's eyes closed, and one of his enemies once said. "Then they burn over him.

"First he shall write a confession. Ha, ha! yes, his, his eyes flashing, his hands making soothing his murderer's name slipped from his fingers. It would have fallen in a swoon to the ground, had not he strode into his rooms that cold November night, slid down his knee, and shot off into the fire. A side, and drink it off, and so kill himself of his own own free will. No one is to blame for my death. and there was a sound of hurrying feet.

"His eyes repel, and yet fascinate you horribly," he shall write his own confession, and sign it, and then he will take the poison that I shall put by his into the fire. Presently his eyes wandered to the one laid one's hand upon it; in a word, a man remained of it.

"Sign it," said Arnoff.

"Eat it up," he said, and the dog obeyed him.

It was a cruel, diabolical deed.

Digitized by Google

ZETTE.

Upon the posters which hung on the outside of the carriage she was styled:

MDLLE. ANTONIA,

Somnambule Extralucide.

Her mother called her Zette—her real name was Suzanne.

She was a pretty girl, not very tall, with fair complexion, and long black hair that she let float about her during her consultations, though ordinarily she wore it in a loose coil upon the nape of a neck that was perfect.

Never having done much work, her hands were delicate and well-shaped—she was enough of a coquette to wish to keep them so. She had a finely moulded form, and to have seen her simply dressed in some quiet colour, with the gait of a wise little work-woman, one would never have suspected her strange calling.

Her mother, Madame Floury, was as little, like others of her class, as her daughter. About her there was nothing in common with the shrews who frequent fairs in red dresses and soiled skirts. She had the air of a little merchant who was good and proper, with a winning, honest smile, and people stopped before the carriage, and even entered there (without thinking of the charlatanism on the posters) in order to see the interior of this small dwelling that smelled so sweet.

The vehicle was painted brown, with a thread of gold running the length of the plinths. There was a tiny balcony in front of it, and on this balcony convolvuli and nasturtiums, planted in boxes, twined about wires up to the roof, where they clustered in bright-hued bunches.

Along the route persons stared in amazement at this queer coach all covered with garlands of flowers.

The two women were always together, but associated very little with their neighbours. They were not proud, and having the best of hearts were the first to offer to care for a sick child, or to give to others in distress. Indeed, the foreigners who knew them well loved them sincerely, even though they did feel somewhat oppressed by what they termed "their grand manners."

There was, however, someone who was all devotion to Zette and her mother.

It was a young gymnast of two-and-twenty, in a large travelling circus, that had very nearly the same itinerary as Mme. Floury. His name was Jacques, but on the play-bills they spelt it Jack. He was exceedingly handsome and of no common type. There was fire in his eyes and much intelligence in his smile. There was, too, much tenderness in this same smile, especially when he spoke to Zette. His love for this pretty brunette—so unlike any other woman he had seen about him in his wanderings—was very sincere.

Near her he felt himself quite another man to what he was in the circus. There was such an atmosphere of honesty surrounding Zette that his own manners, when with her, were altogether different from what they had been, and he was astonished at how well they became him.

Then, too, he had dreamed of being loved by this sweet girl, and of never being separated from her. Their positions accorded admirably. His salary was good, and some day perhaps he might enter one of the great circuses of Lyons, or Paris. It would be charming to find so sweet a little wife awaiting his coming after his work was done.

He had often spoken to Zette of these plans. He loved her so dearly that it could not be possible she did not love him at least a little.

Zette always listened silently, visibly touched by what she heard, and he thought each time she would say "yes," but when he had finished by asking, with such pleading eyes: "Will you be my wife, Zette?" she replied very gravely: "No."

Then Jacques would be astonished. Why not? Could it be that she did not believe him when he said he loved her—that she had no confidence in him—that she did not love him?

"Yes, I love you," Zette answered sweetly; "but I do not wish to marry you."

And she would never say why.

One day, however, Mme. Floury blamed her for refusing the hand of this brave lad.

"Listen, mother," she said; "I adore Jacques, and I believe I shall always remain single because I do not wish to marry him. Do you remember the day when we went together to the circus? I saw, as we entered, how all the women who were there turned their lorgnettes towards him, and afterwards they smiled and talked about him, and tried to attract his attention by applauding him. I ought, perhaps, to have been proud to think that this man, whom they all wanted, loved me, and that I had only to say the word to be his wife. Ah, well, in my heart there was nothing but jealousy. I wanted to tear the lorgnettes away from those women. From what I suffered that evening I understood how much I might suffer if we were married. No, that cannot be. He is too handsome, see? Suppose, some day, when he had grown tired of me, one of those women should take him away from me. I would die, surely. You know now, mother, why I cannot say yes."

Digitized by Google

But notwithstanding this obstinate refusal, which he could not explain, Jacques came every day. He no longer mentioned the subject to Zette, understanding that he was contending against a fixed resolve, except once when he said to her:

"You will not have me, Zette, and I do not wish any other woman. Some day, though, you may change your mind, and then you need only hold out your hand, and say to me: 'Let us be married,' and it will make me happy."

So, after thus simply settling the affair, Jacques was like a brother in the house. It was he who in the spring-time planted the seeds in the boxes upon the little balcony; it was he who twined the tendrils about the wires; and it was he who, at all seasons, furnished the gilded porcelain vases that held the flowers.

These flowers were a great luxury to Zette.

This state of things did not long continue, however. The young girl was now twenty and Jacques twenty-six. One evening he presented his friends with tickets to the circus. It was the last day of a long-continued fair, and Zette and her mother had nothing to do. So they decked themselves in their best and went early.

Mme. Floury was much amused with the horses, the rope-dancers, the clowns, the trained dogs. Zette thought only of Jacques, whose name on the programme occupied a line to itself, and whose apparatus was hanging up at the top of the high tent. The latter consisted of bars, with copper balls that shone, a maze of trapézes, ropes and pulleys, and the young girl, a little frightened, inquired if it all was secure.

At last the first part of the performance was over, and, keeping time to a slow waltz, Jacques appeared. He was as beautiful as a god in his silk tights that displayed to advantage his superbly moulded form, and, for the rest, his costume consisted of a black satin caleçon, spangled with gold.

After having responded by a bow to the applause of the crowd, and by a smile to Zette's smile, he darted up a rope to his trapéze.

The preliminaries were gone through with amid prolonged bravos, for the handsome gymnast was a great favourite, and it was truly a pleasure to see him act—the supple body so pliant yet so marvellously exact in its movements.

Then there came silence—even the orchestra was still. It was to be the hit of the evening, and a new feat that was to give an added glory to the circus. He was to leap from one trapéze to another, with his face and head covered, then suddenly drop from this giddy height upon a net stretched below him. The two trapézes were swinging with a regular movement. Jacques, standing on a little board, his head enveloped in a black velvet bag, put forth his hand blindly. The crowd held its breath. The man was going to jump—he had jumped!

A piercing cry rent the air.

Missing the second trapéze, which had been badly regulated, Jacques fell to the net, but it proved too frail to support his weight, and striking upon the seats, he rolled to the ground, where he lay motionless.

With a cry of horror, Zette sprang to her feet, rigid and pale, her eyes fixed upon the spot where the men were now carrying away the apparently lifeless body of her friend.

Then suddenly seizing her mother's arm, "Come," she said, in a hollow voice.

Breaking through the crowd, the two women reached the stables, but were there refused admission. For a long while they remained at the entrance, listening to what was said around them, but no one knew anything. Finally, Mme. Floury saw a clown whom she recognised as one of Jacques friends. He was just coming out of the refreshment-room when she called him.

"The net broke the force of the fall," said the man, whose face looked troubled, even under the paint. "The doctor says he will be lame for life, and that this ends for him his profession as a gymnast. Poor fellow! But he has something laid up for a rainy day."

Mme. Floury looked at Zette; she was very pale, and her eyes were fixed upon the man as he spoke, as though trying to find if he lied. At least she said: "Let us go."

The two women did not speak as they traversed the grounds of the fair, and they were still silent as they ascended their own little staircase. But when Mme. Floury had lighted the candle, she saw Zette sitting beside the bed with a strange smile on her lips; she felt frightened for her, and went to her.

"Of what are you thinking, little daughter?" she asked, trying to reassure herself.

Then Zette laid her head upon her mother's shoulder, with a childlike gesture.

"I think—that now I can marry Jacques," she told her.

EMILE ROUSTAN.

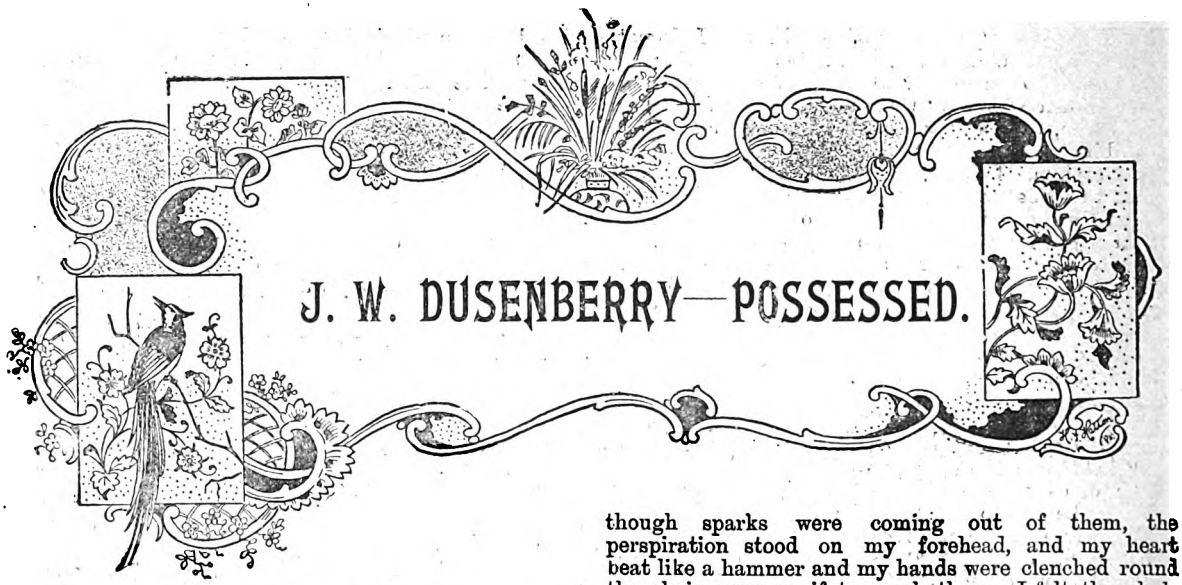
RESULT OF JUMBLED STORY COMPETITION, No. 18.

£5 has been sent to Miss Mary E. Spencer, 8, Bettridge Road, Fulham, S.W. (first correct attempt); and £1 each to Miss J. Walker, 24, Porchester Gardens, Hyde Park, W.C.; Miss Smyth, 129, Forton Road, Gosport, Hants; Mr. A. W. Clarke, Divisional Superintendent's Office, G.W.R., Bristol; Mr. Nicholson, Red Hall, Gainsborough; Mrs. C. Miller, 16, Mark Lane, E.C.

KEY.

7	13	88	103	102	72	104	80	29
8	109	107	83	73	62	116	27	56
1	47	23	64	94	22	14	76	127
3	91	110	71	70	34	121	118	38
2	42	49	12	111	69	130	115	101
5	59	25	68	74	15	50	63	67
4	46	119	55	39	17	112	97	129
6	105	51	79	40	28	93	58	20
9	100	95	44	120	45	108	131	106
48	99	33	19	26	60	21	98	37
82	43	87	77	126	24	90	18	117
41	75	65	124	92	35	30	16	85
84	96	114	57	122	54	52	61	133
113	125	10	123	89	132	32	31
86	81	11	78	128	66	36	53

Digitized by Google



J. W. DUSENBERRY—POSSESSED.

Transmigration of souls? Yes, sir, as true as daylight. A few weeks ago I read an account of a man who dreamt that he had substituted himself for another man, taking on his appearance and his manner of speech.

The story laid so powerful a hold on me that I was unable to settle down to my evening's work, and I started out on an aimless walk, to meditate upon it. The supremacy of will; that was what it meant—individual strength. Why might it not drive the consciousness of somebody else out of him and allow the stronger mind to take possession?

From sheer force of habit, because business takes me there almost every day, I turned into the lobby of the D—— Hotel. It was the echo of my own feet on the tiled floor that made me look up to see where I was and how I got there, and it vexed me a trifle to see how absent-minded I was becoming. Absent-minded! There you are again. What does that mean, if not that the mind may take excursions out of the body? Humph!

I dropped into one of the arm-chairs that are ranged along the lobby, and lit a cigar. They knew me quite well there, so I was sure of remaining undisturbed for some hours, if I chose. I became meditative again, and as the smoke of my weed circled round my head, I noticed J. W. Dusenberry lazily sprawled in a chair, across the way, and drowsily reading an evening paper. I was glad that he had not seen me, for I do not like him. He "did" me in a whist deal once; he received a pair of embroidered slippers intended for me, by mistake, and kept them; but worst of all he went to the West-end when he learnt that I was negotiating for a choice corner there, and bought that identical place—at my figure, too, virtually turning me out.

Great heavens! Why not effect a transmigration and occupy him! I felt that in a single evening I could revenge myself on this man, and none would be the wiser. I determined to try, and bending my eyes on him I willed, with all the nervous power that was in me, that he should lose his consciousness, and that my own should replace it. My eyes tingled as though sparks were coming out of them, the perspiration stood on my forehead, and my heart beat like a hammer and my hands were clenched round the chair arms as if to crush them. I felt the whole force of my being gathered into focus, and just in that focus sat Dusenberry, oblivious to what was happening to him.

Presently his eyes grew heavy, his head sank forward, the paper dropped from his hand; I saw a little shudder pass through him, and at the same instant I heard a ringing in my ears and felt a momentary darkness closing upon me; I was giddy and clutched my chair still harder for support; then I shook myself together, convinced that it was better to leave experiments of that kind to the professors, for it was too weakening.

But, hullo! What did this mean? How had the door, which was on my right, got so suddenly over to my left? And who—what—that man! Asleep in the chair! It was myself! I looked down at my clothes. Amazement! I was Dusenberry!

I uttered a faint cry, that caused two or three loungers near me to look up, but affecting to have been choked with cold I caught at my throat—no, it was Dusenberry's throat—and coughed savagely a few times, in a voice that was harsh, and that I recognised as never having been mine before. Then I dropped back into my chair and stared at my recent self in sheer amazement. The fascination of my old body was too tense to endure long. The sight of it filled me with a kind of dread, as if I might, after all, be looking at it from a wholly disembodied standpoint. How, if I were really to die and be unable to get back, thus keeping Dusenberry out of his place for the rest of his days? It was too uncanny.

I sprang to my feet; that is, I should have done so, if I had my own feet to spring to, but I found that the ones I was using were Dusenberry's, and there was not much spring to him, for he weighed three stones more than I. It also surprised me a little to find that Dusenberry did not see colours precisely as I did, for through his eyes there was a prevalence of yellowish tints, but that might have been because he was bilious. With studied carelessness I started towards the bar, thrusting my—that is, Dusenberry's—hands into my—that is, Dusenberry's—pockets, as I went. There was a purse of sovereigns in the right pockets.

It was no part of my scheme to rob my victim, though

Digitized by Google

I intended to have revenge on him before I was through, and I did not want to touch his money. I had enough of my own. But, good gracious! it was on my other self. There were twenty good £5 notes in the pocket of that unconscious figure across the lobby that belonged to me. After some delay caused by an unaccountable aversion to touching my body, I went over and shook myself. I was breathing heavily, and was, apparently, in a deep sleep. Somehow I appeared different from the way I supposed I did, my impressions in that respect having been based partly on the reports of my mirror and partly on the assurance of my wife—made soon after we had been married.

I never realised, for instance, how large the mole on my cheek was, and I resolved to raise whiskers forthwith. But the money. Dropping into a chair beside myself I began to explore my pockets. My fingers had just closed over the notes and cash when I felt the clasp of a stout hand on my shoulders. It was one of the porters. "Aha, ye blatherskite!" he cried. "We've caught you at it."

Then the situation dawned upon me. I was a thief. But no. Dusenberry was the robber, and would get the blame. He was something of a thief, after all, confound him. Yet, if he were arrested I should be the sufferer, for the time being, at least, and to all appearances I was the sufferer anyhow; but for this once I would not complain of Dusenberry. I—that is, he—assumed a dignified air and said: "Desire the clerk to step this way."

The porter would not leave me, but he held up his hands and beckoned with four fingers to the night clerk, who came directly. I knew him, so it was one of the most natural things in the world to remark: "Good-evening, Mr. Martin," through Dusenberry.

"I do not know you, sir," he answered.

I had forgotten who I was, and the porter took advantage of my momentary confusion to say in a loud voice, full of disbelief, "Look at that, now."

"My friend, Mr. Ferguson," I continued, pointing to my sleeping self, "is subject to a curious lapse, like catalespy. He is liable to be in this condition for a day or two. Kindly keep his watch and money, and give him a room at my expense. I will pay for a day in advance."

I had not intended to do it, but under the circumstances, I had to draw out Dusenberry's money. My manner was so frank, and the purse was so large, that the clerk was impressed and the porter quieted. He summoned another man, and the two of them carried me—that used to be—off upstairs somewhere.

"I know Mr. Ferguson," said the clerk. "I'm afraid he's been drinking."

"Never, sir," I answered, "he would not allow himself to be overcome with liquor. Mr. Ferguson is one of the most moral, most temperate, most admirable young men of my acquaintance. Drinking? Absurd! Take the best care of him, give him what he likes, and I will pay the bill." I slapped a note into the hand of this functionary, and left half a sovereign for the porter; then I left the hotel in a hurry, while the good impression was strong, wiping the perspiration from Dusenberry's brow. On reaching the street I started to walk West, but I noticed a tendency in my legs—I mean Dusenberry's legs—to go the other way. Presently I was startled by a remark: "It's pretty tough, I think, that a man can't do as he likes with his own body."

I had not authorised that statement; I was thinking of something else at the moment, yet the voice was the one that I was using! Horrors! There were two of us in Dusenberry! He had partly reoccupied himself. The situation was perilous. I asserted myself at once by crying: "Silence!" in a loud voice—same voice. "Another word and I will go to the foot of the street and jump off the Embankment."

"And my insurance premium not paid for this quarter!" groaned Dusenberry.

"I command you to subject yourself to my will, and if you behave yourself I shall probably give you back yourself in the morning, for you don't improve on close acquaintance. Go to sleep and remain in that condition until I call you."

Dusenberry subsided, and I was in charge once more. As a reward for his obedience I took him into the best restaurant in town and gave him a good dinner; then I let him go to the opera and occupy a box, though he did not care for that, so I went out after the first act and went into a few bazaars and things. I loathe a bazaar, but I was teaching Dusenberry a lesson. I subscribed with his hand and in his writing to various building funds and missionary funds and charity funds and funds for orphans, and funds for clergyman, and I don't know what all—funds aggregating a stiffish little sum of several hundreds.

But I knew that Dusenberry could stand it, and he was mean in money matters. It would serve my vengeance and be for the peace of his soul to do some good with his money. On leaving the last place I slipped and fell downstairs, for I could not get used to Dusenberry's thick legs. Good! I was bruising Dusenberry. I went into a café and drank a pint of heavy, sweet liqueur. Good! Dusenberry would have the gout. I went into the park and sat on a bench in a chill wind with hat off and coat unbuttoned. Good! I was giving Dusenberry a cold. I returned to the hotel, a little anxious about my real self, when an important person blocked the way and said in a loud voice: "Now then, sir, I want to know when you're going to pay my bill."

It was humiliating to be detained and addressed in this public manner, and I started to blush; but, after all, this was Dusenberry's business. Let him blush if he knew how. I would see if he did. "Never, sir," I answered. And Dusenberry didn't blush. "After being dunned in this open and offensive way I shall not pay you one penny."

"You won't, won't you? We'll see to-morrow."

"Go away. I do not know you."

"Ha, ha! That's good. You'll make my acquaintance in the courts, then, soon."

"Go to the devil!" You see, I was getting up a reputation for rudeness for Dusenberry, and now I had precipitated him into a lawsuit.

Presently I found that I was growing tired, for Dusenberry must have been up late on the night before. And it seemed to me then that I had had enough of my present form. I began to think strongly of home, of my comfortable bed, of my bath, of my cool, fresh linen in the locker. Yes, I would go there, but first I would go to the hotel, get myself, and leave Dusenberry asleep there.

I entered the hotel, looked at the register and requested to be taken to room 24.

"That's where Mr. Ferguson was put, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"Well, he's gone."

"What!"

"He sobered up just a little while ago——"

"How dare you say that he has sobered up? He was no more drunk than I am."

Digitized by Google

"Excuse me, but you are quite sure—I thought—as you were coming in, that your breath—however——"

The cordials, the fatigue! Had I been getting Dusenberry drunk?

"You are sure he has gone?"

"I saw him leave half-an-hour ago."

"Good-night." And I strode from that place in an agitation of soul that ought to have turned Dusenberry's hair grey. I had left that place unguarded. I was now, most likely, walking about the streets of that city, perhaps in the vilest slums, a prey to villainy and accident, a creature without a mind, deaf, blind, unfeeling! What would—what had—become of me? Suppose I were at the bottom of the river at this moment and should be doomed to occupy the inferior body that I lived in at present? Despair! Suppose that Dusenberry's personality should wake up and try to evict my personality and suppose that while I was asleep he should succeed in doing it!

Again, despair! I might be maimed or crushed; my clothes might at this moment be in possession of a gang of corner loafers who would pawn them on the morrow for beer, obliging me to be perdu in the friendly screen of a coal yard until night fell again and I was enabled to steal home without exciting comment. I rushed aimlessly from street to street, making Dusenberry puff as I did so for some minutes before I could form any plan of action, the dread of being permanently locked in with Dusenberry, in his now hated form, driving me almost mad. I went to the nearest police station and inquired if anything had been seen of a tall, good-looking man of thirty-seven, dressed in excellent taste and of polished demeanour, who had left the D—— Hotel while suffering from the effect of a sunstroke?

"Sunstroke in October?" asked the sergeant, lifting his brows.

"Oh—ah—well, it was something like it."

"Well, we ain't seen nothin' of 'im."

I left the place in a new frenzy. On reaching a dark and lonely street I sat on the curb stone and tried to weep, but there were no tears in Dusenberry, and I had to give it up. All this time I had a vague sense of relation to my old self that kept me from utter loss of hope. I remembered that during my ardent wish to be at home a vivid picture, almost like a sensation, of myself going in that direction accompanied the thought. How if, after all, I had retained enough power over my unconscious self to cause it to make that journey? I rushed away in the direction of my flat, and arrived at the door in a bewilderment of hope and fear. The clock struck three as I turned the corner. What a night it had been! I felt in my pocket for my key. Chump, that I was! I had only Dusenberry's key. I knew that if I broke into the house I was liable to get Dusenberry shot and also arrested, and I did not want to go as far as that with him, so I resolved on an expedient hardly less bold; I rang.

Somebody was up and moving about the place. Oh, if it could only be—if I dare hope—I bent all my thought to it.

In three minutes the knob rattled, the door swung open. Dim as the light was, there was no mistaking the figure that stood there. It was myself. "Saints be praised!" I cried. I did get there ahead of myself, after all.

The figure in the doorway stood still, gazing straight into the dark with fishy, unseeing eyes, and breathing heavily, like one who walks in his sleep. Listening at the stair foot I could hear no sound except the snoring of the man on the third floor. The arrival of this automaton of myself had not been known to anybody. My wife was asleep. The bell had been unheard, and only my will had brought this figure to the door.

Seizing it I drew it passively out, closed the door softly behind it and led it up the street to where the shadow of a lime tree fell in a black gloom round some yards of pavement. I leaned it against the tree trunk, grasped its hands and put every atom of my will into an imperious demand to change.

Again, the momentary darkness, faintness, giddiness; then I found myself supported by the tree, looking at Dusenberry, who was tightly clutching my hands and perspiring. I shook him off. He was dazed, and showed a desire to sit down. Taking him by the arm, I walked him to the corner, where a bright light threw a garish illumination over the street.

A policeman approached. When he had come up I said: "Officer, I found this man on my doorstep just now. He rang my bell. He has evidently been drinking, is fairly well dressed and may have money about him. Will you kindly see him away from here?"

The officer nodded and winked, and Dusenberry, dazed but docile, went along with him. He was taken to the police station, but as by that time he had recovered enough of his senses to find the way to his station and thence home, he was allowed to go, no record of the arrest being entered. Both of us slept late next morning. I awoke with a feeling of deep thankfulness and went to the hotel for my watch and money, which I secured only at the cost of a knowing look from the clerk.

Dusenberry awoke to embark in a sea of troubles and misunderstandings. He remembered nothing of what had happened while I occupied his tenement of clay, and to this hour he does not know where he got his cold, or his bruised shins, or his twinge of gout: the papers in a lawsuit gave him an awful shock two days later; but worst of all are the people with subscription books, who came to his house and office at all hours to show him pledges made in his writing, and demand money. Shall he confess that he was drunk and try to beg off from payment, thereby injuring his social and business standing, or shall he give up the sovereign, and further postpone that day when he shall be rich? I do not know. It seems to me that he has been punished enough, and perhaps I owe him a little conscience money. But, at all events, he has shown that the transmigration of identity is fatally possible.

C. S. MONTGOMERY.

POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 21.

£1 1s. to sender of first correct attempt from any place within 100 miles of London; £1 1s. to sender of first correct attempt from any place beyond 100 miles from London. Post-cards only, please. This number of Short Stories contains a miscalculation by a character in one of the stories. Where is it? and what is the correct total?

RESULT OF POST-CARD COMPETITION.

No. 19.

LONDON guinea: W. H. Tue, 17, Chester Road, South Highgate, N.W. Provincial guinea: Chas. A. Phillips, Penrhyn Road, Colwyn Bay, North Wales

Digitized by Google

THE LAST KING OF ATLANTIS

Or, THE ROMANCE OF A LOST CONTINENT.

By GEO. C. WALLIS, Author of "The Winning of Gunhild," etc.

CHAPTER XV.

THE BURNING OF MIROPIS.

NAYRAHN sat alone in the tent, gloomily drinking, and at my rough-and-ready intrusion rose in sullen anger, demanding what brought me to his presence then, and in such manner.

"I came to ask you help me capture this town for the Queen before another sunrise," I made answer.

He looked at me more closely, then, seeing I was not of his command, asked my name.

"Arnon, the son of Didron," I responded boldly.

"The same who was thought to have perished in a burning house in this very town and was afterwards sent as a prisoner on board a slave-ship?" queried the astounded soldier.

"The same," I replied, "come back to take my revenge on the town and its perfidious governor."

"It cannot be done until I get more men," said Nayrahn despondingly. "I have already been repulsed with loss. And also, what authority hast thou, who wert a pirate and an outlaw, to beard me in my den thus?"

"None," I said, "but that of the knowledge that with my aid you may drive out these invaders before the night has passed; and do that with the sanction of the Priests of the Sacred Grotto."

The dark-bearded warrior, prone to vacillation then as since, considered awhile before he decided.

"Out with your plan then, Sir Pirate—if you have one," he ventured at length, "and I'll see what may be done."

"Now art sensible," I observed. "As to my plan, 'tis simply this: that you let me pick out a chosen band of two hundred men and steal quietly into the town—I know its by-ways well—and to hold the rest of your troop in readiness for an attack the moment you see the glare of a burning house, which will be fired near the middle of the town by nightfall. I need no more."

"Shalt have thy desire, then," said the Captain, fired by my confidence at last. "Pick out thy men as soon as is needful, and I will risk the hazard."

I stepped out of the tent at once, and chose my little band from amongst the veterans, not liking the appearance of the young recruits, and after enjoining the necessity for instant action on his part directly I gave the signal, led the way slowly and noiselessly from Nayrahn's camp. When I got my men outside I halted and gave my instructions.

"Follow wherever I may lead without a word or a sound," I said, "and do not draw a sword or bow, or twist a sling until I cry 'Now!' Remember that I am your leader from here, and that these two comrades of mine, Valdo and Atris, are my second officers. Also, that you may know whom you are serving, learn that my name is Arnon, erstwhile a reckless pirate, once renowned as Phrena the Iron-Fingered."

A faint murmur of surprise and admiration burst from the men at this, some of them, doubtless, recalling my doings at the Court of King Dulo. At which I was greatly gratified, feeling also, I think, not displeased at the luxury of revelling in my rightful name! However, assuming a stern air, I commanded silence, giving the word to advance without more ado.

It was rapidly growing dusk, and a moonless, cloudy night was setting in, as I led my band towards one of the barricades, but from which I turned off before we reached it into a thick copse of cedar, near which was the great house, under whose sheltering shadow I had rested fifteen years before, blackened and blistered. Here a trio of sentries paced across the garden in which that house stood, trusting to the nearness of the troop camped behind the barricade to prevent the enemy's entrance through that flowery avenue. Vain hope, when "Sunderer" was amongst the enemy's swords!

Creeping stealthily, slowly, up the mossy banks, taking full advantage of every tree and shrub, my two officers and I contrived to spring upon and finish the unsuspecting sentinels without a sound betraying our success. I caught a glimpse of my man's face, as he fell, before I had given him his quietus, and I swear it would have wrinkled the Nayrahn sat alone in his tent.

Digitized by Google

face of an owl with laughter to have seen the consternation pictured on it! Our way thus made easy, we passed through the still, shadowy garden as though we ourselves were but shadows, noiseless, ethereal, like the rest, instead of grim visaged warriors armed to the teeth, and held on till we were fairly inside the enemy's lines.

Now I gave the word to go forward boldly, with studied unconcern, and thus we marched through the streets, none taking alarm at our appearance, plainly taking us for a troop of their own men, indistinct as all objects were fast becoming in the gathering gloom.

I made straight for the governor's house, where I supposed Sothi would be holding his headquarters, and commanded my men to surround it quietly, to rush to the attack immediately they heard the signal-cry of "Now!" and to fire the house when compelled to retreat, but not until. This manœuvre was accomplished successfully, though a few loitering servants saw us with alarm, and made the building all astir with confusion by the time my men were all in place. My own station was directly facing the great central door, which was all hung with flowering climbers, sweet-scented, and flanked by giant statues of dead kings and noted heroes. Out from this portal, with a very puzzled look, came an over-fed, round-bodied, gaily-bedizened guard grasping a long spear—more ornamental than deadly—in his sleek, fat hands, peering about him as though to ascertain the reason of the sudden disturbance.

"Ha!" thought I, "an you want to know what's towards, my friend, shalt have thy want attended to!" and putting my hand to my mouth, sailor-fashion, I roared "Now!" with all the strength of my lungs. So affrighted was that pampered minion that he dropped his spear, and started back to run as fast as his bulky legs could carry him into the house, bellowing loudly as he ran that the enemy were at his heels. I could have laughed at the sight till my sides ached, but my men were now pressing in on all quarters, and the clash of arms rose deafening on the air, no time being left for mirth to have its sway, so I quickly fitted a bullet to my sling, whirled it round my head in a hissing circle, and stayed his noisiness for ever before he had gone many paces.

Then I rushed at the great door, which was slightly barred, and, helped by two-score of my band, forced it open and strode into the house, where chaos ruled supreme. The inmates for the most part had but just risen from the feast-table, and met us feebly with hastily-seized weapons. The soldiers within, scarcely fifty in number, fought as well as in them lay, disputing our passage from room to room, and terrified women, screaming and weeping, with hair dishevelled and robes flying, ran hither and thither to escape the fray.

"Spare the women!" I cried to my followers, "but slay all the men without mercy, and be speedy with it!"

So, indeed, they were, for, taken by surprise and overwhelmed, and appalled at the penetrating swiftness of my sword as I followed them from chamber to chamber without a pause, the fight soon came to an end by the death of all the resisting defenders. But, to my intense disgust, I saw no sign of Sothi, whom I had come specially to seek.

The street outside and the space surrounding the house was by this time filled with soldiery drawn from the barricades, and our position was becoming one of imminent danger, yet, bidding my men hold ground for a little longer, I flew from room to room, searching among the slain and in every corner and every secret recess I could discover to see if Sothi were indeed within, but all to no purpose. Then, raging bitterly at my ill-luck, I gave the word to retreat and to fire the house in so doing—the inmates left alive having taken flight—and to make for the harbour at once.

Into the dense mass of foes we charged, collecting together and issuing from the main entrance, cutting our way through them, flushed as we were with success, and nonplussed as they were with our boldness, with greater ease than might have been expected, and, once free of the great press, we hastened down a street that led to the sea, hotly pursued. Now, as we ran, we heard a crackling noise, saw a bright glare light up the murky sky, and noticed a sudden murmuring behind us.

The pursuers stopped, then turned back, and presently, above the roar of the fire and the shouts of dismay, heard the sound of fighting all along the landward verge of the town, mingled with the battle-cry of the Queen's troops, and we knew that Nayrahn had kept his word and advanced to the attack.

Relieved of immediate danger, we went on with greater caution, and soon I led my little band out upon the almost deserted stone-faced quay, near which lay the eighty vessels of the rebel fleet. Already their crews were preparing to bring up anchors ready for any emergency, when we came to where one lay with its bow touching the stone work.

"Into it, men, and fire it!" I cried, leaping on the deck as I spoke. "Drive these varlets overboard, fire the rebel craft, and cut her anchor chains, and then leap back again. Tide and wind will do the rest, and we'll clear the shore of this traitor squadron in the porting of a helm."

But that crew were a tougher sinewed set of fellows than we bargained for, so that our task was not at all an easy one, and had not some of my men managed to cut their way down between decks, and loosen the rowers from their seats and bring them up to help us, I fear it would have gone ill with us at last. Thus aided, however, we achieved our object, and having set the great, two-hundred oared ship aflame in a score of places, scrambled back on the wharf, followed by the unfettered slaves, and, severing her cables, let her drift with the flowing tide in upon the vessels betwixt her and the shore.

These became at once all hurry and confusion, when that most dreaded neighbour of the seas swept down upon them slowly—a fire-ship flaming furiously, with not a soul on board. They made all press of sail and cut or slipped their cables clumsily in haste to escape from close proximity to their unwelcome consort, and, to my delight, as the last ship cleared out in safety, the wind, freshening from the north, caught the burning vessel, and, fanning the flames into greater intensity, sent her out again from the land in hot pursuit of the flying fleet.

Every vessel was now under weigh, so great was the terror inspired by the dreaded barque as she bore towards them, her spars banging heavily in the breeze, the water curling up under her prow, the flames bursting out from her bows and splitting the deck and side-timbers with short, sharp, whip-like cracks, and lighting up the seventy and nine sail as they stood out to sea, crowding together and sinking one another in their mad haste to avoid the vicinity of the craft blazing away so weirdly over the dark water and mingling the lurid reflection of her fires with the sky-glare from the burning house in the town behind her. It was a grand sight, and I smiled a wolfish smile as I stood and watched the enemy routed by a single ship.

I led the way back into the town, pushing headlong through the crowds of terror-stricken townsfolk who had come down to the water's edge, and so into the thick of the fight that was being waged in the middle of the town, where our own men had now reached.

The fire from the governor's house had meanwhile spread to others, and round the blazing area the contest was being fought with unabating zeal.

Into the enemy's rear we charged then, "Sunderer" piercing its way as though it were intoxicated with the gore it drank and spilled and the spirits it let loose to wing their way to the Shadows; and, small as was our force, the diversion was enough to turn the battle tide, and change the rebel confusion to a hopeless rout.

Up narrow streets and gloomy by-ways, down festering lanes where offal lay in sickly heaps beside the doors, in and out of this house and that, right to the water's brink, and out upon the wharf and back again into the town, and thence to the barricades, now thrown down in parts, we drove the defeated foes with relentless slaughter, giving no quarter, taking no prisoners, letting none escape, and making the gutters of that bibulous town run red with a liquid that is redder and dearer than wine.

Digitized by Google

Then, paying no heed to Nayrahn's orders to spare the town, I commanded all who were within hearing distance to fire every house and building that would burn, and then strike out of the maze of masonry into the suburbs. In vain the Captain strove to stay the progress of the conflagration when once started, for the wind was still rising, and, fanned into fury by it, the flames spread with marvellous rapidity, leaping streets and open spaces in their heedless advance, roaring awfully from the windows of doomed dwellings, and licking up the timber and the dry tropical shrubs in the gardens with their long serpent-like tongues in the passing of a thought. Soon the evacuation of the town became compulsory, and out upon the plain and among the canebrakes—now trampled into worthlessness—a motley multitude of houseless, homeless men and women and children poured, fleeing in breathless haste from the falling fragments of their town.

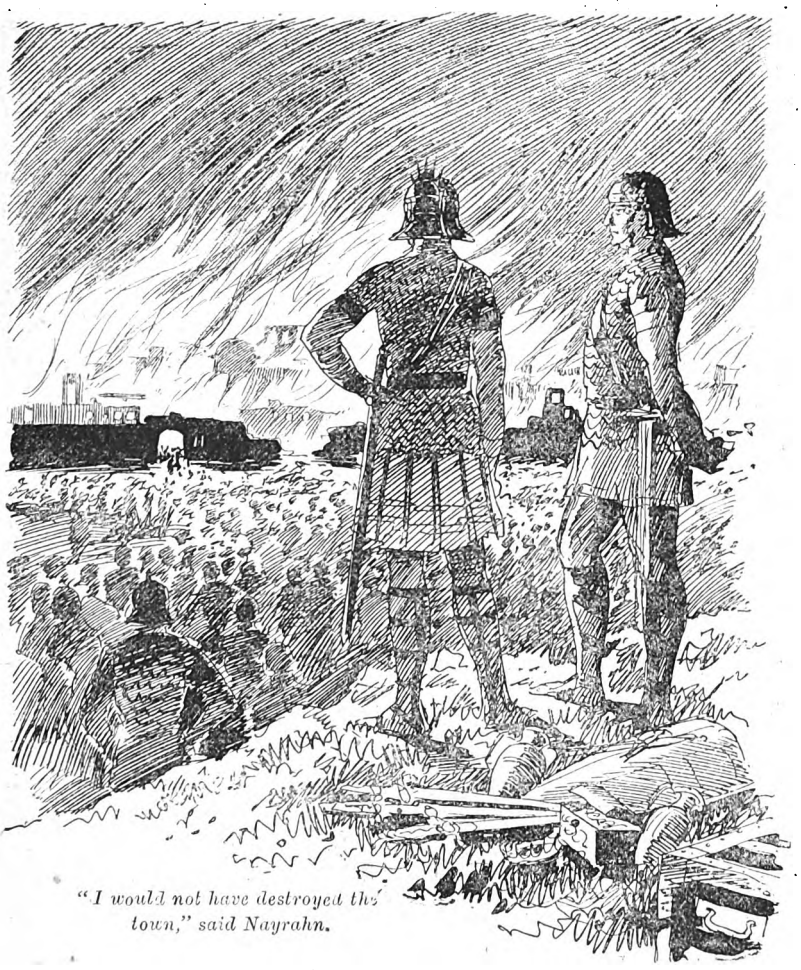
Fiercer and fiercer grew the fire, soaring skyward in a myriad tapering, tossing spires of lurid red, as though 'twould scale the very heavens and set the clouds a-burning. Louder and louder roared and hissed the blaze, as street after street was caught and consumed in its hot embrace. Often and more often charred buildings, crashing, fell, as one by one or score by score, shrivelled, burnt out, they collapsed into indistinguishable ruin, and showers of sparks shot up to show the place where they had been.

I stood with my two officers and Nayrahn, the Captain, on a little knoll, watching the awful scene in all its indescribable grandeur, and thinking exultingly how I had escaped from the clutches of the same devouring element so many years ago.

"I would not have destroyed the town," said Nayrahn gloomily, "but as you gave the command, on you shall rest the blame or praise when I make report to the Queen."

"So be it," I said, "I wish no fairer judgment." For now I know from Unim that Briseis was no party to the treachery that I had so long held her guilty for, though I could not see how else my name had leaked out, I felt the old love and the old self-confidence in her affection return with ten-fold force. I saw now, clearly as though a veil had been drawn from before my eyes, that I had never loved Viol, or Vesta, or the Princess Listra with the same deep, true, lasting love that I felt for my Briseis, who was now my Queen. But you wander from the straight path of your narrative, Arnon!

Towards the dawn the fire had near spent itself, only a sudden blaze here and there, the orange glow of smouldering beams, and the duller colour of heated stone and brickwork, giving evidence that it still existed; and when the morning sun arose in its brilliancy, dispersing the cloud and smoke rack that lingered overhead, it shone slanting upon a great blackened expanse of smouldering, hissing ruins, with scarce a building standing whole in that which but the day before had been a thriving town, well filled with a busy populace. Our victory was, indeed, complete; the enemy had been annihilated almost to a man, and the seaboard towns that might be tempted to go over to the rebels had been given a salutary warning.



"I would not have destroyed the town," said Nayrahn.

Out in the offing, as soon as the light became strong enough, we made out the sixty sail flying the rebel flag—all that remained of their four score—evidently waiting to take off any survivors who might wish to leave Atlantis. Hoisting a white flag as a token of truce, we allowed them to do this, Nayrahn saying, to my entire satisfaction, that the fewer of the treacherous citizens we kept on shore the better. Some four or five thousand were embarked, and the fleet started westward immediately, whilst we, as soon as the noonday heat had passed its hottest point, set off towards Kronos, many of the soldiers loaded heavily with the loot they had obtained in the brief fight. Valdo and Atris and I were encumbered enough with the gold we carried, it is true, but we could ride with ease compared with the discomfort and awkwardness of some of the greedy troopers.

As we drew near to Kronos, traversing much the same ground that I had once crawled over, a burnt and blistered fugitive, I saw with grief the ravages that the great army had made on the surrounding fertile lands for its own support. Vast tracts of maize and wheat, that ought then to have been waving in yellow billows 'neath a ripening sun, lay gaunt and bare, or covered with short stubble, the precious grain having been cut and taken before it was fairly come to maturity. The aloes and the ceiba trees were stripped of their fruit for leagues, and the country-folk wandered, disconsolate, about their empty villages and lands or sat moodily by their doorstones, scowling evilly on us as we passed or muttering curses on all who bore arms.

Digitized by Google

Gods! it wrung my heart to see the misery on some of their faces as our men rode by, well-fed, with ribald jests and coarse laughter and brutish jeers at the cravens who stayed at home instead of seeking glory on the field; to see the wasted forms of the women who had denied themselves for the sake of their little babes—and oft in vain, as was testified by the sad processions that at intervals crossed our path, bearing tiny biers to the village burying-grounds.

CHAPTER XVI.

"QUEEN BRISEIS COMES!"

FAR and wide over the landscape stretched the mighty host, the thousands of its tents whitening the ground as though that tropic region had received a heavy fall of northern snow; the glittering of the thousand weapons of its sentinels reflecting the rays of the morning sun in line after line around the great circumference of the encampment; the armour of the officers and horsemen glinting fitfully as they rode to and fro in the streets of that city of soldiers; the heavy fodder and lighter commissariat waggons lumbering and rattling along the canvas-sided avenues or discharging their loads in the several market-places set up in that white wilderness; and the confused murmur of its many voices hanging over it all like the sound of a busy town.

Southward the camp reached to the villas and gardens of Kronos, eastward to the sea line, northward to the three great burial pyramids, unequalled in size save by the mighty monuments I have seen in the Land of Khem, and to the westward to where we sat in our saddles, looking upon the animated scene. Nearly two hundred thousand men were there congregated—a vast and seething flood of human energy, held in bounds, but ready to overflow or burst its banks and rush with devastating impetus wherever it might be needed, a very deluge of war and death.

"Let the rebels land, with all the men they can muster," said I to my couple of worthies; "let them land, and I will wager but little on their chances against this brave array!"

As we rode into the camp and down the widest of its myriad wide streets, I observed that it was all astir with excitement, as though some startling news were passing from lip to lip, and all was bustle and gossip, even the tawdry-dressed and bedizened camp followers taking unwonted interest in the words that fell from their temporary swains as they drank their morning allowance. Scores of messengers were afoot, rushing from tent to tent with wonderful alacrity, and stopping one of these by neatly throwing my loosened bow-string over his head—to his great surprise and indignation—I inquired what was in the wind that everyone must know about so urgently. After fulminating for a while at my rough and ready mode of detention, he choked down his choler and proceeded to enlighten my darkness.

News had that morning arrived, he said, that the Prince of Aidè had returned to his province, collected its soldiers, and thrown in his lot with the rebels. The Princess and her subjects had rallied to his side with marvellous unanimity when his object became known, and he had unfurled the rebel flag over the palace of Thinæ. Also Nayrahn had brought tidings of the fall of Miropis, and the scattering of the fleet that lay there. Also the Sleeper, who had slept in the sacred Grotto near Miropis, had been awakened by one Arnon, who had been a pirate, the son of the noted Didron, erst known as Phrena the Iron-Fingered, who had likewise played a brave part in the defeat of the renegade Sothi; and more than that, the Sleeper, who gave out his name to be Marenso, had appeared in the encampment but three hours ago, accompanied by two priests, and had gone thence to the Royal Palace in Kronos.

"Small wonder, then," concluded my informant, "that excitement reigns and all minds are unsettled, for the prophecy that was foretold of Marenso, who has slept a thousand years, is in all men's mouths, some fearing thereat and all greatly amazed."

"Small wonder, indeed," said I, "that such a budget of ill and good news together should cause a passing turmoil. But canst tell me the nearest way to the Palace? For I have a message that will startle thee, I think, when I say that I am the Arnon of whom you have spoken, who captured Miropis and awoke the Sleeper, and I would fain see the Queen."

Rendered almost speechless with surprise, the messenger pointed me out the way, and then ran with fleeter feet than before to spread the added item of news that I had given him.

"Now you know my name and fame, will you still go with me or mingle in this throng?" I asked my comrades, wishing to test them once more.

"We go with you wherever you wish," said Atris.

"We follow your fortunes through bright days or dark ones, in war or peace, and like you all the better for knowing who you are," said Valdo, "for we heard the story of Didron and his son years ago."

"Then come with me to the Palace," I said, assured now of their lasting fidelity, "and before many weeks have passed, if I mistake not, we shall all three be in high position, either in the army or the fleet."

So we threaded our way along the avenues of the camp, now nearly in an uproar with the morning's strange intelligence, passed into the city streets, making our way with difficulty through the thronging crowds of people, scarcely less agitated by the flying rumours than the soldiery, and gaining the Palace grounds, pushed ourselves unceremoniously amongst the crush of courtiers who aired their finery and simpering gracefulness for the benefit of the ladies engaged in similar posturings, and at last, dismounting, stood within the great hall that leads to the audience chamber of the Sovereigns of Atlantis.

Further we could not penetrate for some time, so great was the press of nobles and functionaries, but by dint of lusty elbowing and shouldering, and taking advantage of every inward rush, we won through with linked hands into the audience room itself and stood amid the throng before the famous Silver Throne, which was polished as a mirror and all inlaid with intertwining patterns of smooth rose-coloured granite, worked in so dexterously as to seem but one united whole. Its richly cushioned seat was vacant when we entered, and all eyes were directed towards the heavy hangings beyond it, where the Queen would presently appear.

Whilst we waited thus, expectant of her coming, I felt more fearful, more nervous, than I had ever felt before, even in direst danger. My heart throbbed violently against my side, my knees trembled, and the flesh stood up in chilly pimples on my body—strange symptoms, truly, in one so little used to indulge in weak emotion. Not strange, though, when all the causes are taken into account, for surely 'tis not often man stands face to face with a climax like that I felt approaching, when the drapery behind the throne swayed slightly, as with someone shifting it aside.

At that moment the great chamber, with its costly tapestries worked in with the history of our rulers, the swaying sea of human faces, with eyes upturned and necks strained to catch the first glimpse of their sovereign; the throne itself and the purple curtain, all seemed to swim in a misty haze, and then to vanish from my senses. Instead, out of the blackness that succeeded, grew a snow-white cloud, that, as in thought I gazed, took shape and lessened and drew nearer, and as it came, stretched out two arms towards me in loving greeting. I looked again, and it seemed as though the cloud had changed to a female form I knew too well, and, glancing upwards at the face, I saw that it was the face of Briseis, my long lost love, crowned with her wealth of raven hair, which, escaping from its fastenings, fell in rich and ample folds upon her shoulders.

Digitized by Google

Gave me her hand to kiss.

A moment I looked on that cloud-born image, speechless in its astral thinness, then it slowly faded away into shapeless nebulosity, while in my ears rang an usher's cry, taken up by a thousand voices all around in the joyful shout:

"Queen Briseis comes!"

The cloud-mist vanished into the dark whence it came, and out of the dark grew in an instant the great chamber in which I stood, its crowded audience, and the silver throne in view of all, not empty now, but occupied by the counterpart of the vision I had just seen with my spirit eyes. 'Twas Briseis' self who sat in that regal seat.

Long I gazed at her before I ventured forward, scanning every detail of the well-remembered form with hungry eyes. She was still as witching-figured as when I first saw her as I lay in her garden, still as queenly in her royal robes as when she had walked beside me on its blossom-bordered paths, the mistress of that dear domain, still as thoughtful in her winsome glance as then, and still as lovely in my sight as ever, but cares of state and private worries, and, perchance, a pining for my long absence, had not passed by without leaving their marks upon her in the thinner cheek, the more unresting eye, the sharper word; yet all this rather endeared me the more than broke the charm, for the beauty that survives the years, that outlives and defies life's ills and sorrows, the beauty that beams the brighter for all the trouble-tests that would destroy another's charms, is ever the best and purest loveliness that earth can show.

Thinking thus, as I gazed my fill on the Queen that I, a wandering adventurer, dared to covet for my own, I felt the old sweet longing stealing unresisted through my mind.

Unable to bear the strain without a word, I pushed to the front and stood at the foot of the three oaken steps that lead to the Throne-seat, and standing there, raised my eyes unflinchingly to the lady who sat upon it, clad in her royal vestments. She looked at me then, who came forward so roughly and so disdainful of Court etiquette, and amid the angry murmurs of those around who waited for a hearing, our eyes met, and all travel and war marked as I was, and changed from fiery youth to graver manhood, she knew me in an instant, and heedless of the cynosure of those thousand eyes, gave me her hand to kiss, and whispered to me, soft and low, her voice thrilling on the chords of memory with sweet reminiscence:

"Art returned at last, thou wanderer! But know this for thy comfort and greeting, that though I have awaited thee so long, my patience is not yet gone."

"My Queen," I murmured faintly, "those are the sweetest words that I have listened to since last I saw thee!"

"Now rise," said Briseis, in the same low tone, "it is not meet for us to consummate our reunion here, for cares of State are heavy and pressing;" then, in a louder voice, that rang with truly regal hauteur, she went on: "Thy petition, O Arnon, is granted, and henceforth thou art one of my trusted officers. Now stand thee on my right hand, and thou, usher, bring in the Sleeper who has wakened from his rest of a thousand years."

The command was instantly obeyed, and the attention of the audience was happily diverted from us to the wondrous Sleeper, who, dressed in his antique garb, was led before the throne by Unim and his fellow-priest. At the Queen's desire Unim related the tradition that had been handed down from generation to generation, and recited the prophecy that was told concerning the waking of Marenso.

His words rang clearly in the deathlike silence that prevailed, and many a face blanched fearfully as the saying of dread import sounded in their ears:

"For whoso wakes the Sleeper shall bury him, dead truly, in the Sacred Grotto, and whosoever shall be king of Atlantis in the day that the Sleeper dies, shall be its last king, and the end of the land itself shall not be far away."

At another time, I, too, should have been impressed with the message of hovering doom, but now I saw nothing but Briseis, sitting there in state, her lovely face unmoved by either joy or sorrow, and heard nothing that I cared about save the music of her voice.

Then Marenso stood forth, looking as a man who had passed through a stern struggle with a great grief, and coming out triumphant, had nevertheless emerged with the marks of the conflict upon him. He confirmed the words of Unim, and proved, by describing the land as he had known it and telling what king reigned when he was last awake, that his slumber had lasted a thousand years or more; and adding that it was held in his day, as a message from the gods, that the end of Atlantis would come by water and her people and her greatness alike would be buried beneath the sea.

Digitized by Google

The faces of his hearers whitened still more as they listened to him, speaking as one who had risen from the dead and was revealing to them the secrets of the Shadow Land, and all hailed with a sigh of relief the appearance of Nayrahn, who recounted the capture of Miropis; and the messenger who brought the tidings of the secession of the Province of Aidè. Then, to my immense satisfaction, the Queen intimated that the audience was at an end, and all saving myself, Marenso, Unim and his fellow-priest, Nayrahn, and Valdo and Atris, withdrew from the chamber.

"Now we can talk in peace, my faithful subjects," said Briseis, "now we can consider what measures to take in face of the dangers that are threatening us on every side, undisturbed by a frivolous and fearful crowd of sycophants. And first I would know how we are to proceed against the rebels in our motherland?"

"Since you ask, my Sovereign," said Marenso, "I would advise that you send the half of yonder vast array to reconquer the recalcitrant province where rebellion has uplifted its evil head; and that it be done speedily, before the foreign traitors can pour their forces into it."

"'Tis good counsel, Sleeper," said the Queen, "and showest that thou hast soon busied thyself with the affairs of this age. But which of my generals can I best trust for this immediate and important task? I have none, well tried, such as Quitzaal has in his army."

"If you need a man who may be trusted and has lived in the service of arms," cried Marenso eagerly, "you might do worse, O Queen, than appoint me the leader of this expedition. Trust me, and I shall not fail!"

"What wast thou, Marenso, when last thou wast awake?"

"I was King Monteza's general-in-chief," replied the soldier, "and so established his throne that no enemy dared lift his head in our dominions for seven years before I fell asleep."

"Is it your wish, my councillors—for such henceforth you seven shall be—that I make Marenso my general?"

"It is," we answered, though Nayrahn did so doubtfully, as was his wont, agreeing that the sooner the troops were set in motion the better, lest they should succumb to a universal panic.

"And 'twill be something to divert my thoughts," said the Sleeper, bowing low as the favour was bestowed upon him, "for all things are strange to me here, and the sudden loss of friends and relatives and everything I cherished is still bitter upon me."

I pitied him, then; for an awful thing it must be to awake from slumber to find the darkness of a thousand years fallen down between oneself and all familiar forms and places.

"And also," continued Queen Briseis, "I need a captain for my fleet, to lead it out to meet and conquer the great company of ships that Vichri is reported to be bringing to the attack of Kronos."

"For that service there are few so well fitted as Arnon the Pirate," said I, "who loves the sea as his childhood's home, and glories above all things in the sailing of a ship!"

"'Tis thy old fault, Arnon," smiled my royal mistress, "to know thy own merits so well and so witlessly to noise thy knowledge abroad! Nathless thou hast the duty thou cravest."

This time I bowed low in token of thanksgiving for the honour thus laid upon me, and Briseis went on:

"As to you, my priests, do you strive to quell the fright that has come upon the people because of the prophecy. It were ill for them to grieve before the evil falls, and though the sea is rising ever, Kronos and Miropis are still untouched by its advance, and the worst may be long in coming. Go, then, and do my bidding, and a royal present shall be forthcoming to enrich your Sacred Grotto."

"We go, and willingly," said Unim, "for of a truth your Majesty speaks as one inspired of the Spirits," and they departed.

"And thou, Nayrahn, I appoint the Captain of my Guard, for art a brave, if a careful soldier."

Together with Marenso, after making due obeisance, the officer withdrew, followed by Valdo and Atris, whom I motioned to await me outside the palace precincts. Alone I lingered by the throne, fidgeting nervously with the hilt of my sword, seeming unable to break the spell of the silence of that empty room.

"Why stayest thou, Arnon?" asked the Queen.

"Why?" I said, the sound re-echoing round the vaulted hall. "Why? Because, my Queen, whom once I called my love, because—because—forsooth, I cannot go."

"I knew it, my Arnon," said she, "and have waited with scant patience to rid me of these pestering courtiers and councillors, that we may talk alone for a moment. Say, hast never forgotten me in all these years?"

"But once, my Briseis," I answered, "in a way that I will tell thee if thou wishest, although, till a few months agone, I thought 'twas thou betrayed me into exile, using Sothi as an instrument."

"That is what I ever feared," returned my love, "and but that the traitor Sothi stood high in favour with King Dulo, and latterly with his regiment, I had punished him for his evil-doing. Some time I will tell thee the foul story, and thou shalt tell me the tale of thy wanderings, and how thou didst come to forget me even once; but it is not seemly that we stay longer here together, for subjects will talk, and a queen must have regard for their gossip though she despise it in her heart."

"'Tis true," I answered, "and I go, if you will grant me but a lover's kiss to seal the re-uniting of our lives."

"Shouldst have thy boon, my long-lost one," said the Queen, looking at me as though half afraid I meant to take it by violence, "shouldst have thy desire were I as I once was; but slaves and spies are ever round a sovereign's throne, and who knows what eyes may not be on us even now? Nay, who knows what ears have heard our talk already? 'Twere not safe for thee to stay a moment longer. Yet stay"—as I turned to go with a leaden heart—"where art going to lodge thyself and thy followers?"

"I know not, nor care," I said gloomily.

"Then obey thy Queen," said Briseis, looking at me with the old light in her lustrous eyes again, "and take thy quarters in the house where I lived when I first saw thee—thou know'st it, dost thou not, Arnon?—and make it thy home till such time as fortune may favour thee with a change. Thou mayst be wandering in the garden some even—who shall say?—and maybe I visit that same tree-shaded nook at intervals to gain an hour of solitude. There, take what comfort thou canst from that, my Arnon, and put not my good repute in jeopardy by lingering more."

Thus reassured, I turned and went, though slowly, and often looking back before I reached the door. Passing out as the usher re-entered with a score of female waiting slaves, I strode off rapidly to seek my inseparable worthies. They found, I directed my course without delay to the house I remembered so well, near the western outskirts of the city, and took up my abode in its luxurious interior, together with Valdo and Atris, who never tired of commending themselves on their great good luck in being attached to so favoured a patron, and of being waited on with such ceaseless, tireless zeal by the retinue of obsequious slaves that the great establishment maintained, and whom we endeared to our service by a profuse outpouring of golden largess on the first day of our residence there.

Full often the place was thronged with guests and officers of State and many sea captains, till I was nigh distraught with divided attentions and constant banqueting and long confabulations; for none could discuss the least matter of national import unless their paunches and tongues were well lubricated with plenteous repasts and copious bumpers of hill-side wine.

Digitized by Google

I was soon heartily disgusted with them all, save the sea captains. Those I favoured above all the others, seeming to hear the song of the sea in their rough and rollicking talk and spicy yarns that smacked full strong of the briny wave! With them I grew a favourite, as with most others I met, for was I not rich and great and patronised by Royalty, and singled out by the Spirits as their Instrument of Fate?

Yet I would gladly have foregone all this cringing subservience and flattering attention, all this pomp, and glitter, and show, and tinsel, and gaud, for the life that I lived a few short months with Briseis in the years gone by.

It was with unconcealed joy that I escaped from it an hour or two each day to visit the army on the plain, assist in the preparation of Marenso's force for departure, and, finally, to see him start north-westward with his battalions in brave array; or to go down to the Bay of Kronos to supervise the manning and victualling of the huge fleet of five hundred sail waiting there for news of the enemy's movements.

One thing I discovered on these latter visits that gladdened my heart next to the sight of the Queen was that tight old ship, the Ravager, that had carried me in triumph over many a league of tossing, heaving billows, whereon my youthful hands first learned to steer, to warp, to heave to, to slip cable, and hoist sail; whereon I fought 'neath lusty Didron, rough-hearted but true, and whereon I slew cantankerous Zerah for slighting my golden-haired, sunny-tempered Viol.

There she lay by the wharf, that tough old ship, her long, low hull dwarfed by comparison with the great warships around her, but herself more than a match for any of them, I stoutly avowed.

Remembering the swiftness of my lost Seamew and the rig of her Egyptian sail, I had like spars and canvas, though heavier and larger, put on my veteran ship, adding to the prow a sharp iron beak like that I had noticed on Strong-Arm Thaska's vessel, also increasing the number of rowers by fifty; and now I had a craft that I dared against the fleetest in the bay for a ten-league spin—the stake a bar of gold, for I had now fetched all the treasure from my cave and lodged at my home—and, though ill-served by tide and breeze, the good old Ravager outpaced them all with many a length to spare, from that time till now remaining my flagship, the most famous vessel that has ever ploughed the deep Atlantian seas.

Atris and Valdo were numbered amongst her crew of two hundred sturdy sailors, all picked men, and 'twas my greatest joy to tread her deck and make short voyages along the coast to try her speed and toughness.

Many days passed thus busily, and often I wandered in that fair garden, waiting for my love, listening to the birds' sweet carillons, the tinkling of the little rills, and the plashing of the fountains; revelling in the rich odours exhaled by its myriad vari-coloured flowers, and oft reclining silently upon its mossy banks, or sitting on the rude timber seat beneath that well-known leafy grove through which at night the moonbeams stole; yet for weeks she for whom I waited came not.

Then tidings reached us by couriers from the north of the great success of Marenso and the utter rout of the Prince of Aidè's force, which, the messengers said, had been driven after many losses to take refuge in the mountains once infested by robbers, and was there beleaguered by the loyal hosts.

Many of the rebels had deserted to our standard, but the chief nobles and their two leaders were with the remnant in the hills. All accounts spoke highly of the military genius and popularity of the awakened Sleeper, who seemed as one come down from another world to aid Atlantis in her need.

Also news was brought by a swift-sailing merchant vessel that at last the rebel fleet was fairly under weigh, and making for our southern shores, the captain of the ship having seen the great flotilla not many days' voyage beyond Miropis, moving slowly as though weighted down by a full complement of soldiery and stores.

Directly I received this information I proceeded to hasten the preparation of the fleet for taking the sea, and the following day saw everything in readiness for the start. But there is one thing I ought to relate here, that happened before these tidings arrived.

It was one forenoon, when the city was given over to rejoicing at the victories of Marenso, that I observed Atris, alone amongst the merry-makers, wearing a most woeful countenance, and hanging about me as though wishing to say something, but scarcely daring to. At last I grew tired of his hesitancy, and asked him to out with it and let me know what troubled him.

"Thou'rt ever favoured by beauty's smiles," said he mysteriously, "and even the Queen, if I mistake not, looked on thee with love when we stood by."

"'Tis not of myself you wish to speak," I said impatiently, "'tis of thy own affairs, I warrant. Come, man, say what ails thee or what boon thou cravest, and not go round and round the subject like a love-sick maid!"

"Though 'tis not thyself I wish to speak of, thou hast greatly to do with my desire," answered Atris, finding his tongue more readily now. "There was a maiden whom thou didst save from a bullying soldier on the road between here and Miropis. Dost remember?"

"I do," I said, starting, for the affair had slipped my memory.

"And didst thou not promise her to put the matter before the Queen, lest a similar evil should befall her?"

"So I did," I answered, self-condemned.

"And hast forgotten thy promise, and is that lovely maid to be left whatever fate may pass her way these troublesome war times?"

"Thou art right, my Atris," I made reply, "for, truth to tell, I had let the matter slip my mind, so pestered are we with these crowds of hollow-hearted hangers-on at Court. I'll see the Queen this very day and ask her royal permission to send for the maiden and her father to the city, out of harm's way."

"But will the maiden be safer here, think'st thou, than under her father's humble roof?"

